Now that their first joy was over they began to harbour anxieties. Hamilcar's demands would be cruel. But Spendius reassured them.

"I will speak!" And he boasted that he knew excellent things to say for the safety of the army.

Behind all the bushes they met with ambushed sentries, who prostrated themselves before the sword-belt which Spendius had placed over his shoulder.

When they reached the Punic camp the crowd flocked around them, and they thought that they could hear whisperings and laughter. The door of a tent opened.

Hamilcar was at the very back of it seated on a stool beside a table on which there shone a naked sword. He was surrounded by captains, who were standing.

He started back on perceiving these men, and then bent over to examine them.

Their pupils were strangely dilated, and there was a great black circle round their eyes, which extended to the lower parts of their ears; their bluish noses stood out between their hollow cheeks, which were chinked with deep wrinkles; the skin of their bodies was too large for their muscles, and was hidden beneath a slate-coloured dust; their lips were glued to their yellow teeth; they exhaled an infectious odour; they might have been taken for half-opened tombs, for living sepulchres.

In the centre of the tent, on a mat on which the captains were about to sit down, there was a dish of smoking gourds. The Barbarians fastened their eyes upon it with a shivering in all their limbs, and tears came to their eyelids; nevertheless they restrained themselves.

Hamilcar turned away to speak to some one. Then they all flung themselves upon it, flat on the ground. Their faces were soaked in the fat, and the noise of their deglutition was mingled with the sobs of joy which they uttered. Through astonishment, doubtless, rather than pity, they were allowed to finish the mess. Then when they had risen Hamilcar with a sign commanded the man who bore the sword-belt to speak. Spendius was afraid; he stammered.

Hamilcar, while listening to him, kept turning round on his finger a big gold ring, the same which had stamped the seal of Carthage upon the sword-belt. He let it fall to the ground; Spendius immediately picked it up; his servile habits came back to him in the presence of his master. The others quivered with indignation at such baseness.

But the Greek raised his voice and spoke for a long time in rapid, insidious, and even violent fashion, setting forth the crimes of Hanno, whom he knew to be Barca's enemy, and striving to move Hamilcar's pity by the details of their miseries and the recollection of their devotion; in the end he became forgetful of himself, being carried away by the warmth of his temper.

Hamilcar replied that he accepted their excuses. Peace, then, was about to be concluded, and now it would be a definitive one! But he required that ten Mercenaries, chosen by himself, should be delivered up to him without weapons or tunics.

They had not expected such clemency; Spendius exclaimed: "Ah! twenty if you wish, master!"

"No! ten will suffice," replied Hamilcar quietly.

They were sent out of the tent to deliberate. As soon as they were alone, Autaritus protested against the sacrifice of their companions, and Zarxas said to Spendius:

"Why did you not kill him? his sword was there beside you!"

"Him!" said Spendius. "Him! him!" he repeated several times, as though the thing had been impossible, and Hamilcar were an immortal.

They were so overwhelmed with weariness that they stretched themselves on their backs on the ground, not knowing at what resolution to arrive.

Spendius urged them to yield. At last they consented, and went in again.

Then the Suffet put his hand into the hands of the ten Barbarians in turn, and pressed their thumbs; then he rubbed it on his garment, for their viscous skin gave a rude, soft impression to the touch, a greasy tingling which induced horripilation. Afterwards he said to them:

"You are really all the chiefs of the Barbarians, and you have sworn for them?"

"Yes!" they replied.

"Without constraint, from the bottom of your souls, with the intention of fulfilling your promises?"

They assured him that they were returning to the rest in order to fulfil them.

"Well!" rejoined the Suffet, "in accordance with the convention concluded between myself, Barca, and the ambassadors of the Mercenaries, it is you whom I choose and shall keep!"

Spendius fell swooning upon the mat. The Barbarians, as though abandoning him, pressed close together; and there was not a word, not a complaint.

Their companions, who were waiting for them, not seeing them return, believed themselves betrayed. The envoys had no doubt given themselves up to the Suffet.

They waited for two days longer; then on the morning of the third, their resolution was taken. With ropes, picks, and arrows, arranged like rungs between strips of canvas, they succeeded in scaling the rocks; and leaving the weakest, about three thousand in number, behind them, they began their march to rejoin the army at Tunis.

Above the gorge there stretched a meadow thinly sown with shrubs; the Barbarians devoured the buds. Afterwards they found a field of beans; and everything disappeared as though a cloud of grasshoppers had passed that way. Three hours later they reached a second plateau bordered by a belt of green hills.

Among the undulations of these hillocks, silvery sheaves shone at intervals from one another; the Barbarians, who were dazzled by the sun, could perceive confusedly below great black masses supporting them; these rose, as though they were expanding. They were lances in towers on elephants terribly armed.

Besides the spears on their breasts, the bodkin tusks, the brass plates which covered their sides, and the daggers fastened to their knee-caps, they had at the extremity of their tusks a leathern bracelet, in which the handle of a broad cutlass was inserted; they had set out simultaneously from the back part of the plain, and were advancing on both sides in parallel lines.

The Barbarians were frozen with a nameless terror. They did not even try to flee. They already found themselves surrounded.

The elephants entered into this mass of men; and the spurs on their breasts divided it, the lances on their tusks upturned it like ploughshares; they cut, hewed, and hacked with the scythes on their trunks; the towers, which were full of phalaricas, looked like volcanoes on the march; nothing could be distinguished but a large heap, whereon human flesh, pieces of brass and blood made white spots, grey sheets and red fuses. The horrible animals dug out black furrows as they passed through the midst of it all.

The fiercest was driven by a Numidian who was crowned with a diadem of plumes. He hurled javelins with frightful quickness, giving at intervals a long shrill whistle. The great beasts, docile as dogs, kept an eye on him during the carnage.

The circle of them narrowed by degrees; the weakened Barbarians offered no resistance; the elephants were soon in the centre of the plain. They lacked space; they thronged half-rearing together, and their tusks clashed against one another. Suddenly Narr' Havas quieted them, and wheeling round they trotted back to the hills.

Two syntagmata, however, had taken refuge on the right in a bend of ground, had thrown away their arms, and were all kneeling with their faces towards the Punic tents imploring mercy with uplifted arms.

Their legs and hands were tied; then when they were stretched on the ground beside one another the elephants were brought back.

Their breasts cracked like boxes being forced; two were crushed at every step; the big feet sank into the bodies with a motion of the haunches which made the elephants appear lame. They went on to the very end.

The level surface of the plain again became motionless. Night fell. Hamilcar was delighting himself with the spectacle of his vengeance, but suddenly he started.

He saw, and all saw, some more Barbarians six hundred paces to the left on the summit of a peak! In fact four hundred of the stoutest Mercenaries, Etruscans, Libyans, and Spartans had gained the heights at the beginning, and had remained there in uncertainty until now. After the massacre of their companions they resolved to make their way through the Carthaginians; they were already descending in serried columns, in a marvellous and formidable fashion.

A herald was immediately despatched to them. The Suffet needed soldiers; he received them unconditionally, so greatly did he admire their bravery. They could even, said the man of Carthage, come a little nearer, to a place, which he pointed out to them, where they would find provisions.

The Barbarians ran thither and spent the night in eating. Then the Carthaginians broke into clamours against the Suffet's partiality for the Mercenaries.

Did he yield to these outbursts of insatiable hatred or was it a refinement of treachery? The next day he came himself, without a sword and bare-headed, with an escort of Clinabarians, and announced to them that having too many to feed he did not intend to keep them. Nevertheless, as he wanted men and he knew of no means of selecting the good ones, they were to fight together to the death; he would then admit the conquerors into his own body-guard. This death was quite as good as another; — and then moving his soldiers aside (for the Punic standards hid the horizon from the Mercenaries) he showed them the one hundred and ninety-two elephants under Narr' Havas, forming a single straight line, their trunks brandishing broad steel blades like giant arms holding axes above their heads.

The Barbarians looked at one another silently. It was not death that made them turn pale, but the horrible compulsion to which they found themselves reduced.

The community of their lives had brought about profound friendship among these men. The camp, with most, took the place of their country; living without a family they transferred the needful tenderness to a companion, and they would fall asleep in the starlight side by side under the same cloak. And then in their perpetual wanderings through all sorts of countries, murders, and adventures, they had contracted affections, one for the other, in which the stronger protected the younger in the midst of battles, helped him to cross precipices, sponged the sweat of fevers from his brow, and stole food for him, and the weaker, a child perhaps, who had been picked up on the roadside, and had then become a Mercenary, repaid this devotion by a thousand kindnesses.

They exchanged their necklaces and earrings, presents which they had made to one another in former days, after great peril, or in hours of intoxication. All asked to die, and none would strike. A young fellow might be seen here and there, saying to another whose beard was grey: "No! no! you are more robust! you will avenge us, kill me!" and the man would reply: "I have fewer years to live! Strike to the heart, and think no more about it!" Brothers gazed on one another with clasped hands, and friend bade friend eternal farewells, standing and weeping upon his shoulder.

They threw off their cuirasses that the sword-points might be thrust in the more quickly. Then there appeared the marks of the great blows which they had received for Carthage, and which looked like inscriptions on columns.

They placed themselves in four equal ranks, after the fashion of gladiators, and began with timid engagements. Some had even bandaged their eyes, and their swords waved gently through the air like blind men's sticks. The Carthaginians hooted, and shouted to them that they were cowards. The Barbarians became animated, and soon the combat as general, headlong, and terrible.

Sometimes two men all covered with blood would stop, fall into each other's arms, and die with mutual kisses. None drew back. They rushed upon the extended blades. Their delirium was so frenzied that the Carthaginians in the distance were afraid.

At last they stopped. Their breasts made a great hoarse noise, and their eyeballs could be seen through their long hair, which hung down as though it had come out of a purple bath. Several were turning round rapidly, like panthers wounded in the forehead. Others stood motionless looking at a corpse at their feet; then they would suddenly tear their faces with their nails, take their swords with both hands, and plunge them into their own bodies.

There were still sixty left. They asked for drink. They were told by shouts to throw away their swords, and when they had done so water was brought to them.

While they were drinking, with their faces buried in the vases, sixty Carthaginians leaped upon them and killed them with stiletos in the back.

Hamilcar had done this to gratify the instincts of his army, and, by means of this treachery, to attach it to his own person.

The war, then, was ended; at least he believed that it was; Matho would not resist; in his impatience the Suffet commanded an immediate departure.

His scouts came to tell him that a convoy had been descried, departing towards the Lead Mountain. Hamilcar did not trouble himself about it. The Mercenaries once annihilated, the Nomads would give him no further trouble. The important matter was to take Tunis. He advanced by forced marches upon it.

He had sent Narr' Havas to Carthage with the news of his victory; and the King of the Numidians, proud of his success, visited Salammbo.

She received him in her gardens under a large sycamore tree, amid pillows of yellow leather, and with Taanach beside her. Her face was covered with a white scarf, which, passing over her mouth and forehead, allowed only her eyes to be seen; but her lips shone in the transparency of the tissue like the gems on her fingers, for Salammbo had both her hands wrapped up, and did not make a gesture during the whole conversation.

Narr' Havas announced the defeat of the Barbarians to her. She thanked him with a blessing for the services which he had rendered to her father. Then he began to tell her about the whole campaign.

The doves on the palm trees around them cooed softly, and other birds fluttered amid the grass: ring-necked glareolas, Tartessus quails and Punic guinea-fowl. The garden, long uncultivated, had multiplied its verdure; colocynthias mounted into the branches of cassias, the asclepias was scattered over fields of roses, all kinds of vegetation formed entwinings and bowers; and here and there, as in the woods, sun-rays, descending obliquely, marked the shadow of a leaf upon the ground. Domestic animals, grown wild again, fled at the slightest noise. Sometimes a gazelle might be seen trailing scattered peacocks' feathers after its little black hoofs. The clamours of the distant town were lost in the murmuring of the waves. The sky was quite blue, and not a sail was visible on the sea.

Narr' Havas had ceased speaking; Salammbo was looking at him without replying. He wore a linen robe with flowers painted on it, and with gold fringes at the hem; two silver arrows fastened his plaited hair at the tips of his ears; his right hand rested on a pike-staff adorned with circles of electrum and tufts of hair.

As she watched him a crowd of dim thoughts absorbed her. This young man, with his gentle voice and feminine figure, captivated her eyes by the grace of his person, and seemed to her like an elder sister sent by the Baals to protect her. The recollection of Matho came upon her, nor did she resist the desire to learn what had become of him.

Narr' Havas replied that the Carthaginians were advancing towards Tunis to take it. In proportion as he set forth their chances of success and Matho's weaknesses, she seemed to rejoice in extraordinary hope.

Her lips trembled, her breast panted. When he finally promised to kill him himself, she exclaimed: "Yes! kill him! It must be so!"

The Numidian replied that he desired this death ardently, since he would be her husband when the war was over.

Salamambo started, and bent her head.

But Narr' Havas, pursuing the subject, compared his longings to flowers languishing for rain, or to lost travellers waiting for the day. He told her, further, that she was more beautiful than the moon, better than the wind of morning or than the face of a guest. He would bring for her from the country of the Blacks things such as there were none in Carthage, and the apartments in their house should be sanded with gold dust.

Evening fell, and odours of balsam were exhaled. For a long time they looked at each other in silence, and Salamambo's eyes, in the depths of her long draperies, resembled two stars in the rift of a cloud. Before the sun set he withdrew.

The Ancients felt themselves relieved of a great anxiety, when he left Carthage. The people had received him with even more enthusiastic acclamations than on the first occasion. If Hamilcar and the King of the Numidians triumphed alone over the Mercenaries it would be impossible to resist them. To weaken Barca they therefore resolved to make the aged Hanno, him whom they loved, a sharer in the deliverance of Carthage.

He proceeded immediately towards the western provinces, to take his vengeance in the very places which had witnessed his shame. But the inhabitants and the Barbarians were dead, hidden, or fled. Then his anger was vented upon the country. He burnt the ruins of the ruins, he did not leave a single tree nor a blade of grass; the children and the infirm, that were met with, were tortured; he gave the women to his soldiers to be violated before they were slaughtered.

Often, on the crests of the hills, black tents were struck as though overturned by the wind, and broad, brilliantly bordered discs, which were recognised as being chariot-wheels, revolved with a plaintive sound as they gradually disappeared in the valleys. The tribes, which had abandoned the siege of Carthage, were wandering in this way through the provinces, waiting for an opportunity, or for some victory to be gained by the Mercenaries, in order to return. But, whether from terror or famine, they all took the roads to their native lands, and disappeared.

Hamilcar was not jealous of Hanno's successes. Nevertheless he was in a hurry to end matters; he commanded him to fall back upon Tunis; and Hanno, who loved his country, was under the walls of the town on the appointed day.

For its protection it had its aboriginal population, twelve thousand Mercenaries, and, in addition, all the Eaters of Uncleaness, for like Matho they were riveted to the horizon of Carthage, and plebs and schalischim gazed at its lofty walls from afar, looking back in thought to boundless enjoyments. With this harmony of hatred, resistance was briskly organised. Leathern bottles were taken to make helmets; all the palm-trees in the gardens were cut down for lances; cisterns were dug; while for provisions they caught on the shores of the lake big white fish, fed on corpses and filth. Their ramparts, kept in ruins now by the jealousy of Carthage, were so weak that they could be thrown down with a push of the shoulder. Matho stopped up the holes in them with the stones of the houses. It was the last struggle; he hoped for nothing, and yet he told himself that fortune was fickle.

As the Carthaginians approached they noticed a man on the rampart who towered over the battlements from his belt upwards. The arrows that flew about him seemed to frighten him no more than a swarm of swallows. Extraordinary to say, none of them touched him.

Hamilcar pitched his camp on the south side; Narr' Havas, to his right, occupied the plain of Rhades, and Hanno the shore of the lake; and the three generals were to maintain their respective positions, so as all to attack the walls simultaneously.

But Hamilcar wished first to show the Mercenaries that he would punish them like slaves. He had the ten ambassadors crucified beside one another on a hillock in front of the town.

At the sight of this the besieged forsook the rampart.

Matho had said to himself that if he could pass between the walls and Narr' Havas's tents with such rapidity that the Numidians had not time to come out, he could fall upon the rear of the Carthaginian infantry, who would be caught between his division and those inside. He dashed out with his veterans.

Narr' Havas perceived him; he crossed the shore of the lake, and came to warn Hanno to dispatch men to Hamilcar's assistance. Did he believe Barca too weak to resist the Mercenaries? Was it a piece of treachery or folly? No one could ever learn.

Hanno, desiring to humiliate his rival, did not hesitate. He shouted orders to sound the trumpets, and his whole army rushed upon the Barbarians. The latter returned, and ran straight against the Carthaginians; they knocked them down, crushed them under their feet, and, driving them back in this way, reached the tent of Hanno, who was then surrounded by thirty Carthaginians, the most illustrious of the Ancients.

He appeared stupefied by their audacity; he called for his captains. Every one thrust his fist under his throat, vociferating abuse. The crowd pressed on; and those who had their hands on him could scarce retain their hold. However, he tried to whisper to them: "I will give you whatever you want! I am rich! Save me!" They dragged him along; heavy as he was his feet did not touch the ground. The Ancients had been carried off. His terror increased. "You have beaten me! I am your captive! I will ransom myself! Listen to me, my friends!" and borne along by all those shoulders which were pressed against his sides, he repeated: "What are you going to do? What do you want? You can see that I am not obstinate! I have always been good-natured!"

A gigantic cross stood at the gate. The Barbarians howled: "Here! here!" But he raised his voice still higher; and in the names of their gods he called upon them to lead him to the schalischim, because he wished to confide to him something on which their safety depended.

They paused, some asserting that it was right to summon Matho. He was sent for.

Hanno fell upon the grass; and he saw around him other crosses also, as though the torture by which he was about to perish had been multiplied beforehand; he made efforts to convince himself that he was mistaken, that there was only one, and even to believe that there were none at all. At last he was lifted up.

"Speak!" said Matho.

He offered to give up Hamilcar; then they would enter Carthage and both be kings.

Matho withdrew, signing to the others to make haste. It was a stratagem, he thought, to gain time.

The Barbarian was mistaken; Hanno was in an extremity when consideration is had to nothing, and, moreover, he so execrated Hamilcar that he would have sacrificed him and all his soldiers on the slightest hope of safety.

The Ancients were languishing on the ground at the foot of the crosses; ropes had already been passed beneath their armpits. Then the old Suffet, understanding that he must die, wept.

They tore off the clothes that were still left on him — and the horror of his person appeared. Ulcers covered the nameless mass; the fat on his legs hid the nails on his feet; from his fingers there hung what looked like greenish strips; and the tears streaming through the tubercles on his cheeks gave to his face an expression of frightful sadness, for they seemed to take up more room than on another human face. His royal fillet, which was half unfastened, trailed with his white hair in the dust.

They thought that they had no ropes strong enough to haul him up to the top of the cross, and they nailed him upon it, after the Punic fashion, before it was erected. But his pride awoke in his pain. He began to overwhelm them with abuse. He foamed and twisted like a marine monster being slaughtered on the shore, and predicted that they would all end more horribly still, and that he would be avenged.

He was. On the other side of the town, whence there now escaped jets of flame with columns of smoke, the ambassadors from the Mercenaries were in their last throes.

Some who had swooned at first had just revived in the freshness of the wind; but their chins still rested upon their breasts, and their bodies had fallen somewhat, in spite of the nails in their arms, which were fastened higher than their heads; from their heels and hands blood fell in big, slow drops, as ripe fruit falls from the branches of a tree, — and Carthage, gulf, mountains, and plains all appeared to them to be revolving like an immense wheel; sometimes a cloud of dust, rising from the ground, enveloped them in its eddies; they burned with horrible thirst, their tongues curled in their mouths, and they felt an icy sweat flowing over them with their departing souls.

Nevertheless they had glimpses, at an infinite depth, of streets, marching soldiers, and the swinging of swords; and the tumult of battle reached them dimly like the noise of the sea to shipwrecked men dying on the masts of a ship. The Italiotes, who were sturdier than the rest, were still shrieking. The Lacedaemonians were silent, with eyelids closed; Zarxas, once so vigorous, was bending like a broken reed; the Ethiopian beside him had his head thrown back over the arms of the cross; Autaritus was motionless, rolling his eyes; his great head of hair, caught in a cleft in the wood, fell straight upon his forehead, and his death-rattle seemed rather to be a roar of anger. As to Spendius, a strange courage had come to him; he despised life now in the certainty which he possessed of an almost immediate and an eternal emancipation, and he awaited death with impassibility.

Amid their swooning, they sometimes started at the brushing of feathers passing across their lips. Large wings swung shadows around them, croakings sounded in the air; and as Spendius's cross was the highest, it was upon his that the first vulture alighted. Then he turned his face towards Autaritus, and said slowly to him with an unaccountable smile:

"Do you remember the lions on the road to Sicca?"

"They were our brothers!" replied the Gaul, as he expired.

The Suffet, meanwhile, had bored through the walls and reached the citadel. The smoke suddenly disappeared before a gust of wind, discovering the horizon as far as the walls of Carthage; he even thought that he could distinguish people watching on the platform of Eschmoun; then, bringing back his eyes, he perceived thirty crosses of extravagant size on the shore of the Lake, to the left.

In fact, to render them still more frightful, they had been constructed with tent-poles fastened end to end, and the thirty corpses of the Ancients appeared high up in the sky. They had what looked like white butterflies on their breasts; these were the feathers of the arrows which had been shot at them from below.

A broad gold ribbon shone on the summit of the highest; it hung down to the shoulder, there being no arm on that side, and Hamilcar had some difficulty in recognising Hanno. His spongy bones had given way under the iron pins, portions of his limbs had come off, and nothing was left on the cross but shapeless remains, like the fragments of animals that are hung up on huntsmen's doors.

The Suffet could not have known anything about it; the town in front of him masked everything that was beyond and behind; and the captains who had been successively sent to the two generals had not re-appeared. Then fugitives arrived with the tale of the rout, and the Punic army halted. This catastrophe, falling upon them as it did in the midst of their victory, stupefied them. Hamilcar's orders were no longer listened to.

Matho took advantage of this to continue his ravages among the Numidians.

Hanno's camp having been overthrown, he had returned against them. The elephants came out; but the Mercenaries advanced through the plain shaking about flaming firebrands, which they had plucked from the walls, and the great beasts, in fright, ran headlong into the gulf, where they killed one another in their struggles, or were drowned beneath the weight of their cuirasses. Narr' Havas had already launched his cavalry; all threw themselves face downwards upon the ground; then, when the horses were within three paces of them, they sprang beneath their bellies, ripped them open with dagger-strokes, and half the Numidians had perished when Barca came up.

The exhausted Mercenaries could not withstand his troops. They retired in good order to the mountain of the Hot Springs. The Suffet was prudent enough not to pursue them. He directed his course to the mouths of the Macaras.

Tunis was his; but it was now nothing but a heap of smoking rubbish. The ruins fell through the breaches in the walls to the centre of the plain; quite in the background, between the shores of the gulf, the corpses of the elephants drifting before the wind conflicted, like an archipelago of black rocks floating on the water.

Narr' Havas had drained his forests of these animals, taking young and old, male and female, to keep up the war, and the military force of his kingdom could not repair the loss. The people who had seen them perishing at a distance were grieved at it; men lamented in the streets, calling them by their names like deceased friends: "Ah! the Invincible! the Victory! the Thunderer! the Swallow!" On the first day, too, there was no talk except of the dead citizens. But on the morrow the tents of the Mercenaries were seen on the mountain of the Hot Springs. Then so deep was the despair that many people, especially women, flung themselves headlong from the top of the Acropolis.

Hamilcar's designs were not known. He lived alone in his tent with none near him but a young boy, and no one ever ate with them, not even excepting Narr' Havas. Nevertheless he showed great deference to the latter after Hanno's defeat; but the king of the Numidians had too great an interest in becoming his son not to distrust him.

This inertness veiled skilful manoeuvres. Hamilcar seduced the heads of the villages by all sorts of artifices; and the Mercenaries were hunted, repulsed, and enclosed like wild beasts. As soon as they entered a wood, the trees caught fire around them; when they drank of a spring it was poisoned; the caves in which they hid in order to sleep were walled up. Their old accomplices, the populations who had hitherto defended them, now pursued them; and they continually recognised Carthaginian armour in these bands.

Many had their faces consumed with red tetters; this, they thought, had come to them through touching Hanno. Others imagined that it was because they had eaten Salamambo's fishes, and far from repenting of it, they dreamed of even more abominable sacrileges, so that the abasement of the Punic Gods might be still greater. They would fain have exterminated them.

In this way they lingered for three months along the eastern coast, and then behind the mountain of Selloum, and as far as the first sands of the desert. They sought for a place of refuge, no matter where. Utica and Hippo-Zarytus alone had not betrayed them; but Hamilcar was encompassing these two towns. Then they went northwards at haphazard without even knowing the various routes. Their many miseries had confused their understandings.

The only feeling left them was one of exasperation, which went on developing; and one day they found themselves again in the gorges of Cobus and once more before Carthage!

Then the actions multiplied. Fortune remained equal; but both sides were so wearied that they would willingly have exchanged these skirmishes for a great battle, provided that it were really the last.

Matho was inclined to carry this proposal himself to the Suffet. One of his Libyans devoted himself for the purpose. All were convinced as they saw him depart that he would not return.

He returned the same evening.

Hamilcar accepted the challenge. The encounter should take place the following day at sunrise, in the plain of Rhades.

The Mercenaries wished to know whether he had said anything more, and the Libyan added:

"As I remained in his presence, he asked me what I was waiting for. 'To be killed!' I replied. Then he rejoined: 'No! begone! that will be tomorrow with the rest.'"

This generosity astonished the Barbarians; some were terrified by it, and Matho regretted that the emissary had not been killed.

He had still remaining three thousand Africans, twelve hundred Greeks, fifteen hundred Campanians, two hundred Iberians, four hundred Etruscans, five hundred Samnites, forty Gauls, and a troop of Naffurs, nomad bandits met with in the date region — in all seven thousand two hundred and nineteen soldiers, but not one complete syntagmata. They had stopped up the holes in their cuirasses with the shoulder-blades of quadrupeds, and replaced their brass cothurni with worn sandals. Their garments were weighted with copper or steel plates; their coats of mail hung in tatters about them, and scars appeared like purple threads through the hair on their arms and faces.

The wraiths of their dead companions came back to their souls and increased their energy; they felt, in a confused way, that they were the ministers of a god diffused in the hearts of the oppressed, and were the pontiffs, so to speak, of universal vengeance! Then they were enraged with grief at what was extravagant injustice, and above all by the sight of Carthage on the horizon. They swore an oath to fight for one another until death.

The beasts of burden were killed, and as much as possible was eaten so as to gain strength; afterwards they slept. Some prayed, turning towards different constellations.

The Carthaginians arrived first in the plain. They rubbed the edges of their shields with oil to make the arrows glide off them easily; the foot-soldiers who wore long hair took the precaution of cutting it on the forehead; and Hamilcar ordered all bowls to be inverted from the fifth hour, knowing that it is disadvantageous to fight with the stomach too full. His army amounted to fourteen thousand men, or about double the number of the Barbarians. Nevertheless, he had never felt such anxiety; if he succumbed it would mean the annihilation of the Republic, and he would perish on the cross; if, on the contrary, he triumphed, he would reach Italy by way of the Pyrenees, the Gauls, and the Alps, and the empire of the Barcas would become eternal. Twenty times during the night he rose to inspect everything himself, down to the most trifling details. As to the Carthaginians, they were exasperated by their lengthened terror. Narr' Havas suspected the fidelity of his Numidians. Moreover, the Barbarians might vanquish them. A strange weakness had come upon him; every moment he drank large cups of water.

But a man whom he did not know opened his tent and laid on the ground a crown of rock-salt, adorned with hieratic designs formed with sulphur, and lozenges of mother-of-pearl; a marriage crown was sometimes sent to a betrothed husband; it was a proof of love, a sort of invitation.

Nevertheless Hamilcar's daughter had no tenderness for Narr' Havas.

The recollection of Matho disturbed her in an intolerable manner; it seemed to her that the death of this man would unburden her thoughts, just as people to cure themselves of the bite of a viper crush it upon the wound. The king of the Numidians was depending upon her; he awaited the wedding with impatience, and, as it was to follow the victory, Salammbo made him this present to stimulate his courage. Then his distress vanished, and he thought only of the happiness of possessing so beautiful a woman.

The same vision had assailed Matho; but he cast it from him immediately, and his love, that he thus thrust back, was poured out upon his companions in arms. He cherished them like portions of his own person, of his hatred, — and he felt his spirit higher, and his arms stronger; everything that he was to accomplish appeared clearly before him. If sighs sometimes escaped him, it was because he was thinking of Spendius.

He drew up the Barbarians in six equal ranks. He posted the Etruscans in the centre, all being fastened to a bronze chain; the archers were behind, and on the wings he distributed the Naffurs, who were mounted on short-haired camels, covered with ostrich feathers.

The Suffet arranged the Carthaginians in similar order. He placed the Clinabarians outside the infantry next to the velites, and the Numidians beyond; when day appeared, both sides were thus in line face to face. All gazed at each other from a distance, with round fierce eyes. There was at first some hesitation; at last both armies moved.

The Barbarians advanced slowly so as not to become out of breath, beating the ground with their feet; the centre of the Punic army formed a convex curve. Then came the burst of a terrible shock, like the crash of two fleets in collision. The first rank of the Barbarians had quickly opened up, and the marksmen, hidden behind the others, discharged their bullets, arrows, and javelins. The curve of the Carthaginians, however, flattened by degrees, became quite straight, and then bent inwards; upon this, the two sections of the velites drew together in parallel lines, like the legs of a compass that is being closed. The Barbarians, who were attacking the phalanx with fury, entered the gap; they were being lost; Matho checked them, — and while the Carthaginian wings continued to advance, he drew out the three inner ranks of his line; they soon covered his flanks, and his army appeared in triple array.

But the Barbarians placed at the extremities were the weakest, especially those on the left, who had exhausted their quivers, and the troop of velites, which had at last come up against them, was cutting them up greatly.

Matho made them fall back. His right comprised Campanians, who were armed with axes; he hurled them against the Carthaginian left; the centre attacked the enemy, and those at the other extremity, who were out of peril, kept the velites at a distance.

Then Hamilcar divided his horsemen into squadrons, placed hoplites between them, and sent them against the Mercenaries.

Those cone-shaped masses presented a front of horses, and their broader sides were filled and bristling with lances. The Barbarians found it impossible to resist; the Greek foot-soldiers alone had brazen armour, all the rest had cutlasses on the end of poles, scythes taken from the farms, or swords manufactured out of the fellies of wheels; the soft blades were twisted by a blow, and while they were engaged in straightening them under their heels, the Carthaginians massacred them right and left at their ease.

But the Etruscans, riveted to their chain, did not stir; those who were dead, being prevented from falling, formed an obstruction with their corpses; and the great bronze line widened and contracted in turn, as supple as a serpent, and as impregnable as a wall. The Barbarians would come to re-form behind it, pant for a minute, and then set off again with the fragments of their weapons in their hands.

Many already had none left, and they leaped upon the Carthaginians, biting their faces like dogs. The Gauls in their pride stripped themselves of the sagum; they showed their great white bodies from a distance, and they enlarged their wounds to terrify the enemy. The voice of the crier announcing the orders could no longer be heard in the midst of the Punic syntagmata; their signals were being repeated by the standards, which were raised above the dust, and every one was swept away in the swaying of the great mass that surrounded him.

Hamilcar commanded the Numidians to advance. But the Naffurs rushed to meet them.

Clad in vast black robes, with a tuft of hair on the top of the skull, and a shield of rhinoceros leather, they wielded a steel which had no handle, and which they held by a rope; and their camels, which bristled all over with feathers, uttered long, hoarse cluckings. Each blade fell on a precise spot, then rose again with a smart stroke carrying off a limb with it. The fierce beasts galloped through the syntagmata. Some, whose legs were broken, went hopping along like wounded ostriches.

The Punic infantry turned in a body upon the Barbarians, and cut them off. Their maniples wheeled about at intervals from one another. The more brilliant Carthaginian weapons encircled them like golden crowns; there was a swarming movement in the centre, and the sun, striking down upon the points of the swords, made them glitter with white flickering gleams. However, files of Clinabarians lay stretched upon the plain; some Mercenaries snatched away their armour, clothed themselves in it, and then returned to the fray. The deluded Carthaginians were several times entangled in their midst. They would stand stupidly motionless, or else would back, surge again, and triumphant shouts rising in the distance seemed to drive them along like derelicts in a storm. Hamilcar was growing desperate; all was about to perish beneath the genius of Matho and the invincible courage of the Mercenaries.

But a great noise of tabourines burst forth on the horizon. It was a crowd of old men, sick persons, children of fifteen years of age, and even women, who, being unable to withstand their distress any longer, had set out from Carthage, and, for the purpose of placing themselves under the protection of something formidable, had taken from Hamilcar's palace the only elephant that the Republic now possessed, — that one, namely, whose trunk had been cut off.

Then it seemed to the Carthaginians that their country, forsaking its walls, was coming to command them to die for her. They were seized with increased fury, and the Numidians carried away all the rest.

The Barbarians had set themselves with their backs to a hillock in the centre of the plain. They had no chance of conquering, or even of surviving; but they were the best, the most intrepid, and the strongest.

The people from Carthage began to throw spits, larding-pins and hammers, over the heads of the Numidians; those whom consuls had feared died beneath sticks hurled by women; the Punic populace was exterminating the Mercenaries.

The latter had taken refuge on the top of the hill. Their circle closed up after every fresh breach; twice it descended to be immediately repulsed with a shock; and the Carthaginians stretched forth their arms pell-mell, thrusting their pikes between the legs of their companions, and raking at random before them. They slipped in the blood; the steep slope of the ground made the corpses roll to the bottom. The elephant, which was trying to climb the hillock, was up to its belly; it seemed to be crawling over them with delight; and its shortened trunk, which was broad at the extremity, rose from time to time like an enormous leech.

Then all paused. The Carthaginians ground their teeth as they gazed at the hill, where the Barbarians were standing.

At last they dashed at them abruptly, and the fight began again. The Mercenaries would often let them approach, shouting to them that they wished to surrender; then, with frightful sneers, they would kill themselves at a blow, and as the dead fell, the rest would mount upon them to defend themselves. It was a kind of pyramid, which grew larger by degrees.

Soon there were only fifty, then only twenty, only three, and lastly only two — a Samnite armed with an axe, and Matho who still had his sword.

The Samnite with bent hams swept his axe alternately to the right and left, at the same time warning Matho of the blows that were being aimed at him. "Master, this way! that way! stoop down!"

Matho had lost his shoulder-pieces, his helmet, his cuirass; he was completely naked, and more livid than the dead, with his hair quite erect, and two patches of foam at the corners of his lips, — and his sword whirled so rapidly that it formed an aureola around him. A stone broke it near the guard; the Samnite was killed and the flood of Carthaginians closed in, they touched Matho. Then he raised both his empty hands towards heaven, closed his eyes, and, opening out his arms like a man throwing himself from the summit of a promontory into the sea, hurled himself among the pikes.

They moved away before him. Several times he ran against the Carthaginians. But they always drew back and turned their weapons aside.

His foot struck against a sword. Matho tried to seize it. He felt himself tied by the wrists and knees, and fell.

Narr' Havas had been following him for some time, step by step, with one of the large nets used for capturing wild beasts, and, taking advantage of the moment when he stooped down, had involved him in it.

Then he was fastened on the elephants with his four limbs forming a cross; and all those who were not wounded escorted him, and rushed with great tumult towards Carthage.

The news of the victory had arrived in some inexplicable way at the third hour of the night; the clepsydra of Khamon had just completed the fifth as they reached Malqua; then Matho opened his eyes. There were so many lights in the houses that the town appeared to be all in flames.

An immense clamour reached him dimly; and lying on his back he looked at the stars.

Then a door closed and he was wrapped in darkness.

On the morrow, at the same hour, the last of the men left in the Pass of the Hatchet expired.

On the day that their companions had set out, some Zuaeces who were returning had tumbled the rocks down, and had fed them for some time.

The Barbarians constantly expected to see Matho appear, — and from discouragement, from languor, and from the obstinacy of sick men who object to change their situation, they would not leave the mountain; at last the provisions were exhausted and the Zuaeces went away. It was known that they numbered scarcely more than thirteen hundred men, and there was no need to employ soldiers to put an end to them.

Wild beasts, especially lions, had multiplied during the three years that the war had lasted. Narr' Havas had held a great battue, and — after tying goats at intervals — had run upon them and so driven them towards the Pass of the Hatchet; — and they were now all living in it when a man arrived who had been sent by the Ancients to find out what there was left of the Barbarians.

Lions and corpses were lying over the tract of the plain, and the dead were mingled with clothes and armour. Nearly all had the face or an arm wanting; some appeared to be still intact; others were completely dried up, and their helmets were filled with powdery skulls; feet which had lost their flesh stood out straight from the knemides; skeletons still wore their cloaks; and bones, cleaned by the sun, made gleaming spots in the midst of the sand.

The lions were resting with their breasts against the ground and both paws stretched out, winking their eyelids in the bright daylight, which was heightened by the reflection from the white rocks. Others were seated on their hind-quarters and staring before them, or else were sleeping, rolled into a ball and half hidden by their great manes; they all looked well fed, tired, and dull. They were as motionless as the mountain and the dead. Night was falling; the sky was striped with broad red bands in the west.

In one of the heaps, which in an irregular fashion embossed the plain, something rose up vaguer than a spectre. Then one of the lions set himself in motion, his monstrous form cutting a black shadow on the background of the purple sky, and when he was quite close to the man, he knocked him down with a single blow of his paw.

Then, stretching himself flat upon him, he slowly drew out the entrails with the edge of his teeth.

Afterwards he opened his huge jaws, and for some minutes uttered a lengthened roar which was repeated by the echoes in the mountain, and was finally lost in the solitude.

Suddenly some small gravel rolled down from above. The rustling of rapid steps was heard, and in the direction of the portcullis and of the gorge there appeared pointed muzzles and straight ears, with gleaming, tawny eyes. These were the jackals coming to eat what was left.

The Carthaginian, who was leaning over the top of the precipice to look, went back again.

CHAPTER XV

MATHO

There were rejoicings at Carthage, — rejoicings deep, universal, extravagant, frantic; the holes of the ruins had been stopped up, the statues of the gods had been repainted, the streets were strewn with myrtle branches, incense smoked at the corners of the crossways, and the throng on the terraces looked, in their variegated garments, like heaps of flowers blooming in the air.

The shouts of the water-carriers watering the pavement rose above the continual screaming of voices; slaves belonging to Hamilcar offered in his name roasted barley and pieces of raw meat; people accosted one another, and embraced one another with tears; the Tyrian towns were taken, the nomads dispersed, and all the Barbarians annihilated. The Acropolis was hidden beneath coloured velaria; the beaks of the triremes, drawn up in line outside the mole, shone like a dyke of diamonds; everywhere there was a sense of the restoration of order, the beginning of a new existence, and the diffusion of vast happiness: it was the day of Salammbo's marriage with the King of the Numidians.

On the terrace of the temple of Khamon there were three long tables laden with gigantic plate, at which the priests, Ancients, and the rich were to sit, and there was a fourth and higher one for Hamilcar, Narr' Havas, and Salammbo; for as she had saved her country by the restoration of the zaimph, the people turned her wedding day into a national rejoicing, and were waiting in the square below till she should appear.

But their impatience was excited by another and more acrid longing: Matho's death has been promised for the ceremony.

It had been proposed at first to flay him alive, to pour lead into his entrails, to kill him with hunger; he should be tied to a tree, and an ape behind him should strike him on the head with a stone; he had offended Tanith, and the cynocephaluses of Tanith should avenge her. Others were of opinion that he should be led about on a dromedary after linen wicks, dipped in oil, had been inserted in his body in several places; — and they took pleasure in the thought of the large animal wandering through the streets with this man writhing beneath the fires like a candelabrum blown about by the wind.

But what citizens should be charged with his torture, and why disappoint the rest? They would have liked a kind of death in which the whole town might take part, in which every hand, every weapon, everything Carthaginian, to the very paving-stones in the streets and the waves in the gulf, could rend him, and crush him, and annihilate him. Accordingly the Ancients decided that he should go from his prison to the square of Khamon without any escort, and with his arms fastened to his back; it was forbidden to strike him to the heart, in order that he might live the longer; to put out his eyes, so that he might see the torture through; to hurl anything against his person, or to lay more than three fingers upon him at a time.

Although he was not to appear until the end of the day, the people sometimes fancied that he could be seen, and the crowd would rush towards the Acropolis, and empty the streets, to return with lengthened murmurings. Some people had remained standing in the same place since the day before, and they would call on one another from a distance and show their nails which they had allowed to grow, the better to bury them into his flesh. Others walked restlessly up and down; some were as pale as though they were awaiting their own execution.

Suddenly lofty feather fans rose above the heads, behind the Mappalian district. It was Salammbo leaving her palace; a sigh of relief found vent.

But the procession was long in coming; it marched with deliberation.

First there filed past the priests of the Pataec Gods, then those of Eschmoun, of Melkarth, and all the other colleges in succession, with the same insignia, and in the same order as had been observed at the time of the sacrifice. The pontiffs of Moloch passed with heads bent, and the multitude stood aside from them in a kind of remorse. But the priests of Rabbetna advanced with a proud step, and with lyres in their hands; the priestesses followed them in transparent robes of yellow or black, uttering cries like birds and writhing like vipers, or else whirling round to the sound of flutes to imitate the dance of the stars, while their light garments wafted puffs of delicate scents through the streets.

The Kedeschim, with painted eyelids, who symbolised the hermaphrodism of the Divinity, received applause among these women, and, being perfumed and dressed like them, they resembled them in spite of their flat breasts and narrower hips. Moreover, on this day the female principle dominated and confused all things; a mystic voluptuousness moved in the heavy air; the torches were already lighted in the depths of the sacred woods; there was to be a great celebration there during the night; three vessels had brought courtesans from Sicily, and others had come from the desert.

As the colleges arrived they ranged themselves in the courts of the temples, on the outer galleries, and along double staircases which rose against the walls, and drew together at the top. Files of white robes appeared between the colonnades, and the architecture was peopled with human statues, motionless as statues of stone.

Then came the masters of the exchequer, the governors of the provinces, and all the rich. A great tumult prevailed below. Adjacent streets were discharging the crowd, hierodules were driving it back with blows of sticks; and then Salammbo appeared in a litter surmounted by a purple canopy, and surrounded by the Ancients crowned with their golden tiaras.

Thereupon an immense shout arose; the cymbals and crotala sounded more loudly, the tabourines thundered, and the great purple canopy sank between the two pylons.

It appeared again on the first landing. Salammbo was walking slowly beneath it; then she crossed the terrace to take her seat behind on a kind of throne cut out of the carapace of a tortoise. An ivory stool with three steps was pushed beneath her feet; two Negro children knelt on the edge of the first step, and sometimes she would rest both arms, which were laden with rings of excessive weight, upon their heads.

From ankle to hip she was covered with a network of narrow meshes which were in imitation of fish scales, and shone like mother-of-pearl; her waist was clasped by a blue zone, which allowed her breasts to be seen through two crescent-shaped slashings; the nipples were hidden by carbuncle pendants. She had a headdress made of peacock's feathers studded with gems; an ample cloak, as white as snow, fell behind her, — and with her elbows at her sides, her knees pressed together, and circles of diamonds on the upper part of her arms, she remained perfectly upright in a hieratic attitude.

Her father and her husband were on two lower seats, Narr' Havas dressed in a light simar and wearing his crown of rock-salt, from which there strayed two tresses of hair as twisted as the horns of Ammon; and Hamilcar in a violet tunic figured with gold vine branches, and with a battle-sword at his side.

The python of the temple of Eschmoun lay on the ground amid pools of pink oil in the space enclosed by the tables, and, biting its tail, described a large black circle. In the middle of the circle there was a copper pillar bearing a crystal egg; and, as the sun shone upon it, rays were emitted on every side.

Behind Salammbo stretched the priests of Tanith in linen robes; on her right the Ancients, in their tiaras, formed a great gold line, and on the other side the rich with their emerald sceptres a great green line, — while quite in the background, where the priests of Moloch were ranged, the cloaks looked like a wall of purple. The other colleges occupied the lower terraces. The multitude obstructed the streets. It reached to the house-tops, and extended in long files to the summit of the Acropolis. Having thus the people at her feet, the firmament above her head, and around her the immensity of the sea, the gulf, the mountains, and the distant provinces, Salammbo in her splendour was blended with Tanith, and seemed the very genius of Carthage, and its embodied soul.

The feast was to last all night, and lamps with several branches were planted like trees on the painted woollen cloths which covered the low tables. Large electrum flagons, blue glass amphoras, tortoise-shell spoons, and small round loaves were crowded between the double row of pearl-bordered plates; bunches of grapes with their leaves had been rolled round ivory vine-stocks after the fashion of the thyrsus; blocks of snow were melting on ebony trays, and lemons, pomegranates, gourds, and watermelons formed hillocks beneath the lofty silver plate; boars with open jaws were wallowing in the dust of spices; hares, covered with their fur, appeared to be bounding amid the flowers; there were shells filled with forcemeat; the pastry had symbolic shapes; when the covers of the dishes were removed doves flew out.

The slaves, meanwhile, with tunics tucked up, were going about on tiptoe; from time to time a hymn sounded on the lyres, or a choir of voices rose. The clamour of the people, continuous as the noise of the sea, floated vaguely around the feast, and seemed to lull it in a broader harmony; some recalled the banquet of the Mercenaries; they gave themselves up to dreams of happiness; the sun was beginning to go down, and the crescent of the moon was already rising in another part of the sky.

But Salammbo turned her head as though some one had called her; the people, who were watching her, followed the direction of her eyes.

The door of the dungeon, hewn in the rock at the foot of the temple, on the summit of the Acropolis, had just opened; and a man was standing on the threshold of this black hole.

He came forth bent double, with the scared look of fallow deer when suddenly enlarged.

The light dazzled him; he stood motionless awhile. All had recognised him, and they held their breath.

In their eyes the body of this victim was something peculiarly theirs, and was adorned with almost religious splendour. They bent forward to see him, especially the women. They burned to gaze upon him who had caused the deaths of their children and husbands; and from the bottom of their souls there sprang up in spite of themselves an infamous curiosity, a desire to know him completely, a wish mingled with remorse which turned to increased execration.

At last he advanced; then the stupefaction of surprise disappeared. Numbers of arms were raised, and he was lost to sight.

The staircase of the Acropolis had sixty steps. He descended them as though he were rolled down in a torrent from the top of a mountain; three times he was seen to leap, and then he alighted below on his feet.

His shoulders were bleeding, his breast was panting with great shocks; and he made such efforts to burst his bonds that his arms, which were crossed on his naked loins, swelled like pieces of a serpent.

Several streets began in front of him, leading from the spot at which he found himself. In each of them a triple row of bronze chains fastened to the navels of the Pataec gods extended in parallel lines from one end to the other; the crowd was massed against the houses, and servants, belonging to the Ancients, walked in the middle brandishing thongs.

One of them drove him forward with a great blow; Matho began to move.

They thrust their arms over the chains shouting out that the road had been left too wide for him; and he passed along, felt, pricked, and slashed by all those fingers; when he reached the end of one street another appeared; several times he flung himself to one side to bite them; they speedily dispersed, the chains held him back, and the crowd burst out laughing.

A child rent his ear; a young girl, hiding the point of a spindle in her sleeve, split his cheek; they tore handfuls of hair from him and strips of flesh; others smeared his face with sponges steeped in filth and fastened upon sticks. A stream of blood started from the right side of his neck, frenzy immediately set in. This last Barbarian was to them a representative of all the Barbarians, and all the army; they were taking vengeance on him for their disasters, their terrors, and their shame. The rage of the mob developed with its gratification; the curving chains were over-strained, and were on the point of breaking; the people did not feel the blows of the slaves who struck at them to drive them back; some clung to the projections of the houses; all the openings in the walls were stopped up with heads; and they howled at him the mischief that they could not inflict upon him.

It was atrocious, filthy abuse mingled with ironical encouragements and imprecations; and, his present tortures not being enough for them, they foretold to him others that should be still more terrible in eternity.

This vast baying filled Carthage with stupid continuity. Frequently a single syllable — a hoarse, deep, and frantic intonation — would be repeated for several minutes by the entire people. The walls would vibrate with it from top to bottom, and both sides of the street would seem to Matho to be coming against him, and carrying him off the ground, like two immense arms stifling him in the air.

Nevertheless he remembered that he had experienced something like it before. The same crowd was on the terraces, there were the same looks and the same wrath; but then he had walked free, all had then dispersed, for a god covered him; — and the recollection of this, gaining precision by degrees, brought a crushing sadness upon him.

Shadows passed before his eyes; the town whirled round in his head, his blood streamed from a wound in his hip, he felt that he was dying; his limbs bent, and he sank quite gently upon the pavement.

Some one went to the peristyle of the temple of Melkarth, took thence the bar of a tripod, heated red hot in the coals, and, slipping it beneath the first chain, pressed it against his wound. The flesh was seen to smoke; the hootings of the people drowned his voice; he was standing again.

Six paces further on, and he fell a third and again a fourth time; but some new torture always made him rise. They discharged little drops of boiling oil through tubes at him; they strewed pieces of broken glass beneath his feet; still he walked on. At the corner of the street of Satheb he leaned his back against the wall beneath the pent-house of a shop, and advanced no further.

The slaves of the Council struck him with their whips of hippopotamus leather, so furiously and long that the fringes of their tunics were drenched with sweat. Matho appeared insensible; suddenly he started off and began to run at random, making a noise with his lips like one shivering with severe cold. He threaded the street of Boudes, and the street of Soepo, crossed the Green Market, and reached the square of Khamon.

He now belonged to the priests; the slaves had just dispersed the crowd, and there was more room. Matho gazed round him and his eyes encountered Salammbo.

At the first step that he had taken she had risen; then, as he approached, she had involuntarily advanced by degrees to the edge of the terrace; and soon all external things were blotted out, and she saw only Matho. Silence fell in her soul, — one of those abysses wherein the whole world disappears beneath the pressure of a single thought, a memory, a look. This man who was walking towards her attracted her.

Excepting his eyes he had no appearance of humanity left; he was a long, perfectly red shape; his broken bonds hung down his thighs, but they could not be distinguished from the tendons of his wrists, which were laid quite bare; his mouth remained wide open; from his eye-sockets there darted flames which seemed to rise up to his hair; — and the wretch still walked on!

He reached the foot of the terrace. Salammbo was leaning over the balustrade; those frightful eyeballs were scanning her, and there rose within her a consciousness of all that he had suffered for her. Although he was in his death agony she could see him once more kneeling in his tent, encircling her waist with his arms, and stammering out gentle words; she thirsted to feel them and hear them again; she did not want him to die! At this moment Matho gave a great start; she was on the point of shrieking aloud. He fell backwards and did not stir again.

Salamambo was borne back, nearly swooning, to her throne by the priests who flocked about her. They congratulated her; it was her work. All clapped their hands and stamped their feet, howling her name.

A man darted upon the corpse. Although he had no beard he had the cloak of a priest of Moloch on his shoulder, and in his belt that species of knife which they employed for cutting up the sacred meat, and which terminated, at the end of the handle, in a golden spatula. He cleft Matho's breast with a single blow, then snatched out the heart and laid it upon the spoon; and Schahabarim, uplifting his arm, offered it to the sun.

The sun sank behind the waves; his rays fell like long arrows upon the red heart. As the beatings diminished the planet sank into the sea; and at the last palpitation it disappeared.

Then from the gulf to the lagoon, and from the isthmus to the pharos, in all the streets, on all the houses, and on all the temples, there was a single shout; sometimes it paused, to be again renewed; the buildings shook with it; Carthage was convulsed, as it were, in the spasm of Titanic joy and boundless hope.

Narr' Havas, drunk with pride, passed his left arm beneath Salamambo's waist in token of possession; and taking a gold patera in his right hand, he drank to the Genius of Carthage.

Salamambo rose like her husband, with a cup in her hand, to drink also. She fell down again with her head lying over the back of the throne, — pale, stiff, with parted lips, — and her loosened hair hung to the ground.

Thus died Hamilcar's daughter for having touched the mantle of Tanith.

SALAMMBÔ

TABLE DES MATIÈRES

Chapitre 1 LE FESTIN

Chapitre 2 A SICCA

Chapitre 3 SALAMMBÔ.

Chapitre 4 SOUS LES MURS DE CARTHAGE

Chapitre 5 TANIT

Chapitre 6 HANNON

Chapitre 7 HAMILCAR BARCA

Chapitre 8 LA BATAILLE DU MACAR

Chapitre 9 EN CAMPAGNE

Chapitre 10 LE SERPENT

Chapitre 11 SOUS LA TENTE

Chapitre 12 L'AQUEDUC

Chapitre 13 MOLOCH

Chapitre 14 LE DEFILE DE LA HACHE

Chapitre 15 MATHO

Chapitre 1 LE FESTIN

C'était à Mégara, faubourg de Carthage, dans les jardins d'Hamilcar.

Les soldats qu'il avait commandés en Sicile se donnaient un grand festin pour célébrer le jour anniversaire de la bataille d'Eryx, et comme le maître était absent et qu'ils se trouvaient nombreux, ils mangeaient et ils buvaient en pleine liberté.

Les capitaines, portant des cothurnes de bronze, s'étaient placés dans le chemin du milieu, sous un voile de pourpre à franges d'or, qui s'étendait depuis le mur des écuries jusqu'à la première terrasse du palais ; le commun des soldats était répandu sous les arbres, où l'on distinguait quantité de bâtiments à toit plat, pressoirs, celliers, magasins, boulangeries et arsenaux, avec une cour pour les éléphants, des fosses pour les bêtes féroces, une prison pour les esclaves.

Des figuiers entouraient les cuisines ; un bois de sycomores se prolongeait jusqu'à des masses de verdure, où des grenades resplendissaient parmi les touffes blanches des cotonniers ; des vignes, chargées de grappes, montaient dans le branchage des pins : un champ de roses s'épanouissait sous des platanes ; de place en place sur des gazons, se balançaient des lis ; un sable noir, mêlé à de la poudre de corail, parsemait les sentiers, et, au milieu, l'avenue des cyprès faisait d'un bout à l'autre comme une double colonnade d'obélisques verts.

Le palais, bâti en marbre numidique tacheté de jaune, superposait tout au fond, sur de larges assises, ses quatre étages en terrasses. Avec son grand escalier droit en bois d'ébène, portant aux angles de chaque marche la proue d'une galère vaincue, avec ses portes rouges écartelées d'une croix noire, ses grillages d'airain qui le défendaient en bas des scorpions, et ses treillis de baguettes dorées qui bouchaient en haut ses ouvertures, il semblait aux soldats, dans son opulence farouche, aussi solennel et impénétrable que le visage d'Hamilcar.

Le Conseil leur avait désigné sa maison pour y tenir ce festin ; les convalescents qui couchaient dans le temple d'Eschmoûn, se mettant en marche dès l'aurore, s'y étaient traînés sur leurs béquilles. A chaque minute, d'autres arrivaient. Par tous les sentiers, il en débouchait incessamment, comme des torrents qui se précipitent dans un lac. On voyait entre les arbres courir les esclaves des cuisines, effarés et à demi nus ; les gazelles sur les pelouses s'enfuyaient en bêlant ; le soleil se couchait, et le parfum des citronniers rendait encore plus lourde l'exhalaison de cette foule en sueur.

Il y avait là des hommes de toutes les nations, des Ligures, des Lusitaniens, des Baléares, des Nègres et des fugitifs de Rome. On entendait, à côté du lourd patois dorien, retentir les syllabes celtiques bruisantes comme des chars de bataille, et les terminaisons ioniennes se heurtaient aux consonnes du désert, âpres comme des cris de chacal. Le Grec se reconnaissait à sa taille mince, l'Egyptien à ses épaules remontées, le Cantabre à ses larges mollets. Des Cariens balançaient orgueilleusement les plumes de leur casque, des archers de Cappadoce s'étaient peints avec des jus d'herbes de larges fleurs sur le corps, et quelques Lydiens portant des robes de femmes dînaient en pantoufles et avec des boucles d'oreilles. D'autres, qui s'étaient par pompe barbouillés de vermillon, ressemblaient à des statues de corail.

Ils s'allongeaient sur les coussins, ils mangeaient accroupis autour de grands plateaux, ou bien, couchés sur le ventre, ils tiraient à eux les morceaux de viande, et se rassasiaient appuyés sur les coudes, dans la pose pacifique des lions lorsqu'ils dépècent leur proie. Les derniers venus, debout contre les arbres, regardaient les tables basses disparaissant à moitié sous des tapis d'écarlate, et attendaient leur tour.

Les cuisines d'Hamilcar n'étant pas suffisantes, le Conseil leur avait envoyé des esclaves, de la vaisselle, des lits ; et l'on voyait au milieu du jardin, comme sur un champ de bataille quand on brûle les morts, de grands feux clairs où rôtiissaient des boeufs. Les pains saupoudrés d'anis alternaient avec les gros fromages plus lourds que des disques, et les cratères pleins de vin, et les canthares pleins d'eau auprès des corbeilles en filigrane d'or qui contenaient des fleurs. La joie de pouvoir enfin se gorger à l'aise dilatait tous les yeux çà et là, les chansons commençaient.

D'abord on leur servit des oiseaux à la sauce verte, dans des assiettes d'argile rouge rehaussée de dessins noirs, puis toutes les espèces de coquillages que l'on ramasse sur les côtes puniques, des bouillies de froment, de fève et d'orge, et des escargots au cumin, sur des plats d'ambre jaune.

Ensuite les tables furent couvertes de viandes antilopes : avec leurs cornes, paons avec leurs plumes, moutons entiers cuits au vin doux, gigots de chèvres et de buffles, hérissons au garum, cigales frites et loirs confits. Dans des gamelles en bois de Tamrapanni flottaient, au milieu du safran, de grands morceaux de graisse. Tout débordait de saumure, de truffes et d'assa foetida. Les pyramides de fruits s'écroulaient sur les gâteaux de miel, et l'on n'avait pas oublié quelques-uns de ces petits chiens à gros ventre et à soies roses que l'on engraisait avec du marc d'olives, mets carthaginois en abomination aux autres peuples. La surprise des nourritures nouvelles excitait la cupidité des estomacs. Les Gaulois aux longs cheveux retroussés sur le sommet de la tête, s'arrachaient les pastèques et les limons qu'ils croquaient avec l'écorce. Des Nègres n'ayant jamais vu de langoustes se déchiraient le visage à leurs piquants rouges. Mais les Grecs rasés, plus blancs que des marbres, jetaient derrière eux les épluchures de leur assiette, tandis que des pâtres du Brutium, vêtus de peaux de loups, dévoraient silencieusement, le visage dans leur portion.

La nuit tombait. On retira le velarium étalé sur l'avenue de cyprès et l'on apporta des flambeaux.

Les lueurs vacillantes du pétrole qui brûlait dans des vases de porphyre effrayèrent, au haut des cèdres, les singes consacrés à la lune. Ils poussèrent des cris, ce qui mit les soldats en gaieté.

Des flammes oblongues tremblaient sur les cuirasses d'airain. Toutes sortes de scintillements jaillissaient des plats incrustés de pierres précieuses. Les cratères, à bordure de miroirs convexes, multipliaient l'image élargie des choses ; les soldats se pressant autour s'y regardaient avec ébahissement et grimaçaient pour se faire rire. Ils se lançaient, par-dessus les tables, les escabeaux d'ivoire et les spatules d'or. Ils avalaient à pleine gorge tous les vins grecs qui sont dans des outres, les vins de Campanie enfermés dans des amphores, les vins des Cantabres que l'on apporte dans des tonneaux, et les vins de jujubier, de cinnamome et de lotus. Il y en avait des flaques par terre où l'on glissait. La fumée des viandes montait dans les feuillages avec la vapeur des haleines. On entendait à la fois le claquement des mâchoires, le bruit des paroles, des chansons, des coupes, le fracas des vases campaniens qui s'écroulaient en mille morceaux, ou le son limpide d'un grand plat d'argent.

A mesure qu'augmentait leur ivresse, ils se rappelaient de plus en plus l'injustice de Carthage. En effet, la République, épuisée par la guerre, avait laissé s'accumuler dans la ville toutes les bandes qui revenaient. Giscon, leur général, avait eu cependant la prudence de les renvoyer les uns après les autres pour faciliter l'acquittement de leur solde, et le Conseil avait cru qu'ils finiraient par consentir à quelque diminution. Mais on leur en voulait aujourd'hui de ne pouvoir les payer. Cette dette se confondait dans l'esprit du peuple avec les trois mille deux cents talents euboïques exigés par Lutatius, et ils étaient, comme Rome, un ennemi pour Carthage. Les Mercenaires le comprenaient ; aussi leur indignation éclatait en menaces et en débordements. Enfin, ils demandèrent à se réunir pour célébrer une de leurs victoires, et le parti de la paix céda, en se vengeant d'Hamilcar qui avait tant soutenu la guerre. Elle s'était terminée contre tous ses efforts, si bien que, désespérant de Carthage, il avait remis à Giscon le gouvernement des Mercenaires. Désigner son palais pour les recevoir, c'était attirer sur lui quelque chose de la haine qu'on leur portait. D'ailleurs la dépense devait être excessive ; il la subirait presque toute.

Fiers d'avoir fait plier la République, les Mercenaires croyaient qu'ils allaient enfin s'en retourner chez eux, avec la solde de leur sang dans le capuchon de leur manteau. Mais leurs fatigues, revues à travers les vapeurs de l'ivresse, leur semblaient prodigieuses et trop peu récompensées. Ils se montraient leurs blessures, ils racontaient leurs combats, leurs voyages et les chasses de leurs pays. Ils imitaient le cri des bêtes féroces, leurs bonds. Puis vinrent les immondes gageures ; ils s'enfonçaient la tête dans les amphores, et restaient à boire, sans s'interrompre, comme des dromadaires altérés. Un Lusitanien, de taille gigantesque, portant un homme au bout de chaque bras, parcourait les tables tout en crachant du feu par les narines. Des Lacédémoniens qui n'avaient point ôté leurs cuirasses sautaient d'un pas lourd. Quelques-uns s'avançaient comme des femmes en faisant des gestes obscènes ; d'autres se mettaient nus pour combattre, au milieu des coupes, à la façon des gladiateurs, et une compagnie de Grecs dansait autour d'un vase où l'on voyait des nymphes, pendant qu'un nègre tapait avec un os de boeuf sur un bouclier d'airain.

Tout à coup, ils entendirent un chant plaintif, un chant fort et doux, qui s'abaissait et remontait dans les airs comme le battement d'ailes d'un oiseau blessé.

C'était la voix des esclaves dans l'ergastule. Des soldats, pour les délivrer, se levèrent d'un bond et disparurent.

Ils revinrent, chassant au milieu des cris, dans la poussière, une vingtaine d'hommes que l'on distinguait à leur visage plus pâle. Un petit bonnet de forme conique, en feutre noir, couvrait leur tête rasée ; ils portaient tous des sandales de bois et faisaient un bruit de ferrailles comme des chariots en marche.

Ils arrivèrent dans l'avenue des cyprès, où ils se perdirent parmi la foule, qui les interrogeait. L'un d'eux était resté à l'écart, debout. A travers les déchirures de sa tunique on apercevait ses épaules rayées par de longues balafres. Baissant le menton, il regardait autour de lui avec méfiance et fermait un peu ses paupières dans l'éblouissement des flambeaux ; mais quand il vit que personne de ces gens armés ne lui en voulait, un grand soupir s'échappa de sa poitrine : il balbutiait, il ricanait sous les larmes claires qui lavaient sa figure ; puis il saisit par les anneaux un canthare tout plein, le leva droit en l'air au bout de ses bras d'où pendaient des chaînes, et alors regardant le ciel et toujours tenant la coupe, il dit :

— " Salut d'abord à toi, Baal-Eschmoûn libérateur, que les gens de ma patrie appellent Esculape ! et à vous, Génies des fontaines, de la lumière et des bois ! et à vous, Dieux cachés sous les montagnes et dans les cavernes de la terre ! et à vous, hommes forts aux armures reluisantes, qui m'avez délivré ! "

Puis il laissa tomber la coupe et conta son histoire. On le nommait Spendius. Les Carthaginois l'avaient pris à la bataille des Egeineuses, et parlant grec, ligure et punique, il remercia encore une fois les Mercenaires ; il leur baisait les mains ; enfin, il les félicita du banquet, tout en s'étonnant de n'y pas apercevoir les coupes de la Légion sacrée. Ces coupes, portant une vigne en émeraude sur chacune de leurs six faces en or, appartenaient à une milice exclusivement composée des jeunes patriciens, les plus hauts de taille. C'était un privilège, presque un honneur sacerdotal ; aussi rien dans les trésors de la République n'était plus convoité des Mercenaires. Ils détestaient la Légion à cause de cela, et on en avait vu qui risquaient leur vie pour l'inconcevable plaisir d'y boire. Donc ils commandèrent d'aller chercher les coupes. Elles étaient en dépôt chez les Syssites, compagnies de commerçants qui mangeaient en commun. Les esclaves revinrent. A cette heure, tous les membres des Syssites dormaient.

— " Qu'on les réveille ! " répondirent les Mercenaires.

Après une seconde démarche, on leur expliqua qu'elles étaient enfermées dans un temple.

— " Qu'on l'ouvre ! " répliquèrent-ils.

Et quand les esclaves, en tremblant, eurent avoué qu'elles étaient entre les mains du général Giscon, ils s'écrièrent :

— " Qu'il les apporte ! "

Giscon, bientôt, apparut au fond du jardin dans une escorte de la Légion sacrée. Son ample manteau noir, retenu sur sa tête à une mitre d'or constellée de pierres précieuses, et qui pendait tout à l'entour jusqu'aux sabots de son cheval, se confondait, de loin, avec la couleur de la nuit. On n'apercevait que sa barbe blanche, les rayonnements de sa coiffure et son triple collier à larges plaques bleues qui lui battait sur la poitrine.

Les soldats, quand il entra, le saluèrent d'une grande acclamation, tous criant :

— " Les coupes ! Les coupes ! "

Il commença par déclarer que, si l'on considérait leur courage, ils en étaient dignes. La foule hurla de joie, en applaudissant.

Il le savait bien, lui qui les avait commandés là-bas et qui était revenu avec la dernière cohorte sur la dernière galère !

— " C'est vrai ! c'est vrai ! ", disaient-ils.

Cependant, continua Giscon, la République avait respecté leurs divisions par peuples, leurs coutumes, leurs cultes ; ils étaient libres dans Carthage ! Quant aux vases de la Légion sacrée, c'était une propriété particulière. Tout à coup, près de Spendius, un Gaulois s'élança par-dessus les tables et courut droit à Giscon, qu'il menaçait en gesticulant avec deux épées nues.

Le général, sans s'interrompre, le frappa sur la tête de son lourd bâton d'ivoire : le Barbare tomba. Les Gaulois hurlaient, et leur fureur, se communiquant aux autres, allait emporter les légionnaires. Giscon haussa les épaules en les voyant pâlir. Il songeait que son courage serait inutile contre ces bêtes brutes, exaspérées. Il valait mieux plus tard s'en venger dans quelque ruse ; donc il fit signe à ses soldats et s'éloigna lentement. Puis, sous la porte, se tournant vers les Mercenaires, il leur cria qu'ils s'en repentiraient.

Le festin recommença. Mais Giscon pouvait revenir et, cernant le faubourg qui touchait aux derniers remparts, les écraser contre les murs. Alors ils se sentirent seuls malgré leur foule ; et la grande ville qui dormait sous eux, dans l'ombre, leur fit peur, tout à coup, avec ses entassements d'escaliers, ses hautes maisons noires et ses vagues dieux encore plus féroces que son peuple. Au loin, quelques fanaux glissaient sur le port, et il y avait des lumières dans le temple de Khamon. Ils se souvinrent d'Hamilcar. Où était-il ? Pourquoi les avoir abandonnés, la paix conclue ? Ses dissensions avec le Conseil n'étaient sans doute qu'un jeu pour les perdre. Leur haine inassouvie retombait sur lui : et ils le maudissaient s'exaspérant les uns les autres par leur propre colère. A ce moment-là, il se fit un rassemblement sous les platanes. C'était pour voir un nègre qui se roulait en battant le sol avec ses membres, la prunelle fixe, le cou tordu, l'écume aux lèvres. Quelqu'un cria qu'il était empoisonné. Tous se crurent empoisonnés. Ils tombèrent sur les esclaves ; une clameur épouvantable s'éleva, et un vertige de destruction tourbillonna sur l'armée ivre. Ils frappaient au hasard, autour d'eux, ils brisaient, ils tuaient : quelques-uns lancèrent des flambeaux dans les feuillages ; d'autres, s'accoudant sur la balustrade des lions, les massacrèrent à coups de flèches ; les plus hardis coururent aux éléphants, ils voulaient leur abattre la trompe et manger de l'ivoire.

Cependant des frondeurs baléares qui, pour piller plus commodément, avaient tourné l'angle du palais, furent arrêtés par une haute barrière faite en jonc des Indes. Ils coupèrent avec leurs poignards les courroies de la serrure et se trouvèrent alors sous la façade qui regardait Carthage, dans un autre jardin rempli de végétations taillées. Des lignes de fleurs blanches, toutes se suivant une à une, décrivaient sur la terre couleur d'azur de longues paraboles, comme des fusées d'étoiles. Les buissons, pleins de ténèbres, exhalaient des odeurs chaudes, mielleuses. Il y avait des troncs d'arbre barbouillés de cinabre, qui ressemblaient à des colonnes sanglantes. Au milieu, douze piédestaux de cuivre portaient chacun une grosse boule de verre, et des lueurs rougeâtres emplissaient confusément ces globes creux, comme d'énormes prunelles qui palpitieraient encore. Les soldats s'éclairaient avec des torches, tout en trébuchant sur la pente du terrain, profondément labouré.

Mais ils aperçurent un petit lac, divisé en plusieurs bassins par des murailles de pierres bleues. L'onde était si limpide que les flammes des torches tremblaient jusqu'au fond, sur un lit de cailloux blancs et de poussière d'or. Elle se mit à bouillonner, des paillettes lumineuses glissèrent, et de gros poissons, qui portaient des pierreries à la gueule, apparurent vers la surface.

Les soldats, en riant beaucoup, leur passèrent les doigts dans les ouïes et les apportèrent sur les tables.

C'étaient les poissons de la famille Barca. Tous descendaient de ces lottes primordiales qui avaient fait éclore l'oeuf mystique où se cachait la Déesse. L'idée de commettre un sacrilège ranima la gourmandise des Mercenaires ; ils placèrent vite du feu sous des vases d'airain et s'amusèrent à regarder les beaux poissons se débattre dans l'eau bouillante.

La houle des soldats se poussait. Ils n'avaient plus peur. Ils recommençaient à boire. Les parfums qui leur coulaient du front mouillaient de gouttes larges leurs tuniques en lambeaux, et s'appuyant des deux poings sur les tables qui leur semblaient osciller comme des navires, ils promenaient à l'entour leurs gros yeux ivres, pour dévorer par la vue ce qu'ils ne pouvaient prendre. D'autres, marchant tout au milieu des plats sur les nappes de pourpre, cassaient à coups de pied les escabeaux d'ivoire et les fioles tyriennes en verre. Les chansons se mêlaient au râle des esclaves agonisant parmi les coupes brisées. Ils demandaient du vin, des viandes, de l'or. Ils criaient pour avoir des femmes. Ils déliraient en cent langages. Quelques-uns se croyaient aux étuves, à cause de la buée qui flottait autour d'eux, ou bien, apercevant des feuillages, ils s'imaginaient être à la chasse et couraient sur leurs compagnons comme sur des bêtes sauvages. L'incendie de l'un à l'autre gagnait tous les arbres, et les hautes masses de verdure, d'où s'échappaient de longues spirales blanches, semblaient des volcans qui commencent à fumer. La clameur redoublait ; les lions blessés rugissaient dans l'ombre.

Le palais s'éclaira d'un seul coup à sa plus haute terrasse, la porte du milieu s'ouvrit, et une femme, la fille d'Hamilcar elle-même, couverte de vêtements noirs, apparut sur le seuil. Elle descendit le premier escalier qui longeait obliquement le premier étage, puis le second, le troisième, et elle s'arrêta sur la dernière terrasse, au haut de l'escalier des galères. Immobile et la tête basse, elle regardait les soldats.

Derrière elle, de chaque côté, se tenaient deux longues théories d'hommes pâles, vêtus de robes blanches à franges rouges qui tombaient droit sur leurs pieds. Ils n'avaient pas de barbe, pas de cheveux, pas de sourcils. Dans leurs mains étincelantes d'anneaux ils portaient d'énormes lyres et chantaient tous, d'une voix aiguë, un hymne à la divinité de Carthage. C'étaient les prêtres eunuques du temple de Tanit, que Salammbô appelait souvent dans sa maison.

Enfin elle descendit l'escalier des galères. Les prêtres la suivirent. Elle s'avança dans l'avenue des cyprès, et elle marchait lentement entre les tables des capitaines, qui se reculaient un peu en la regardant passer.

Sa chevelure, poudrée d'un sable violet, et réunie en forme de tour selon la mode des vierges chananéennes, la faisait paraître plus grande. Des tresses de perles attachées à ses tempes descendaient jusqu'aux coins de sa bouche, rose comme une grenade entrouverte. Il y avait sur sa poitrine un assemblage de pierres lumineuses, imitant par leur bigarrure les écailles d'une murène. Ses bras, garnis de diamants, sortaient nus de sa tunique sans manches, étoilée de fleurs rouges sur un fond tout noir. Elle portait entre les chevilles une chaînette d'or pour régler sa marche, et son grand manteau de pourpre sombre, taillé dans une étoffe inconnue, traînait derrière elle, faisant à chacun de ses pas comme une large vague qui la suivait.

Les prêtres, de temps à autre, pinçaient sur leurs lyres des accords presque étouffés, et dans les intervalles de la musique, on entendait le petit bruit de la chaînette d'or avec le claquement régulier de ses sandales en papyrus.

Personne encore ne la connaissait. On savait seulement qu'elle vivait retirée dans des pratiques pieuses. Des soldats l'avaient aperçue la nuit, sur le haut de son palais, à genoux devant les étoiles, entre les tourbillons des cassolettes allumées. C'était la lune qui l'avait rendue si pâle, et quelque chose des Dieux l'enveloppait comme une vapeur subtile. Ses prunelles semblaient regarder tout au loin au-delà des espaces terrestres. Elle marchait en inclinant la tête, et tenait à sa main droite une petite lyre d'ébène.

Ils l'entendaient murmurer :

— " Morts ! Tous morts ! Vous ne viendrez plus obéissant à ma voix, quand, assise sur le bord du lac, je vous jetais dans la gueule des pépins de pastèques ! Le mystère de Tanit roulait au fond de vos yeux, plus limpides que les globules des fleuves. " Et elle les appelait par leurs noms, qui étaient les noms des mois.

— " Siv ! Sivan ! Tammouz, Eloul, Tischri, Schebar !

— Ah ! pitié pour moi, Déesse ! "

Les soldats, sans comprendre ce qu'elle disait, se tassaient autour d'elle. Ils s'ébahissaient de sa parure ; mais elle promena sur eux tous un long regard épouvanté, puis s'enfonçant la tête dans les épaules en écartant les bras, elle répéta plusieurs fois :

— " Qu'avez-vous fait ! qu'avez-vous fait !

— Vous aviez cependant, pour vous réjouir, du pain, des viandes, de l'huile, tout le malobathre des greniers ! J'avais fait venir des boeufs d'Hécatompyle, j'avais envoyé des chasseurs dans le désert ! " Sa voix s'enflait, ses joues s'empourpraient. Elle ajouta : " Où êtes-vous donc, ici ? Est-ce dans une ville conquise, ou dans le palais d'un maître ? Et quel maître ? le suffète Hamilcar mon père, serviteur des Baals ! Vos armes, rouges du sang de ses esclaves, c'est lui qui les a refusées à Lutatius ! En connaissez-vous un dans vos patries qui sache mieux conduire les batailles ? Regardez donc ! les marches de notre palais sont encombrées par nos victoires ! Continuez ! brûlez-le ! J'emporterai avec moi le Génie de ma maison, mon serpent noir qui dort là-haut sur des feuilles de lotus ! Je sifflerai, il me suivra ; et, si je monte en galère, il courra dans le sillage de mon navire sur l'écume des flots. "

Ses narines minces palpitaient. Elle écrasait ses ongles contre les pierreries de sa poitrine. Ses yeux s'alanguirent ; elle reprit :

— " Ah ! pauvre Carthage ! lamentable ville ! Tu n'as plus pour te défendre les hommes forts d'autrefois, qui allaient au-delà des océans bâtir des temples sur les rivages. Tous les pays travaillaient autour de toi, et les plaines de la mer, labourées par tes rames, balançaient tes moissons. "

Alors elle se mit à chanter les aventures de Melkarth, dieu des Sidoniens et père de sa famille.

Elle disait l'ascension des montagnes d'Ersiphonie, le voyage à Tartessus, et la guerre contre Masisabal pour venger la reine des serpents :

— " Il poursuivait dans la forêt le monstre femelle dont la queue ondulait sur les feuilles mortes comme un ruisseau d'argent ; et il arriva dans une prairie où des femmes, à croupe de dragon, se tenaient autour d'un grand feu, dressées sur la pointe de leur queue. La lune, couleur de sang, resplendissait dans un cercle pâle, et leurs langues écarlates, fendues comme des harpons de pêcheurs, s'allongeaient en se recourbant jusqu'au bord de la flamme. "

Puis Salammbô, sans s'arrêter, raconta comment Melkarth, après avoir vaincu Masisabal, mit à la proue du navire sa tête coupée. — " A chaque battement des flots, elle s'enfonçait sous l'écume ; mais le soleil l'embaumait, elle se fit plus dure que l'or ; cependant les yeux ne cessaient point de pleurer, et les larmes, continuellement, tombaient dans l'eau. "

Elle chantait tout cela dans un vieil idiome chananéen que n'entendaient pas les Barbares. Ils se demandaient ce qu'elle pouvait leur dire avec les gestes effrayants dont elle accompagnait son discours ; — et montés autour d'elle sur les tables, sur les lits, dans les rameaux des sycomores, la bouche ouverte et allongeant la tête, ils tâchaient de saisir ces vagues histoires qui se balançaient devant leur imagination, à travers l'obscurité des théogonies, comme des fantômes dans des nuages.

Seuls, les prêtres sans barbe comprenaient Salammbô. Leurs mains ridées, pendant sur les cordes des lyres, frémissaient, et de temps à autre en tiraient un accord lugubre : car plus faibles que des vieilles femmes ils tremblaient à la fois d'émotion mystique et de la peur que leur faisaient les hommes. Les Barbares ne s'en souciaient ; ils écoutaient toujours la vierge chanter.

Aucun ne la regardait comme un jeune chef numide placé aux tables des capitaines, parmi des soldats de sa nation. Sa ceinture était si hérissée de dards, qu'elle faisait une bosse dans son large manteau, noué à ses tempes par un lacet de cuir. L'étoffe, bâillant sur ses épaules, enveloppait d'ombre son visage, et l'on n'apercevait que les flammes de ses deux yeux fixes. C'était par hasard qu'il se trouvait au festin, — son père le faisant vivre chez les Barca, selon la coutume des rois qui envoyaient leurs enfants dans les grandes familles pour préparer des alliances ; mais depuis six mois que Narr'Havas y logeait, il n'avait point encore aperçu Salammbô ; et, assis sur les talons, la barbe baissée vers les hampes de ses javelots, il la considérait en écartant les narines comme un léopard qui est accroupi dans les bambous.

De l'autre côté des tables se tenait un Libyen de taille colossale et à courts cheveux noirs frisés. Il n'avait gardé que sa jaquette militaire, dont les lames d'airain déchiraient la pourpre du lit. Un collier à lune d'argent s'embarrassait dans les poils de sa poitrine. Des éclaboussures de sang lui tachetaient la face, il s'appuyait sur le coude gauche ; et la bouche grande ouverte il souriait.

Salammbô n'en était plus au rythme sacré. Elle employait simultanément tous les idiomes des Barbares, délicatesse de femme pour attendrir leur colère. Aux Grecs elle parlait grec, puis elle se tournait vers les Ligures, vers les Campaniens, vers les Nègres ; et chacun en l'écoutant retrouvait dans cette voix la douceur de sa patrie. Emportée par les souvenirs de Carthage, elle chantait maintenant les anciennes batailles contre Rome ; ils applaudissaient. Elle s'enflammait à la lueur des épées nues ; elle criait, les bras ouverts. Sa lyre tomba, elle se tut ; — et pressant son cœur à deux mains, elle resta quelques minutes les paupières closes à savourer l'agitation de tous ces hommes.

Mâtho le Libyen se penchait vers elle. Involontairement elle s'en approcha, et, poussée par la reconnaissance de son orgueil, elle lui versa dans une coupe d'or un long jet de vin pour se réconcilier avec l'armée.

— " Bois ! " dit-elle.

Il prit la coupe et il la portait à ses lèvres quand un Gaulois, le même que Giscon avait blessé, le frappa sur l'épaule, tout en débitant d'un air jovial des plaisanteries dans la langue de son pays. Spendius n'était pas loin ; il s'offrit à les expliquer.

— " Parle ! " dit Mâtho.

— " Les Dieux te protègent, tu vas devenir riche. A quand les noces ? "

— " Quelles noces ? "

— " Les tiennes ! car chez nous ", dit le Gaulois, lorsqu'une femme fait boire un soldat, c'est qu'elle lui offre sa couche. "

Il n'avait pas fini que Narr'Havas, en bondissant, tira un javelot de sa ceinture, et appuyé du pied droit sur le bord de la table, il le lança contre Mâtho.

Le javelot siffla entre les coupes, et, traversant le bras du Libyen, le cloua sur la nappe si fortement, que la poignée en tremblait dans l'air.

Mâtho l'arracha vite ; mais il n'avait pas d'armes, il était nu ; enfin, levant à deux bras la table surchargée, il la jeta contre Narr'Havas tout au milieu de la foule qui se précipitait entre eux. Les soldats et les Numides se serraient à ne pouvoir tirer leurs glaives. Mâtho avançait en donnant de grands coups avec sa tête. Quand il la releva, Narr'Havas avait disparu. Il le chercha des yeux. Salammbo aussi était partie.

Alors sa vue se tournant sur le palais, il aperçut tout en haut la porte rouge à croix noire qui se refermait. Il s'élança.

On le vit courir entre les proues des galères, puis réapparaître le long des trois escaliers jusqu'à la porte rouge qu'il heurta de tout son corps. En haletant, il s'appuya contre le mur pour ne pas tomber.

Un homme l'avait suivi, et, à travers les ténèbres, car les lueurs du festin étaient cachées par l'angle du palais, il reconnut Spendius.

— " Va-t'en ! " dit-il.

L'esclave, sans répondre, se mit avec ses dents à déchirer sa tunique ; puis s'agenouillant auprès de Mâtho il lui prit le bras délicatement, et il le palpait dans l'ombre pour découvrir la blessure.

Sous un rayon de la lune qui glissait entre les nuages, Spendius aperçut au milieu du bras une plaie béante. Il roula tout autour le morceau d'étoffe ; mais l'autre, s'irritant, disait : " Laisse-moi ! Laisse-moi ! "

— " Oh ! non ! " reprit l'esclave. " Tu m'as délivré de l'ergastule. Je suis à toi ! tu es mon maître ! ordonne ! "

Mâtho, en frôlant les murs, fit le tour de la terrasse. Il tendait l'oreille à chaque pas, et, par l'intervalle des roseaux dorés, plongeait ses regards dans les appartements silencieux. Enfin il s'arrêta d'un air désespéré.

— " Ecoute ! " lui dit l'esclave. " Oh ! ne me méprise pas pour ma faiblesse ! J'ai vécu dans le palais. Je peux, comme une vipère, me couler entre les murs. Viens ! Il y a dans la Chambre des Ancêtres un lingot d'or sous chaque dalle ; une voie souterraine conduit à leurs tombeaux. " — " Eh ! qu'importe ! " dit Mâtho.

Spendius se tut.

Ils étaient sur la terrasse. Une masse d'ombre énorme s'étalait devant eux, et qui semblait contenir de vagues amoncellements, pareils aux flots gigantesques d'un océan noir pétrifié.

Mais une barre lumineuse s'éleva du côté de l'Orient. A gauche, tout en bas, les canaux de Mégara commençaient à rayer de leurs sinuosités blanches les verdure des jardins. Les toits coniques des temples heptagones, les escaliers, les terrasses, les remparts, peu à peu, se découpaient sur la pâleur de l'aube ; et tout autour de la péninsule carthaginoise une ceinture d'écume blanche oscillait tandis que la mer couleur d'émeraude semblait comme figée dans la fraîcheur du matin. Puis à mesure que le ciel rose allait s'élargissant, les hautes maisons inclinées sur les pentes du terrain se haussaient, se tassaient telles qu'un troupeau de chèvres noires qui descend des montagnes. Les rues désertes s'allongeaient ; les palmiers, çà et là sortant des murs, ne bougeaient pas ; les citernes remplies avaient l'air de boucliers d'argent perdus dans les cours, le phare du promontoire Hennormaeum commençait à pâlir. Tout en haut de l'Acropole, dans le bois de cyprès, les chevaux d'Eschmoûn, sentant venir la lumière, posaient leurs sabots sur le parapet de marbre et hennissaient du côté du soleil.

Il parut ; Spendius, levant les bras, poussa un cri.

Tout s'agitait dans une rougeur épandue, car le Dieu, comme se déchirant, versait à pleins rayons sur Carthage la pluie d'or de ses veines. Les éperons des galères étincelaient, le toit de Khamon paraissait tout en flammes, et l'on apercevait des lueurs au fond des temples dont les portes s'ouvraient. Les grands chariots arrivant de la campagne faisaient tourner leurs roues sur les dalles des rues. Des dromadaires chargés de bagages descendaient les rampes. Les changeurs dans les carrefours relevaient les auvents de leurs boutiques. Des cigognes s'envolèrent, des voiles blanches palpaient. On entendait dans le bois de Tanit le tambourin des courtisanes sacrées, et à la pointe des Mappales, les fourneaux pour cuire les cercueils d'argile commençaient à fumer.

Spendius se penchait en dehors de la terrasse ; ses dents claquaient, il répétait :

— " Ah ! oui... oui ... maître ! je comprends pourquoi tu dédaignais tout à l'heure le pillage de la maison. "

Mâtho fut comme réveillé par le sifflement de sa voix, il semblait ne pas comprendre ; Spendius reprit :

— " Ah ! quelles richesses ! et les hommes qui les possèdent n'ont même pas de fer pour les défendre ! "

Alors, lui faisant voir de sa main droite étendue quelques-uns de la populace qui rampaient en dehors du môle, sur le sable, pour chercher des paillettes d'or :

— " Tiens ! " lui dit-il, " la République est comme ces misérables : courbée au bord des océans, elle enfonce dans tous les rivages ses bras avides, et le bruit des flots emplît tellement son oreille qu'elle n'entendrait pas venir par-derrière le talon d'un maître ! "

Il entraîna Mâtho tout à l'autre bout de la terrasse, et lui montrant le jardin où miroitaient au soleil les épées des soldats suspendues dans les arbres.

— " Mais ici il y a des hommes forts dont la haine est exaspérée ! et rien ne les attache à Carthage, ni leurs familles, ni leurs serments, ni leurs dieux ! "

Mâtho restait appuyé contre le mur ; Spendius, se rapprochant, poursuivit à voix basse :

— " Me comprends-tu, soldat ? Nous nous promènerions couverts de pourpre comme des satrapes. On nous laverait dans les parfums ; j'aurais des esclaves à mon tour ! N'es-tu pas las de dormir sur la terre dure, de boire le vinaigre des camps, et toujours d'entendre la trompette ? Tu te reposeras plus tard, n'est-ce pas ? quand on arrachera ta cuirasse pour jeter ton cadavre aux vautours ! ou peut-être, t'appuyant sur un bâton, aveugle, boiteux, débile, tu t'en iras de porte en porte raconter ta jeunesse aux petits enfants et aux vendeurs de saumure. Rappelle-toi toutes les injustices de tes chefs, les campements dans la neige, les courses au soleil, les tyrannies de la discipline et l'éternelle menace de la croix ! Après tant de misères on t'a donné un collier d'honneur, comme on suspend au poitrail des ânes une ceinture de grelots pour les étourdir dans la marche, et faire qu'ils ne sentent pas la fatigue. Un homme comme toi, plus brave que Pyrrhus ! Si tu l'avais voulu, pourtant ! Ah ! comme tu seras heureux dans les grandes salles fraîches, au son des lyres, couché sur des fleurs, avec des bouffons et avec des femmes ! Ne me dis pas que l'entreprise est impossible ! Est-ce que les Mercenaires, déjà, n'ont pas possédé Rheggium et d'autres places fortes en Italie ! Qui t'empêche ? !

Hamilcar est absent ; le peuple exècre les Riches ; Giscon ne peut rien sur les lâches qui l'entourent. Mais tu es brave, toi ! ils t'obéiront. Commande-les ! Carthage est à nous ; jetons-nous-y ! "

— " Non ! " dit Mâtho, " la malédiction de Moloch pèse sur moi. Je l'ai senti à ses yeux, et tout à l'heure j'ai vu dans un temple un bélier noir qui reculait. " Il ajouta, en regardant autour de lui : " Où est-elle ? "

Spendius comprit qu'une inquiétude immense l'occupait ; il n'osa plus parler.

Les arbres derrière eux fumaient encore ; de leurs branches noircies, des carcasses de singes à demi-brûlées tombaient de temps à autre au milieu des plats. Les soldats ivres ronflaient la bouche ouverte à côté des cadavres ; et ceux qui ne dormaient pas baissaient leur tête, éblouis par le jour. Le sol piétiné disparaissait sous des flaques rouges. Les éléphants balançaient entre les pieux de leurs parcs leurs trompes sanglantes. On apercevait dans les greniers ouverts des sacs de froment répandus, et sous la porte une ligne épaisse de chariots amoncelés par les Barbares ; les paons juchés dans les cèdres déployaient leur queue et se mettaient à crier.

Cependant l'immobilité de Mâtho étonnait Spendius, il était encore plus pâle que tout à l'heure, et, les prunelles fixes, il suivait quelque chose à l'horizon, appuyé des deux poings sur le bord de la terrasse. Spendius, en se courbant, finit par découvrir ce qu'il contemplait. Un point d'or tournait au loin dans la poussière sur la route d'Utique ; c'était le moyeu d'un char attelé de deux mulets ; un esclave courait à la tête du timon, en les tenant par la bride. Il y avait dans le char deux femmes assises. Les crinières des bêtes bouffaient entre leurs oreilles à la mode persique, sous un réseau de perles bleues. Spendius les reconnut ; il retint un cri.

Un grand voile, par-derrière, flottait au vent.

Chapitre 2 A SICCA

Deux jours après, les Mercenaires sortirent de Carthage.

On leur avait donné à chacun une pièce d'or, sous la condition qu'ils iraient camper à Sicca, et on leur avait dit avec toutes sortes de caresses :

— " Vous êtes les sauveurs de Carthage ! Mais vous l'affameriez en y restant ; elle deviendrait insolvable. Eloignez-vous ! La République, plus tard, vous saura gré de cette condescendance. Nous allons immédiatement lever des impôts ; votre solde sera complète, et l'on équippa des galères qui vous reconduiront dans vos patries. "

Ils ne savaient que répondre à tant de discours. Ces hommes, accoutumés à la guerre, s'ennuyaient dans le séjour d'une ville ; on n'eut pas de mal à les convaincre, et le peuple monta sur les murs pour les voir s'en aller.

Ils défilèrent par la rue de Khamon et la porte de Cirta, pêle-mêle, les archers avec les hoplites, les capitaines avec les soldats, les Lusitaniens avec les Grecs. Ils marchaient d'un pas hardi, faisant sonner sur les dalles leurs lourds cothurnes. Leurs armures étaient bosselées par les catapultes et leurs visages noircis par le hâle des batailles. Des cris rauques sortaient des barbes épaisses ; leurs cottes de mailles déchirées battaient sur les pommeaux des glaives, et l'on apercevait, aux trous de l'airain, leurs membres nus, effrayants comme des machines de guerre. Les sarisses, les haches, les épieux, les bonnets de feutre et les casques de bronze, tout oscillait à la fois d'un seul mouvement. Ils emplissaient la rue à faire craquer les murs, et cette longue masse de soldats en armes s'épanchait entre les hautes maisons à six étages, barbouillées de bitume. Derrière leurs grilles de fer ou de roseaux, les femmes, la tête couverte d'un voile, regardaient en silence les Barbares passer.

Les terrasses, les fortifications, les murs disparaissaient sous la foule des Carthaginois, habillée de vêtements noirs. Les tuniques des matelots faisaient comme des taches de sang parmi cette sombre multitude, et des enfants presque nus, dont la peau brillait sous leurs bracelets de cuivre, gesticulaient dans le feuillage des colonnes ou entre les branches d'un palmier. Quelques-uns des Anciens s'étaient postés sur la plate-forme des tours, et l'on ne savait pas pourquoi se tenait ainsi, de place en place, un personnage à barbe longue, dans une attitude rêveuse. Il apparaissait de loin sur le fond du ciel, vague comme un fantôme, et immobile comme les pierres.

Tous, cependant, étaient oppressés par la même inquiétude ; on avait peur que les Barbares, en se voyant si forts, n'eussent la fantaisie de vouloir rester. Mais ils partaient avec tant de confiance que les Carthaginois s'enhardirent et se mêlèrent aux soldats. On les accablait de serments, d'étreintes. Quelques-uns même les engageaient à ne pas quitter la ville, par exagération de politique et audace d'hypocrisie. On leur jetait des parfums, des fleurs et des pièces d'argent. On leur donnait des amulettes contre les maladies ; mais on avait craché dessus trois fois pour attirer la mort, ou enfermé dedans des poils de chacal qui rendent le coeur lâche. On invoquait tout haut la faveur de Melkarth et tout bas sa malédiction.

Puis vint la cohue des bagages, des bêtes de somme et des traînards. Des malades gémissaient sur des dromadaires ; d'autres s'appuyaient, en boitant, sur le tronçon d'une pique. Les ivrognes emportaient des outres, les voraces des quartiers de viande, des gâteaux, des fruits, du beurre dans des feuilles de figuier, de la neige dans des sacs de toile. On en voyait avec des parasols à la main, avec des perroquets sur l'épaule. Ils se faisaient suivre par des dogues, par des gazelles ou des panthères. Des femmes de race Libyque, montées sur des ânes, invectivaient les négresses qui avaient abandonné pour les soldats les lupanars de Malqua : plusieurs allaitaient des enfants suspendus à leur poitrine dans une lanière de cuir. Les mulets, que l'on aiguillonnait avec la pointe des glaives, pliaient l'échine sous le fardeau des tentes ; et il y avait une quantité de valets et de porteurs d'eau, hâves, jaunis par les fièvres et tout sales de vermine, écume de la plèbe carthaginoise, qui s'attachait aux Barbares.

Quand ils furent passés, on ferma les portes derrière eux, le peuple ne descendit pas des murs ; l'armée se répandit bientôt sur la largeur de l'isthme.

Elle se divisait par masses inégales. Puis les lances apparurent comme de hauts brins d'herbe, enfin tout se perdit dans une traînée de poussière ; ceux des soldats qui se retournaient vers Carthage, n'apercevaient plus que ses longues murailles, découpant au bord du ciel leurs créneaux vides.

Alors les Barbares entendirent un grand cri. Ils crurent que quelques-uns d'entre eux, restés dans la ville (car ils ne savaient pas leur nombre), s'amusaient à piller un temple. Ils rirent beaucoup à cette idée, puis continuèrent leur chemin.

Ils étaient joyeux de se retrouver, comme autrefois, marchant tous ensemble dans la pleine campagne ; et des Grecs chantaient la vieille chanson des Mamertins :

— " Avec ma lance et mon épée, je laboure et je moissonne ; c'est moi qui suis le maître de la maison ! L'homme désarmé tombe à mes genoux et m'appelle Seigneur et Grand-Roi. "

Ils criaient, sautaient, les plus gais commençaient des histoires ; le temps des misères était fini. En arrivant à Tunis, quelques-uns remarquèrent qu'il manquait une troupe de frondeurs baléares. Ils n'étaient pas loin, sans doute : on n'y pensa plus.

Les uns allèrent loger dans les maisons, les autres campèrent au pied des murs, et les gens de la ville vinrent causer avec les soldats. Pendant toute la nuit, on aperçut des feux qui brûlaient à l'horizon, du côté de Carthage ; ces lueurs, comme des torches géantes, s'allongeaient sur le lac immobile. Personne, dans l'armée, ne pouvait dire quelle fête on célébrait.

Les Barbares, le lendemain, traversèrent une campagne toute couverte de cultures. Les métairies des patriciens se succédaient sur le bord de la route ; des rigoles coulaient dans des bois de palmiers ; les oliviers faisaient de longues lignes vertes ; des vapeurs roses flottaient dans les gorges des collines ; des montagnes bleues se dressaient par derrière. Un vent chaud soufflait. Des caméléons rampaient sur les feuilles larges des cactus.

Les Barbares se ralentirent.

Ils s'en allaient par détachements isolés, ou se traînaient les uns après les autres à de longs intervalles. Ils mangeaient des raisins au bord des vignes. Ils se couchaient dans les herbes, et ils regardaient avec stupéfaction les grandes cornes des boeufs artificiellement tordues, les brebis revêtues de peaux pour protéger leur laine, les sillons qui s'entrecroisaient de manière à former des losanges, et les socs de charrues pareils à des ancres de navires, avec les grenadiers que l'on arrosait de silphium. Cette opulence de la terre et ces inventions de la sagesse les éblouissaient.

Le soir, ils s'étendirent sur les tentes sans les déplier ; et, tout en s'endormant la figure aux étoiles, ils regrettaient le festin d'Hamilcar.

Au milieu du jour suivant, on fit halte sur le bord d'une rivière, dans des touffes de lauriers-roses. Alors ils jetèrent vite leurs lances, leurs boucliers, leurs ceintures. Ils se lavaient en criant, ils puisaient dans leur casque, et d'autres buvaient à plat ventre, tout au milieu des bêtes de somme, dont les bagages tombaient.

Spendius, assis sur un dromadaire volé dans les parcs d'Hamilcar, aperçut de loin Mâtho, qui, le bras suspendu contre la poitrine, nu-tête et la figure basse, laissait boire son mulet, tout en regardant l'eau couler. Aussitôt il courut à travers la foule, en l'appelant :

— " Maître ! maître ! "

A peine si Mâtho le remercia de ses bénédictions. Spendius n'y prenant garde se mit à marcher derrière lui, et, de temps à autre, il tournait des yeux inquiets du côté de Carthage.

C'était le fils d'un rhéteur grec et d'une prostituée campanienne. Il s'était d'abord enrichi à vendre des femmes ; puis, ruiné par un naufrage, il avait fait la guerre contre les Romains avec les pâtres du Samnium. On l'avait pris, il s'était échappé ; on l'avait repris, et il avait travaillé dans les carrières, haleté dans les étuves, crié dans les supplices, passé par bien des maîtres, connu toutes les fureurs. Un jour enfin, par désespoir il s'était lancé à la mer du haut de la trirème où il poussait l'aviron. Des matelots d'Hamilcar l'avaient recueilli mourant et amené à Carthage dans l'ergastule de Mégara. Mais comme on devait rendre aux Romains leurs transfuges, il avait profité du désordre pour s'enfuir avec les soldats.

Pendant toute la route, il resta près de Mâtho ; il lui apportait à manger, il le soutenait pour descendre, il étendait un tapis, le soir, sous sa tête. Mâtho finit par s'émouvoir de ces prévenances, et peu à peu il desserra les lèvres.

Il était né dans le golfe des Syrtes. Son père l'avait conduit en pèlerinage au temple d'Ammon. Puis il avait chassé les éléphants dans les forêts des Garamantes. Ensuite, il s'était engagé au service de Carthage. On l'avait nommé tétrarque à la prise de Drépanum. La République lui devait quatre chevaux, vingt-trois médines de froment et la solde d'un hiver. Il craignait les Dieux et souhaitait mourir dans sa patrie.

Spendius lui parla de ses voyages, des peuples et des temples qu'il avait visités, et il connaissait beaucoup de choses : il savait faire des sandales, des épieux, des filets, apprivoiser les bêtes farouches et cuire des poissons.

Parfois s'interrompant, il tirait du fond de sa gorge un cri rauque ; le mulet de Mâtho pressait son allure ; les autres se hâtaient pour les suivre, puis Spendius recommençait, toujours agité par son angoisse. Elle se calma, le soir du quatrième jour.

Ils marchaient côte à côte, à la droite de l'armée, sur le flanc d'une colline ; la plaine, en bas, se prolongeait, perdue dans les vapeurs de la nuit. Les lignes des soldats défilant au-dessous d'eux faisaient dans l'ombre des ondulations. De temps à autre elles passaient sur les éminences éclairées par la lune ; alors une étoile tremblait à la pointe des piques, les casques un instant miroitaient, tout disparaissait, et il en survenait d'autres, continuellement. Au loin, des troupeaux réveillés bêlaient, et quelque chose d'une douceur infinie semblait s'abattre sur la terre.

Spendius, la tête renversée et les yeux à demi clos, aspirait avec de grands soupirs la fraîcheur du vent ; il écartait les bras en remuant ses doigts pour mieux sentir cette caresse qui lui coulait sur le corps. Des espoirs de vengeance, revenus, le transportaient. Il colla sa main contre sa bouche afin d'arrêter ses sanglots, et, à demi pâmé d'ivresse, il abandonnait le licol de son dromadaire qui avançait à grands pas réguliers. Mâtho était retombé dans sa tristesse : ses jambes pendaient jusqu'à terre, et les herbes, en fouettant ses cothurnes, faisaient un sifflement continu.

Cependant, la route s'allongeait sans jamais en finir. A l'extrémité d'une plaine, toujours on arrivait sur un plateau de forme ronde ; puis on redescendait dans une vallée, et les montagnes qui semblaient boucher l'horizon, à mesure que l'on approchait d'elles, se déplaçaient comme en glissant. De temps à autre, une rivière apparaissait dans la verdure des tamarix, pour se perdre au tournant des collines. Parfois, se dressait un énorme rocher, pareil à la proue d'un vaisseau ou au piédestal de quelque colosse disparu.

On rencontrait, à des intervalles réguliers, de petits temples quadrangulaires, servant aux stations des pèlerins qui se rendaient à Sicca. Ils étaient fermés comme des tombeaux. Les Libyens, pour se faire ouvrir, frappaient de grands coups contre la porte. Personne de l'intérieur ne répondait.

Puis les cultures se firent plus rares. On entraît tout à coup sur des bandes de sable, hérissées de bouquets épineux. Des troupeaux de moutons brouaient parmi les pierres ; une femme, la taille ceinte d'une toison bleue, les gardait. Elle s'enfuyait en poussant des cris, dès qu'elle apercevait entre les rochers les piques des soldats.

Ils marchaient dans une sorte de grand couloir bordé par deux chaînes de monticules rougeâtres, quand une odeur nauséabonde vint les frapper aux narines, et ils crurent voir au haut d'un caroubier quelque chose d'extraordinaire : une tête de lion se dressait au-dessus des feuilles.

Ils y coururent. C'était un lion, attaché à une croix par les quatre membres comme un criminel. Son mufle énorme lui retombait sur la poitrine, et ses deux pattes antérieures, disparaissant à demi sous l'abondance de sa crinière, étaient largement écartées comme les deux ailes d'un oiseau. Ses côtes, une à une, saillaient sous sa peau tendue ; ses jambes de derrière, clouées l'une contre l'autre, remontaient un peu ; et du sang noir, coulant parmi ses poils, avait amassé des stalactites au bas de sa queue qui pendait toute droite le long de la croix. Les soldats se divertirent autour ; ils l'appelaient consul et citoyen de Rome et lui jetèrent des cailloux dans les yeux, pour faire envoler les moucheron.

Cent pas plus loin ils en virent deux autres, puis tout à coup parut une longue file de croix supportant des lions. Les uns étaient morts depuis si longtemps qu'il ne restait plus contre le bois que les débris de leurs squelettes ; d'autres à moitié rongés tordaient la gueule en faisant une horrible grimace ; il y en avait d'énormes, l'arbre de la croix pliait sous eux et ils se balançaient au vent, tandis que sur leur tête des bandes de corbeaux tournoyaient dans l'air, sans jamais s'arrêter. Ainsi se vengeaient les paysans carthaginois quand ils avaient pris quelque bête féroce ; ils espéraient par cet exemple terrifier les autres. Les Barbares, cessant de rire, tombèrent dans un long étonnement. " Quel est ce peuple, pensaient-ils, qui s'amuse à crucifier les lions ! " inquiets, troublés, malades déjà, ils se déchiraient les mains aux dards des aloès ; de grands moustiques bourdonnaient à leurs oreilles, et les dysenteries commençaient dans l'armée. Ils s'ennuyaient de ne pas voir Sicca. Ils avaient peur de se perdre et d'atteindre le désert, la contrée des sables et des épouvantements. Beaucoup même ne voulaient plus avancer. D'autres reprirent le chemin de Carthage.

Ils étaient, d'ailleurs, les hommes du Nord surtout, vaguement

Enfin le septième jour, après avoir suivi pendant longtemps la base d'une montagne, on tourna brusquement à droite ; alors apparut une ligne de murailles posée sur des roches blanches et se confondant avec elles. Soudain la ville entière se dressa ; des voiles bleus, jaunes et blancs s'agitaient sur les murs, dans la rougeur du soir. C'étaient les prêtresses de Tanit, accourues pour recevoir les hommes. Elles se tenaient rangées sur le long du rempart, en frappant des tambourins, en pinçant des lyres, en secouant des crotales, et les rayons du soleil, qui se couchait par- derrière, dans les montagnes de la Numidie, passaient entre les cordes des harpes où s'allongeaient leurs bras nus. Les instruments, par intervalles, se taisaient tout à coup, et un cri strident éclatait, précipité, furieux, continu, sorte d'aboïement qu'elles faisaient en se frappant avec la langue les deux coins de la bouche. D'autres restaient accoudées, le menton dans la main, et plus immobiles que des sphinx, elles dardaient leurs grands yeux noirs sur l'armée qui montait.

Bien que Sicca fût une ville sacrée, elle ne pouvait contenir une telle multitude ; le temple avec ses dépendances en occupait, seul, la moitié. Aussi les Barbares s'établirent dans la plaine tout à leur aise, ceux qui étaient disciplinés par troupes régulières, et les autres, par nations ou d'après leur fantaisie.

Les Grecs alignèrent sur des rangs parallèles leurs tentes de peaux ; les Ibériens disposèrent en cercle leurs pavillons de toile ; les Gaulois se firent des baraques de planches ; les Libyens des cabanes de pierres sèches, et les Nègres creusèrent dans le sable avec leurs ongles des fosses pour dormir. Beaucoup, ne sachant où se mettre, erraient au milieu des bagages, et la nuit couchaient par terre dans leurs manteaux troués.

La plaine se développait autour d'eux, toute bordée de montagnes. Çà et là un palmier se penchait sur une colline de sable, des sapins et des chênes tachetaient les flancs des précipices. Quelquefois la pluie d'un orage, telle qu'une longue écharpe, pendait du ciel, tandis que la campagne restait partout couverte d'azur et de sérénité ; puis un vent tiède chassait des tourbillons de poussière ; — et un ruisseau descendait en cascade des hauteurs de Sicca où se dressait, avec sa toiture d'or sur des colonnes d'airain, le temple de la Vénus carthaginoise, dominatrice de la contrée. Elle semblait l'emplir de son âme. Par ces convulsions des terrains, ces alternatives de la température et ces jeux de la lumière, elle manifestait l'extravagance de sa force avec la beauté de son éternel sourire. Les montagnes, à leur sommet, avaient la forme d'un croissant ; d'autres ressemblaient à des poitrines de femme tendant leurs seins gonflés, et les Barbares sentaient peser par-dessus leurs fatigues un accablement qui était plein de délices.

Spendius, avec l'argent de son dromadaire, s'était acheté un esclave. Tout le long du jour il dormait étendu devant la tente de Mâtho. Souvent il se réveillait croyant dans son rêve entendre siffler les lanières ; alors, en souriant, il se passait les mains sur les cicatrices de ses jambes, à la place où les fers avaient longtemps porté ; puis il se rendormait.

Mâtho acceptait sa compagnie, et quand il sortait, Spendius, avec un long glaive sur la cuisse, l'escortait comme un licteur ; ou bien Mâtho nonchalamment s'appuyait du bras sur son épaule, car Spendius était petit.

Un soir qu'ils traversaient ensemble les rues du camp, ils aperçurent des hommes couverts de manteaux blancs ; parmi eux se trouvait Narr'Havas, le prince des Numides. Mâtho tressaillit.

— " Ton épée ! " s'écria-t-il ; " je veux le tuer ! " — " Pas encore ! " fit Spendius en l'arrêtant. Déjà Narr'Havas s'avavançait vers lui.

Il baisa ses deux pouces en signe d'alliance, rejetant la colère qu'il avait eue sur l'ivresse du festin ; puis il parla longuement contre Carthage, mais il ne dit pas ce qui l'amenait chez les Barbares.

Etait-ce pour les trahir ou bien la République ? se demandait Spendius ; et comme il comptait faire son profit de tous les désordres, il savait gré à Narr'Havas des futures perfidies dont il le soupçonnait.

Le chef des Numides resta parmi les Mercenaires. Il paraissait vouloir s'attacher Mâtho. Il lui envoyait des chèvres grasses, de la poudre d'or et des plumes d'autruche. Le Libyen, ébahi de ces caresses, hésitait à y répondre ou à s'en exaspérer. Mais Spendius l'apaisait, et Mâtho se laissait gouverner par l'esclave, — toujours irrésolu et dans une invincible torpeur, comme ceux qui ont pris autrefois quelque breuvage dont ils doivent mourir.

Un matin qu'ils partaient tous les trois pour la chasse au lion, Narr'Havas cacha un poignard dans son manteau. Spendius marcha continuellement derrière lui ; et ils revinrent sans qu'on eût tiré le poignard.

Une autre fois, Narr'Havas les entraîna fort loin, jusqu'aux limites de son royaume. Ils arrivèrent dans une gorge étroite ; Narr'Havas sourit en leur déclarant qu'il ne connaissait plus la route ; Spendius la retrouva.

Mais le plus souvent Mâtho, mélancolique comme un augure, s'en allait dès le soleil levant pour vagabonder dans la campagne. Il s'étendait sur le sable, et jusqu'au soir y restait immobile.

Il consulta l'un après l'autre tous les devins de l'armée, ceux qui observent la marche des serpents, ceux qui lisent dans les étoiles, ceux qui soufflent sur la cendre des morts. Il avala du galbanum, du seseli et du venin de vipère qui glace le cœur ; des femmes nègres, en chantant au clair de lune des paroles barbares, lui piquèrent la peau du front avec des stylets d'or ; il se chargeait de colliers et d'amulettes : il invoqua tour à tour Baal-Kamon, Moloch, les sept Cabires, Tanit et la Vénus des Grecs. Il grava un nom sur une plaque de cuivre et il l'enfouit dans le sable au seuil de sa tente. Spendius l'entendait gémir et parler tout seul.

Une nuit il entra.

Mâtho, nu comme un cadavre, était couché à plat ventre sur une peau de lion, la face dans les deux mains, une lampe suspendue éclairait ses armes, accrochées sur sa tête contre le mât de la tente.

— " Tu souffres ? " lui dit l'esclave. " Que te faut-il ? réponds-moi ! - " et il le secoua par l'épaule en l'appelant plusieurs fois : " Maître ! maître ! ... "

Enfin Mâtho leva vers lui de grands yeux troubles.

— " Ecoute ! " fit-il à voix basse, avec un doigt sur les lèvres. " C'est une colère des Dieux ! la fille d'Hamilcar me poursuit ! J'en ai peur, Spendius ! " Il se serrait contre sa poitrine, comme un enfant épouvanté par un fantôme. — " Parle-moi ! je suis malade ! je veux guérir ! j'ai tout essayé ! Mais toi, tu sais peut-être des Dieux plus forts ou quelque invocation irrésistible ? " — " Pour quoi faire ? " demanda Spendius.

Il répondit, en se frappant la tête avec ses deux poings :

— " Pour m'en débarrasser ! "

Puis il se disait, se parlant à lui-même, avec de longs intervalles :

— " Je suis sans doute la victime de quelque holocauste qu'elle aura promis aux Dieux ? .... Elle me tient attaché par une chaîne que l'on n'aperçoit pas. Si je marche, c'est qu'elle avance ; quand je m'arrête, elle se repose ! Ses yeux me brûlent, j'entends sa voix. Elle m'environne, elle me pénètre. Il me semble qu'elle est devenue mon âme !

" Et pourtant, il y a entre nous deux comme les flots invisibles d'un océan sans bornes ! Elle est lointaine et tout inaccessible ! La splendeur de sa beauté fait autour d'elle un nuage de lumière ; et je crois, par moments, ne l'avoir jamais vue... qu'elle n'existe pas... et que tout cela est un songe ! "

Mâtho pleurait ainsi dans les ténèbres ; les Barbares dormaient. Spendius, en le regardant, se rappelait les jeunes hommes qui, avec des vases d'or dans les mains, le suppliaient autrefois, quand il promenait par les villes son troupeau de courtisanes ; une pitié l'émut, et il dit :

— " Sois fort, mon maître ! Appelle ta volonté et n'implore plus les Dieux, car ils ne se détournent pas aux cris des hommes ! Te voilà pleurant comme un lâche ! Tu n'es donc pas humilié qu'une femme te fasse tant souffrir ! " — " Suis-je un enfant ? " dit Mâtho. " Crois-tu que je m'attendrisse encore à leur visage et à leurs chansons ? Nous en avons à Drépanum pour balayer nos écuries. J'en ai possédé au milieu des assauts, sous les plafonds qui croulaient et quand la catapulte vibrait encore ! .... Mais celle-là, Spendius, celle-là ! ... "

L'esclave l'interrompt :

— " Si elle n'était pas la fille d'Hamilcar... "

— " Non ! " s'écria Mâtho. " Elle n'a rien d'une autre fille des hommes ! As-tu vu ses grands yeux sous ses grands sourcils, comme des soleils sous des arcs de triomphe ? Rappelle-toi : quand elle a paru, tous les flambeaux ont pâli. Entre les diamants de son collier, des places sur sa poitrine nue resplendissaient ; on sentait derrière elle comme l'odeur d'un temple, et quelque chose s'échappait de tout son être qui était plus suave que le vin et plus terrible que la mort. Elle marchait cependant, et puis elle s'est arrêtée.

Il resta béant, la tête basse, les prunelles fixes.

— " Mais je la veux ! il me la faut ! j'en meurs ! A l'idée de l'étreindre dans mes bras, une fureur de joie m'emporte, et cependant je la hais, Spendius ! je voudrais la battre ! Que faire ? J'ai envie de me vendre pour devenir son esclave. Tu l'as été, toi ! Tu pouvais l'apercevoir : parle- moi d'elle ! Toutes les nuits, n'est-ce pas, elle monte sur la terrasse de son palais ? Ah ! les pierres doivent frémir sous ses sandales et les étoiles se pencher pour la voir ! "

Il retomba tout en fureur, et râlant comme un taureau blessé.

Puis Mâtho chanta : " Il poursuivait dans la forêt le monstre femelle dont la queue ondulait sur les feuilles mortes, comme un ruisseau d'argent. " Et en traînant la voix, il imitait la voix de Salammbô, tandis que ses mains étendues faisaient comme deux mains légères sur les cordes d'une lyre.

A toutes les consolations de Spendius, il lui répétait les mêmes discours ; leurs nuits se passaient dans ces gémissements et ces exhortations.

Mâtho voulut s'étourdir avec du vin. Après ses ivresses il était plus triste encore. Il essaya de se distraire aux osselets, et il perdit une à une les plaques d'or de son collier. Il se laissa conduire chez les servantes de la Déesse ; mais il descendit la colline en sanglotant, comme ceux qui s'en reviennent des funérailles.

Spendius, au contraire, devenait plus hardi et plus gai. On le voyait, dans les cabarets de feuillages, discourant au milieu des soldats. Il raccommodait les vieilles cuirasses. Il jonglait avec des poignards, il allait pour les malades cueillir des herbes dans les champs. Il était facétieux, subtil, plein d'inventions et de paroles ; les Barbares s'accoutumaient à ses services ; il s'en faisait aimer.

Cependant ils attendaient un ambassadeur de Carthage qui leur apporterait, sur des mulets, des corbeilles chargées d'or ; et toujours recommençant le même calcul, ils dessinaient avec leurs doigts des chiffres sur le sable. Chacun, d'avance, arrangeait sa vie ; ils auraient des concubines, des esclaves, des terres ; d'autres voulaient enfouir leur trésor ou le risquer sur un vaisseau. Mais dans ce désœuvrement les caractères s'irritaient ; il y avait de continuelles disputes entre les cavaliers et les fantassins, les Barbares et les Grecs, et l'on était sans cesse étourdi par la voix aigre des femmes.

Tous les jours, il survenait des troupeaux d'hommes presque nus, avec des herbes sur la tête pour se garantir du soleil ; c'étaient les débiteurs des riches Carthaginois, contraints de labourer leurs terres, et qui s'étaient échappés. Des Libyens affluaient, des paysans ruinés par les impôts, des bannis, des malfaiteurs. Puis la horde des marchands, tous les vendeurs de vin et d'huile, furieux de n'être pas payés, s'en prenaient à la République ; Spendius déclamait contre elle. Bientôt les vivres diminuèrent. On parlait de se porter en masse sur Carthage et d'appeler les Romains.

Un soir, à l'heure du souper, on entendit des sons lourds et fêlés qui se rapprochaient, et, au loin, quelque chose de rouge apparut dans les ondulations du terrain.

C'était une grande litière de pourpre, ornée aux angles par des bouquets de plumes d'autruche. Des chaînes de cristal, avec des guirlandes de perles, battaient sur sa tenture fermée. Des chameaux la suivaient en faisant sonner la grosse cloche suspendue à leur poitrail, et l'on apercevait autour d'eux des cavaliers ayant une armure en écailles d'or depuis les talons jusqu'aux épaules.

Ils s'arrêtèrent à trois cents pas du camp, pour retirer des étuis qu'ils portaient en croupe, leur bouclier rond, leur large glaive et leur casque à la béotienne. Quelques-uns restèrent avec les chameaux ; les autres se remirent en marche. Enfin les enseignes de la République parurent, c'est-à-dire des bâtons de bois bleu, terminés par des têtes de cheval ou des pommes de pins. Les Barbares se levèrent tous, en applaudissant ; les femmes se précipitaient vers les gardes de la Légion et leur baisaient les pieds.

La litière s'avancait sur les épaules de douze Nègres, qui marchaient d'accord à petits pas rapides. Ils allaient de droite et de gauche, au hasard, embarrassés par les cordes des tentes, par les bestiaux qui erraient et les trépieds où cuisaient les viandes. Quelquefois une main grasse, chargée de bagues, entrouvrait la litière ; une voix rauque criait des injures ; alors les porteurs s'arrêtaient, puis ils prenaient une autre route à travers le camp.

Mais les courtines de pourpre se relevèrent ; et l'on découvrit sur un large oreiller une tête humaine tout impassible et boursouflée ; les sourcils formaient comme deux arcs d'ébène se rejoignant par les pointes ; des paillettes d'or étincelaient dans les cheveux crépus, et la face était si blême qu'elle semblait saupoudrée avec de la râpura de marbre. Le reste du corps disparaissait sous les toisons qui emplissaient la litière.

Les soldats reconnurent dans cet homme ainsi couché le suffète Hannon, celui qui avait contribué par sa lenteur à faire perdre la bataille des îles Aegates ; et, quant à sa victoire d'Hécatompyle sur les Libyens, s'il s'était conduit avec clémence, c'était par cupidité, pensaient les Barbares, car il avait vendu à son compte tous les captifs, bien qu'il eût déclaré leur mort à la République.

Lorsqu'il eut, pendant quelque temps, cherché une place commode pour haranguer les soldats, il fit un signe : la litière s'arrêta, et Hannon, soutenu par deux esclaves, posa ses pieds par terre, en chancelant.

Il avait des bottines en feutre noir, semées de lunes d'argent. Des bandelettes, comme autour d'une momie, s'enroulaient à ses jambes, et la chair passait entre les linges croisés. Son ventre débordait sur la jaquette écarlate qui lui couvrait les cuisses ; les plis de son cou retombaient jusqu'à sa poitrine comme des fanons de boeuf, sa tunique, où des fleurs étaient peintes, craquait aux aisselles ; il portait une écharpe, une ceinture et un large manteau noir à doubles manches lacées. L'abondance de ses vêtements, son grand collier de pierres bleues, ses agrafes d'or et ses lourds pendants d'oreilles ne rendaient que plus hideuse sa difformité. On aurait dit quelque grosse idole ébauchée dans un bloc de pierre ; car une lèpre pâle, étendue sur tout son corps, lui donnait l'apparence d'une chose inerte. Cependant son nez, crochu comme un bec de vautour, se dilatait violemment, afin d'aspirer l'air, et ses petits yeux, aux cils collés, brillaient d'un éclat dur et métallique. Il tenait à la main une spatule d'aloès, pour se gratter la peau.

Enfin deux hérauts sonnèrent dans leurs cornes d'argent ; le tumulte s'apaisa, et Hannon se mit à parler.

Il commença par faire l'éloge des Dieux et de la République ; les Barbares devaient se féliciter de l'avoir servie. Mais il fallait se montrer plus raisonnables, les temps étaient durs, — " - et si un maître n'a que trois olives, n'est-il pas juste qu'il en garde deux pour lui ? "

Ainsi le vieux suffète entremêlait son discours de proverbes et d'apologues, tout en faisant des signes de tête pour solliciter quelque approbation.

Il parlait punique et ceux qui l'entouraient (les plus alertes accourus sans leurs armes) étaient des Campaniens, des Gaulois et des Grecs, si bien que personne dans cette foule ne le comprenait. Hannon s'en aperçut, il s'arrêta, et il se balançait lourdement, d'une jambe sur l'autre, en réfléchissant.

L'idée lui vint de convoquer les capitaines ; alors ses hérauts crièrent cet ordre en grec, — langage qui, depuis Xantippe, servait aux commandements dans les armées carthagoises.

Les gardes, à coups de fouet, écartèrent la tourbe des soldats ; et bientôt les capitaines des phalanges à la spartiate et les chefs des cohortes barbares arrivèrent, avec les insignes de leur grade et l'armure de leur nation. La nuit était tombée, une grande rumeur circulait par la plaine ; çà et là des feux brûlaient ; on allait de l'un à l'autre, on se demandait : " Qu'y a-t-il ? " et pourquoi le suffète ne distribuait pas l'argent ?

Il exposait aux capitaines les charges infinies de la République. Son trésor était vide. Le tribut des Romains l'accablait. " Nous ne savons plus que faire ! ... Elle est bien à plaindre ! "

De temps à autre, il se frottait les membres avec sa spatule d'aloès, ou bien il s'interrompait pour boire dans une coupe d'argent, que lui tendait un esclave, une tisane faite avec de la cendre de belette et des asperges bouillies dans du vinaigre ; puis il s'essuyait les lèvres à une serviette d'écarlate, et reprenait :

— " Ce qui valait un sicle d'argent vaut aujourd'hui trois shekels d'or, et les cultures abandonnées pendant la guerre ne rapportent rien ! Nos pêcheries de pourpre sont à peu près perdues, les perles mêmes deviennent exorbitantes ; à peine si nous avons assez d'onguents pour le service des Dieux ! Quant aux choses de la table, je n'en parle pas, c'est une calamité ! Faute de galères, nous manquons d'épices, et l'on a bien du mal à se fournir de silphium, à cause des rébellions sur la frontière de Cyrène. La Sicile, où l'on trouvait tant d'esclaves, nous est maintenant fermée ! Hier encore, pour un baigneur et quatre valets de cuisine, j'ai donné plus d'argent qu'autrefois pour une paire d'éléphants ! "

Il déroula un long morceau de papyrus ; et il lut, sans passer un seul chiffre, toutes les dépenses que le Gouvernement avait faites ; tant pour les réparations des temples, pour le dallage des rues, pour la construction des vaisseaux, pour les pêcheries de corail, pour l'agrandissement des Syssites, et pour des engins dans les mines, au pays des Cantabres.

Mais les capitaines, pas plus que les soldats, n'entendaient le punique, bien que les Mercenaires se saluassent en cette langue. On plaçait ordinairement dans les armées des Barbares quelques officiers carthaginois pour servir d'interprètes ; après la guerre ils s'étaient cachés de peur des vengeances, et Hannon n'avait pas songé à les prendre avec lui ; d'ailleurs sa voix trop sourde se perdait au vent.

Les Grecs, sanglés dans leur ceinturon de fer, tendaient l'oreille, en s'efforçant à deviner ses paroles, tandis que des montagnards, couverts de fourrures comme des ours, le regardaient avec défiance ou bâillaient, appuyés sur leur massue à clous d'airain. Les Gaulois inattentifs secouaient en ricanant leur haute chevelure, et les hommes du désert écoutaient immobiles, tout encapuchonnés dans leurs vêtements de laine grise : d'autres arrivaient par-derrrière ; les gardes, que la cohue poussait, chancelaient sur leurs chevaux, les Nègres tenaient au bout de leurs bras des branches de sapin enflammées et le gros Carthaginois continuait sa harangue, monté sur un tertre de gazon.

Cependant les Barbares s'impatientaient, des murmures s'élevèrent, chacun l'apostropha. Hannon gesticulait avec sa spatule ; ceux qui voulaient faire taire les autres, criant plus fort, ajoutaient au tapage. Tout à coup, un homme d'apparence chétive bondit aux pieds d'Hannon, arracha la trompette d'un héraut, souffla dedans, et Spendius (car c'était lui) annonça qu'il allait dire quelque chose d'important. A cette déclaration, rapidement débitée en cinq langues diverses, grec, latin, gaulois, Lybique et baléare, les capitaines, moitié riant, moitié surpris, répondirent :

— " Parle ! parle ! "

Spendius hésita ; il tremblait ; enfin s'adressant aux Libyens, qui étaient les plus nombreux, il leur dit :

— " Vous avez tous entendu les horribles menaces de cet homme ? "

Hannon ne se récria pas, donc il ne comprenait point le Lybique ; et, pour continuer l'expérience, Spendius répéta la même phrase dans les autres idiomes des Barbares.

Ils se regardèrent étonnés ; puis tous, comme d'un accord tacite, croyant peut-être avoir compris, ils baissèrent la tête en signe d'assentiment.

Alors Spendius commença d'une voix véhémence :

— " Il a d'abord dit que tous les Dieux des autres peuples n'étaient que des songes près des Dieux de Carthage ! il vous a appelés lâches, voleurs, menteurs, chiens et fils de chiennes ! La République sans vous (il a dit cela ! ), ne serait pas contrainte à payer le tribut des Romains ; et par vos débordements vous l'avez épuisée de parfums, d'aromates, d'esclaves et de silphium, car vous vous entendez avec les nomades sur la frontière de Cyrène ! Mais les coupables seront punis ! Il a lu l'énumération de leurs supplices ; on les fera travailler au dallage des rues, à l'armement des vaisseaux, à l'embellissement des Syssites, et l'on enverra les autres gratter la terre dans les mines, au pays des Cantabres. "

Spendius redit les mêmes choses aux Gaulois, aux Grecs, aux Campaniens, aux Baléares. En reconnaissant plusieurs des noms propres qui avaient frappé leurs oreilles, les Mercenaires furent convaincus qu'il rapportait exactement le discours du suffète. Quelques-uns lui crièrent : - " Tu mens ! " Leurs voix se perdirent dans le tumulte des autres ; Spendius ajouta :

— " N'avez-vous pas vu qu'il a laissé en dehors du camp une réserve de ses cavaliers ? A un signal ils vont accourir pour vous égorger tous. "

Les Barbares se tournèrent de ce côté, et, comme la foule alors s'écartait, il apparut au milieu d'elle, s'avançant avec la lenteur d'un fantôme, un être humain tout courbé, maigre, entièrement nu et caché jusqu'aux flancs par de longs cheveux hérissés de feuilles sèches, de poussière et d'épines. Il avait autour des reins et autour des genoux des torchis de paille, des lambeaux de toile ; sa peau molle et terreuse pendait à ses membres décharnés, comme des haillons sur des branches sèches ; ses mains tremblaient d'un frémissement continu, et il marchait en s'appuyant sur un bâton d'olivier.

Il arriva auprès des Nègres qui portaient les flambeaux. Une sorte de ricanement idiot découvrait ses gencives pâles ; ses grands yeux effarés considéraient la foule des Barbares autour de lui.

Mais, poussant un cri d'effroi, il se jeta derrière eux et il s'abritait de leurs corps ; il bégayait :

" Les voilà ! les voilà ! " en montrant les gardes du Suffète, immobiles dans leurs armures luisantes. Leurs chevaux piaffaient, éblouis par la lueur des torches ; elles pétillaient dans les ténèbres ; le spectre humain se débattait et hurlait :

— " Ils les ont tués ! . "

A ces mots qu'il criait en baléare, des Baléares arrivèrent et le reconnurent ; sans leur répondre il répétait :

— " Oui, tués tous, tous ! écrasés comme des raisins ! Les beaux jeunes hommes ! les frondeurs ! mes compagnons, les vôtres ! "

On lui fit boire du vin, et il pleura ; puis il se répandit en paroles.

Spendius avait peine à contenir sa joie, — tout en expliquant aux Grecs et aux Libyens les choses horribles que racontait Zaxas ; il n'y pouvait croire, tant elles survenaient à propos. Les Baléares pâlissaient, en apprenant comment avaient péri leurs compagnons.

C'était une troupe de trois cents frondeurs débarqués de la veille, et qui, ce jour-là, avaient dormi trop tard. Quand ils arrivèrent sur la place de Khamon, les Barbares étaient partis et ils se trouvaient sans défense, leurs balles d'argile ayant été mises sur les chameaux avec le reste des bagages. On les laissa s'engager dans la rue de Satheb, jusqu'à la porte de chêne doublée de plaques d'airain ; alors le peuple, d'un seul mouvement, s'était poussé contre eux.

En effet, les soldats se rappelèrent un grand cri ; Spendius, qui fuyait en tête des colonnes, ne l'avait pas entendu.

Puis les cadavres furent placés dans les bras des Dieux-Patæques qui bordaient le temple de Khamon. On leur reprocha tous les crimes des Mercenaires : leur gourmandise, leurs vols, leurs impiétés, leurs dédains, et le meurtre des poissons dans le jardin de Salammbô. On fit à leurs corps d'infâmes mutilations ; les prêtres brûlèrent leurs cheveux pour tourmenter leur âme ; on les suspendit par morceaux chez les marchands de viandes ; quelques-uns même y enfoncèrent les dents, et le soir, pour en finir, on alluma des bûchers dans les carrefours.

C'étaient là ces flammes qui luisaient de loin sur le lac. Mais quelques maisons ayant pris feu, on avait jeté vite par-dessus les murs ce qui restait de cadavres et d'agonisants ; Zarxas jusqu'au lendemain s'était tenu dans les roseaux, au bord du lac ; puis il avait erré dans la campagne, cherchant l'armée d'après les traces des pas sur la poussière. Le matin, il se cachait dans les cavernes ; le soir, il se remettait en marche, avec ses plaies saignantes, affamé, malade, vivant de racines et de charognes ; un jour enfin, il aperçut des lances à l'horizon et il les avait suivies, car sa raison était troublée à force de terreurs et de misères.

L'indignation des soldats, contenue tant qu'il parlait, éclata comme un orage ; ils voulaient massacrer les gardes avec le Suffète. Quelques-uns s'interposèrent, disant qu'il fallait l'entendre et savoir au moins s'ils seraient payés. Alors tous crièrent : " Notre argent ! " Hannon leur répondit qu'il l'avait apporté.

On courut aux avant-postes, et les bagages du Suffète arrivèrent au milieu des tentes, poussés par les Barbares. Sans attendre les esclaves, bien vite ils dénouèrent les corbeilles ; ils y trouvèrent des robes d'hyacinthe, des éponges, des grattoirs, des brosses, des parfums, et des poinçons en antimoine, pour se peindre les yeux ; — le tout appartenant aux Gardes, hommes riches accoutumés à ces délicatesses. Ensuite on découvrit sur un chameau une grande cuve de bronze : c'était au Suffète pour se donner des bains pendant la route ; car il avait pris toutes sortes de précautions, jusqu'à emporter, dans des cages, des belettes d'Hécatompyle que l'on brûlait vivantes pour faire sa tisane. Mais, comme sa maladie lui donnait un grand appétit, il y avait, de plus, force comestibles et force vins, de la saumure, des viandes et des poissons au miel, avec des petits pots de Commagène, graisse d'oie fondue recouverte de neige et de paille hachée. La provision en était considérable ; à mesure que l'on ouvrait les corbeilles, il en apparaissait, et des rires s'élevaient comme des flots qui s'entrechoquent.

Quant à la solde des Mercenaires, elle emplissait, à peu près, deux couffes de sparterie ; on voyait même, dans l'une, de ces rondelles en cuir dont la République se servait pour ménager le numéraire ; et comme les Barbares paraissaient fort surpris, Hannon leur déclara que, leurs comptes étant trop difficiles, les Anciens n'avaient pas eu le loisir de les examiner. On leur envoyait cela, en attendant.

Alors tout fut renversé, bouleversé : les mulets, les valets, la litière, les provisions, les bagages. Les soldats prirent la monnaie dans les sacs pour lapider Hannon. A grand'peine il put monter sur un âne ; il s'enfuyait en se cramponnant aux poils, hurlant, pleurant, secoué, meurtri, et appelant sur l'armée la malédiction de tous les Dieux. Son large collier de pierreries rebondissait jusqu'à ses oreilles. Il retenait avec ses dents son manteau trop long qui traînait, et de loin les Barbares lui criaient : — " Va-t'en, lâche ! pourceau ! égout de Moloch ! sue ton or et ta peste ! plus vite ! plus vite ! " L'escorte en déroute galopait à ses côtés.

Mais la fureur des Barbares ne s'apaisa pas. Ils se rappelèrent que plusieurs d'entre eux, partis pour Carthage, n'en étaient pas revenus ; on les avait tués sans doute. Tant d'injustice les exaspéra, et ils se mirent à arracher les piquets des tentes, à rouler leurs manteaux, à brider leurs chevaux ; chacun prit son casque et son épée, en un instant tout fut prêt. Ceux qui n'avaient pas d'armes s'élancèrent dans les bois pour se couper des bâtons.

Le jour se levait ; les gens de Sicca réveillés s'agitaient dans les rues. " Ils vont à Carthage ", disait-on, et cette rumeur bientôt s'étendit par la contrée.

De chaque sentier, de chaque ravin, il surgissait des hommes. On apercevait les pasteurs qui descendaient les montagnes en courant.

Puis, quand les Barbares furent partis, Spendius fit le tour de la plaine, monté sur un étalon punique et avec son esclave qui menait un troisième cheval.

Une seule tente était restée. Spendius y entra.

— " Debout, maître ! lève-toi ! nous partons ! "

— " Où allez-vous donc ? ", demanda Mâtho.

— " A Carthage ! ", cria Spendius.

Mâtho bondit sur le cheval que l'esclave tenait à la Porte.

Chapitre 3 SALAMMBÔ.

La lune se levait au ras des flots, et, sur la ville encore couverte de ténèbres, des points lumineux, des blancheurs brillaient : le timon d'un char dans une cour, quelque haillon de toile suspendu, l'angle d'un mur, un collier d'or à la poitrine d'un dieu. Les boules de verre sur les toits des temples rayonnaient, çà et là comme de gros diamants. Mais de vagues ruines, des tas de terre noire, des jardins faisaient des masses plus sombres dans l'obscurité, et, au bas de Malqua, des filets de pêcheurs s'étendaient d'une maison à l'autre, comme de gigantesques chauves-souris déployant leurs ailes. On n'entendait plus le grincement des roues hydrauliques qui apportaient l'eau au dernier étage des palais ; et au milieu des terrasses, les chameaux reposaient tranquillement, couchés sur le ventre, à la manière des autruches. Les portiers dormaient dans les rues contre le seuil des maisons ; l'ombre des colosses s'allongeait sur les places désertes ; au loin quelquefois la fumée d'un sacrifice brûlant encore s'échappait par les tuiles de bronze, et la brise lourde apportait avec des parfums d'aromates les senteurs de la marine et l'exhalaison des murailles chauffées par le soleil. Autour de Carthage les ondes immobiles resplendissaient, car la lune étalait sa lueur tout à la fois sur le golfe environné de montagnes et sur le lac de Tunis, où des phénicoptères parmi les bancs de sable formaient de longues lignes roses, tandis qu'au-delà, sous les catacombes, la grande lagune salée miroitait comme un morceau d'argent. La voûte du ciel bleu s'enfonçait à l'horizon, d'un côté dans le poudroissement des plaines, de l'autre dans les brumes de la mer, et sur le sommet de l'Acropole les cyprès pyramidaux bordant le temple d'Eschmoûn se balançaient, et faisaient un murmure, comme les flots réguliers qui battaient lentement le long du môle, au bas des remparts.

Salammbô monta sur la terrasse de son palais, soutenue par une esclave qui portait dans un plat de fer des charbons enflammés.

Il y avait au milieu de la terrasse un petit lit d'ivoire, couvert de peaux de lynx avec des coussins en plume de perroquet, animal fatidique consacré aux Dieux, et dans les quatre coins s'élevaient quatre longues cassolettes remplies de nard, d'encens, de cinnamome et de myrrhe. L'esclave alluma les parfums. Salammbô regarda l'étoile polaire ; elle salua lentement les quatre points du ciel et s'agenouilla sur le sol parmi la poudre d'azur qui était semée d'étoiles d'or, à l'imitation du firmament. Puis les deux coudes contre les flancs, les avant-bras tout droits et les mains ouvertes, en se renversant la tête sous les rayons de la lune, elle dit :

— " O Rabbetna ! ... Baalet ! ... Tanit " et sa voix se traînait d'une façon plaintive, comme pour appeler quelqu'un. — " Anaîtis ! Astarté ! Derceto ! Astoreth ! Mylitta ! Athara ! Elissa ! Tiratha ! ... Par les symboles cachés, — par les cistres résonnants, — par les sillons de la terre, — par l'éternel silence et par l'éternelle fécondité, — dominatrice de la mer ténébreuse et des plages azurées, ô Reine des choses humides, salut ! "

Elle se balançait tout le corps deux ou trois fois, puis se jeta le front dans la poussière, les bras allongés.

Son esclave la releva lentement, car il fallait, d'après les rites, que quelqu'un vînt arracher le suppliant à sa prosternation ; c'était lui dire que les Dieux l'agréaient, et la nourrice de Salammbô ne manquait jamais à ce devoir de piété.

Des marchands de la Gétulie-Darytienne l'avaient toute petite apportée à Carthage, et, après son affranchissement, elle n'avait pas voulu abandonner ses maîtres, comme le prouvait son oreille droite, percée d'un large trou. Un jupon à raies multicolores, en lui serrant les hanches, descendait sur ses chevilles, où s'entrechoquaient deux cercles d'étain. Sa figure, un peu plate, était jaune comme sa tunique. Des aiguilles d'argent très longues faisaient un soleil derrière sa tête. Elle portait sur la narine un bouton de corail, et elle se tenait auprès du lit, plus droite qu'un hermès et les paupières baissées.

Salammbô s'avança jusqu'au bord de la terrasse. Ses yeux, un instant, parcoururent l'horizon, puis ils s'abaissèrent sur la ville endormie, et le soupir qu'elle poussa, en lui soulevant les seins, fit onduler d'un bout à l'autre la longue simarre blanche qui pendait autour d'elle, sans agrafe ni ceinture. Ses sandales à pointes recourbées disparaissaient sous un amas d'émeraudes, et ses cheveux à l'abandon emplissaient un réseau en fils de pourpre.

Mais elle releva la tête pour contempler la lune, et, mêlant à ses paroles des fragments d'hymne, elle murmura :

— " Que tu tournes légèrement, soutenue par l'éther impalpable ! Il se polit autour de toi, et c'est le mouvement de ton agitation qui distribue les vents et les rosées fécondes. Selon que tu croîs et décrois, s'allongent ou se rapetissent les yeux des chats et les taches des panthères. Les épouses hurlent ton nom dans la douleur des enfantements ! Tu gonfles le coquillage ! Tu fais bouillonner les vins ! Tu putréfies les cadavres ! Tu formes les perles au fond de la mer ! "

— " Et tous les germes, ô Déesse ! fermentent dans les obscures profondeurs de ton humidité. "

— " Quand tu parais, il s'épand une quiétude sur la terre ; les fleurs se forment, les flots s'apaisent, les hommes fatigués s'étendent la poitrine vers toi, et le monde avec ses océans et ses montagnes, comme en un miroir, se regarde dans ta figure. Tu es blanche, douce, lumineuse, immaculée, auxiliatrice, purifiante, sereine. "

Le croissant de la lune était alors sur la montagne des Eaux-Chaudes, dans l'échancrure de ses deux sommets, de l'autre côté du golfe. Il y avait en dessous une petite étoile et tout autour un cercle pâle. Salammhô reprit :

— " Mais tu es terrible, maîtresse ! ... C'est par toi que se produisent les monstres, les fantômes effrayants, les songes menteurs ; tes yeux dévorent les pierres des édifices, et les singes sont malades toutes les fois que tu rajeunis. "

— " Où donc vas-tu ? Pourquoi changer tes formes, perpétuellement ? Tantôt mince et recourbée, tu glisses dans les espaces comme une galère sans mâture, ou bien au milieu des étoiles tu ressembles à un pasteur qui garde son troupeau. Luisante et ronde, tu frôles la cime des monts comme la roue d'un char. "

— " O Tanit ! tu m'aimes, n'est-ce pas ? Je t'ai tant regardée ! Mais non ! tu cours dans ton azur, et moi je reste sur la terre immobile. "

— " Taanach, prends ton nebal et joue tout bas sur la corde d'argent, car mon coeur est triste ! "

L'esclave souleva une sorte de harpe en bois d'ébène plus haute qu'elle, et triangulaire comme un delta ; elle en fixa la pointe dans un globe de cristal, et des deux bras se mit à jouer.

Les sons se succédaient, sourds et précipités comme un bourdonnement d'abeilles, et de plus en plus sonores ils s'envolaient dans la nuit avec la plainte des flots et le frémissement des grands arbres au sommet de l'Acropole.

— " Tais-toi ! " s'écria Salammbô.

— " Qu'as-tu donc, maîtresse ? La brise qui souffle, un nuage qui passe, tout à présent t'inquiète et t'agite. "

— " Je ne sais ", dit-elle.

— " Tu te fatigues à des prières trop longues ! "

— " Oh ! Taanach, je voudrais m'y dissoudre comme une fleur dans du vin ! "

— " C'est peut-être la fumée de tes parfums ? "

— " Non ! " dit Salammbô : " L'esprit des Dieux habite dans les bonnes odeurs. "

Alors l'esclave lui parla de son père. On le croyait parti vers la contrée de l'ambre, derrière les colonnes de Melkarth. — " Mais s'il ne revient pas ", disait-elle, " il te faudra pourtant, puisque c'était sa volonté, choisir un époux parmi les fils des Anciens, et alors ton chagrin s'en ira dans les bras d'un homme. "

— " Pourquoi ? " demanda la jeune fille. Tous ceux qu'elle avait aperçus lui faisaient horreur avec leurs rires de bête fauve et leurs membres grossiers.

— " Quelquefois, Taanach, il s'exhale du fond de mon être comme de chaudes bouffées, plus lourdes que les vapeurs d'un volcan. Des voix m'appellent, un globe de feu roule et monte dans ma poitrine, il m'étouffe, je vais mourir ; et puis, quelque chose de suave, coulant de mon front jusqu'à mes pieds, passe dans ma chair... c'est une caresse qui m'enveloppe, et je me sens écrasée comme si un dieu s'étendait sur moi. Oh ! je voudrais me perdre dans la brume des nuits, dans le flot des fontaines, dans la sève des arbres, sortir de mon corps, n'être qu'un souffle, qu'un rayon, et glisser, monter jusqu'à toi, ô Mère ! "

Elle leva ses bras le plus haut possible, en se cambrant la taille, pâle et légère comme la lune avec son long vêtement. Puis elle retomba sur la couche d'ivoire, haletante ; mais Taanach lui passa autour du cou un collier d'ambre avec des dents de dauphin pour bannir les terreurs, et Salammbô dit d'une voix presque éteinte :

— " Va me chercher Schahabarim. "

Son père n'avait pas voulu qu'elle entrât dans le collège des prêtresses, ni même qu'on lui fit rien connaître de la Tanit populaire. Il la réservait pour quelque alliance pouvant servir sa politique, si bien que Salammbô vivait seule au milieu de ce palais ; sa mère, depuis longtemps, était morte.

Elle avait grandi dans les abstinences, les jeûnes et les purifications, toujours entourée de choses exquises et graves, le corps saturé de parfums, l'âme pleine de prières. Jamais elle n'avait goûté de vin, ni mangé de viandes, ni touché à une bête immonde, ni posé ses talons dans la maison d'un mort.

Elle ignorait les simulacres obscènes, car chaque dieu se manifestant par des formes différentes, des cultes souvent contradictoires témoignaient à la fois du même principe, et Salammbô adorait la Déesse en sa figuration sidérale. Une influence était descendue de la lune sur la vierge ; quand l'astre allait en diminuant, Salammbô s'affaiblissait. Languissante toute la journée, elle se ranimait le soir. Pendant une éclipse, elle avait manqué mourir.

Mais la Rabbet jalouse se vengeait de cette virginité soustraite à ses sacrifices, et elle tourmentait Salammbô d'obsessions d'autant plus fortes qu'elles étaient vagues, épandues dans cette croyance et avivées par elle.

Sans cesse la fille d'Hamilcar s'inquiétait de Tanit. Elle avait appris ses aventures, ses voyages et tous ses noms, qu'elle répétait sans qu'ils eussent pour elle de signification distincte. Afin de pénétrer dans les profondeurs de son dogme, elle voulait connaître au plus secret du temple la vieille idole avec le manteau magnifique d'où dépendaient les destinées de Carthage, — car l'idée d'un dieu ne se dégageait pas nettement de sa représentation, et tenir ou même voir son simulacre, c'était lui prendre une part de sa vertu, et, en quelque sorte, le dominer.

Salammbô se détourna. Elle avait reconnu le bruit des clochettes d'or que Schahabarim portait au bas de son vêtement.

Il monta les escaliers : puis, dès le seuil de la terrasse, il s'arrêta en croisant les bras.

Ses yeux enfoncés brillaient comme les lampes d'un sépulcre ; son long corps maigre flottait dans sa robe de lin, alourdie par les grelots qui s'alternaient sur ses talons avec des pommes d'émeraude. Il avait les membres débiles, le crâne oblique, le menton pointu ; sa peau semblait froide à toucher, et sa face jaune, que des rides profondes labouraient, comme contractée dans un désir, dans un chagrin éternel.

C'était le grand prêtre de Tanit, celui qui avait élevé Salammbô.

— " Parle ! " dit-il. " Que veux-tu ? "

— " J'espérais ... tu m'avais presque promis... " Elle balbutiait, elle se troubla ; puis, tout à coup :

— " Pourquoi me méprises-tu ? qu'ai-je donc oublié dans les rites ? Tu es mon maître, et tu m'as dit que personne comme moi ne s'entendait aux choses de la Déesse ; mais il y en a que tu ne veux pas dire. Est-ce vrai, ô père ? "

Schahabarim se rappela les ordres d'Hamilcar ; il répondit :

— " Non, je n'ai plus rien à t'apprendre ! "

— " Un Génie ", reprit-elle, " me pousse à cet amour. J'ai gravi les marches d'Eschmoûn, dieu des planètes et des intelligences ; j'ai dormi sous l'olivier d'or de Melkarth, patron des colonies tyriennes ; j'ai poussé les portes de Baal-Khamon, éclaireur et fertilisateur ; j'ai sacrifié aux Kabyres souterrains, aux dieux des bois, des vents, des fleuves et des montagnes : mais tous ils sont trop loin, trop haut, trop insensibles, comprends-tu ? tandis qu'elle, je la sens mêlée à ma vie ; elle emplit mon âme, et je tressaille à des élancements intérieurs comme si elle bondissait pour s'échapper. Il me semble que je vais entendre sa voix, apercevoir sa figure, des éclairs m'éblouissent, puis je retombe dans les ténèbres. "

Schahabarim se taisait. Elle le sollicitait de son regard suppliant.

Enfin, il fit signe d'écarter l'esclave, qui n'était pas de race chananéenne. Taanach disparut, et Schahabarim, levant un bras dans l'air, commença :

— " Avant les Dieux, les ténèbres étaient seules, et un souffle flottait, lourd et indistinct comme la conscience d'un homme dans un rêve. Il se contracta, créant le Désir et la Nue, et du Désir et de la Nue sortit la Matière primitive. C'était une eau bourbeuse, noire, glacée, profonde. Elle enferma des monstres insensibles, parties incohérentes des formes à naître et qui sont peintes sur la paroi des sanctuaires. "

Puis la Matière se condensa. Elle devint un oeuf. Il se rompit. Une moitié forma la terre, l'autre le firmament. Le soleil, la lune, les vents, les nuages parurent ; et, au fracas de la foudre, les animaux intelligents s'éveillèrent. Alors Eschmoûn se déroula dans la sphère étoilée ; Khamon rayonna dans le soleil ; Melkarth, avec ses bras, le poussa derrière Gadès ; les Kabyrim descendirent sous les volcans, et Rabbetna, telle qu'une nourrice, se pencha sur le monde, versant sa lumière comme un lait et sa nuit comme un manteau.

— " Et après ? " dit-elle.

Il lui avait conté le secret des origines pour la distraire par des perspectives plus hautes ; mais le désir de la vierge se ralluma sous ces dernières paroles, et Schahabarim, cédant à moitié, reprit :

— " Elle inspire et gouverne les amours des hommes. "

— " Les amours des hommes ! " répéta Salammbô rêvant.

— " Elle est l'âme de Carthage ", continua le prêtre ; et bien qu'elle soit partout épandue, c'est ici qu'elle demeure, sous le voile sacré.

— " O père ! " s'écria Salammbô, " je la verrai, n'est-ce pas ? tu m'y conduiras ! Depuis longtemps j'hésitais ; la curiosité de sa forme me dévore. Pitié ! secours-moi ! partons ! "

Il la repoussa d'un geste véhément et plein d'orgueil.

— " Jamais ! Ne sais-tu pas qu'on en meurt ? Les Baals hermaphrodites ne se dévoilent que pour nous seuls, hommes par l'esprit, femmes par la faiblesse. Ton désir est un sacrilège ; satisfais-toi avec la science que tu possèdes ! "

Elle tomba sur les genoux, mettant ses deux doigts contre ses oreilles en signe de repentir ; et elle sanglotait, écrasée par la parole du prêtre, pleine à la fois de colère contre lui, de terreur et d'humiliation. Schahabarim, debout, restait plus insensible que les pierres de la terrasse. Il la regardait de haut en bas frémissante à ses pieds, il éprouvait une sorte de joie en la voyant souffrir pour sa divinité, qu'il ne pouvait, lui non plus, étreindre tout entière. Déjà les oiseaux chantaient, un vent froid soufflait, de petits nuages couraient dans le ciel plus pâle.

Tout à coup il aperçut à l'horizon derrière Tunis, comme des brouillards légers, qui se traînaient contre le sol ; puis ce fut un grand rideau de poudre grise perpendiculairement étalé, et, dans les tourbillons de cette masse nombreuse, des têtes de dromadaires, des lances, des boucliers parurent. C'était l'armée des Barbares qui s'avavançait sur Carthage.

Chapitre 4 SOUS LES MURS DE CARTHAGE

Des gens de la campagne, montés sur des ânes ou courant à pied, pâles, essoufflés, fous de peur, arrivèrent dans la ville. Ils fuyaient devant l'armée. En trois jours, elle avait fait le chemin de Sicca, pour venir à Carthage et tout exterminer.

On ferma les portes. Les Barbares, presque aussitôt, parurent ; mais ils s'arrêtèrent au milieu de l'isthme, sur le bord du lac.

D'abord ils n'annoncèrent rien d'hostile. Plusieurs s'approchèrent avec des palmes à la main. Ils furent repoussés à coups de flèches, tant la terreur était grande.

Le matin et à la tombée du jour, des rôdeurs quelquefois erraient le long des murs. On remarquait surtout un petit homme, enveloppé soigneusement d'un manteau et dont la figure disparaissait sous une visière très basse. Il restait pendant de grandes heures à regarder l'aqueduc, et avec une telle persistance, qu'il voulait sans doute égarer les Carthaginois sur ses véritables desseins. Un autre homme l'accompagnait, une sorte de géant qui marchait tête nue.

Mais Carthage était défendue dans toute la largeur de l'isthme : d'abord par un fossé, ensuite par un rempart de gazon, et enfin par un mur, haut de trente coudées, en pierres de taille, et à double étage. Il contenait des écuries pour trois cents éléphants avec des magasins pour leurs caparaçons, leurs entraves et leur nourriture, puis d'autres écuries pour quatre mille chevaux avec les provisions d'orge et les harnachements, et des casernes pour vingt mille soldats avec les armures et tout le matériel de guerre. Des tours s'élevaient sur le second étage, toutes garnies de créneaux et qui portaient en dehors des boucliers de bronze, suspendus à des crampons.

Cette première ligne de murailles abritait immédiatement Malqua, le quartier des gens de la marine et des teinturiers. On apercevait des mâts où séchaient des voiles de pourpre, et sur les dernières terrasses des fourneaux d'argile pour cuire la saumure.

Par-dérrière, la ville étageait en amphithéâtre ses hautes maisons de forme cubique. Elles étaient en pierres, en planches, en galets, en roseaux, en coquillages, en terre battue. Les bois des temples faisaient comme des lacs de verdure dans cette montagne de blocs, diversement coloriés. Les places publiques la nivelaient à des distances inégales ; d'innombrables ruelles s'entrecroisant la coupaient du haut en bas. On distinguait les enceintes des trois vieux quartiers, maintenant confondues ; elles se levaient çà et là comme de grands écueils, ou allongeaient des pans énormes, — à demi couverts de fleurs, noircis, largement rayés par le jet des immondices, et des rues passaient dans leurs ouvertures béantes, comme des fleuves sous des ponts.

La colline de l'Acropole, au centre de Byrsa, disparaissait sous un désordre de monuments. C'étaient des temples à colonnes torsées avec des chapiteaux de bronze et des chaînes de métal, des cônes en pierres sèches à bandes d'azur, des coupoles de cuivre, des architraves de marbre, des contreforts babyloniens, des obélisques posant sur leur pointe comme des flambeaux renversés. Les péristyles atteignaient aux frontons ; les volutes se déroulaient entre les colonnades ; des murailles de granit supportaient des cloisons de tuile ; tout cela montait l'un sur l'autre en se cachant à demi, d'une façon merveilleuse et incompréhensible. On y sentait la succession des âges et comme des souvenirs de patries oubliées.

Derrière l'Acropole, dans des terrains rouges, le chemin des Mappales, bordé de tombeaux, s'allongeait en ligne droite du rivage aux catacombes ; de larges habitations s'espaçaient ensuite dans des jardins, et ce troisième quartier, Mégara, la ville neuve, allait jusqu'au bord de la falaise, où se dressait un phare géant qui flambait toutes les nuits.

Carthage se déployait ainsi devant les soldats établis dans la plaine.

De loin ils reconnaissaient les marchés, les carrefours ; ils se disputaient sur l'emplacement des temples. Celui de Khamon, en face des Syssites, avait des tuiles d'or ; Melkarth, à la gauche d'Eschmoûn, portait sur sa toiture des branches de corail ; Tanit, au-delà, arrondissait dans les palmiers sa coupole de cuivre ; le noir Moloch était au bas des citernes, du côté du phare. L'on voyait à l'angle des frontons, sur le sommet des murs, au coin des places, partout, des divinités à tête hideuse, colossales ou trapues, avec des ventres énormes, ou démesurément aplaties, ouvrant la gueule, écartant les bras, tenant à la main des fourches, des chaînes ou des javelots ; et le bleu de la mer s'étalait au fond des rues, que la perspective rendait encore plus escarpées.

Un peuple tumultueux du matin au soir les emplissait ; de jeunes garçons, agitant des sonnettes, criaient à la porte des bains : les boutiques de boissons chaudes fumaient, l'air retentissait du tapage des enclumes, les coqs blancs consacrés au Soleil chantaient sur les terrasses, les boeufs que l'on égorgeait mugissaient dans les temples, des esclaves couraient avec des corbeilles sur leur tête ; et, dans l'enfoncement des portiques, quelque prêtre apparaissait drapé d'un manteau sombre, nu-pieds et en bonnet pointu.

Ce spectacle de Carthage irritait les Barbares. Ils l'admiraient, ils l'exécraient, ils auraient voulu tout à la fois l'anéantir et l'habiter. Mais qu'y avait-il dans le Port-Militaire, défendu par une triple muraille ? Puis, derrière la ville, au fond de Mégara, plus haut que l'Acropole, apparaissait le palais d'Hamilcar.

Les yeux de Mâtho à chaque instant s'y portaient. Il montait dans les oliviers, et il se penchait, la main étendue au bord des sourcils. Les jardins étaient vides, et la porte rouge à croix noire restait constamment fermée.

Plus de vingt fois il fit le tour des remparts, cherchant quelque brèche pour entrer. Une nuit, il se jeta dans le golfe, et, pendant trois heures, il nagea tout d'une haleine. Il arriva au bas des Mappales, il voulut grimper contre la falaise. Il ensanglanta ses genoux, brisa ses ongles, puis retomba dans les flots et s'en revint.

Son impuissance l'exaspérait. Il était jaloux de cette Carthage enfermant Salammbô, comme de quelqu'un qui l'aurait possédée. Ses énervements l'abandonnèrent, et ce fut une ardeur d'action folle et continuelle. La joue en feu, les yeux irrités, la voix rauque, il se promenait d'un pas rapide à travers le camp ; ou bien, assis sur le rivage, il frottait avec du sable sa grande épée. Il lançait des flèches aux vautours qui passaient. Son coeur débordait en paroles furieuses.

— " Laisse aller ta colère comme un char qui s'emporte ", disait Spendius " Crie, blasphème, ravage et tue. La douleur s'apaise avec du sang, et puisque tu ne peux assouvir ton amour, gorge ta haine ; elle te soutiendra ! "

Mâtho reprit le commandement de ses soldats. Il les faisait impitoyablement manoeuvrer. On le respectait pour son courage, pour sa force surtout. D'ailleurs, il inspirait comme une crainte mystique ; on croyait qu'il parlait, la nuit, à des fantômes. Les autres capitaines s'animèrent de son exemple. L'armée, bientôt, se disciplina. Les Carthaginois entendaient de leurs maisons la fanfare des buccines qui réglait les exercices. Enfin, les Barbares se rapprochèrent.

Il aurait fallu pour les écraser dans l'isthme que deux armées pussent les prendre à la fois par-derrière, l'une débarquant au fond du golfe d'Utique, et la seconde à la montagne des Eaux-Chaudes. Mais que faire avec la seule Légion sacrée, grosse de six mille hommes tout au plus ? S'ils inclinaient vers l'Orient, ils allaient se joindre aux Nomades, intercepter la route de Cyrène et le commerce du désert. S'ils se repliaient sur l'Occident, la Numidie se soulèverait. Enfin le manque de vivres les ferait tôt ou tard dévaster, comme des sauterelles, les campagnes environnantes ; les Riches tremblaient pour leurs beaux châteaux, pour leurs vignobles, pour leurs cultures.

Hannon proposa des mesures atroces et impraticables, comme de promettre une forte somme pour chaque tête de Barbare, ou, qu'avec des vaisseaux et des machines, on incendiât leur camp. Son collègue Giscon voulait au contraire qu'ils fussent payés. Mais, à cause de sa popularité, les Anciens le détestaient ; car ils redoutaient le hasard d'un maître et, par terreur de la monarchie, s'efforçaient d'atténuer ce qui en subsistait ou la pouvait rétablir.

Il y avait en dehors des fortifications des gens d'une autre race et d'une origine inconnue, — tous chasseurs de porc-épic, mangeurs de mollusques et de serpents. Ils allaient dans les cavernes prendre des hyènes vivantes, qu'ils s'amusaient à faire courir le soir sur les sables de Mégara, entre les stèles des tombeaux. Leurs cabanes, de fange et de varech, s'accrochaient contre la falaise comme des nids d'hirondelles. Ils vivaient là, sans gouvernement et sans dieux, pêle-mêle, complètement nus, à la fois débiles et farouches, et depuis des siècles exécrés par le peuple, à cause de leurs nourritures immondes. Les sentinelles s'aperçurent un matin qu'ils étaient tous partis.

Enfin des membres du Grand-Conseil se décidèrent. Ils vinrent au camp, sans colliers ni ceintures, en sandales découvertes, comme des voisins. Ils s'avançaient d'un pas tranquille, jetant des saluts aux capitaines, ou bien ils s'arrêtaient pour parler aux soldats, disant que tout était fini et qu'on allait faire justice à leurs réclamations.

Beaucoup d'entre eux voyaient pour la première fois un camp de Mercenaires. Au lieu de la confusion qu'ils avaient imaginée, partout c'était un ordre et un silence effrayants. Un rempart de gazon enfermait l'armée dans une haute muraille, inébranlable au choc des catapultes. Le sol des rues était aspergé d'eau fraîche ; par les trous des tentes, ils apercevaient des prunelles fauves qui luisaient dans l'ombre. Les faisceaux de piques et les panoplies suspendues les éblouissaient comme des miroirs. Ils se parlaient à voix basse. Ils avaient peur avec leurs longues robes de renverser quelque chose.

Les soldats demandèrent des vivres, en s'engageant à les payer sur l'argent qu'on leur devait.

On leur envoya des boeufs, des moutons, des pintades, des fruits secs et des lupins, avec des scombres fumés, de ces scombres excellents que Carthage expédiait dans tous les ports. Mais ils tournaient dédaigneusement autour des bestiaux magnifiques ; et, dénigrant ce qu'ils convoitaient, offraient pour un bœuf la valeur d'un pigeon, pour trois chèvres le prix d'une grenade. Les Mangeurs-de-choses-immondes, se portant pour arbitres, affirmaient qu'on les dupait. Alors ils tiraient leur glaive, menaçaient de tuer.

Des commissaires du Grand-Conseil écrivirent le nombre d'années que l'on devait à chaque soldat. Mais il était impossible maintenant de savoir combien on avait engagé de Mercenaires, et les Anciens furent effrayés de la somme exorbitante qu'ils auraient à payer. Il fallait vendre la réserve du silphium, imposer les villes marchandes ; les Mercenaires s'impacienteraient, déjà Tunis était avec eux : et les Riches, étourdis par les fureurs d'Hannon et les reproches de son collègue, recommandèrent aux citoyens qui pouvaient connaître quelque Barbare d'aller le voir immédiatement pour reconquérir son amitié, lui dire de bonnes paroles. Cette confiance les calmerait.

Des marchands, des scribes, des ouvriers de l'arsenal, des familles entières se rendirent chez les Barbares.

Les soldats laissaient entrer chez eux tous les Carthaginois, mais par un seul passage tellement étroit que quatre hommes de front s'y coudoyaient. Spendius, debout contre la barrière, les faisait attentivement fouiller ; Mâtho, en face de lui, examinait cette multitude, cherchant à retrouver quelqu'un qu'il pouvait avoir vu chez Salammbô.

Le camp ressemblait à une ville, tant il était rempli de monde et d'agitation. Les deux foules distinctes se mêlaient sans se confondre, l'une habillée de toile ou de laine avec des bonnets de feutre pareils à des pommes de pin, et l'autre vêtue de fer et portant des casques. Au milieu des valets et des vendeurs ambulants circulaient des femmes de toutes les nations, brunes comme des dattes mûres, verdâtres comme des olives, jaunes comme des oranges, vendues par des matelots, choisies dans les bouges, volées à des caravanes, prises dans le sac des villes, que l'on fatiguait d'amour tant qu'elles étaient jeunes, qu'on accablait de coups lorsqu'elles étaient vieilles, et qui mouraient dans les déroutes au bord des chemins, parmi les bagages, avec les bêtes de somme abandonnées. Les épouses des Nomades balançaient sur leurs talons des robes en poil de dromadaire, carrées et de couleur fauve ; des musiciennes de la Cyrénaïque, enveloppées de gazes violettes et les sourcils peints, chantaient accroupies sur des nattes : de vieilles négresses aux mamelles pendantes ramassaient, pour faire du feu, des fientes d'animal que l'on desséchait au soleil : les Syracusaines avaient des plaques d'or dans la chevelure, les femmes des Lusitaniens des colliers de coquillages, les Gauloises des peaux de loup sur leur poitrine blanche ; et des enfants robustes, couverts de vermine, nus, incirconcis, donnaient aux passants des coups dans le ventre avec leur tête, ou venaient par derrière, comme de jeunes tigres, les mordre aux mains.

Les Carthaginois se promenaient à travers le camp, surpris par la quantité de choses dont il regorgeait. Les plus misérables étaient tristes, et les autres dissimulaient leur inquiétude.

Les soldats leur frappaient sur l'épaule, en les excitant à la gaieté. Dès qu'ils apercevaient quelque personnage, ils l'invitaient à leurs divertissements. Quand on jouait au disque, ils s'arrangeaient pour lui écraser les pieds, et au pugilat, dès la première passe, lui fracassaient la mâchoires. Les frondeurs effrayaient les Carthaginois avec leurs frondes, les psyllés avec des vipères, les cavaliers avec leurs chevaux. Ces gens d'occupations paisibles, à tous les outrages, baissaient la tête et s'efforçaient de sourire. Quelques-uns, pour se montrer braves, faisaient signe qu'ils voulaient devenir des soldats. On leur donnait à fendre du bois et à étriller des mulets. On les bouclait dans une armure et on les roulait comme des tonneaux par les rues du camp. Puis, quand ils se disposaient à partir, les Mercenaires s'arrachaient les cheveux avec des contorsions grotesques.

Mais beaucoup, par sottise ou préjugé, croyaient naïvement tous les Carthaginois très riches, et ils marchaient derrière eux en les suppliant de leur accorder quelque chose. Ils demandaient tout ce qui leur semblait beau : une bague, une ceinture, des sandales, la frange d'une robe, et, quand le Carthaginois dépouillé s'écriait : — " Mais je n'ai plus rien. Que veux-tu ? " Ils répondaient " Ta femme ! "

D'autres disaient : — " Ta vie ! "

Les comptes militaires furent remis aux capitaines, lus aux soldats, définitivement approuvés. Alors ils réclamèrent des tentes : on leur donna des tentes. Puis les polémarques des Grecs demandèrent quelques-unes de ces belles armures que l'on fabriquait à Carthage ; le Grand-Conseil vota des sommes pour cette acquisition. Mais il était juste, prétendaient les cavaliers, que la République les indemnîsât de leurs chevaux ; l'un affirmait en avoir perdu trois à tel siège, un autre cinq dans telle marche, un autre quatorze dans les précipices. On leur offrit des étalons d'Hécatompile ; ils aimèrent mieux l'argent.

Puis ils demandèrent qu'on leur payât en argent (en pièces d'argent et non en monnaie de cuir) tout le blé qu'on leur devait, et au plus haut prix où il s'était vendu pendant la guerre, si bien qu'ils exigeaient pour une mesure de farine quatre cents fois plus qu'ils n'avaient donné pour un sac de froment. Cette injustice exaspéra ; il fallut céder, pourtant.

Alors les délégués des soldats et ceux du Grand-Conseil se réconcilièrent, en jurant par le Génie de Carthage et par les Dieux des Barbares. Avec les démonstrations et la verbosité orientales, ils se firent des excuses et des caresses. Puis les soldats réclamèrent, comme une preuve d'amitié, la punition des traîtres qui les avaient indisposés contre la République.

On feignit de ne pas les comprendre. Ils s'expliquèrent plus nettement, disant qu'il leur fallait la tête d'Hannon.

Plusieurs fois par jour ils sortaient de leur camp. Ils se promenaient au pied des murs. Ils criaient qu'on leur jetât la tête du Suffète, et ils tendaient leurs robes pour la recevoir.

Le Grand-Conseil aurait faibli, peut-être, sans une dernière exigence plus injurieuse que les autres : ils demandèrent en mariage, pour leurs chefs, des vierges choisies dans les grandes familles. C'était une idée de Spendius, que plusieurs trouvaient toute simple et fort exécutable. Mais cette prétention de vouloir se mêler au sang punique indigna le peuple ; on leur signifia brutalement qu'ils n'avaient plus rien à recevoir. Alors ils s'écrièrent qu'on les avait trompés ; si avant trois jours leur solde n'arrivait pas, ils iraient eux-mêmes la prendre dans Carthage.

La mauvaise foi des Mercenaires n'était point aussi complète que le pensaient leurs ennemis. Hamilcar leur avait fait des promesses exorbitantes, vagues il est vrai, mais solennelles et réitérées. Ils avaient pu croire, en débarquant à Carthage, qu'on leur abandonnerait la ville, qu'ils se partageraient des trésors ; et quand ils virent que leur solde à peine serait payée, ce fut une désillusion pour leur orgueil comme pour leur cupidité.

Denys, Pyrrhus, Agathoclès et les généraux d'Alexandre n'avaient-ils pas fourni l'exemple de merveilleuses fortunes ? L'idéal d'Hercule, que les Chananéens confondaient avec le soleil, resplendissait à l'horizon des armées. On savait que de simples soldats avaient porté des diadèmes, et le retentissement des empires qui s'écroulaient faisait rêver le Gaulois dans sa forêt de chênes, l'Ethiopien dans ses sables. Mais il y avait un peuple toujours prêt à utiliser les courages ; et le voleur chassé de sa tribu, le parricide errant sur les chemins, le sacrilège poursuivi par les dieux, tous les affamés, tous les désespérés tâchaient d'atteindre au port où le courtier de Carthage recrutait des soldats. Ordinairement elle tenait ses promesses. Cette fois pourtant, l'ardeur de son avarice l'avait entraînée dans une infamie périlleuse. Les Numides, les Libyens, l'Afrique entière s'allaient jeter sur Carthage. La mer seule était libre. Elle y rencontrait les Romains ; et, comme un homme assailli par des meurtriers, elle sentait la mort tout autour d'elle.

Il fallut bien recourir à Giscon ; les Barbares acceptèrent son entremise. Un matin ils virent les chaînes du port s'abaisser, et trois bateaux plats, passant par le canal de la Taenia, entrèrent dans le lac.

Sur le premier, à la proue, on apercevait Giscon. Derrière lui, et plus haute qu'un catafalque, s'élevait une caisse énorme, garnie d'anneaux pareils à des couronnes qui pendaient. Apparaissait ensuite la légion des Interprètes, coiffés comme des sphinx, et portant un perroquet tatoué sur la poitrine. Des amis et des esclaves suivaient, tous sans armes, et si nombreux qu'ils se touchaient des épaules. Les trois longues barques, pleines à sombrer, s'avançaient aux acclamations de l'armée, qui les regardait.

Dès que Giscon débarqua, les soldats coururent à sa rencontre. Avec des sacs il fit dresser une sorte de tribune et déclara qu'il ne s'en irait pas avant de les avoir tous intégralement payés.

Des applaudissements éclatèrent ; il fut longtemps sans pouvoir parler.

Puis il blâma les torts de la République et ceux des Barbares ; la faute en était à quelques mutins, qui par leur violence avaient effrayé Carthage. La meilleure preuve de ses bonnes intentions, c'était qu'on l'envoyait vers eux, lui, l'éternel adversaire du suffète Hannon. Ils ne devaient point supposer au peuple l'ineptie de vouloir irriter des braves, ni assez d'ingratitude pour méconnaître leurs services ; et Giscon se mit à la paye des soldats en commençant par les Libyens. Comme ils avaient déclaré les listes mensongères, il ne s'en servit point.

Ils défilaient devant lui, par nations, en ouvrant leurs doigts pour dire le nombre des années ; on les marquait successivement au bras gauche avec de la peinture verte ; les scribes puisaient dans le coffre béant, et d'autres, avec un stylet, faisaient des trous sur une lame de plomb.

Un homme passa, qui marchait lourdement, à la manière des boeufs.

— " Monte près de moi ", dit le Suffète, suspectant quelque fraude ;
" combien d'années as-tu servi ? "

— " Douze ans ", répondit le Libyen.

Giscon lui glissa les doigts sous la mâchoire, car la mentonnière du casque y produisait à la longue deux callosités ; on les appelait des carroubes, et avoir les carroubes était une locution pour dire un vétéran.

— " Voleur ! " s'écria le Suffète, " ce qui te manque au visage tu dois le porter sur les épaules ! ", et lui déchirant sa tunique, il découvrit son dos couvert de gales sanglantes ; c'était un laboureur d'Hippo-Zaryte. Des huées s'élevèrent ; on le décapita.

Dès qu'il fut nuit, Spendius alla réveiller les Libyens. Il leur dit :

— " Quand les Ligures, les Grecs, les Baléares et les hommes d'Italie seront payés, ils s'en retourneront.

Mais vous autres, vous resterez en Afrique, épars dans vos tribus et sans aucune défense ! C'est alors que la République se vengera ! Méfiez-vous du voyage ! Allez-vous croire à toutes les paroles ? Les deux suffètes sont d'accord ! Celui-là vous abuse ! Rappelez-vous l'Ile-des-Ossements et Xantippe qu'ils ont renvoyé à Sparte sur une galère pourrie ! "

— " Comment nous y prendre ? ", demandaient-ils.

— " Réfléchissez ! " disait Spendius.

Les deux jours suivants se passèrent à payer les gens de Magdala, de Leptis, d'Hécatompyle ; Spendius se répandait chez les Gaulois.

— " On solde les Libyens, ensuite on payera les Grecs, puis les Baléares, les Asiatiques, et tous les autres ! Mais vous qui n'êtes pas nombreux, on ne vous donnera rien ! Vous ne reverrez plus vos patries ! Vous n'aurez point de vaisseaux ! Ils vous tueront, pour épargner la nourriture. "

Les Gaulois vinrent trouver le Suffète. Autharite, celui qu'il avait blessé chez Hamilcar, l'interpella. Il disparut, repoussé par les esclaves, mais en jurant qu'il se vengerait.

Les réclamations, les plaintes se multiplièrent. Les plus obstinés pénétraient dans la tente du Suffète ; pour l'attendrir ils prenaient ses mains, lui faisaient palper leurs bouches sans dents, leurs bras tout maigres et les cicatrices de leurs blessures. Ceux qui n'étaient point encore payés s'irritaient, ceux qui avaient reçu leur solde en demandaient une autre pour leurs chevaux ; et les vagabonds, les bannis, prenant les armes des soldats, affirmaient qu'on les oubliait. A chaque minute, il arrivait comme des tourbillons d'hommes ; les tentes craquaient, s'abattaient ; la multitude serrée entre les remparts du camp oscillait à grands cris depuis les portes jusqu'au centre. Quand le tumulte se faisait trop fort, Giscon posait un coude sur son sceptre d'ivoire, et, regardant la mer, il restait immobile, les doigts enfoncés dans sa barbe.

Souvent Mâtho s'écartait pour aller s'entretenir avec Spendius ; puis il se replaçait en face du Suffète, et Giscon sentait perpétuellement ses prunelles comme deux phalariques en flammes dardées vers lui. Par-dessus la foule, plusieurs fois, ils se lancèrent des injures, mais qu'ils n'entendirent pas. Cependant la distribution continuait, et le Suffète à tous les obstacles trouvait des expédients.

Les Grecs voulurent élever des chicanes sur la différence des monnaies. Il leur fournit de telles explications qu'ils se retirèrent sans murmures. Les Nègres réclamèrent de ces coquilles blanches usitées pour le commerce dans l'intérieur de l'Afrique. Il leur offrit d'en envoyer prendre à Carthage ; alors, comme les autres, ils acceptèrent de l'argent.

Mais on avait promis aux Baléares quelque chose de meilleur, à savoir des femmes. Le Suffète répondit que l'on attendait pour eux toute une caravane de vierges : la route était longue, il fallait encore six lunes. Quand elles seraient grasses et bien frottées de benjoin, on les enverrait sur des vaisseaux, dans les ports des Baléares.

Tout à coup, Zarxas, beau maintenant et vigoureux, sauta comme un bateleur sur les épaules de ses amis et il cria :

— " En as-tu réservé pour les cadavres ? " tandis qu'il montrait dans Carthage la porte de Khamon.

Aux derniers feux du soleil, les plaques d'airain la garnissant de haut en bas resplendissaient ; les Barbares crurent apercevoir sur elle une traînée sanglante. Chaque fois que Giscon voulait parler, leurs cris recommençaient. Enfin, il descendit à pas graves et s'enferma dans sa tente.

Quand il en sortit au lever du soleil, ses interprètes, qui couchaient en dehors, ne bougèrent point ; ils se tenaient sur le dos, les yeux fixes, la langue au bord des dents et la face bleuâtre. Des mucosités blanches coulaient de leurs narines, et leurs membres étaient raides, comme si le froid pendant la nuit les eût tous gelés. Chacun portait autour du cou un petit lacet de joncs.

La rébellion dès lors ne s'arrêta plus. Ce meurtre des Baléares appelé par Zarxas confirmait les défiances de Spendius. Ils s'imaginaient que la République cherchait toujours à les tromper. Il fallait en finir ! On se passerait des interprètes ! Zarxas, avec une fronde autour de la tête, chantait des chansons de guerre ; Autharite brandissait sa grande épée ; Spendius soufflait à l'un quelque parole, fournissait à l'autre un poignard. Les plus forts tâchaient de se payer eux-mêmes, les moins furieux demandaient que la distribution continuât. Personne maintenant ne quittait ses armes, et toutes les colères se réunissaient contre Giscon dans une haine tumultueuse.

Quelques-uns montaient à ses côtés. Tant qu'ils vociféraient des injures on les écoutait avec patience ; mais s'ils tentaient pour lui le moindre mot, ils étaient immédiatement lapidés, ou par derrière d'un coup de sabre on leur abattait la tête. L'amoncellement des sacs était plus rouge qu'un autel.

Ils devenaient terribles après le repas, quand ils avaient bu du vin ! C'était une joie défendue sous peine de mort dans les armées puniques, et ils levaient leur coupe du côté de Carthage par dérision pour sa discipline. Puis ils revenaient vers les esclaves des finances et ils recommençaient à tuer. Le mot frappe, différent dans chaque langue, était compris de tous.

Giscon savait bien que la patrie l'abandonnait ; mais il ne voulait point malgré son ingratitude la déshonorer. Quand ils lui rappelèrent qu'on leur avait promis des vaisseaux, il jura par Moloch de leur en fournir lui-même, à ses frais, et, arrachant son collier de pierres bleues, il le jeta dans la foule en gage de serment.

Alors les Africains réclamèrent le blé, d'après les engagements du Grand-Conseil. Giscon étala les comptes des Syssites, tracés avec de la peinture violette sur des peaux de brebis ; il lisait tout ce qui était entré dans Carthage, mois par mois et jour par jour.

Soudain il s'arrêta, les yeux béants, comme s'il fût découvert entre les chiffres sa sentence de mort.

En effet, les Anciens les avaient frauduleusement réduits et le blé, vendu pendant l'époque la plus calamiteuse de la guerre, se trouvait à un taux si bas, qu'à moins d'aveuglement on n'y pouvait croire.

— " Parle ! " crièrent-ils, " plus haut ! Ah ! c'est qu'il cherche à mentir, le lâche ! méfions-nous. "

Pendant quelque temps, il hésita. Enfin il reprit sa besogne.

Les soldats, sans se douter qu'on les trompait, acceptèrent comme vrais les comptes des Syssites. Alors l'abondance où s'était trouvée Carthage les jeta dans une jalousie furieuse. Ils brisèrent la caisse de sycomore ; elle était vide aux trois quarts. Ils avaient vu de telles sommes en sortir qu'ils la jugeaient inépuisable ; Giscon en avait enfoui dans sa tente. Ils escaladèrent les sacs. Mâtho les conduisait, et comme ils criaient : " L'argent ! l'argent ! " Giscon à la fin répondit :

— " Que votre général vous en donne ! "

Il les regardait en face, sans parler, avec ses grands yeux jaunes et sa longue figure plus pâle que sa barbe. Une flèche, arrêtée par les plumes, se tenait à son oreille dans son large anneau d'or, et un filet de sang coulait de sa tiare sur son épaule.

A un geste de Mâtho, tous s'avancèrent. Il écarta les bras ; Spendius, avec un noeud coulant, l'étreignit aux poignets ; un autre le renversa, et il disparut dans le désordre de la foule qui s'écroulait sur les sacs.

Ils saccagèrent sa tente. On n'y trouva que les choses indispensables à la vie ; puis, en cherchant mieux, trois images de Tanit, et dans une peau de singe, une pierre noire tombée de la lune. Beaucoup de Carthaginois avaient voulu l'accompagner ; c'étaient des hommes considérables et tous du parti de la guerre.

On les entraîna en dehors des tentes, et on les précipita dans la fosse aux immondices. Avec des chaînes de fer ils furent attachés par le ventre à des pieux solides, et on leur tendait la nourriture à la pointe d'un javelot.

Autharite, tout en les surveillant, les accablait d'invectives, mais comme ils ne comprenaient point sa langue, ils ne répondaient pas ; le Gaulois, de temps à autre, leur jetait des cailloux au visage pour les faire crier.

Dès le lendemain, une sorte de langueur envahit l'armée. A présent que leur colère était finie, des inquiétudes les prenaient. Mâtho souffrait d'une tristesse vague. Il lui semblait avoir indirectement outragé Salammbô. Ces Riches étaient comme une dépendance de sa personne. Il s'asseyait la nuit au bord de leur fosse, et il retrouvait dans leurs gémissements quelque chose de la voix dont son coeur était plein.

Cependant ils accusaient, tous, les Libyens, qui seuls étaient payés. Mais, en même temps que se ravivaient les antipathies nationales avec les haines particulières, on sentait le péril de s'y abandonner. Les repréailles, après un attentat pareil, seraient formidables. Donc il fallait prévenir la vengeance de Carthage. Les conciliabules, les harangues n'en finissaient pas. Chacun parlait, on n'écoutait personne, et Spendius, ordinairement si loquace, à toutes les propositions secouait la tête.

Un soir il demanda négligemment à Mâtho s'il n'y avait pas des sources dans l'intérieur de la ville.

— " Pas une ! " répondit Mâtho.

Le lendemain, Spendius l'entraîna sur la berge du lac.

— " Maître ! " dit l'ancien esclave, " Si ton coeur est intrépide, je te conduirai dans Carthage. "

— " Comment ? " répétait l'autre en haletant.

— " Jure d'exécuter tous mes ordres, de me suivre comme une ombre ! "

Alors Mâtho, levant son bras vers la planète de Chabar, s'écria :

— " Par Tanit, je le jure ! "

Spendius reprit :

— " Demain après le coucher du soleil, tu m'attendras au pied de l'aqueduc, entre la neuvième et la dixième arcade. Emporte avec toi un pic de fer, un casque sans aigrette et des sandales de cuir. "

L'aqueduc dont il parlait traversait obliquement l'isthme entier, — ouvrage considérable — , agrandi plus tard par les Romains. Malgré son dédain des autres peuples, Carthage leur avait pris gauchement cette invention nouvelle, comme Rome elle-même avait fait de la galère punique ; et cinq rangs d'arcs superposés, d'une architecture trapue, avec des contreforts à la base et des têtes de lion au sommet, aboutissaient à la partie occidentale de l'Acropole, où ils s'enfonçaient sous la ville pour déverser presque une rivière dans les citernes de Mégara.

A l'heure convenue, Spendius y trouva Mâtho. Il attacha une sorte de harpon au bout d'une corde, le fit tourner rapidement comme une fronde, l'engin de fer s'accrocha ; et ils se mirent, l'un derrière l'autre, à grimper le long du mur.

Mais quand ils furent montés sur le premier étage, le crampon, chaque fois qu'ils le jetaient, retombait ; il leur fallait, pour découvrir quelque fissure, marcher sur le bord de la corniche ; à chaque rang des arcs, ils la trouvaient plus étroite. Puis la corde se relâcha. Plusieurs fois, elle faillit se rompre.

Enfin ils arrivèrent à la plate-forme supérieure. Spendius, de temps à autre, se penchait pour tâter les pierres avec sa main.

— " C'est là " dit-il, " commençons ! " Et pesant sur l'épieu qu'avait apporté Mâtho, ils parvinrent à disjoindre une des dalles.

Ils aperçurent, au loin, une troupe de cavaliers galopant sur des chevaux sans brides. Leurs bracelets d'or sautaient dans les vagues draperies de leurs manteaux. On distinguait en avant un homme couronné de plumes d'autruche et qui galopait avec une lance à chaque main.

— " Narr'Havas ! " s'écria Mâtho.

— " Qu'importe ! " reprit Spendius ; et il sauta dans le trou qu'ils venaient de faire en découvrant la dalle.

Mâtho, par son ordre, essaya de pousser un des blocs. Mais, faute de place, il ne pouvait remuer les coudes . — " Nous reviendrons ", dit Spendius ! " Mets-toi devant. " Alors ils s'aventurèrent dans le conduit des eaux.

Ils en avaient jusqu'au ventre. Bientôt ils chancelèrent et il leur fallut nager. Leurs membres se heurtaient contre les parois du canal trop étroit. L'eau coulait presque immédiatement sous la dalle supérieure : ils se déchiraient le visage. Puis le courant les entraîna. Un air plus lourd qu'un sépulcre leur écrasait la poitrine, et la tête sous les bras, les genoux l'un contre l'autre, allongés tant qu'ils pouvaient, ils passaient comme des flèches dans l'obscurité, étouffant, râlant, presque morts. Soudain, tout fut noir devant eux et la vélocité des eaux redoublait. Ils tombèrent.

Quand ils furent remontés à la surface, ils se tinrent pendant quelques minutes étendus sur le dos, à humer l'air, délicieusement. Des arcades, les unes derrière les autres, s'ouvraient au milieu de larges murailles séparant des bassins. Tous étaient remplis, et l'eau se continuait en une seule nappe dans la longueur des citernes. Les coupoles du plafond laissaient descendre par leur soupirail une clarté pâle qui étalait sur les ondes comme des disques de lumière, et les ténèbres à l'entour, s'épaississant vers les murs, les reculaient indéfiniment. Le moindre bruit faisait un grand écho.

Spendius et Mâtho se remirent à nager, et, passant par l'ouverture des arcs, ils traversèrent plusieurs chambres à la file. Deux autres rangs de bassins plus petits s'étendaient parallèlement de chaque côté. Ils se perdirent, ils tournaient, ils revenaient. Enfin, quelque chose résista sous leurs talons. C'était le pavé de la galerie qui longeait les citernes.

Alors, s'avançant avec de grandes précautions, ils palpèrent la muraille pour trouver une issue. Mais leurs pieds glissaient ; ils tombaient dans les vasques profondes. Ils avaient à remonter, puis ils retombaient encore ; et ils sentaient une épouvantable fatigue, comme si leurs membres en nageant se fussent dissous dans l'eau. Leurs yeux se fermèrent : ils agonisaient.

Spendius se frappa la main contre les barreaux d'une grille. Ils la secouèrent, elle céda, et ils se trouvèrent sur les marches d'un escalier. Une porte de bronze le fermait en haut. Avec la pointe d'un poignard, ils écartèrent la barre que l'on ouvrait en dehors ; tout à coup le grand air pur les enveloppa.

La nuit était pleine de silence, et le ciel avait une hauteur démesurée. Des bouquets d'arbres débordaient, sur les longues lignes des murs. La ville entière dormait. Les feux des avant-postes brillaient comme des étoiles perdues.

Spendius qui avait passé trois ans dans l'ergastule, connaissait imparfaitement les quartiers. Mâtho conjectura que, pour se rendre au palais d'Hamilcar, ils devaient prendre sur la gauche, en traversant les Mappales.

— " Non ", dit Spendius, " conduis-moi au temple de Tanit. "

Mâtho voulut parler.

— " Rappelle-toi ! " fit l'ancien esclave ; et, levant son bras, il lui montra la planète de Chabar qui resplendissait.

Alors Mâtho se tourna silencieusement vers l'Acropole.

Ils rampaient le long des clôtures de nopals qui bordaient les sentiers. L'eau coulait de leurs membres sur la poussière. Leurs sandales humides ne faisaient aucun bruit ; Spendius, avec ses yeux plus flamboyants que des torches, à chaque pas fouillait les buissons ; : — et il marchait derrière Mâtho, les mains posées sur les deux poignards qu'il portait aux bras, tenus au-dessous de l'aisselle par un cercle de cuir.

Chapitre 5 TANIT

Quand ils furent sortis des jardins, ils se trouvèrent arrêtés par l'enceinte de Mégara. Mais ils découvrirent une brèche dans la grosse muraille, et passèrent.

Le terrain descendait, formant une sorte de vallon très large. C'était une place découverte.

— " Ecoute ", dit Spendius, " et d'abord ne crains rien, j'exécuterai ma promesse ... "

Il s'interrompt ; il avait l'air de réfléchir, comme pour chercher ses paroles. — " Te rappelles-tu cette fois, au soleil levant, où, sur la terrasse de Salammbô, je t'ai montré Carthage ? Nous étions forts ce jour-là, mais tu n'as voulu rien entendre ! " Puis d'une voix grave : — " Maître, il y a dans le sanctuaire de Tanit un voile mystérieux, tombé du ciel, et qui recouvre la Déesse. "

— " Je le sais ", dit Mâtho.

Spendius reprit :

— " Il est divin lui-même, car il fait partie d'elle. Les dieux résident où se trouvent leurs simulacres. C'est parce que Carthage le possède, que Carthage est puissante. " Alors se penchant à son oreille : " Je t'ai emmené avec moi pour le ravir ! "

Mâtho recula d'horreur.

— " Va-t'en ! cherche quelque autre ! Je ne veux pas t'aider dans cet exécrationnel forfait. " — " Mais Tanit est ton ennemie ", répliqua Spendius : elle te persécute, et tu meurs de sa colère. Tu t'en vengeras. Elle t'obéira. Tu deviendras presque immortel et invincible.

Mâtho baissait la tête. Il continua :

— " Nous succomberions ; l'armée d'elle-même s'anéantirait. Nous n'avons ni fuite à espérer, ni secours, ni pardon ! Quel châiment des Dieux peux-tu craindre, puisque tu vas avoir leur force dans les mains ? Aimes-tu mieux périr le soir d'une défaite, misérablement, à l'abri d'un buisson, ou parmi l'outrage de la populace, dans la flamme des bûchers ? Maître, un jour tu entreras à Carthage, entre les collègues des pontifes, qui baiseront tes sandales : et si le voile de Tanit te pèse encore, tu le rétabliras dans son temple. Suis-moi ! viens le prendre. "

Une envie terrible dévorait Mâtho. Il aurait voulu, en s'abstenant du sacrilège, posséder le voile. Il se disait que peut-être on n'aurait pas besoin de le prendre pour en accaparer la vertu. Il n'allait point jusqu'au fond de sa pensée, s'arrêtant sur la limite où elle l'épouvantait.

— " Marchons ! " dit-il ; et ils s'éloignèrent d'un pas rapide, côte à côte, sans parler.

Le terrain remonta, et les habitations se rapprochèrent. Ils tournaient dans les rues étroites, au milieu des ténèbres. Des lambeaux de sparterie fermant les portes battaient contre les murs. Sur une place, des chameaux rumaient devant des tas d'herbes coupées. Puis ils passèrent sous une galerie que recouvraient des feuillages. Un troupeau de chiens aboya. Mais l'espace tout à coup s'élargit, et ils reconnurent la face occidentale de l'Acropole. Au bas de Byrsa s'étalait une longue masse noire : c'était le temple de Tanit, ensemble de monuments et de jardins, de cours et d'avant-cours, bordé par un petit mur de pierres sèches. Spendius et Mâtho le franchirent.

Cette première enceinte renfermait un bois de platanes, par précaution contre la peste et l'infection de l'air. Çà et là étaient disséminées des tentes où l'on vendait pendant le jour des pâtes épilatoires, des parfums, des vêtements, des gâteaux en forme de lune, et des images de la Déesse avec des représentations du temple, creusées dans un bloc d'albâtre.

Ils n'avaient rien à craindre, car les nuits où l'astre ne paraissait pas on suspendait tous les rites : cependant Mâtho se ralentissait ; il s'arrêta devant les trois marches d'ébène qui conduisaient à la seconde enceinte.

— " Avance ! " dit Spendius.

Des grenadiers, des amandiers, des cyprès et des myrtes, immobiles comme des feuillages de bronze, alternaient régulièrement ; le chemin, pavé de cailloux bleus, craquait sous les pas, et des roses épanouies pendaient en berceau sur toute la longueur de l'allée. Ils arrivèrent devant un trou ovale, abrité par une grille. Alors, Mâtho, que ce silence effrayait, dit à Spendius :

— " C'est ici qu'on mélange les Eaux douces avec les Eaux amères.

"

— " J'ai vu tout cela ", reprit l'ancien esclave, " en Syrie, dans la ville de Maphug " ; et, par un escalier de six marches d'argent, ils montèrent dans la troisième enceinte.

Un cèdre énorme en occupait le milieu. Ses branches les plus basses disparaissaient sous des brides d'étoffes et des colliers qu'y avaient appendus les fidèles. Ils firent encore quelques pas, et la façade du temple se déploya.

Deux longs portiques, dont les architraves reposaient sur des piliers trapus, flanquaient une tour quadrangulaire, ornée à sa plate-forme par un croissant de lune. Sur les angles des portiques et aux quatre coins de la tour s'élevaient des vases pleins d'aromates allumés. Des grenades et des coloquintes chargeaient les chapiteaux. Des entrelacs, des losanges, des lignes de perles s'alternaient sur les murs, et une haie en filigrane d'argent formait un large demi-cercle devant l'escalier d'airain qui descendait du vestibule.

Il y avait à l'entrée, entre une stèle d'or et une stèle d'émeraude, un cône de pierre ; Mâtho, en passant à côté, se baisa la main droite.

La première chambre était très haute ; d'innombrables ouvertures perçaient sa voûte ; en levant la tête on pouvait voir les étoiles. Tout autour de la muraille, dans des corbeilles de roseau, s'amoncelaient des barbes et des chevelures, prémices des adolescences ; et, au milieu de l'appartement circulaire, le corps d'une femme sortait d'une gaine couverte de mamelles. Grasse, barbue, et les paupières baissées, elle avait l'air de sourire, en croisant ses mains sur le bord de son gros ventre, — poli par les baisers de la foule.

Puis ils se retrouvèrent à l'air libre, dans un corridor transversal, où un autel de proportions exiguës s'appuyait contre une porte d'ivoire. On n'allait point au-delà : les prêtres seuls pouvaient l'ouvrir ; car un temple n'était pas un lieu de réunion pour la multitude, mais la demeure particulière d'une divinité.

— " L'entreprise est impossible ", disait Mâtho. " Tu n'y avais pas songé ! Retournons ! " Spendius examinait les murs.

Il voulait le voile, non qu'il eût confiance en sa vertu (Spendius ne croyait qu'à l'Oracle), mais persuadé que les Carthaginois, s'en voyant privés, tomberaient dans un grand abattement. Pour trouver quelque issue, ils firent le tour par-derrière.

On apercevait, sous des bosquets de térébinthe, des édicules de forme différente. Ça et là un phallus de pierre se dressait, et de grands cerfs erraient tranquillement, poussant de leurs pieds fourchus des pommes de pin tombées.

Ils revinrent sur leurs pas entre deux longues galeries qui s'avançaient parallèlement. De petites cellules s'ouvraient au bord. Des tambourins et des cymbales étaient accrochés du haut en bas de leurs colonnes de cèdre. Des femmes dormaient en dehors des cellules, étendues sur des nattes. Leurs corps, tout gras d'onguents, exhalaient une odeur d'épices et de cassolettes éteintes ; elles étaient si couvertes de tatouages, de colliers, d'anneaux, de vermillon et d'antimoine, qu'on les eût prises, sans le mouvement de leur poitrine, pour des idoles ainsi couchées par terre. Des lotus entouraient une fontaine, où nageaient des poissons pareils à ceux de Salammbô ; puis au fond, contre la muraille du temple, s'étalait une vigne dont les sarments étaient de verre et les grappes d'émeraude : les rayons des pierres précieuses faisaient des jeux de lumière, entre les colonnes peintes, sur les visages endormis.

Mâtho suffoquait dans la chaude atmosphère que rabattaient sur lui les cloisons de cèdre. Tous ces symboles de la fécondation, ces parfums, ces rayonnements, ces haleines l'accablaient. A travers les éblouissements mystiques, il songeait à Salammbô. Elle se confondait avec la Déesse elle-même, et son amour s'en dégageait plus fort, comme les grands lotus qui s'épanouissaient sur la profondeur des eaux.

Spendius calculait quelle somme d'argent il aurait autrefois gagnée à vendre ces femmes ; et, d'un coup d'oeil rapide, il pesait en passant les colliers d'or.

Le temple était, de ce côté comme de l'autre, impénétrable. Ils revinrent derrière la première chambre. Pendant que Spendius cherchait, furetait, Mâtho, prosterné devant la porte, implorait Tanit. Il la suppliait de ne point permettre ce sacrilège. Il tâchait de l'adoucir avec des mots caressants, comme on fait à une personne irritée. Spendius remarqua au-dessus de la porte une ouverture étroite.

— " Lève-toi ! " dit-il à Mâtho, et il le fit s'adosser contre le mur, tout debout. Alors, posant un pied dans ses mains, puis un autre sur sa tête, il parvint jusqu'à la hauteur du soupirail, s'y engagea et disparut. Puis Mâtho sentit tomber sur son épaule une corde à noeuds, celle que Spendius avait enroulée autour de son corps avant de s'engager dans les citernes ; et s'y appuyant des deux mains, bientôt il se trouva près de lui dans une grande salle pleine d'ombre.

De pareils attentats étaient une chose extraordinaire. L'insuffisance des moyens pour les prévenir témoignait assez qu'on les jugeait impossibles. La terreur, plus que les murs, défendait les sanctuaires. Mâtho, à chaque pas, s'attendait à mourir.

Cependant, une lueur vacillait au fond des ténèbres ; ils s'en rapprochèrent. C'était une lampe qui brûlait dans une coquille sur le piédestal d'une statue, coiffée du bonnet des Cabires. Des disques en diamant parsemaient sa longue robe bleue, et des chaînes, qui s'enfonçaient sous les dalles, l'attachaient au sol par les talons. Mâtho retint un cri. Il balbutiait : " Ah ! la voilà ! la voilà ! ... " Spendius prit la lampe afin de s'éclairer.

— " Quel impie tu es ! " murmura Mâtho. Il le suivait pourtant.

L'appartement où ils entrèrent n'avait rien qu'une peinture noire représentant une autre femme. Ses jambes montaient jusqu'au haut de la muraille. Son corps occupait le plafond tout entier. De son nombril pendait à un fil un oeuf énorme, et elle retombait sur l'autre mur, la tête en bas, jusqu'au niveau des dalles où atteignaient ses doigts pointus.

Pour passer plus loin, ils écartèrent une tapisserie ; mais le vent souffla, et la lumière s'éteignit.

Alors ils errèrent, perdus dans les complications de l'architecture. Tout à coup, ils sentirent sous leurs pieds quelque chose d'une douceur étrange. Des étincelles pétillaient, jaillissaient ; ils marchaient dans du feu. Spendius tâta le sol et reconnut qu'il était soigneusement tapissé avec des peaux de lynx ; puis il leur sembla qu'une grosse corde mouillée, froide et visqueuse, glissait entre leurs jambes. Des fissures, taillées dans la muraille, laissaient tomber de minces rayons blancs. Ils s'avançaient à ces lueurs incertaines. Enfin ils distinguèrent un grand serpent noir. Il s'élança vite et disparut.

— " Fuyons ! " s'écria Mâtho. " C'est elle ! je la sens elle vient. "

— " Eh non ! " répondit Spendius, " le temple est vide. "

Alors une lumière éblouissante leur fit baisser les yeux. Puis ils aperçurent tout à l'entour une infinité de bêtes, efflanquées, haletantes, hérissant leurs griffes, et confondues les unes par-dessus les autres dans un désordre mystérieux qui épouvantait. Des serpents avaient des pieds, des taureaux avaient des ailes, des poissons à têtes d'homme dévoraient des fruits, des fleurs s'épanouissaient dans la mâchoire des crocodiles, et des éléphants, la trompe levée, passaient en plein azur, orgueilleusement, comme des aigles. Un effort terrible distendait leurs membres incomplets ou multipliés. Ils avaient l'air, en tirant la langue, de vouloir faire sortir leur âme ; et toutes les formes se trouvaient là, comme si le réceptacle des germes, crevant dans une éclosion soudaine, se fût vidé sur les murs de la salle.

Douze globes de cristal bleu la bordaient circulairement, supportés par des monstres qui ressemblaient à des tigres. Leurs prunelles saillaient comme les yeux des escargots, et courbant leurs reins trapus, ils se tournaient vers le fond, où resplendissait, sur un char d'ivoire, la Rabbet suprême, l'Omniféconde, la dernière inventée.

Des écailles, des plumes, des fleurs et des oiseaux lui montaient jusqu'au ventre. Pour pendants d'oreilles elle avait des cymbales d'argent qui lui battaient sur les joues. Ses grands yeux fixes vous regardaient, et une pierre lumineuse, enchâssée à son front dans un symbole obscène, éclairait toute la salle, en se reflétant au-dessus de la porte, sur des miroirs de cuivre rouge.

Mâtho fit un pas ; une dalle fléchit sous ses talons, et voilà que les sphères se mirent à tourner, les monstres à rugir ; une musique s'éleva, mélodieuse et ronflante comme l'harmonie des planètes ; l'âme tumultueuse de Tanit ruisselait épandue. Elle allait se lever, grande comme la salle, avec les bras ouverts. Tout à coup les monstres fermèrent la gueule, et les globes de cristal ne tournaient plus.

Puis une modulation lugubre pendant quelque temps se traîna dans l'air, et s'éteignit enfin.

— " Et le voile ? " dit Spendius.

Nulle part on ne l'apercevait. Où donc se trouvait-il ? Comment le découvrir ? Et si les prêtres l'avaient caché ? Mâtho éprouvait un déchirement au coeur et comme une déception dans sa foi.

— " Par ici ! " chuchota Spendius. Une inspiration le guidait. Il entraîna Mâtho derrière le char de Tanit, où une fente, large d'une coudée, coupait la muraille du haut en bas.

Alors ils pénétrèrent dans une petite salle toute ronde, et si élevée qu'elle ressemblait à l'intérieur d'une colonne. Il y avait au milieu une grosse pierre noire à demi sphérique, comme un tambourin ; des flammes brûlaient dessus ; un cône d'ébène se dressait par-derrière, portant une tête et deux bras.

Mais au-delà on aurait dit un nuage où étincelaient des étoiles : des figures apparaissaient dans les profondeurs de ses plis : Eschmoûn avec les Kabires, quelques-uns des monstres déjà vus, les bêtes sacrées des Babyloniens, puis d'autres qu'ils ne connaissaient pas. Cela passait comme un manteau sous le visage de l'idole, et remontant étalé sur le mur, s'accrochait par les angles, tout à la fois bleuâtre comme la nuit, jaune comme l'aurore, pourpre comme le soleil, nombreux, diaphane, étincelant, léger. C'était là le manteau de la Déesse, le zaïmph saint que l'on ne pouvait voir.

Ils pâlirent l'un et l'autre.

— " Prends-le ! " dit enfin Mâtho.

Spendius n'hésita pas ; et, s'appuyant sur l'idole, il décrocha le voile, qui s'affaissa par terre. Mâtho posa la main dessus ; puis il entra sa tête par l'ouverture, puis il s'en enveloppa le corps, et il écartait les bras pour le mieux contempler.

— " Partons ! " dit Spendius.

Mâtho, en haletant, restait les yeux fixés sur les dalles.

Tout à coup il s'écria :

— " Mais si j'allais chez elle ? Je n'ai plus peur de sa beauté. Que pourrait-elle faire contre moi ? Me voilà plus qu'un homme, maintenant. Je traverserais les flammes, je marcherais dans la mer ! Un élan m'emporte ! Salammbô ! Salammbô ! Je suis ton maître ! "

Sa voix tonnait. Il semblait à Spendius de taille plus haute et transfiguré.

Un bruit de pas se rapprocha, une porte s'ouvrit et un homme apparut, un prêtre, avec son haut bonnet et les yeux écarquillés. Avant qu'il eût fait un geste, Spendius s'était précipité, et, l'étreignant à pleins bras, lui avait enfoncé dans les flancs ses deux poignards. La tête sonna sur les dalles.

Puis, immobiles comme le cadavre, ils restèrent pendant quelque temps à écouter. On n'entendait que le murmure du vent par la porte entrouverte.

Elle donnait sur un passage resserré. Spendius s'y engagea. Mâtho le suivit, et ils se trouvèrent presque immédiatement dans la troisième enceinte, entre les portiques latéraux, où étaient les habitations des prêtres.

Derrière les cellules il devait y avoir pour sortir un chemin plus court. Ils se hâtèrent.

Spendius, s'accroupissant au bord de la fontaine, lava ses mains sanglantes. Les femmes dormaient. La vigne d'émeraude brillait. Ils se remirent en marche.

Mais quelqu'un, sous les arbres, courait derrière eux ; et Mâtho, qui portait le voile, sentit plusieurs fois qu'on le tirait par en bas, tout doucement. C'était un grand cynocéphale, un de ceux qui vivaient libres dans l'enceinte de la Déesse. Comme s'il avait eu conscience du vol, il se cramponnait au manteau. Cependant ils n'osaient le battre, dans la peur de faire redoubler ses cris ; soudain sa colère s'apaisa et il trottait près d'eux, côte à côte, en balançant son corps, avec ses longs bras qui pendaient. Puis, à la barrière, d'un bond, il s'élança dans un palmier.

Quand ils furent sortis de la dernière enceinte, ils se dirigèrent vers le palais d'Hamilcar, Spendius comprenant qu'il était inutile de vouloir en détourner Mâtho.

Ils prirent par la rue des Tanneurs, la place de Muthumbal, le marché aux herbes et le carrefour de Cynasyn. A l'angle d'un mur, un homme se recula, effrayé par cette chose étincelante, qui traversait les ténèbres.

— " Cache le zaïmph ! " dit Spendius.

D'autres gens les croisèrent ; mais ils n'en furent pas aperçus.

Enfin ils reconnurent les maisons de Mégara.

Le phare, bâti par-derrière, au sommet de la falaise, illuminait le ciel d'une grande clarté rouge, et l'ombre du palais, avec ses terrasses superposées, se projetait sur les jardins comme une monstrueuse pyramide. Ils entrèrent par la haie de jujubiers, en abattant les branches à coups de poignard.

Tout gardait les traces du festin des Mercenaires. Les parcs étaient rompus, les rigoles taries, les portes de l'ergastule ouvertes. Personne n'apparaissait autour des cuisines ni des celliers. Ils s'étonnaient de ce silence, interrompu quelquefois par le souffle rauque des éléphants qui s'agitaient dans leurs entraves, et la crépitation du phare où flambait un bûcher d'aloès.

Mâtho, cependant, répétait :

— " Où est-elle ? je veux la voir ! Conduis-moi ! "

— " C'est une démente ! " disait Spendius. " Elle appellera, ses esclaves accourront, et, malgré ta force, tu mourras ! "

Ils atteignirent ainsi l'escalier des galères. Mâtho leva la tête, et il crut apercevoir, tout en haut, une vague clarté rayonnante et douce. Spendius voulut le retenir. Il s'élança sur les marches.

En se retrouvant aux places où il l'avait déjà vue, l'intervalle des jours écoulés s'effaça dans sa mémoire. Tout à l'heure elle chantait entre les tables ; elle avait disparu, et depuis lors il montait continuellement cet escalier. Le ciel, sur sa tête, était couvert de feux ; la mer emplissait l'horizon ; à chacun de ses pas une immensité plus large l'entourait, et il continuait à gravir avec l'étrange facilité que l'on éprouve dans les rêves.

Le bruissement du voile frôlant contre les pierres lui rappela son pouvoir nouveau ; mais, dans l'excès de son espérance, il ne savait plus maintenant ce qu'il devait faire ; cette incertitude l'intimida.

De temps à autre, il collait son visage contre les baies quadrangulaires des appartements fermés, et il crut voir dans plusieurs des personnes endormies.

Le dernier étage, plus étroit, formait comme un dé sur le sommet des terrasses. Mâtho en fit le tour, lentement.

Une lumière laiteuse emplissait les feuilles de talc qui bouchaient les petites ouvertures de la muraille ; et, symétriquement disposées, elles ressemblaient dans les ténèbres à des rangs de perles fines. Il reconnut la porte rouge à croix noire. Les battements de son cœur redoublèrent. Il aurait voulu s'enfuir. Il poussa la porte ; elle s'ouvrit.

Une lampe en forme de galère brûlait suspendue dans le lointain de la chambre ; et trois rayons, qui s'échappaient de sa carène d'argent, tremblaient sur les hauts lambris, couverts d'une peinture rouge à bandes noires. Le plafond était un assemblage de poutrelles, portant au milieu de leur dorure des améthystes et des topazes dans les noeuds du bois. Sur les deux grands côtés de l'appartement, s'allongeait un lit très bas fait de courroies blanches ; et des cintres, pareils à des coquilles, s'ouvraient au-dessus, dans l'épaisseur de la muraille, laissant déborder quelque vêtement qui pendait jusqu'à terre.

Une marche d'onyx entourait un bassin ovale ; de fines pantoufles en peau de serpent étaient restées sur le bord avec une buire d'albâtre. La trace d'un pas humide s'apercevait au-delà. Des senteurs exquises s'évaporaient.

Mâtho effleurait les dalles incrustées d'or, de nacre et de verre ; et malgré la polissure du sol, il lui semblait que ses pieds enfonçaient comme s'il eût marché dans des sables.

Il avait aperçu derrière la lampe d'argent un grand carré d'azur se tenant en l'air par quatre cordes qui remontaient, et il s'avancait, les reins courbés, la bouche ouverte.

Des ailes de phénicoptères, emmanchées à des branches de corail noir, traînaient parmi les coussins de pourpre et les étrilles d'écaille, les coffrets de cèdre, les spatules d'ivoire. A des cornes d'antilope étaient enfilés des bagues, des bracelets ; et des vases d'argile rafraîchissaient au vent, dans la fente du mur, sur un treillage de roseaux. Plusieurs fois il se heurta les pieds, car le sol avait des niveaux de hauteur inégale qui faisaient dans la chambre comme une succession d'appartements. Au fond, des balustres d'argent entouraient un tapis semé de fleurs peintes. Enfin il arriva contre le lit suspendu, près d'un escabeau d'ébène servant à y monter.

Mais la lumière s'arrêtait au bord ; — et l'ombre, telle qu'un grand rideau, ne découvrait qu'un angle du matelas rouge avec le bout d'un petit pied nu posant sur la cheville. Alors Mâtho tira la lampe, tout doucement.

Elle dormait la joue dans une main et l'autre bras déplié. Les anneaux de sa chevelure se répandaient autour d'elle si abondamment qu'elle paraissait couchée sur des plumes noires, et sa large tunique blanche se courbait en molles draperies, jusqu'à ses pieds, suivant les inflexions de sa taille. On apercevait un peu ses yeux, sous ses paupières entre-closes. Les courtines, perpendiculairement tendues, l'enveloppaient d'une atmosphère bleuâtre, et le mouvement de sa respiration, en se communiquant aux cordes, semblait la balancer dans l'air. Un long moustique bourdonnait.

Mâtho, immobile, tenait au bout de son bras la galère d'argent, mais la moustiquaire s'enflamma d'un seul coup, disparut, et Salammbô se réveilla.

Le feu s'était de soi-même éteint. Elle ne parlait pas. La lampe faisait osciller sur les lambris de grandes moires lumineuses.

— " Qu'est-ce donc ? " dit-elle.

Il répondit :

— " C'est le voile de la Déesse ! "

— " Le voile, de la Déesse ! " s'écria Salammbô. Et appuyée sur les deux poings, elle se penchait en dehors toute frémissante. Il reprit :

— " J'ai été le chercher pour toi dans les profondeurs du sanctuaire ! Regarde ! " Le zaïmph étincelait tout couvert de rayons.

— " T'en souviens-tu ? " disait Mâtho. " La nuit, tu apparaissais dans mes songes - ; mais je ne devinais pas l'ordre muet de tes yeux ! " Elle avançait un pied sur l'escabeau d'ébène. " Si j'avais compris, je serais accouru ; j'aurais abandonné l'armée ; je ne serais pas sorti de Carthage. Pour t'obéir, je descendrais par la caverne d'Hadrumète dans le royaume des Ombres... Pardonne ! c'étaient comme des montagnes qui pesaient sur mes jours ; et pourtant quelque chose m'entraînait ! Je tâchais de venir jusqu'à toi ! Sans les Dieux, est-ce que jamais j'aurais osé ! ... Partons ! il faut me suivre ! ou, si tu ne veux pas, je vais rester. Que m'importe... Noie mon âme ans le souffle de ton haleine ! Que mes lèvres s'écrasent à baiser tes mains ! "

— " Laisse-moi voir ! " disait-elle. " Plus près ! Plus près ! "

L'aube se levait, et une couleur vineuse emplissait les feuilles de talc dans les murs. Salammbô s'appuyait en défaillant contre les coussins du lit.

— " Je t'aime ! " criait Mâtho.

Elle balbutia : — " Donne-le ! " Et ils se rapprochaient.

Elle s'avancait toujours, vêtue de sa simarre blanche qui traînait, avec ses grands yeux attachés sur le voile. Mâtho la contemplait, ébloui par les splendeurs de sa tête, et tendant vers elle le zaïmph, il allait l'envelopper dans une étreinte. Elle écartait les bras. Tout à coup elle s'arrêta, et ils restèrent béants à se regarder.

Sans comprendre ce qu'il sollicitait, une horreur la saisit. Ses sourcils minces remontèrent, ses lèvres s'ouvraient ; elle tremblait. Enfin, elle frappa dans une des patères d'airain qui pendaient aux coins du matelas rouge, en criant :

— " Au secours ! au secours ! Arrière, sacrilège ! infâme ! maudit ! A moi, Taanach, Kroûm, Ewa, Micipsa, Schaoûl ! "

Et la figure de Spendius effarée, apparaissant dans la muraille entre les buires d'argile, jeta ces mots :

— " Fuis donc ! ils accourent ! "

Un grand tumulte monta en ébranlant les escaliers et un flot de monde, des femmes, des valets, des esclaves, s'élancèrent dans la chambre avec des épieux, des casse-tête, des coutelas, des poignards. Ils furent comme paralysés d'indignation en apercevant un homme ; les servantes poussaient le hurlement des funérailles, et les eunuques pâlissaient sous leur peau noire.

Mâtho se tenait derrière les balustres. Avec le zaïmph qui l'enveloppait, il semblait un dieu sidéral tout environné du firmament. Les esclaves s'allaient jeter sur lui. Elle les arrêta :

— " N'y touchez pas ! C'est le manteau de la Déesse ! "

Elle s'était reculée dans un angle ; mais elle fit un pas vers lui, et, allongeant son bras nu :

— " Malédiction sur toi qui as dérobé Tanit ! Haine, vengeance, massacre et douleur ! Que Gurzil, dieu des batailles, te déchire ! que Matisman, dieu des morts, t'étouffe ! et que l'Autre, — celui qu'il ne faut pas nommer — te brûle ! "

Mâtho poussa un cri comme à la blessure d'une épée. Elle répéta plusieurs fois : — " Va-t'en ! va-t'en ! "

La foule des serviteurs s'écarta, et Mâtho, baissant la tête, passa lentement au milieu d'eux ; mais à la porte il s'arrêta, car la frange du zaïmph s'était accrochée à une des étoiles d'or qui pavaient les dalles. Il le tira brusquement d'un coup d'épaule, et descendit les escaliers.

Spendius, bondissant de terrasse en terrasse et sautant par-dessus les haies, les rigoles, s'était échappé des jardins. Il arriva au pied du phare. Le mur en cet endroit se trouvait abandonné, tant la falaise était inaccessible. Il s'avança jusqu'au bord, se coucha sur le dos, et, les pieds en avant, se laissa glisser tout le long jusqu'en bas ; puis il atteignit à la nage le cap des Tombeaux, fit un grand détour par la lagune salée, et, le soir, rentra au camp des Barbares.

Le soleil s'était levé ; et, comme un lion qui s'éloigne, Mâtho descendait les chemins, en jetant autour de lui des yeux terribles.

Une rumeur indécise arrivait à ses oreilles. Elle était partie du palais et elle recommençait au loin, du côté de l'Acropole. Les uns disaient qu'on avait pris le trésor de la République dans le temple de Moloch ; d'autres parlaient d'un prêtre assassiné. On s'imaginait ailleurs que les Barbares étaient entrés dans la ville.

Mâtho, qui ne savait comment sortir des enceintes, marchait droit devant lui. On l'aperçut, alors une clameur s'éleva. Tous avaient compris ; ce fut une consternation, puis une immense colère.

Du fond des Mappales, des hauteurs de l'Acropole, des catacombes, des bords du lac, la multitude accourut. Les patriciens sortaient de leur palais, les vendeurs de leurs boutiques ; les femmes abandonnaient leurs enfants ; on saisit des épées, des haches, des bâtons ; mais l'obstacle qui avait empêché Salammbô les arrêta. Comment reprendre le voile ? Sa vue seule était un crime : il était de la nature des Dieux et son contact faisait mourir.

Sur le péristyle des temples, les prêtres désespérés se tordaient les bras. Les gardes de la Légion galopèrent au hasard : on montait sur les maisons, sur les terrasses, sur l'épaule des colosses et dans la mâture des navires. Il s'avancait cependant, et à chacun de ses pas la rage augmentait, mais la terreur aussi. Les rues se vidaient à son approche, et ce torrent d'hommes qui fuyaient rejaillissait des deux côtés jusqu'au sommet des murailles. Il ne distinguait partout que des yeux grands ouverts comme pour le dévorer, des dents qui claquaient, des poings tendus, et les imprécations de Salammbô retentissaient en se multipliant.

Tout à coup, une longue flèche siffla, puis une autre, et des pierres ronflaient : mais les coups, mal dirigés (car on avait peur d'atteindre le zaïmph), passaient au-dessus de sa tête. D'ailleurs, se faisant du voile un bouclier, il le tendait à droite, à gauche, devant lui, par derrière ; et ils n'imaginaient aucun expédient. Il marchait de plus en plus vite, s'engageant par les rues ouvertes. Elles étaient barrées avec des cordes, des chariots, des pièges ; à chaque détour il revenait en arrière. Enfin il entra sur la place de Khamon, où les Baléares avaient péri ; Mâtho s'arrêta, pâlisant comme quelqu'un qui va mourir. Il était bien perdu cette fois ; la multitude battait des mains.

Il courut jusqu'à la grande porte fermée. Elle était très haute, tout en cœur de chêne, avec des clous de fer et doublée d'airain. Mâtho se jeta contre. Le peuple trépignait de joie, voyant l'impuissance de sa fureur ; alors il prit sa sandale, cracha dessus et en souffleta les panneaux immobiles. La ville entière hurla. On oubliait le voile maintenant, et ils allaient l'écraser. Mâtho promena sur la foule de grands yeux vagues. Ses tempes battaient à l'étourdir ; il se sentait envahi par l'engourdissement des gens ivres. Tout à coup il aperçut la longue chaîne que l'on tirait pour manoeuvrer la bascule de la porte. D'un bond il s'y cramponna, en roidissant ses bras, en s'arc-boutant des pieds ; et, à la fin, les battants énormes s'entrouvrirent.

Quand il fut dehors, il retira de son cou le grand zaïmph et l'éleva sur sa tête le plus haut possible. L'étoffe, soutenue par le vent de la mer, resplendissait au soleil avec ses couleurs, ses pierreries et la figure de ses dieux. Mâtho, le portant ainsi, traversa toute la plaine jusqu'aux tentes des soldats, et le peuple, sur les murs, regardait s'en aller la fortune de Carthage.

Chapitre 6 HANNON

— " J'aurais dû l'enlever ! " disait-il le soir à Spendius.

— Il fallait la saisir, l'arracher de sa maison ! Personne n'eût osé rien contre moi ! "

Spendius ne l'écoutait pas. Etendu sur le dos, il se reposait avec délices, près d'une grande jarre pleine d'eau miellée, où de temps à autre il se plongeait la tête pour boire plus abondamment.

Mâtho reprit :

— " Que faire ? ... Comment rentrer dans Carthage ? "

— " Je ne sais ", lui dit Spendius.

Cette impassibilité l'exaspérait ; il s'écria :

— " Eh ! la faute vient de toi ! Tu m'entraînes, puis tu m'abandonnes, lâche que tu es ! Pourquoi donc t'obéirais-je ? Te crois-tu mon maître ? Ah ! prostitueur, esclave, fils d'esclave ! "

" Il grinçait des dents et levait sur Spendius sa large main.

Le Grec ne répondit pas. Un lampadaire d'argile brûlait doucement contre le mât de la tente, où le zaïmph rayonnait dans la panoplie suspendue. Tout à coup, Mâtho chaussa ses cothurnes, boucla sa jaquette à lames d'airain, prit son casque.

— " Où vas-tu ? " demanda Spendius.

— " J'y retourne ! Laisse-moi ! Je la ramènerai ! Et s'ils se présentent je les écrase comme des vipères ! Je la ferai mourir, Spendius ! " Il répéta : " Oui ! Je la tuerai ! tu verras, je la tuerai ! "

Mais Spendius, qui tendait l'oreille, arracha brusquement le zaïmph et le jeta dans un coin, en accumulant par-dessus des toisons. On entendit un murmure de voix, des torches brillèrent, et Narr'Havas entra, suivi d'une vingtaine d'hommes environ.

Ils portaient des manteaux de laine blanche, de longs poignards, des colliers de cuir, des pendants d'oreilles en bois, des chaussures en peau d'hyène ; et, restés sur le seuil, ils s'appuyaient contre leurs lances comme des pasteurs qui se reposent. Narr'Havas était le plus beau de tous ; des courroies garnies de perles serraient ses bras minces ; le cercle d'or attachant autour de sa tête son large vêtement retenait une plume d'autruche qui lui pendait par-dérrière l'épaule : un continuel sourire découvrait ses dents ; ses yeux semblaient aiguisés comme des flèches, et il y avait dans toute sa personne quelque chose d'attentif et de léger.

Il déclara qu'il venait se joindre aux Mercenaires, car la République menaçait depuis longtemps son royaume. Donc il avait intérêt à secourir les Barbares, et il pouvait aussi leur être utile.

— " Je vous fournirai des éléphants (mes forêts en sont pleines), du vin, de l'huile, de l'orge, des dattes, de la poix et du soufre pour les sièges, vingt mille, fantassins et dix mille chevaux. Si je m'adresse à toi, Mâtho, c'est que la possession du zaïmph t'a rendu le premier de l'armée. " Il ajouta : " Nous sommes d'anciens amis d'ailleurs. "

Mâtho, cependant, considérait Spendius, qui écoutait assis sur les peaux de mouton, tout en faisant avec la tête de petits signes d'assentiment. Narr'Havas parlait. Il attestait les Dieux, il maudissait Carthage. Dans ses imprécations, il brisa un javelot. Tous ses hommes à la fois poussèrent un grand hurlement, et Mâtho, emporté par cette colère, s'écria qu'il acceptait l'alliance.

Alors on amena un taureau blanc avec une brebis noire, symbole du jour et symbole de la nuit. On les égorgea au bord d'une fosse. Quand elle fut pleine de sang ils y plongèrent leurs bras. Puis Narr'Havas étala sa main sur la poitrine de Mâtho, et Mâtho la sienne sur la poitrine de Narr'Havas. Ils répétèrent ce stigmatisme sur la toile de leurs tentes. Ensuite ils passèrent la nuit à manger, et on brûla le reste des viandes avec la peau, les ossements, les cornes et les ongles.

Une immense acclamation avait salué Mâtho lorsqu'il était revenu portant le voile de la Déesse ; ceux mêmes qui n'étaient pas de la religion chananéenne sentirent à leur vague enthousiasme qu'un Génie survenait. Quant à chercher à s'emparer du zaïmph, aucun n'y songea ; la manière mystérieuse dont il l'avait acquis suffisait, dans l'esprit des Barbares, à en légitimer la possession. Ainsi pensaient les soldats de race africaine. Les autres, dont la haine était moins vieille, ne savaient que résoudre. S'ils avaient eu des navires, ils se seraient immédiatement en allés.

Spendius, Narr'Havas et Mâtho expédièrent des hommes à toutes les tribus du territoire punique.

Carthage exténuaient ces peuples. Elle en tirait des impôts exorbitants ; et les fers, la hache ou la croix punissaient les retards et jusqu'aux murmures. Il fallait cultiver ce qui convenait à la République, fournir ce qu'elle demandait ; personne n'avait le droit de posséder une arme ; quand les villages se révoltaient, on vendait les habitants ; les gouverneurs étaient estimés comme des pressoirs d'après la quantité qu'ils faisaient rendre. Puis, au-delà des régions directement soumises à Carthage, s'étendaient les alliés ne payant qu'un médiocre tribut ; derrière les alliés vagabondaient les Nomades, qu'on pouvait lâcher sur eux. Par ce système les récoltes étaient toujours abondantes, les haras savamment conduits, les plantations superbes. Le vieux Caton, un maître en fait de labours et d'esclaves, quatre-vingt-douze ans plus tard, en fut ébahi, et le cri de mort qu'il répétait dans Rome n'était que l'exclamation d'une jalousie cupide.

Durant la dernière guerre, les exactions avaient redoublé, si bien que les villes de Libye, presque toutes, s'étaient livrées à Régulus. Pour les punir, on avait exigé d'elles mille talents, vingt mille boeufs, trois cents sacs de poudre d'or, des avances de grains considérables, et les chefs des tribus avaient été mis en croix ou jetés aux lions.

Tunis surtout exérait Carthage ! Plus vieille que la métropole, elle ne lui pardonnait point sa grandeur ; elle se tenait en face de ses murs, accroupie dans la fange, au bord de l'eau, comme une bête venimeuse qui la regardait. Les déportations, les massacres et les épidémies ne l'affaiblissaient pas. Elle avait soutenu Archagate, fils d'Agathoclès. Les Mangeurs-de-choses-immondes, tout de suite, y trouvèrent des armes.

Les courriers n'étaient pas encore partis que dans les provinces une joie universelle éclata. Sans rien attendre, on étrangla dans les bains les intendants des maisons et les fonctionnaires de la République ; on retira des cavernes les vieilles armes que l'on cachait ; avec le fer des charrues on forgea des épées ; les enfants sur les portes aiguisaient des javelots, et les femmes donnèrent leurs colliers, leurs bagues, leurs pendants d'oreilles, tout ce qui pouvait servir à la destruction de Carthage. Chacun y voulait contribuer. Les paquets de lances s'amoncelaient dans les bourgs, comme des gerbes de maïs. On expédia des bestiaux et de l'argent. Mâtho paya vite aux Mercenaires l'arrérage de leur solde, et cette idée de Spendius le fit nommer général en chef, schalischim des Barbares.

En même temps, les secours d'hommes affluaient. D'abord parurent les gens de race autochtone, puis les esclaves des campagnes. Des caravanes de Nègres furent saisies, on les arma, et des marchands qui venaient à Carthage, dans l'espoir d'un profit plus certain, se mêlèrent aux Barbares. Il arrivait incessamment des bandes nombreuses. Des hauteurs de l'Acropole on voyait l'armée qui grossissait.

Sur la plate-forme de l'aqueduc, les gardes de la Légion étaient postés en sentinelles ; et près d'eux, de distance en distance, s'élevaient des cuves en airain où bouillonnaient des flots d'asphalte. En bas, dans la plaine, la grande foule s'agitait tumultueusement. Ils étaient incertains, éprouvant cet embarras que la rencontre des murailles inspire toujours aux Barbares.

Utique et Hippo-Zaryte refusèrent leur alliance. Colonies phéniciennes comme Carthage, elles se gouvernaient elles-mêmes, et, dans les traités que concluait la République, faisaient chaque fois admettre des clauses pour les en distinguer. Cependant elles respectaient cette soeur plus forte qui les protégeait, et elles ne croyaient point qu'un amas de Barbares fût capable de la vaincre ; ils seraient au contraire exterminés. Elles désiraient rester neutres et vivre tranquilles.

Mais leur position les rendait indispensables. Utique, au fond d'un golfe, était commode pour amener dans Carthage les secours du dehors. Si Utique seule était prise, Hippo-Zaryte, à six heures plus loin sur la côte, la remplacerait, et la métropole, ainsi ravitaillée, se trouverait inexpugnable.

Spendius voulait qu'on entreprît le siège immédiatement, Narr'Havas s'y opposa ; il fallait d'abord se porter sur la frontière. C'était l'opinion des vétérans, celle de Mâtho lui-même, et il fut décidé que Spendius irait attaquer Utique, Mâtho Hippo-Zaryte ; le troisième corps d'armée, s'appuyant à Tunis, occuperait la plaine de Carthage ; Autharite s'en chargea. Quant à Narr'Havas, il devait retourner dans son royaume pour y prendre des éléphants, et avec sa cavalerie battre les routes.

Les femmes crièrent bien fort à cette décision ; elles convoitaient les bijoux des dames puniques. Les Libyens aussi réclamèrent. On les avait appelés contre Carthage, et voilà qu'on s'en allait ! Les soldats presque seuls partirent. Mâtho commandait ses compagnons avec les Ibériens, les Lusitaniens, les hommes de l'Occident et des îles, et tous ceux qui parlaient grec avaient demandé Spendius, à cause de son esprit.

La stupéfaction fut grande quand on vit l'armée se mouvoir tout à coup ; puis elle s'allongea sous la montagne de l'Ariane, par le chemin d'Utique, du côté de la mer. Un tronçon demeura devant Tunis, le reste disparut, et il reparut sur l'autre bord du golfe, à la lisière des bois, où il s'enfonça.

Ils étaient quatre-vingt mille hommes, peut-être. Les deux cités tyriennes ne résisteraient pas ; ils reviendraient sur Carthage. Déjà une armée considérable l'entamait, en occupant l'isthme par la base, et bientôt elle périrait affamée, car on ne pouvait vivre sans l'auxiliaire des provinces, les citoyens ne payant pas, comme à Rome, de contributions. Le génie politique manquait à Carthage. Son éternel souci du pain l'empêchait d'avoir cette prudence que donnent les ambitions plus hautes. Galère ancrée sur le sable Libyque, elle s'y maintenait à force de travail. Les nations, comme des flots, mugissaient autour d'elle, et la moindre tempête ébranlait cette formidable machine.

Le trésor se trouvait épuisé par la guerre romaine et par tout ce qu'on avait gaspillé, perdu, tandis qu'on marchandait les Barbares. Cependant il fallait des soldats et pas un gouvernement ne se fiait à la République. Ptolémée naguère lui avait refusé deux mille talents. D'ailleurs le rapt du voile les décourageait. Spendius l'avait bien prévu.

Mais ce peuple, qui se sentait haï, étreignait sur son coeur, son argent et ses dieux ; et son patriotisme était entretenu par la constitution même de son gouvernement.

D'abord, le pouvoir dépendait de tous sans qu'aucun fût assez fort pour l'accaparer. Les dettes particulières étaient considérées comme dettes publiques, les hommes de race chananéenne avaient le monopole du commerce ; en multipliant les bénéfices de la piraterie par ceux de l'usure, en exploitant rudement les terres, les esclaves et les pauvres, quelquefois on arrivait à la richesse. Elle ouvrait seule toutes les magistratures, et bien que la puissance et l'argent se perpétuassent dans les mêmes familles, on tolérait l'oligarchie, parce qu'on avait l'espoir d'y atteindre.

Les sociétés de commerçants, où l'on élaborait les lois, choisissaient les inspecteurs des finances, qui, au sortir de leur charge, nommaient les cent membres du Conseil des Anciens, dépendant eux-mêmes de la Grande Assemblée, réunion générale de tous les riches. Quant aux deux suffètes, à ces restes de rois, moindres que des consuls, ils étaient pris le même jour dans deux familles distinctes. On les divisait par toutes sortes de haines, pour qu'ils s'affaiblissent réciproquement. Ils ne pouvaient délibérer sur la guerre ; et, quand ils étaient vaincus, le Grand-Conseil les crucifiait.

Donc la force de Carthage émanait des Syssites, c'est-à-dire d'une grande cour au centre de Malqua, à l'endroit, disait-on, où avait abordé la première barque de matelots phéniciens, la mer depuis lors s'étant beaucoup retirée. C'était un assemblage de petites chambres d'une architecture archaïque en troncs de palmier, avec des encoignures de pierre, et séparées les unes des autres pour recevoir isolément les différentes compagnies. Les Riches se tassaient là tout le jour pour débattre leurs intérêts et ceux du gouvernement, depuis la recherche du poivre jusqu'à l'extermination de Rome. Trois fois par lune ils faisaient monter leurs lits sur la haute terrasse bordant le mur de la cour ; et d'en bas on les apercevait attablés dans les airs, sans cothurnes et sans manteaux, avec les diamants de leurs doigts qui se promenaient sur les viandes et leurs grandes boucles d'oreilles qui se penchaient entre les buires, — tous forts et gras, à moitié nus, heureux, riant et mangeant en plein azur, comme de gros requins qui s'ébattaient dans la mer.

Mais à présent ils ne pouvaient dissimuler leurs inquiétudes, ils étaient trop pâles ; la foule qui les attendait aux portes, les escortait jusqu'à leurs palais pour en tirer quelque nouvelle. Comme par les temps de peste, toutes les maisons étaient fermées ; les rues s'emplissaient, se vidaient soudain ; on montait à l'Acropole : on courait vers le port ; chaque nuit le Grand-Conseil délibérait. Enfin le peuple fut convoqué sur la place de Kamon, et l'on décida de s'en remettre à Hannon, le vainqueur d'Hécatompile.

C'était un homme dévot, rusé, impitoyable aux gens d'Afrique, un vrai Carthaginois. Ses revenus égalaient ceux des Barca. Personne n'avait une telle expérience dans les choses de l'administration.

Il décréta l'enrôlement de tous les citoyens valides, il plaça des catapultes sur les tours, il exigea des provisions d'armes exorbitantes, il ordonna même la construction de quatorze galères dont on n'avait pas besoin ; et il voulut que tout fût enregistré, soigneusement écrit. Il se faisait transporter à l'arsenal, au phare, dans le trésor des temples ; on apercevait toujours sa grande litière qui, en se balançant de gradin en gradin, montait les escaliers de l'Acropole. Dans son palais, la nuit, comme il ne pouvait dormir, pour se préparer à la bataille, il hurlait, d'une voix terrible, des manoeuvres de guerre.

Tout le monde, par excès de terreur, devenait brave. Les Riches, dès le chant des coqs, s'alignaient le long des Mappales ; et, retroussant leurs robes, ils s'exerçaient à manier la pique. Mais, faute d'instructeur, on se disputait. Ils s'asseyaient essoufflés sur les tombes, puis recommençaient. Plusieurs même s'imposèrent un régime. Les uns, s'imaginant qu'il fallait beaucoup manger pour acquérir des forces, se gorgeaient, et d'autres, incommodés par leur corpulence, s'exténuaient de jeûnes pour se faire maigrir.

Utique avait déjà réclamé plusieurs fois les secours de Carthage. Mais Hannon ne voulait point partir tant que le dernier écrou manquait aux machines de guerre. Il perdit encore trois lunes à équiper les cent douze éléphants qui logeaient dans les remparts ; c'étaient les vainqueurs de Régulus ; le peuple les chérissait ; on ne pouvait trop bien agir envers ces vieux amis. Hannon fit refondre les plaques d'airain dont on garnissait leur poitrail, dorer leurs défenses, élargir leurs tours, et tailler dans la pourpre la plus belle des caparaçons bordés de franges très lourdes. Enfin, comme on appelait leurs conducteurs des Indiens (d'après les premiers, sans doute, venus des Indes), il ordonna que tous fussent costumés à la mode indienne, c'est-à-dire avec un bourrelet blanc autour des tempes et un petit caleçon de byssus qui formait, par ses plis transversaux, comme les deux valves d'une coquille appliquée sur les hanches.

L'armée d'Autharite restait toujours devant Tunis. Elle se cachait derrière un mur fait avec la boue du lac et défendu au sommet par des broussailles épineuses. Des Nègres y avaient planté çà et là, sur de grands bâtons, d'effroyables figures, masques humains composés avec des plumes d'oiseaux, têtes de chacal ou de serpents, qui bâillaient vers l'ennemi pour l'épouvanter ; — et, par ce moyen, s'estimant invincibles, les Barbares dansaient, luttaient, jonglaient, convaincus que Carthage ne tarderait pas à périr. Un autre qu'Hannon eût écrasé facilement cette multitude qu'embarrassaient des troupeaux et des femmes. D'ailleurs, ils ne comprenaient aucune manoeuvre, et Autharite découragé n'en exigeait plus rien.

Ils s'écartaient, quand il passait en roulant ses gros yeux bleus. Puis, arrivé au bord du lac, il retirait son sayon en poil de phoque, dénouait la corde qui attachait ses longs cheveux rouges et les trempait dans l'eau. Il regrettait de n'avoir pas déserté chez les Romains avec les deux mille Gaulois du temple d'Eryx.

Souvent, au milieu du jour, le soleil perdait ses rayons tout à coup. Alors, le golfe et la pleine mer semblaient immobiles comme du plomb fondu. Un nuage de poussière brune, perpendiculairement étalé, accourait en tourbillonnant ; les palmiers se courbaient, le ciel disparaissait, on entendait rebondir des pierres sur la croupe des animaux ; et le Gaulois, les lèvres collées contre les trous de sa tente, râlait d'épuisement et de mélancolie. Il songeait à la senteur des pâturages par les matins d'automne, à des flocons de neige, aux beuglements des aurochs perdus dans le brouillard, et, fermant ses paupières, il croyait apercevoir les feux des longues cabanes, couvertes de paille, trembler sur les marais, au fond des bois.

D'autres que lui regrettaient la patrie, bien qu'elle ne fût pas aussi lointaine. En effet, les Carthaginois captifs pouvaient distinguer au-delà du golfe, sur les pentes de Byrsa, les velarium de leurs maisons, étendus dans les cours. Mais des sentinelles marchaient autour d'eux, perpétuellement. On les avait tous attachés à une chaîne commune. Chacun portait un carcan de fer, et la foule ne se fatiguait pas de venir les regarder. Les femmes montraient aux petits enfants leurs belles robes en lambeaux qui pendaient sur leurs membres amaigris.

Toutes les fois qu'Autharite considérait Giscon, une fureur le prenait au souvenir de son injure ; il l'eût tué sans le serment qu'il avait fait à Narr'Havas. Alors il rentrait dans sa tente, buvait un mélange d'orge et de cumin jusqu'à s'évanouir d'ivresse, — puis se réveillait au grand soleil, dévoré par une soif horrible.

Mâtho cependant assiégeait Hippo-Zaryte.

Mais la ville était protégée par un lac communiquant avec la mer. Elle avait trois enceintes, et sur les hauteurs qui la dominaient se développait un mur fortifié de tours. Jamais il n'avait commandé de pareilles entreprises. Puis la pensée de Salammbô l'obsédait, et il rêvait dans les plaisirs de sa beauté, comme les délices d'une vengeance qui le transportait d'orgueil. C'était un besoin de la revoir, âcre, furieux, permanent. Il songea même à s'offrir comme parlementaire, espérant qu'une fois dans Carthage il parviendrait jusqu'à elle. Souvent il faisait sonner l'assaut, et, sans rien attendre, s'élançait sur le môle qu'on tâchait d'établir dans la mer. Il arrachait les pierres avec ses mains, bouleversait, frappait, enfonçait partout son épée. Les Barbares se précipitaient pêle- mêle ; les échelles rompaient avec un grand fracas, et des masses d'hommes s'écroulaient dans l'eau qui rejaillissait en flots rouges contre les murs. Enfin, le tumulte s'affaiblissait, et les soldats s'éloignaient pour recommencer.

Mâtho allait s'asseoir en dehors des tentes ; il essuyait avec son bras sa figure éclaboussée de sang, et, tourné vers Carthage, il regardait l'horizon.

En face de lui, dans les oliviers, les palmiers, les myrtes et les platanes, s'étaient deux larges étangs qui rejoignaient un autre lac dont on n'apercevait pas les contours. Derrière une montagne surgissaient d'autres montagnes, et au milieu du lac immense, se dressait une île toute noire et de forme pyramidale. Sur la gauche, à l'extrémité du golfe, des tas de sable semblaient de grandes vagues blondes arrêtées, tandis que la mer, plate comme un dallage de lapis-lazuli, montait insensiblement jusqu'au bord du ciel. La verdure de la campagne disparaissait par endroits sous de longues plaques jaunes ; des caroubes brillaient comme des boutons de corail ; des pampres retombaient du sommet des sycomores ; on entendait le murmure de l'eau ; des alouettes huppées sautaient, et les derniers feux du soleil doraient la carapace des tortues, sortant des joncs pour aspirer la brise.

Mâtho poussait de grands soupirs. Il se couchait à plat ventre ; il enfonçait ses ongles dans la terre et il pleurait ; il se sentait misérable, chétif, abandonné. Jamais il ne la posséderait, et il ne pouvait même s'emparer d'une ville.

La nuit, seul, dans sa tente, il contemplait le zaïmph. A quoi cette chose des Dieux lui servait-elle ? et des doutes survenaient dans la pensée du Barbare. Puis il lui semblait au contraire que le vêtement de la Déesse dépendait de Salammbô, et qu'une partie de son âme y flottait plus subtile qu'une haleine ; et il le palpait, le humait, s'y plongeait le visage, il le baisait en sanglotant. Il s'en recouvrait les épaules pour se faire illusion et se croire auprès d'elle.

Quelquefois il s'échappait tout à coup ; à la clarté des étoiles, il enjambait les soldats qui dormaient, roulés dans leurs manteaux ; puis, aux portes du camp, il s'élançait sur un cheval, et, deux heures après, il se trouvait à Utique dans la tente de Spendius.

D'abord, il parlait du siège ; mais il n'était venu que pour soulager sa douleur en causant de Salammbô :

Spendius l'exhortait à la sagesse.

— " Repousse de ton âme ces misères qui la dégradent ! Tu obéissais autrefois, à présent tu commandes une armée, et si Carthage n'est pas conquise, du moins on nous accordera des provinces, nous deviendrons des rois ! "

Mais, comment la possession du zäimph ne leur donnait-elle pas la victoire ? D'après Spendius, il fallait attendre.

Mâtho s'imagina que le voile concernait exclusivement les hommes de race chananéenne, et, dans sa subtilité de Barbare, il se disait : — " Donc le zäimph ne fera rien pour moi ; mais, puisqu'ils l'ont perdu, il ne fera rien pour eux. "

Ensuite, un scrupule le troubla, il avait peur, en adorant Aptouknos, le dieu des Libyens, d'offenser Moloch ; et il demanda timidement à Spendius auquel des deux il serait bon de sacrifier un homme.

— " Sacrifie toujours ! " dit Spendius, en riant.

Mâtho, qui ne comprenait point cette indifférence, soupçonna le Grec d'avoir un génie dont il ne voulait pas parler.

Tous les cultes, comme toutes les races, se rencontraient dans ces armées de Barbares, et l'on considérait les dieux des autres, car ils effrayaient aussi. Plusieurs mêlaient à leur religion natale des pratiques étrangères. On avait beau ne pas adorer les étoiles, telle constellation étant funeste ou secourable, on lui faisait des sacrifices ; une amulette inconnue, trouvée par hasard dans un péril, devenait une divinité ; ou bien c'était un nom, rien qu'un nom, et que l'on répétait sans même chercher à comprendre ce qu'il pouvait dire. Mais, à force d'avoir pillé des temples, vu quantité de nations et d'égorgements, beaucoup finissaient par ne plus croire qu'au destin et à la mort ; et chaque soir ils s'endormaient dans la placidité des bêtes féroces. Spendius aurait craché sur les images de Jupiter Olympien ; cependant il redoutait de parler haut dans les ténèbres, et il ne manquait pas, tous les jours, de se chauffer d'abord du pied droit.

Il élevait, en face d'Utique, une longue terrasse quadrangulaire.

Mais, à mesure qu'elle montait, le rempart grandissait aussi ; ce qui était abattu par les uns, presque immédiatement se trouvait relevé par les autres. Spendius ménageait ses hommes, rêvait des plans ; il tâchait de se rappeler les stratagèmes qu'il avait entendu raconter dans ses voyages. Pourquoi Narr'Havas ne revenait-il pas ? On était plein d'inquiétudes.

Hannon avait terminé ses apprêts. Par une nuit sans lune, il fit, sur des radeaux, traverser à ses éléphants et à ses soldats le golfe de Carthage. Puis ils tournèrent la montagne des Eaux-Chaudes pour éviter Autharite, — et continuèrent avec tant de lenteur qu'au lieu de surprendre les Barbares un matin, comme avait calculé le Suffète, on n'arriva qu'en plein soleil, dans la troisième journée.

Utique avait, du côté de l'orient, une plaine qui s'étendait jusqu'à la grande lagune de Carthage ; derrière elle, débouchait à angle droit une vallée comprise entre deux basses montagnes s'interrompant tout à coup ; les Barbares s'étaient campés plus loin sur la gauche, de manière à bloquer le port ; et ils dormaient dans leurs tentes (car ce jour-là les deux partis, trop las pour combattre, se reposaient), lorsque, au tournant des collines, l'armée carthaginoise parut.

Des goujats munis de frondes étaient espacés sur les ailes. Les gardes de la Légion, sous leurs armures en écailles d'or, formaient la première ligne, avec leurs gros chevaux sans crinière, sans poil, sans oreilles et qui avaient au milieu du front une corne d'argent pour les faire ressembler à des rhinocéros. Entre leurs escadrons, des jeunes gens, coiffés d'un petit casque, balançaient dans chaque main un javelot de frêne ; les longues piques de la lourde infanterie s'avançaient par-derrière. Tous ces marchands avaient accumulé sur leurs corps le plus d'armes possible : on en voyait qui portaient à la fois une lance, une hache, une massue, deux glaives ; d'autres, comme des porcs-épics, étaient hérissés de dards, et leurs bras s'écartaient de leurs cuirasses en lames de corne ou en plaques de fer. Enfin apparurent les échafaudages des hautes machines : carrobalistes, onagres, catapultes et scorpions, oscillant sur des chariots tirés par des mulets et des quadriges de boeufs — et à mesure que l'armée se développait, les capitaines, en haletant, couraient de droite et de gauche pour communiquer des ordres, faire joindre les files et maintenir les intervalles. Ceux des Anciens qui commandaient étaient venus avec des casques de pourpre dont les franges magnifiques s'embarrassaient dans les courroies de leurs cothurnes. Leurs visages, tout barbouillés de vermillon, reluisaient sous des casques énormes surmontés de dieux et, comme ils avaient des boucliers à bordure d'ivoire couverte de pierreries, on aurait dit des soleils qui passaient sur des murs d'airain.

Les Carthaginois manoeuvraient si lourdement que les soldats, par dérision, les engagèrent à s'asseoir. Ils criaient qu'ils allaient tout à l'heure vider leurs gros ventres, épousseter la dorure de leur peau et leur faire boire du fer.

Au haut du mât planté devant la tente de Spendius, un lambeau de toile verte apparut ; c'était le signal. L'armée carthaginoise y répondit par un grand tapage de trompettes, de cymbales, de flûtes en os d'âne et de tympanons. Déjà les Barbares avaient sauté en dehors des palissades. On était à portée de javelot, face à face.

Un frondeur baléare s'avança d'un pas, posa dans sa lanière une de ses balles d'argile, tourna son bras : un bouclier d'ivoire éclata, et les deux armées se mêlèrent.

Avec la pointe des lances, les Grecs, en piquant les chevaux aux naseaux, les firent se renverser sur leurs maîtres. Les esclaves qui devaient lancer des pierres les avaient prises trop grosses ; elles retombaient près d'eux. Les fantassins puniques, en frappant de taille avec leurs longues épées, se découvraient le flanc droit. Les Barbares enfoncèrent leurs lignes ; ils les égorgeaient à plein glaive ; ils trébuchaient sur les moribonds et les cadavres, tout aveuglés par le sang qui leur jaillissait au visage. Ce tas de piques, de casques, de cuirasses, d'épées et de membres confondus tournait sur soi-même, s'élargissant et se serrant avec des contractions élastiques. Les cohortes carthaginoises se trouèrent de plus en plus, leurs machines ne pouvaient sortir des sables ; enfin la litière du Suffète (sa grande litière à pendeloques de cristal), que l'on apercevait depuis le commencement, balancée dans les soldats comme une barque sur les flots, tout à coup sombra. Il était mort sans doute ? Les Barbares se trouvèrent seuls.

La poussière autour d'eux tombait et ils commençaient à chanter, lorsque Hannon lui-même parut au haut d'un éléphant. Il était nu-tête, sous un parasol de byssus, que portait un nègre derrière lui. Son collier, à plaques bleues battait sur les fleurs de sa tunique noire ; des cercles de diamants comprimaient ses bras énormes, et, la bouche ouverte, il brandissait une pique démesurée, épanouie par le bout comme un lotus et plus brillante qu'un miroir. Aussitôt la terre s'ébranla, — et les Barbares virent accourir, sur une seule ligne, tous les éléphants de Carthage avec leurs défenses dorées, les oreilles peintes en bleu, revêtus de bronze, et secouant par-dessus leurs caparaçons d'écarlate des tours de cuir, où dans chacune trois archers tenaient un grand arc ouvert.

A peine si les soldats avaient leurs armes ; ils s'étaient rangés au hasard. Une terreur les glaça ; ils restèrent indécis.

Déjà du haut des tours on leur jetait des javalots, des flèches, des phalariques, des masses de plomb ; quelques-uns, pour y monter, se cramponnaient aux franges des caparaçons. Avec des coutelas on leur abattait les mains, et ils tombaient à la renverse sur des glaives tendus. Les piques trop faibles se rompaient, les éléphants passaient dans les phalanges comme des sangliers dans des touffes d'herbes ; ils arrachèrent les pieux du camp avec leurs trompes, le traversèrent d'un bout à l'autre en renversant les tentes sous leurs poitrails ; tous les Barbares avaient fui. Ils se cachaient dans les collines qui bordent la vallée par où les Carthaginois étaient venus.

Hannon vainqueur se présenta devant les portes d'Utique. Il fit sonner de la trompette. Les trois Juges de la ville parurent, au sommet d'une tour, dans la baie des créneaux.

Les gens d'Utique ne voulaient point recevoir chez eux des hôtes aussi bien armés. Hannon s'emporta. Enfin ils consentirent à l'admettre avec une faible escorte.

Les rues se trouvèrent trop étroites pour les éléphants. Il fallut les laisser dehors.

Dès que le Suffète fut dans la ville, les principaux le vinrent saluer. Il se fit conduire aux étuves, et appela ses cuisiniers.

Trois heures après, il était encore enfoncé dans l'huile de cinnamome dont on avait rempli la vasque ; et, tout en se baignant, il mangeait, sur une peau de boeuf étendue, des langues de phénicoptères avec des graines de pavot assaisonnées au miel. Près de lui, son médecin qui, immobile dans une longue robe jaune, faisait de temps à autre réchauffer l'étuve, et deux jeunes garçons penchés sur les marches du bassin, lui frottaient les jambes. Mais les soins de son corps n'arrêtaient pas son amour de la chose publique, et il dictait une lettre pour le Grand-Conseil, et, comme on venait de faire des prisonniers, il se demandait quel châtement terrible inventer.

— " Arrête ! " dit-il à un esclave qui écrivait, debout, dans le creux de sa main. " Qu'on m'en amène ! Je veux les voir. "

Et du fond de la salle emplie d'une vapeur blanchâtre où les torches jetaient des taches rouges, on poussa trois Barbares : un Samnite, un Spartiate et un Cappadocien.

— " Continue ! " dit Hannon.

— " Réjouissez-vous, lumière des Baals ! votre suffète a exterminé les chiens voraces ! Bénédiction sur la République ! Ordonnez des prières ! "

Il aperçut les captifs, et alors éclatant de rire :

— " Ah ! ah ! mes braves de Sicca ! Vous ne criez plus si fort aujourd'hui ! C'est moi ! Me reconnaissez-vous ? Où sont donc vos épées ? Quels hommes terribles, vraiment ! " Et il feignait de se vouloir cacher, comme s'il en avait peur. — " Vous demandiez des chevaux, des femmes, des terres, des magistratures, sans doute, et des sacerdoces ! Pourquoi pas ? Eh bien, je vous en fournirai, des terres, et dont jamais vous ne sortirez ! On vous mariera à des potences toutes neuves ! Votre solde ? on vous la fondra dans la bouche en lingots de plomb ! et je vous mettrai à de bonnes places, très hautes, au milieu des nuages, pour être rapprochés des aigles ! "

Les trois Barbares, chevelus et couverts de guenilles, le regardaient sans comprendre ce qu'il disait. Blessés aux genoux, on les avait saisis en leur jetant des cordes, et les grosses chaînes de leurs mains traînaient par le bout, sur les dalles. Hannon s'indigna de leur impassibilité.

— " A genoux ! à genoux ! chacals ! poussière ! vermine ! excréments ! Et ils ne répondent pas ! Assez ! taisez-vous ! Qu'on les écorche vifs ! Non ! Tout à l'heure ! "

Il soufflait comme un hippopotame, en roulant ses yeux. L'huile parfumée débordait sous la masse de son corps, et, se collant contre les écailles de sa peau, à la lueur des torches, la faisait paraître rose.

Il reprit :

— " Nous avons, pendant quatre jours, grandement souffert du soleil. Au passage du Macar, des mulets se sont perdus. Malgré leur position, le courage extraordinaire... Ah ! Demonades ! comme je souffre ! Qu'on réchauffe les briques, et qu'elles soient rouges ! "

On entendit un bruit de râteaux et de fourneaux. L'encens fuma plus fort dans les larges cassolettes, et les masseurs tout nus, qui suaient comme des éponges, lui écrasèrent sur les articulations une pâte composée avec du froment, du soufre, du vin noir, du lait de chienne, de la myrrhe, du galbanum et du styrax. Une soif incessante le dévorait ; l'homme vêtu de jaune ne céda pas à cette envie, et, lui tendant une coupe d'or où fumait un bouillon de vipère :

— " Bois ! " dit-il, " pour que la force des serpents, nés du soleil, pénètre dans la moelle de tes os, et prends courage, ô reflet des Dieux ! Tu sais d'ailleurs qu'un prêtre d'Eschmoûn observe autour du Chien les étoiles cruelles d'où dérive ta maladie. Elles pâlisent comme les macules de ta peau, et tu n'en dois pas mourir. "

— " Oh ! oui, n'est-ce pas ? " répéta le Suffète, " je n'en dois pas mourir ! " Et de ses lèvres violacées s'échappait une haleine plus nauséabonde que l'exhalaison d'un cadavre. Deux charbons semblaient brûler à la place de ses yeux, qui n'avaient plus de sourcils ; un amas de peau rugueuse lui pendait sur le front ; ses deux oreilles, en s'écartant de sa tête, commençaient à grandir, et les rides profondes qui formaient des demi-cercles autour de ses narines lui donnaient un aspect étrange et effrayant, l'air d'une bête farouche. Sa voix dénaturée ressemblait à un rugissement ; il dit :

— " Tu as peut-être raison, Demonades ? En effet, voilà bien des ulcères qui se sont fermés. Je me sens robuste. Tiens ! regarde comme je mange ! "

Et moins par gourmandise que par ostentation, et pour se prouver à lui-même qu'il se portait bien, il entamait les farces de fromage et d'origan, les poissons désossés, les courges, les huîtres, avec des oeufs, des raiforts, des truffes et des brochettes de petits oiseaux. Tout en regardant les prisonniers, il se délectait dans l'imagination de leur supplice. Cependant il se rappelait Sicca, et la rage de toutes ses douleurs s'exhalait en injures contre ces trois hommes.

— " Ah ! traîtres ! ah ! misérables ! infâmes ! maudits ! Et vous m'outragez, moi ! moi ! le Suffète ! Leurs services, le prix de leur sang, comme ils disent ! Ah ! oui ! leur sang ! leur sang ! " Puis, se parlant à lui-même : — " Tous périront ! on n'en vendra pas un seul ! Il vaudrait mieux les conduire à Carthage ! on me verrait... mais je n'ai pas, sans doute, emporté assez de chaînes ? Ecris : envoyez-moi ... Combien sont-ils ? qu'on aille le demander à Muthumbal ! Va ! pas de pitié ! et qu'on m'apporte dans des corbeilles toutes leurs mains coupées ! "

Mais des cris bizarres, à la fois rauques et aigus, arrivaient dans la salle, par-dessus la voix d'Hannon et le retentissement des plats que l'on posait autour de lui. Ils redoublèrent, et tout à coup le barrissement furieux des éléphants éclata, comme si la bataille recommençait. Un grand tumulte entourait la ville.

Les Carthaginois n'avaient point cherché à poursuivre les Barbares. Ils s'étaient établis au pied des murs, avec leurs bagages, leurs valets, tout leur train de satrapes, et ils se réjouissaient sous leurs belles tentes à bordures de perles, tandis que le camp des Mercenaires ne faisait plus dans la plaine qu'un amas de ruines. Spendius avait repris son courage. Il expédia Zarxas vers Mâtho, parcourut les bois, rallia ses hommes (les pertes n'étaient pas considérables), — et enragés d'avoir été vaincus sans combattre, ils reformaient leurs lignes, quand on découvrit une cuve de pétrole, abandonnée sans doute par les Carthaginois. Alors Spendius fit enlever des porcs dans les métairies, les barbouilla de bitume, y mit le feu et les poussa vers Utique.

Les éléphants, effrayés par ces flammes, s'enfuirent. Le terrain montait, on leur jetait des javelots, ils revinrent en arrière ; — et à grands coups d'ivoire et sous leurs pieds, ils éventraient les Carthaginois, les étouffaient, les aplatisaient. Derrière eux, les Barbares descendaient la colline ; le camp punique, sans retranchements, dès la première charge fut saccagé, et les Carthaginois se trouvèrent écrasés contre les portes, car on ne voulut pas les ouvrir dans la peur des Mercenaires.

Le jour se levait ; on vit, du côté de l'Occident, arriver les fantassins de Mâtho. En même temps des cavaliers parurent ; c'était Narr'Havas avec ses Numides. Sautant par-dessus les ravins et les buissons, ils forçaient les fuyards comme des lévriers qui chassent des lièvres. Ce changement de fortune interrompit le Suffète. Il cria pour qu'on vînt l'aider à sortir de l'éteve.

Les trois captifs étaient toujours devant lui. Alors un nègre (le même qui, dans la bataille, portait son parasol) se pencha vers son oreille.

— " Eh bien ! . . ? ... " répondit le Suffète lentement.

— " Ah ! tue-les ! " ajouta-t-il d'un ton brusque.

L'Ethiopien tira de sa ceinture un long poignard et les trois têtes tombèrent. Une d'elles, en rebondissant parmi les épluchures du festin, alla sauter dans la vasque, et elle y flotta quelque temps, la bouche ouverte et les yeux fixes. Les lueurs du matin entraient par les fentes du mur ; les trois corps, couchés sur leur poitrine, ruisselaient à gros bouillons comme trois fontaines, et une nappe de sang coulait sur les mosaïques, sablées de poudre bleue. Le Suffète trempa sa main dans cette fange toute chaude, et il s'en frotta les genoux : c'était un remède.

Le soir venu, il s'échappa de la ville avec son escorte, puis s'engagea dans la montagne, pour rejoindre son armée.

Il parvint à en retrouver les débris.

Quatre jours après, il était à Gorza, sur le haut d'un défilé, quand les troupes de Spendius se présentèrent en bas. Vingt bonnes lances, en attaquant le front de leur colonne, les eussent facilement arrêtées ; les Carthaginois les regardèrent passer tout stupéfaits. Hannon reconnut à l'arrière-garde le roi des Numides ; Narr'Havas s'inclina pour le saluer, en faisant un signe qu'il ne comprit pas.

On s'en revint à Carthage avec toutes sortes de terreurs. On marchait la nuit seulement ; le jour on se cachait dans les bois d'oliviers. A chaque étape quelques-uns mouraient ; ils se crurent perdus plusieurs fois. Enfin ils atteignirent le cap Hermaeum, où des vaisseaux vinrent les prendre.

Hannon était si fatigué, si désespéré, — la perte des éléphants surtout l'accablait, — qu'il demanda, pour en finir, du poison à Demonades. D'ailleurs, il se sentait déjà tout étendu sur sa croix.

Carthage n'eut pas la force de s'indigner contre lui. On avait perdu quatre cent mille neuf cent soixante-douze sicles d'argent, quinze mille six cent vingt-trois shekels d'or, dix-huit éléphants, quatorze membres du Grand- Conseil, trois cents Riches, huit mille citoyens, du blé pour trois lunes, un bagage considérable et toutes les machines de guerre ! La défection de Narr'Havas était certaine, les deux sièges recommençaient. L'armée d'Autharite s'étendait maintenant de Tunis à Rhadès. Du haut de l'Acropole, on apercevait dans la campagne de longues fumées montant jusqu'au ciel ; c'étaient les châteaux des Riches qui brûlaient.

Un homme, seul, aurait pu sauver la République. On se repentit de l'avoir méconnu, et le parti de la paix, lui-même, vota les holocaustes pour le retour d'Hamilcar.

La vue du zaïmph avait bouleversé Salammbô. Elle croyait la nuit entendre les pas de la Déesse, et elle se réveillait épouvantée en jetant des cris. Elle envoyait tous les jours porter de la nourriture dans les temples. Taanach se fatiguait à exécuter ses ordres, et Schahabarim ne la quittait plus.

Chapitre 7 HAMILCAR BARCA

L'Annonciateur-des-Lunes qui veillait toutes les nuits au haut du temple d'Eschmoûn, pour signaler avec sa trompette les agitations de l'astre, aperçut un matin, du côté de l'Occident, quelque chose de semblable à un oiseau frôlant de ses longues ailes la surface de la mer.

C'était un navire à trois rangs de rames ; il y avait à la proue un cheval sculpté. Le soleil se levait ; l'Annonciateur-des-Lunes mit sa main devant les yeux ; puis saisissant à plein bras son clairon, il poussa sur Carthage un grand cri d'airain.

De toutes les maisons des gens sortirent ; on ne voulait pas en croire les paroles, on se disputait, le môle était couvert de peuple. Enfin on reconnut la trirème d'Hamilcar.

Elle s'avavançait d'une façon orgueilleuse et farouche, l'antenne toute droite, la voile bombée dans la longueur du mât, en fendant l'écume autour d'elle ; ses gigantesques avirons battaient l'eau en cadence ; de temps à autre l'extrémité de sa quille, faite comme un soc de charrue, apparaissait, et sous l'éperon qui terminait sa proue, le cheval à tête d'ivoire, en dressant ses deux pieds, semblait courir sur les plaines de la mer.

Autour du promontoire, comme le vent avait cessé, la voile tomba, et l'on aperçut auprès du pilote un homme debout, tête nue ; c'était lui, le suffète Hamilcar ! Il portait autour des flancs des lames de fer qui reluisaient ; un manteau rouge s'attachant à ses épaules laissait voir ses bras ; deux perles très longues pendaient à ses oreilles, et il baissait sur sa poitrine sa barbe noire, touffue.

Cependant la galère ballottée au milieu des rochers côtoyait le môle, et la foule la suivait sur les dalles en criant :

— " Salut ! bénédiction ! Oeil de Khamon ! ah ! délivre-nous ! C'est la faute des Riches ! ils veulent te faire mourir ! Prends garde à toi, Barca ! "

Il ne répondait pas, comme si la clameur des océans et des batailles l'eût complètement assourdi. Mais quand il fut sous l'escalier qui descendait de l'Acropole, Hamilcar releva la tête et, les bras croisés, il regarda le temple d'Eschmoûn. Sa vue monta plus haut encore, dans le grand ciel pur ; d'une voix âpre, il cria un ordre à ses matelots ; la trirème bondit ; elle érafla l'idole établie à l'angle du môle pour arrêter les tempêtes ; et dans le port marchand plein d'immondices, d'éclats de bois et d'écorces de fruits, elle refoulait, éventrait les autres navires amarrés à des pieux et finissant par des mâchoires de crocodile. Le peuple accourait, quelques-uns se jetèrent à la nage.

Déjà elle se trouvait au fond, devant la porte hérissée de clous. La porte se leva, et la trirème disparut sous la voûte profonde.

Le Port-Militaire était complètement séparé de la ville ; quand des ambassadeurs arrivaient, il leur fallait passer entre deux murailles, dans un couloir qui débouchait à gauche, devant le temple de Khamoûn. Cette grande place d'eau, ronde comme une coupe, avait une bordure de quais où étaient bâties des loges abritant les navires. En avant de chacune d'elles montaient deux colonnes, portant à leur chapiteau des cornes d'Ammon, ce qui formait une continuité des portiques tout autour du bassin. Au milieu, dans une île, s'élevait une maison pour le Suffète-de-la-mer.

L'eau était si limpide que l'on apercevait le fond pavé de cailloux blancs. Le bruit des rues n'arrivait pas jusque-là, et Hamilcar, en passant, reconnaissait les trirèmes qu'il avait autrefois commandées.

Il n'en restait plus qu'une vingtaine peut-être, à l'abri, par terre, penchées sur le flanc ou droites sur la quille, avec des poupes très hautes et des proues bombées, couvertes de dorures et de symboles mystiques. Les chimères avaient perdu leurs ailes, les Dieux-Patèques leurs bras, les taureaux leurs cornes d'argent ; — et toutes à moitié dépeintes, inertes, pourries, mais pleines d'histoires et exhalant encore la senteur des voyages, comme des soldats mutilés qui revoient leur maître, elles semblaient lui dire : — " C'est nous ! c'est nous ! et toi aussi tu es vaincu ! "

Nul, hormis le Suffète-de-la-mer, ne pouvait entrer dans la maison-amiral. Tant qu'on n'avait pas la preuve de sa mort, on le considérait comme existant toujours. Les Anciens évitaient par là un maître de plus, et ils n'avaient pas manqué pour Hamilcar d'obéir à la coutume.

Le Suffète s'avança dans les appartements déserts. A chaque pas il retrouvait des armures, des meubles, des objets connus qui l'étonnaient cependant, et même sous le vestibule il y avait encore, dans une cassolette, la cendre des parfums allumés au départ pour conjurer Melkarth. Ce n'était pas ainsi qu'il espérait revenir. ! Tout ce qu'il avait fait, tout ce qu'il avait vu se déroula dans sa mémoire : les assauts, les incendies, les légions, les tempêtes Drépanum, Syracuse, Lilybée, le mont Etna, le plateau d'Eryx, cinq ans de batailles, — jusqu'au jour funeste où, déposant les armes, avait il perdu la Sicile. Puis il revoyait des bois de citronniers, des pasteurs avec des chèvres sur des montagnes grises ; et son coeur bondissait à l'imagination d'une autre Carthage établie là-bas. Ses projets, ses souvenirs bourdonnaient dans sa tête, encore étourdie par le tangage du vaisseau ; une angoisse l'accablait, et devenu faible, tout à coup, il sentit le besoin de se rapprocher des Dieux.

Alors il monta au dernier étage de sa maison ; puis ayant retiré d'une coquille d'or suspendue à son bras une spatule garnie de clous, il ouvrit une petite chambre ovale.

De minces rondelles noires, encastrées dans la muraille et transparentes comme du verre, l'éclairaient doucement. Entre les rangs de ces disques égaux, des trous étaient creusés, pareils à ceux des urnes dans les columbarium. Ils contenaient chacun une pierre ronde, obscure, et qui paraissait très lourde. Les gens d'un esprit supérieur, seuls, honoraient ces abaddirs tombés de la lune. Par leur chute, ils signifiaient les astres, le ciel, le feu ; par leur couleur, la nuit ténébreuse, et par leur densité, la cohésion des choses terrestres. Une atmosphère étouffante emplissait ce lieu mystique. Du sable marin, que le vent avait poussé sans doute à travers la porte, blanchissait un peu les pierres rondes posées dans les niches. Hamilcar, du bout de son doigt, les compta les unes après les autres ; puis il se cacha le visage sous un voile de couleur safran, et, tombant à genoux, il s'étendit par terre, les deux bras allongés.

Le jour extérieur frappait contre les feuilles de laitier noir. Des arborescences, des monticules, des tourbillons, de vagues animaux se dessinaient dans leur épaisseur diaphane ; et la lumière arrivait, effrayante et pacifique cependant, comme elle doit être par-derrière le soleil, dans les mornes espaces des créations futures. Il s'efforçait à bannir de sa pensée toutes les formes, tous les symboles et les appellations des Dieux, afin de mieux saisir l'esprit immuable que les apparences dérobaient. Quelque chose des vitalités planétaires le pénétrait, tandis qu'il sentait pour la mort et pour tous les hasards un dédain plus savant et plus intime. Quand il se releva, il était plein d'une intrépidité sereine, invulnérable à la miséricorde, à la crainte, et comme sa poitrine étouffait, il alla sur le sommet de la tour qui dominait Carthage.

La ville descendait en se creusant par une courbe longue, avec ses coupoles, ses temples, ses toits d'or, ses maisons, ses touffes de palmiers, çà et là, ses boules de verre d'où jaillissaient des feux, et les remparts faisaient comme la gigantesque bordure de cette corne d'abondance qui s'épanchait vers lui. Il apercevait en bas les ports, les places, l'intérieur des cours, le dessin des rues, les hommes tout petits presque à ras des dalles. Ah ! Si Hannon n'était pas arrivé trop tard le matin des îles Aegates ? Ses yeux plongèrent dans l'extrême horizon, et il tendit du côté de Rome ses deux bras frémissants.

La multitude occupait les degrés de l'Acropole. Sur la place de Khamon on se poussait pour voir le Suffète sortir, les terrasses peu à peu se chargeaient de monde ; quelques-uns le reconnurent, on le saluait, il se retira, afin d'irriter mieux l'impatience du peuple.

Hamilcar trouva en bas, dans la salle, les hommes les plus importants de son parti : Istatten, Subeldia, Hictamon, Yeoubas et d'autres. Ils lui racontèrent tout ce qui s'était passé depuis la conclusion de la paix : l'avarice des Anciens, le départ des soldats, leur retour, leurs exigences, la capture de Giscon, le vol du zaïmph, Utique secourue, puis abandonnée ; mais aucun n'osa lui dire les événements qui le concernaient. Enfin on se sépara, pour se revoir pendant la nuit à l'assemblée des Anciens, dans le temple de Moloch.

Ils venaient de sortir quand un tumulte s'éleva en dehors, à la porte. Malgré les serviteurs, quelqu'un voulait entrer ; et comme le tapage redoublait, Hamilcar commanda d'introduire l'inconnu.

On vit paraître une vieille négresse, cassée, ridée, tremblante, l'air stupide, et enveloppée jusqu'aux talons dans de larges voiles bleus. Elle s'avança en face du Suffète, ils se regardèrent l'un l'autre quelque temps ; tout à coup Hamilcar tressaillit ; sur un geste de sa main, les esclaves s'en allèrent. Alors, lui faisant signe de marcher avec précaution, il l'entraîna par le bras dans une chambre lointaine.

La négresse se jeta par terre, à ses pieds pour les baiser ; il la releva brutalement.

— " Où l'as-tu laissé, Iddibal ? "

— " Là-bas, Maître " ; et en se débarrassant de ses voiles, avec sa manche elle se frotta la figure ; la couleur noire, le tremblement sénile, la taille courbée, tout disparut. C'était un robuste vieillard, dont la peau semblait tannée par le sable, le vent et la mer. Une houppe de cheveux blancs se levait sur son crâne, comme l'aigrette d'un oiseau ; et, d'un coup d'oeil ironique, il montrait par terre le déguisement tombé.

— " Tu as bien fait, Iddibal ! C'est bien ! - " Puis, comme le perçant de son regard aigu : " Aucun encore ne se doute ? "

Le vieillard lui jura par les Kabyres que le mystère était gardé. Ils ne quittaient pas leur cabane à trois jours d'Hadrumète, rivage peuplé de tortues avec des palmiers sur la dune. — " Et selon ton ordre, ô Maître ! je lui apprends à lancer des javelots et à conduire des attelages ! "

— " Il est fort, n'est-ce pas ? "

— " Oui, Maître, et intrépide aussi ! Il n'a peur ni des serpents, ni du tonnerre, ni des fantômes. Il court pieds nus, comme un pâtre, sur le bord des précipices. "

— " Parle ! Parle ! "

— " Il invente des pièges pour les bêtes farouches. L'autre lune, croirais-tu, il a surpris un aigle ; il le traînait, et le sang de l'oiseau et le sang de l'enfant s'éparpillaient dans l'air en larges gouttes, telles que des roses emportées. La bête, furieuse, l'enveloppait du battement de ses ailes ; il l'étreignait contre sa poitrine, et à mesure qu'elle agonisait ses rires redoublaient, éclatants et superbes comme des chocs d'épées. "

Hamilcar baissait la tête, ébloui par ces présages de grandeur.

— " Mais, depuis quelque temps, une inquiétude l'agite. Il regarde au loin les voiles qui passent sur la mer ; il est triste, il repousse le pain, il s'informe des Dieux et il veut connaître Carthage ! "

— " Non ! non ! pas encore ! " s'écria le Suffète.

Le vieil esclave parut savoir le péril qui effrayait Hamilcar, et il reprit :

— " Comment le retenir ? Il me faut déjà lui faire des promesses, et je ne suis venu à Carthage que pour lui acheter un poignard à manche d'argent avec des perles tout autour. " Puis il conta qu'ayant aperçu le Suffète sur la terrasse, il s'était donné aux gardiens du port pour une des femmes de Salammbô, afin de pénétrer jusqu'à lui.

Hamilcar resta longtemps comme perdu dans ses délibérations ; enfin il dit :

— " Demain tu te présenteras à Mégara, au coucher du soleil, derrière les fabriques de pourpre, en imitant par trois fois le cri d'un chacal. Si tu ne me vois pas, le premier jour de chaque lune tu reviendras à Carthage. N'oublie rien ! Aime-le ! Maintenant, tu peux lui parler d'Hamilcar. "

L'esclave reprit son costume, et ils sortirent ensemble de la maison et du port.

Hamilcar continua seul à pied, sans escorte, car les réunions des Anciens étaient, dans les circonstances extraordinaires, toujours secrètes, et l'on s'y rendait mystérieusement.

D'abord il longea la face orientale de l'Acropole, passa ensuite par le Marché-aux-herbes, les galeries de Kinsido, le Faubourg-des-parfumeurs. Les rares lumières s'éteignaient, les rues plus larges se faisaient silencieuses, puis des ombres glissèrent dans les ténèbres. Elles le suivaient, d'autres survinrent, et toutes se dirigeaient comme lui du côté des Mappales.

Le temple de Moloch était bâti au pied d'une gorge escarpée, dans un endroit sinistre. On n'apercevait d'en bas que de hautes murailles montant indéfiniment, telles que les parois d'un monstrueux tombeau. La nuit était sombre, un brouillard grisâtre semblait peser sur la mer. Elle battait contre la falaise avec un bruit de râles et de sanglots ; et des ombres peu à peu s'évanouissaient comme si elles eussent passé à travers les murs.

Mais, sitôt qu'on avait franchi la porte, on se trouvait dans une vaste cour quadrangulaire, que bordaient des arcades. Au milieu, se levait une masse d'architecture à huit pans égaux. Des coupoles la surmontaient en se tassant autour d'un second étage qui supportait une manière de rotonde, d'où s'élançait un cône à courbe rentrante, terminé par une boule au sommet.

Des feux brûlaient dans des cylindres en filigrane emmanchés à des perches que portaient des hommes. Ces lueurs vacillaient sous les bourrasques du vent et rougissaient les peignes d'or fixant à la nuque leurs cheveux tressés. Ils couraient, s'appelaient pour recevoir les Anciens.

Sur les dalles, de place en place, étaient accroupis comme des sphinx des lions énormes, symboles vivants du Soleil dévorateur. Ils sommeillaient, les paupières entre-closes. Mais réveillés par les pas et par les voix, ils se levaient lentement, venaient vers les Anciens, qu'ils reconnaissaient à leur costume, se frottaient contre leurs cuisses en bombant le dos avec des bâillements sonores ; la vapeur de leur haleine passait sur la lumière des torches. L'agitation redoubla, des portes se fermèrent, tous les prêtres s'enfuirent, et les Anciens disparurent sous les colonnes qui faisaient autour du temple un vestibule profond.

Elles étaient disposées de façon à reproduire par leurs rangs circulaires, compris les uns dans les autres, la période saturnienne contenant les années, les années les mois, les mois les jours, et se touchaient à la fin contre la muraille du sanctuaire.

C'était là que les Anciens déposaient leurs bâtons en corne de narval, — car une loi toujours observée punissait de mort celui qui entrait à la séance avec une arme quelconque. Plusieurs portaient au bas de leur vêtement une déchirure arrêtée par un galon de pourpre, pour bien montrer qu'en pleurant la mort de leurs proches ils n'avaient point ménagé leurs habits, et ce témoignage d'affliction empêchait la fente de s'agrandir. D'autres gardaient leur barbe enfermée dans un petit sac de peau violette, que deux cordons attachaient aux oreilles. Tous s'abordèrent en s'embrassant poitrine contre poitrine. Ils entouraient Hamilcar, ils le félicitaient ; on aurait dit des frères qui revoient leur frère.

Ces hommes étaient généralement trapus, avec des nez recourbés comme ceux des colosses assyriens. Quelques-uns cependant, par leurs pommettes plus saillantes, leur taille plus haute et leurs pieds plus étroits, trahissaient une origine africaine, des ancêtres nomades. Ceux qui vivaient continuellement au fond de leurs comptoirs avaient le visage pâle ; d'autres gardaient sur eux comme la sévérité du désert, et d'étranges bijoux scintillaient à tous les doigts de leurs mains, hâlés par les soleils inconnus. On distinguait des navigateurs au balancement de leur démarche, tandis que les hommes d'agriculture sentaient le pressoir, les herbes sèches et la sueur de mulet. Ces vieux pirates faisaient labourer des campagnes, ces ramasseurs d'argent équipaient des navires, ces propriétaires de culture nourrissaient des esclaves exerçant des métiers. Tous étaient savants dans les disciplines religieuses, experts en stratagèmes, impitoyables et riches. Ils avaient l'air fatigués par de longs soucis. Leurs yeux pleins de flammes regardaient avec défiance, et l'habitude des voyages et du mensonge, du trafic et du commandement, donnait à toute leur personne un aspect de ruse et de violence, une sorte de brutalité discrète et convulsive. D'ailleurs, l'influence du Dieu les assombrissait.

Ils passèrent d'abord par une salle voûtée, qui avait la forme d'un oeuf. Sept portes, correspondant aux sept planètes, étalaient contre sa muraille sept carrés de couleur différente. Après une longue chambre, ils entrèrent dans une autre salle pareille.

Un candélabre tout couvert de fleurs ciselées brûlait au fond, et chacune de ses huit branches en or portait dans un calice de diamants une mèche de byssus. Il était posé sur la dernière des longues marches qui allaient vers un grand autel, terminé aux angles par des cornes d'airain. Deux escaliers latéraux conduisaient à son sommet aplati ; on n'en voyait pas les pierres ; c'était comme une montagne de cendres accumulées, et quelque chose d'indistinct fumait dessus, lentement. Puis au-delà, plus haut que le candélabre, et bien plus haut que l'autel, se dressait le Moloch, tout en fer, avec sa poitrine d'homme où bâillaient des ouvertures. Ses ailes ouvertes s'étendaient sur le mur, ses mains allongées descendaient jusqu'à terre ; trois pierres noires, que bordait un cercle jaune, figuraient trois prunelles à son front, et, comme pour beugler, il levait dans un effort terrible sa tête de taureau.

Autour de l'appartement étaient rangés des escabeaux d'ébène. Derrière chacun d'eux, une tige en bronze posant sur trois griffes supportait un flambeau. Toutes ces lumières se reflétaient dans les losanges de nacre qui pavaient la salle. Elle était si haute que la couleur rouge des murailles, en montant vers la voûte, se faisait noire, et les trois yeux de l'idole apparaissaient tout en haut, comme des étoiles à demi perdues dans la nuit.

Les Anciens s'assirent sur les escabeaux d'ébène, ayant mis par-dessus leur tête la queue de leur robe. Ils restaient immobiles, les mains croisées dans leurs larges manches, et le dallage de nacre semblait un fleuve lumineux qui, ruisselant de l'autel vers la porte, coulait sous leurs pieds nus.

Les quatre pontifes se tenaient au milieu, dos à dos, sur quatre sièges d'ivoire formant la croix, le grand-prêtre d'Eschmoûn en robe d'hyacinthe, le grand-prêtre de Tanit en robe de lin blanc, le grand-prêtre de Khamon en robe de laine fauve, et le grand-prêtre de Moloch en robe de pourpre.

Hamilcar s'avança vers le candélabre. Il tourna tout autour, en considérant les mèches qui brûlaient, puis jeta sur elles une poudre parfumée ; des flammes violettes parurent à l'extrémité des branches.

Alors une voix aiguë s'éleva, une autre y répondit ; et les cent Anciens, les quatre pontifes, et Hamilcar debout, tous à la fois, entonnèrent un hymne, et répétant toujours les mêmes syllabes et renforçant les sons, leurs voix montaient, éclatèrent, devinrent terribles, puis, d'un seul coup, se turent.

On attendit quelque temps. Enfin Hamilcar tira de sa poitrine une petite statuette à trois têtes, bleue comme du saphir, et il la posa devant lui. C'était l'image de la vérité, le génie même de sa parole. Puis il la replaça dans son sein, et tous, comme saisis d'une colère soudaine, crièrent :

— " Ce sont tes bons amis les Barbares ! Traître ! infâme ! Tu reviens pour nous voir périr, n'est-ce pas ? Laissez-le parler ! - " — " Non ! non ! "

Ils se vengeaient de la contrainte où le cérémonial politique les avait tout à l'heure obligés ; : et bien qu'ils eussent souhaité le retour d'Hamilcar, ils s'indignaient maintenant de ce qu'il n'avait point prévenu leurs désastres ou plutôt ne les avait pas subis comme eux.

Quand le tumulte fut calmé, le pontife de Moloch se leva.

— " Nous te demandons pourquoi tu n'es pas revenu à Carthage ? "

— " Que vous importe ! " répondit dédaigneusement le Suffète.

Leurs cris redoublèrent.

— " De quoi m'accusez-vous ! J'ai mal conduit la guerre, peut-être ? Vous avez vu l'ordonnance de mes batailles, vous autres qui laissez commodément à des Barbares... "

— " Assez, assez ! "

Il reprit, d'une voix basse, pour se faire mieux écouter :

— " Oh ! cela est vrai ! Je me trouve, lumières des Baals ; il en est parmi vous d'intrépides ! Giscon, lève-toi ! "

" Et parcourant la marche de l'autel, les paupières à demi fermées, comme pour chercher quelqu'un, il répéta : " Lève-toi, Giscon ! tu peux m'accuser, ils te défendront ! Mais où est-il ? " Puis, comme se ravisant : " Ah ! dans sa maison, sans doute ? entouré de ses fils, commandant à ses esclaves, heureux, et comptant sur le mur les colliers d'honneur que la patrie lui a donnés ? "

Ils s'agitaient avec des haussements d'épaules, comme flagellés par les lanières. — " Vous ne savez même pas s'il est vivant ou s'il est mort ! " Et sans se soucier de leurs clameurs, il disait qu'en abandonnant le Suffète, c'était la République qu'on avait abandonnée. De même la paix romaine, si avantageuse qu'elle leur parût, était plus funeste que vingt batailles. Quelques-uns applaudirent, les moins riches du Conseil, suspects d'incliner toujours vers le peuple ou vers la tyrannie. Leurs adversaires, chefs des Syssites et administrateurs, en triomphaient par le nombre ; les plus considérables s'étaient rangés près d'Hannon, qui siégeait à l'autre bout de la salle, devant la haute porte, fermée par une tapisserie d'hyacinthe.

Il avait peint avec du fard les ulcères de sa figure. Mais la poudre d'or de ses cheveux lui était tombée sur les épaules, où elle faisait deux plaques brillantes, et ils paraissaient blanchâtres, fins et crépus comme de la laine. Des linges imbibés d'un parfum gras qui dégouttelaient sur les dalles, enveloppaient ses mains, et sa maladie sans doute avait considérablement augmenté, car ses yeux disparaissaient sous les plis de ses paupières. Pour voir, il lui fallait se renverser la tête. Ses partisans l'engageaient à parler. Enfin, d'une voix rauque et hideuse :

— " Moins d'arrogance, Barca ! Nous avons tous été vaincus ! Chacun supporte son malheur ! résigne-toi ! "

— " Apprends-nous plutôt ", dit en souriant Hamilcar, " comment tu as conduit tes galères dans la flotte romaine ? "

— " J'étais chassé par le vent ", répondit Hannon.

— " Tu fais comme le rhinocéros qui piétine dans sa fiente : tu étales ta sottise ! tais-toi ! " Et ils commencèrent à s'incriminer sur la bataille des Iles Aegates.

Hannon l'accusait de n'être pas venu à sa rencontre.

— " Mais c'eût été dégarnir Eryx. Il fallait prendre le large ; qui t'empêchait ? Ah ! j'oubliais ! tous les éléphants ont peur de la mer ! "

Les gens d'Hamilcar trouvèrent la plaisanterie si bonne qu'ils poussèrent de grands rires. La voûte en retentissait, comme si l'on eût frappé des tympanons.

Hannon dénonça l'indignité d'un tel outrage ; cette maladie lui étant survenue par un refroidissement au siège d'Hécatompyle, et des pleurs coulaient sur sa face comme une pluie d'hiver sur une muraille en ruine.

Hamilcar reprit :

— " Si vous m'aviez aimé autant que celui-là, il y aurait maintenant une grande joie dans Carthage ! Combien de fois n'ai-je pas crié vers vous ! et toujours vous me refusiez de l'argent ! "

— " Nous en avons besoin ", dirent les chefs des Syssites.

— " Et quand mes affaires étaient désespérées, nous avons bu l'urine des mulets et mangé les courroies de nos sandales, — quand j'aurais voulu que les brins d'herbe fussent des soldats, et faire des bataillons avec la pourriture de nos morts, vous rappeliez chez vous ce qui me restait de vaisseaux ! "

— " Nous ne pouvions pas tout risquer ", répondit Baat-Baal, possesseur de mines d'or dans la Gétulie-Darytienne.

— " Que faisiez-vous cependant, ici, à Carthage, dans vos maisons, derrière vos murs ? Il y a des Gaulois sur l'Eridan qu'il fallait pousser, des Chananéens à Cyrène qui seraient venus, et tandis que les Romains envoient à Ptolémée des ambassadeurs... "

— " Il nous vante les Romains, à présent ! " Quelqu'un lui cria : " Combien t'ont-ils payé pour les défendre ? "

— " Demande-le aux plaines du Brutium, aux ruines de Locres, de Métaponte et d'Héraclée ! J'ai brûlé tous leurs arbres, j'ai pillé tous leurs temples, et jusqu'à la mort des petits-fils de leurs petits-fils... "

— " Eh ! tu déclames comme un rhéteur ! " fit Kapouras, un marchand très illustre. " Que veux-tu donc ? "

— " Je dis qu'il faut être plus ingénieux ou plus terrible ! Si l'Afrique entière rejette votre joug, c'est que vous ne savez pas, maîtres débiles, l'attacher à ses épaules ! Agathoclès, Régulus, Coepio, tous les hommes hardis n'ont qu'à débarquer pour la prendre ; et quand les Libyens qui sont à l'Orient s'entendront avec les Numides qui sont à l'Occident, et que les Nomades viendront du sud et les Romains du nord ... "

Un cri d'horreur s'éleva. " Oh ! vous frapperez vos poitrines, vous vous roulez dans la poussière et vous déchirez vos manteaux ! N'importe ! il faudra s'en aller tourner la meule dans Suburre et faire la vendange sur les collines du Latium. "

Ils se battaient la cuisse droite pour marquer leur scandale, et les manches de leur robe se levaient comme de grandes ailes d'oiseaux effarouchés. Hamilcar, emporté par un esprit, continuait, debout sur la plus haute marche de l'autel, frémissant, terrible ; il levait les bras, et les rayons du candélabre qui brûlait derrière lui passaient entre ses doigts comme des javelots d'or.

— " Vous perdrez vos navires, vos campagnes, vos chariots, vos lits suspendus, et vos esclaves qui vous frottent les pieds ! Les chacals se coucheront dans vos palais, la charrue retournera vos tombeaux. Il n'y aura plus que le cri des aigles et l'amoncellement des ruines. Tu tomberas, Carthage ! "

Les quatre pontifes étendirent leurs mains pour écarter l'anathème. Tous s'étaient levés. Mais le Suffète-de-la-mer, magistrat sacerdotal sous la protection du Soleil, était inviolable tant que l'assemblée des Riches ne l'avait pas jugé. Une épouvante s'attachait à l'autel. Ils reculèrent.

Hamilcar ne parlait plus. L'oeil fixe et la face aussi pâle que les perles de sa tiare, il haletait, presque effrayé par lui-même et l'esprit perdu dans des visions funèbres. De la hauteur où il était, tous les flambeaux sur les tiges de bronze lui semblaient une vaste couronne de feux, posée à ras des dalles ; des fumées noires, s'en échappant, montaient dans les ténèbres de la voûte ; et le silence pendant quelques minutes fut tellement profond qu'on entendait au loin le bruit de la mer.

Puis les Anciens se mirent à s'interroger. Leurs intérêts, leur existence se trouvait attaquée par les Barbares. Mais on ne pouvait les vaincre sans le secours du Suffète et cette considération, malgré leur orgueil, leur fit oublier toutes les autres. On prit à part ses amis.

Il y eut des réconciliations intéressées, des sous-entendus et des promesses. Hamilcar ne voulait plus se mêler d'aucun gouvernement. Tous le conjurèrent. Ils le suppliaient : et comme le mot de trahison revenait dans leurs discours, il s'emporta. Le seul traître, c'était le Grand- Conseil, car l'engagement des soldats expirant avec la guerre, ils devenaient libres dès que la guerre était finie ; : il exalta même leur bravoure et tous les avantages qu'on en pourrait tirer en les intéressant à la République par des donations, des privilèges.

Alors Magdassan un ancien Gouverneur de provinces, dit en roulant ses yeux jaunes :

— " Vraiment, Barca, à force de voyager, tu es devenu un Grec ou un Latin, je ne sais quoi ! Que parles-tu de récompenses pour ces hommes ? Périront dix mille Barbares plutôt qu'un seul d'entre nous ! "

Les Anciens approuvaient de la tête en murmurant :

— " Oui, faut-il tant se gêner ? On en trouve toujours ! "

— " Et l'on s'en débarrasse commodément, n'est-ce pas ? On les abandonne, ainsi que vous avez fait en Sardaigne. On avertit l'ennemi du chemin qu'ils doivent prendre, comme pour ces Gaulois dans la Sicile, ou bien on les débarque au milieu de la mer. En revenant, j'ai vu le rocher tout blanc de leurs os ! "

— " Quel malheur ! " fit impudemment Kapouras.

— " Est-ce qu'ils n'ont pas cent fois tourné à l'ennemi ! " exclamaient les autres.

Hamilcar s'écria :

— " Pourquoi donc, malgré vos lois, les avez-vous rappelés à Carthage ? Et quand ils sont dans votre ville, pauvres et nombreux au milieu de toutes vos richesses, l'idée ne vous vient pas de les affaiblir par la moindre division ! Ensuite vous les congédiez avec leurs femmes et avec leurs enfants, tous, sans garder un seul otage ! Comptiez-vous qu'ils s'assassineraient pour vous épargner la douleur de tenir vos serments ? Vous les haïssez, parce qu'ils sont forts ! Vous me haïssez encore plus, moi, leur maître ! Oh ! je l'ai senti, tout à l'heure, quand vous me baisiez les mains, et que vous vous reteniez tous pour ne pas les mordre ! "

Si les lions qui dormaient dans la cour fussent entrés en hurlant, la clameur n'eût pas été plus épouvantable. Mais le pontife d'Eschmoûn se leva, et, les deux genoux l'un contre l'autre, les coudes au corps, tout droit et les mains à demi ouvertes, il dit :

— " Barca, Carthage a besoin que tu prennes contre les Mercenaires le commandement général des forces puniques ! " — " Je refuse ", répondit Hamilcar.

— " Nous te donnerons pleine autorité ! - " crièrent les chefs des Syssites.

— " Non ! "

— " Sans aucun contrôle, sans partage, tout l'argent que tu voudras, tous les captifs, tout le butin, cinquante zerets de terre par cadavre d'ennemi. "

— " Non ! non ! parce qu'il est impossible de vaincre avec vous ! "

— " Il en a peur. "

— " Parce que vous êtes lâches, avares, ingrats, pusillanimes et fous ! "

— Il les ménage !

— " Pour se mettre à leur tête ", dit quelqu'un.

— " Et revenir sur nous ", dit un autre ; et du fond de la salle,

Hannon hurla :

— " Il veut se faire roi ! "

Alors ils bondirent, en renversant les sièges et les flambeaux : leur foule s'élança vers l'autel ; ils brandissaient des poignards. Mais, fouillant sous ses manches, Hamilcar tira deux larges coutelas ; et à demi courbé, le pied gauche en avant, les yeux flamboyants, les dents serrées, il les défiait, immobile sous le candélabre d'or.

Ainsi, par précaution, ils avaient apporté des armes ; c'était un crime ; ils se regardèrent les uns les autres, effrayés. Comme tous étaient coupables, chacun bien vite se rassura, et peu à peu, tournant le dos au Suffète, ils redescendirent, enragés d'humiliation. Pour la seconde fois, ils reculaient devant lui. Pendant quelque temps, ils restèrent debout. Plusieurs qui s'étaient blessé les doigts les portaient à leur bouche ou les roulaient doucement dans le bas de leur manteau, et ils allaient s'en aller quand Hamilcar entendit ces paroles :

— " Eh ! c'est une délicatesse pour ne pas affliger sa fille ! "

Une voix plus haute s'éleva :

— " Sans doute, puisqu'elle prend ses amants parmi les Mercenaires ! "

D'abord il chancela, puis ses yeux cherchèrent rapidement Schahabarim. Mais, seul, le prêtre de Tanit était resté à sa place ; et Hamilcar n'aperçut de loin que son haut bonnet. Tous lui ricanaient à la face. A mesure qu'augmentait son angoisse, leur joie redoublait, et, au milieu des huées, ceux qui étaient par-derrière criaient :

— " On l'a vu sortir de sa chambre ! "

— " Un matin du mois de Tammouz ! "

— " C'est le voleur du zaïmph ! "

— " Un homme très beau ! "

— " Plus grand que toi ! "

Il arracha sa tiare, insigne de sa dignité, — sa tiare à huit rangs mystiques dont le milieu portait une coquille d'émeraude — et à deux mains, de toutes ses forces, il la lança par terre ; les cercles d'or en se brisant rebondirent, et les perles sonnèrent sur les dalles. Ils virent alors sur la blancheur de son front une longue cicatrice ; elle s'agitait comme un serpent entre ses sourcils ; tous ses membres tremblaient. Il monta un des escaliers latéraux qui conduisaient sur l'autel et il marchait dessus ! C'était se vouer au Dieu, s'offrir en holocauste. Le mouvement de son manteau agitait les lueurs du candélabre plus bas que ses sandales, et la poudre fine, soulevée par ses pas, l'entourait comme un nuage jusqu'au ventre. Il s'arrêta entre les jambes du colosse d'airain. Il prit dans ses mains deux poignées de cette poussière dont la vue seule faisait frissonner d'horreur tous les Carthaginois, et il dit :

— " Par les cent flambeaux de vos Intelligences ! par les huit feux des Kabyres ! par les étoiles, les météores et les volcans ! par tout ce qui brûle ! par la soif du Désert et la salure de l'Océan ! par la caverne d'Hadrumète et l'empire des Ames ! par l'extermination ! par la cendre de vos fils, et la cendre des frères de vos aïeux, avec qui maintenant je confonds la mienne ! vous, les Cent du Conseil de Carthage, vous avez menti en accusant ma fille ! Et moi, Hamilcar Barca, Suffète-de-la-mer, Chef des Riches et Dominateur du peuple, devant Moloch-à-tête-de-taureau, je jure... " On s'attendait à quelque chose d'épouvantable, mais il reprit d'une voix plus haute et plus calme : " Que même je ne lui en parlerai pas ! "

Les serviteurs sacrés, portant des peignes d'or, entrèrent, — les uns avec des éponges de pourpre et les autres avec des branches de palmier. Ils relevèrent le rideau d'hyacinthe étendu devant la porte : et par l'ouverture de cet angle, on aperçut au fond des autres salles le grand ciel rose qui semblait continuer la voûte, en s'appuyant à l'horizon sur la mer toute bleue. Le soleil, sortant des flots, montait. Il frappa tout à coup contre la poitrine du colosse d'airain, divisé en sept compartiments que fermaient des grilles. Sa gueule aux dents rouges s'ouvrait dans un horrible bâillement ; ses naseaux énormes se dilataient, le grand jour l'animait, lui donnait un air terrible et impatient, comme s'il avait voulu bondir au-dehors pour se mêler avec l'astre, le Dieu, et parcourir ensemble les immensités.

Cependant les flambeaux répandus par terre brûlaient encore, en allongeant çà et là sur les pavés de nacre comme des taches de sang. Les Anciens chancelaient, épuisés ; ils aspiraient à pleins poumons la fraîcheur de l'air ; la sueur coulait sur leurs faces livides ; à force d'avoir crié, ils ne s'entendaient plus. Mais leur colère contre le Suffète n'était point calmée ; en manière d'adieux ils lui jetaient des menaces, et Hamilcar leur répondait :

— " A la nuit prochaine, Barca, dans le temple d'Eschmoûn ! "

— " J'y serai ! "

— " Nous te ferons condamner par les Riches ! "

— " Et moi par le peuple ! " — " Prends garde de finir sur la croix ! "

— " Et vous, déchirés dans les rues ! "

Dès qu'ils furent sur le seuil de la cour, ils reprirent un calme maintien.

Leurs coureurs et leurs cochers les attendaient à la porte. La plupart s'en allèrent sur des mules blanches. Le Suffète sauta dans son char, prit les rênes ; les deux bêtes, courbant leur encolure et frappant en cadence les cailloux qui rebondissaient, montèrent au grand galop toute la voie des Mappales, et le vautour d'argent, à la pointe du timon, semblait voler tant le char passait vite.

La route traversait un champ, planté de longues dalles, aiguës par le sommet, telles que des pyramides, et qui portaient, entaillée à leur milieu, une main ouverte comme si le mort couché dessous l'eût tendue vers le ciel pour réclamer quelque chose. Ensuite, étaient disséminées des cabanes en terre, en branchages, en claies de joncs, toutes de forme conique. De petits murs en cailloux, des rigoles d'eau vive, des cordes de sparterie, des haies de nopals séparaient irrégulièrement ces habitations, qui se tassaient de plus en plus, en s'élevant vers les jardins du Suffète. Mais Hamilcar tendait ses yeux sur une grande tour dont les trois étages faisaient trois monstrueux cylindres, le premier bâti en pierres, le second en briques, et le troisième, tout en cèdre, — supportant une coupole de cuivre sur vingt-quatre colonnes de genévrier, d'où retombaient, en manière de guirlandes, des chaînettes d'airain entrelacées. Ce haut édifice dominait les bâtiments qui s'étendaient à droite, les entrepôts, la maison-de-commerce, tandis que le palais des femmes se dressait au fond des cyprès, — alignés comme deux murailles de bronze.

Quand le char retentissant fut entré par la porte étroite, il s'arrêta sous un large hangar, où des chevaux, retenus à des entraves, mangeaient des tas d'herbes coupées.

Tous les serviteurs accoururent. Ils faisaient une multitude, ceux qui travaillaient dans les campagnes, par terreur des soldats, ayant été ramenés à Carthage. Les laboureurs, vêtus de peaux de bêtes, traînaient des chaînes rivées à leurs chevilles ; les ouvriers des manufactures de pourpre avaient les bras rouges comme des bourreaux ; les marins, des bonnets verts ; les pêcheurs, des colliers de corail ; les chasseurs, un filet sur l'épaule ; et les gens de Mégara, des tuniques blanches ou noires, des caleçons de cuir, des calottes de paille, de feutre ou de toile, selon leur service ou leurs industries différentes.

Par-derrière se pressait une populace en haillons. Ils vivaient, ceux-là, sans aucun emploi, loin des appartements, dormaient la nuit dans les jardins, dévoraient les restes des cuisines, — moisissure humaine qui végétait à l'ombre du palais. Hamilcar les tolérait, par prévoyance encore plus que par dédain. Tous, en témoignage de joie, s'étaient mis une fleur à l'oreille, et beaucoup d'entre eux ne l'avaient jamais vu.

Mais des hommes, coiffés comme des sphinx et munis de grands bâtons, s'élancèrent dans la foule, en frappant de droite et de gauche. C'était pour repousser les esclaves curieux de voir le maître, afin qu'il ne fût pas assailli sous leur nombre et incommodé par leur odeur.

Alors, tous se jetèrent à plat ventre en criant :

— " Oeil de Baal, que ta maison fleurisse ! "

" Et entre ces hommes, ainsi couchés par terre dans l'avenue des cyprès, l'Intendant-des-intendants, Abdalonim, coiffé d'une mitre blanche, s'avança vers Hamilcar, un encensoir à la main.

Salammbô descendait alors l'escalier des galères. Toutes ses femmes venaient derrière elle ; et, à chacun de ses pas, elles descendaient aussi. Les têtes des Négresses marquaient de gros points noirs la ligne des bandeaux à plaque d'or qui serraient le front des Romaines. D'autres avaient dans les cheveux des flèches d'argent, des papillons d'émeraude, ou de longues aiguilles étalées en soleil. Sur la confusion de ces vêtements blancs, jaunes et bleus, les anneaux, les agrafes, les colliers, les franges, les bracelets resplendissaient ; un murmure d'étoffes légères s'élevait ; on entendait le claquement des sandales avec le bruit sourd des pieds nus posant sur le bois : — et, çà et là, un grand eunuque, qui les dépassait des épaules, souriait la face en l'air. Quand l'acclamation des hommes se fut apaisée, en se cachant le visage avec leurs manches, elles poussèrent ensemble un cri bizarre, pareil au hurlement d'une louve, et il était si furieux et si strident qu'il semblait faire, du haut en bas, vibrer comme une lyre le grand escalier d'ébène tout couvert de femmes.

Le vent soulevait leurs voiles, et les minces tiges des papyrus se balançaient doucement. On était au mois de Schebaz, en plein hiver. Les grenadiers en fleur se bombaient sur l'azur du ciel, et, à travers les branches, la mer apparaissait avec une île au loin, à demi perdue dans la brume.

Hamilcar s'arrêta, en apercevant Salammbô. Elle lui était survenue après la mort de plusieurs enfants mâles. D'ailleurs, la naissance des filles passait pour une calamité dans les religions du Soleil. Les Dieux, plus tard, lui avaient envoyé un fils ; mais il gardait quelque chose de son espoir trahi et comme l'ébranlement de la malédiction qu'il avait prononcée contre elle. Salammbô, cependant, continuait à marcher.

Des perles de couleurs variées descendaient en longues grappes de ses oreilles sur ses épaules et jusqu'aux coudes. Sa chevelure était crêpée, de façon à simuler un nuage. Elle portait, autour du cou, de petites plaques d'or quadrangulaires représentant une femme entre deux lions cabrés ; et son costume reproduisait en entier l'accoutrement de la Déesse. Sa robe d'hyacinthe, à manches larges, lui serrait la taille en s'évasant par le bas. Le vermillon de ses lèvres faisait paraître ses dents plus blanches, et l'antimoine de ses paupières ses yeux plus longs. Ses sandales, coupées dans un plumage d'oiseau, avaient des talons très hauts et elle était pâle extraordinairement, à cause du froid sans doute.

Enfin elle arriva près d'Hamilcar, et, sans le regarder, sans lever la tête, elle lui dit :

— " Salut, Oeil de Baalim, gloire éternelle ! triomphe ! loisir ! satisfaction ! richesse ! Voilà longtemps que mon coeur était triste, et la maison languissait. Mais le maître qui revient est comme Tainmmouz ressuscité ; et sous ton regard, ô père, une joie, une existence nouvelle va partout s'épanouir ! "

Et prenant des mains de Taanach un petit vase oblong où fumait un mélange de farine, de beurre, de cardamome et de vin : — " Bois à pleine gorge " dit-elle, " la boisson du retour préparée par ta servante. "

Il répliqua — - " Bénédiction sur toi ! " et il saisit machinalement le vase d'or qu'elle lui tendait.

Cependant, il l'examinait avec une attention si âpre que Salammbô troublée balbutia :

— " On t'a dit, ô maître ! ... "

— " Oui ! je sais ! " fit Hamilcar à voix basse.

Etait-ce un aveu ? ou parlait-elle des Barbares ? Et il ajouta quelques mots vagues sur les embarras publics qu'il espérait à lui seul dissiper.

— " O père ! " exclama Salammbô, " tu n'effaceras pas ce qui est irréparable ! "

Alors il se recula, et Salammbô s'étonnait de son ébahissement ; car elle ne songeait point à Carthage mais au sacrilège dont elle se trouvait complice. Cet homme, qui faisait trembler les légions et qu'elle connaissait à peine, l'effrayait comme un dieu ; il avait deviné, il savait tout, quelque chose de terrible allait venir. Elle s'écria : " Grâce ! "

Hamilcar baissa la tête, lentement.

Bien qu'elle voulût s'accuser, elle n'osait ouvrir les lèvres ; et cependant elle étouffait du besoin de se plaindre et d'être consolée. Hamilcar combattait l'envie de rompre son serment. Il le tenait par orgueil, ou par crainte d'en finir avec son incertitude : et il la regardait en face, de toutes ses forces, pour saisir ce qu'elle cachait au fond de son coeur.

Peu à peu, en haletant, Salammbô s'enfonçait la tête dans les épaules, écrasée par ce regard trop lourd. Il était sûr maintenant qu'elle avait failli dans l'étreinte d'un Barbare ; il frémissait, il leva ses deux poings. Elle poussa un cri et tomba entre ses femmes, qui s'empressèrent autour d'elle.

Hamilcar tourna les talons. Tous les intendants le suivirent.

On ouvrit la porte des entrepôts, et il entra dans une vaste salle ronde où aboutissaient, comme les rayons d'une roue à son moyeu, de longs couloirs qui conduisaient vers d'autres salles. Un disque de pierre s'élevait au centre avec des balustres pour soutenir des coussins accumulés sur des tapis.

Le Suffète se promena d'abord à grands pas rapides ; : il respirait bruyamment, il frappait la terre du talon, il se passait la main sur le front comme un homme harcelé par les mouches. Mais il secoua la tête, et, en apercevant l'accumulation des richesses, il se calma ; : sa pensée, qu'attiraient les perspectives des couloirs, se répandait dans les autres salles pleines de trésors plus rares. Des plaques de bronze, des lingots d'argent et des barres de fer alternaient avec les saumons d'étain apportés des Cassitérides par la mer Ténébreuse : les gommes du pays des Noirs débordaient de leurs sacs en écorce de palmier ; poudre d'or, tassée dans des outres, fuyait insensiblement par les coutures trop vieilles. De minces filaments, tirés des plantes marines, pendaient entre les lins d'Egypte, de Grèce, de Taprobane et de Judée : des madrépores, tels que de larges buissons, se hérissaient au pied des murs : et une odeur indéfinissable flottait, exhalaison des parfums, des cuirs, des épices et des plumes d'autruche liées en gros bouquets tout au haut de la voûte. Devant chaque couloir, des dents d'éléphant posées debout, en se réunissant par les pointes, formaient un arc au-dessus de la porte.

Enfin, il monta sur le disque de pierre. Tous les intendants se tenaient les bras croisés, la tête basse, tandis qu'Abdalonim levait d'un air orgueilleux sa mitre pointue.

Hamilcar interrogea le Chef-des-navires. C'était un vieux pilote aux paupières éraillées par le vent, et des flocons blancs descendaient jusqu'à ses hanches, comme si l'écume des tempêtes lui était restée sur la barbe.

Il répondit qu'il avait envoyé une flotte par Gadès et Thymiamata, pour tâcher d'atteindre Eziongaber, en doublant la Corne-du-Sud et le promontoire des Aromates.

D'autres avaient continué dans l'Ouest, durant quatre lunes, sans rencontrer de rivages ; mais la proue des navires s'embarrassait dans les herbes, l'horizon retentissait continuellement du bruit des cataractes, des brouillards couleur de sang obscurcissaient le soleil, une brise toute chargée de parfums endormait les équipages ; et à présent ils ne pouvaient rien dire, tant leur mémoire était troublée. Cependant on avait remonté les fleuves des Scythes, pénétré en Colchide, chez les Ingriens, chez les Estiens, ravi dans l'archipel quinze cents vierges et coulé bas tous les vaisseaux étrangers naviguant au-delà du cap Oestrymon, pour que le secret des routes ne fût pas connu. Le roi Ptolémée retenait l'encens de Schesbar, Syracuse, Elathia, la Corse et les îles n'avaient rien fourni, et le vieux pilote baissa la voix pour annoncer qu'une trirème était prise à Rusicada par les Numides, — " car ils sont avec eux, Maître " .

Hamilcar fronça les sourcils ; puis il fit signe de parler au Chef-des-voyages, enveloppé d'une robe brune sans ceinture, et la tête prise dans une longue écharpe d'étoffe blanche qui, passant au bord de sa bouche, lui retombait par-derrière sur l'épaule.

Les caravanes étaient parties régulièrement à l'équinoxe d'hiver. Mais, de quinze cents hommes se dirigeant sur l'extrême Ethiopie avec d'excellents chameaux, des outres neuves et des provisions de toiles peintes, un seul avait reparu à Carthage, — les autres étant morts de fatigue ou devenus fous par la terreur du désert ; — et il disait avoir vu, bien au-delà du Harousch-Noir, après les Atarantes et le pays des grands singes, d'immenses royaumes où les moindres ustensiles sont tous en or, un fleuve couleur de lait, large comme une mer ; des forêts d'arbres bleus, des collines d'aromates, des monstres à figure humaine végétant sur les rochers et dont les prunelles, pour vous regarder, s'épanouissent comme des fleurs ; puis, derrière des lacs tout couverts de dragons, des montagnes de cristal qui supportent le soleil. D'autres étaient revenus de l'Inde avec des paons, du poivre et des tissus nouveaux. Quant à ceux qui vont acheter des calcédoines par le chemin des Syrtes et le temple d'Ammon, sans doute ils avaient péri dans les sables. Les caravanes de la Gétulie et de Phazzana avaient fourni leurs provenances habituelles ; mais il n'osait à présent, lui, le Chef-des-voyages, en équiper aucune.

Hamilcar comprit ; les Mercenaires occupaient la campagne. Avec un sourd gémissement, il s'appuya sur l'autre coude ; et le Chef-des-métairies avait si peur de parler, qu'il tremblait horriblement malgré ses épaules trapues et ses grosses prunelles rouges. Sa face, camarde comme celle d'un dogue, était surmontée d'un réseau en fils d'écorces ; il portait un ceinturon en peau de léopard avec tous les poils et où reluisaient deux formidables coutelas.

Dès qu'Hamilcar se détourna, il se mit, en criant, à invoquer tous les Baals. Ce n'était pas sa faute ! il n'y pouvait rien ! Il avait observé les températures, les terrains, les étoiles, fait les plantations au solstice d'hiver, les élagages au décours de la lune, inspecté les esclaves, ménagé leurs habits.

Mais Hamilcar s'irritait de cette loquacité. Il claqua de la langue et l'homme au coutelas d'une voix rapide :

— " Ah ! Maître ! ils ont tout pillé ! tout saccagé ! tout détruit ! Trois mille pieds d'arbres sont coupés à Maschala, et à Ubada les greniers défoncés, les citernes comblées ! A Tedès, ils ont emporté quinze cents gomors de farine ; à Marazzana, tué les pasteurs, mangé les troupeaux, brûlé ta maison, ta belle maison à poutres de cèdre, où tu venais l'été ! Les esclaves de Tuburbo, qui sciaient de l'orge, se sont enfuis vers les montagnes ; et les ânes, les bardeaux, les mulets, les boeufs de Taormine, et les chevaux orynges, plus un seul ! tous emmenés ! C'est une malédiction ! je n'y survivrai pas ! " Il reprenait en pleurant : " Ah ! Si tu savais comme les celliers étaient pleins et les charrues reluisantes ! Ah ! les beaux béliers ! ah ! les beaux taureaux ! "

La colère d'Hamilcar l'étouffait. Elle éclata :

— " Tais-toi ! Suis-je donc un pauvre ? Pas de mensonges ! dites vrai ! Je veux savoir tout ce que j'ai perdu, jusqu'au dernier sicle, jusqu'au dernier cab ! Abdalonim, apporte-moi les comptes des vaisseaux, ceux des caravanes ; ceux des métairies, ceux de la maison ! Et si votre conscience est trouble, malheur sur vos têtes ! Sortez ! "

Tous les intendants, marchant à reculons et les poings jusqu'à terre, sortirent.

Abdalonim alla prendre au milieu d'un casier, dans la muraille, des cordes à noeuds, des bandes de toile ou de papyrus, des omoplates de mouton chargées d'écritures fines. Il les déposa aux pieds d'Hamilcar, lui mit entre les mains un cadre de bois garni de trois fils intérieurs où étaient passées des boules d'or, d'argent et de corne, et il commença :

— " Cent quatre-vingt-douze maisons dans les Mappales, louées aux Carthaginois-nouveaux à raison d'un béka par lune. "

— " Non ! c'est trop ! ménage les pauvres ! et tu écriras les noms de ceux qui te paraîtront les plus hardis, en tâchant de savoir s'ils sont attachés à la République ! Après ? "

Abdalonim hésitait, surpris de cette générosité.

Hamilcar lui arracha des mains les bandes de toile.

— " Qu'est-ce donc ? trois palais autour de Khamon à douze késitah par mois ! Mets-en vingt ! Je ne veux pas que les Riches me dévorent.

"

L'Intendant-des-intendants, après un long salut, reprit :

— " Prêté à Tigillas, jusqu'à la fin de la saison, deux kikar au denier trois, intérêt maritime : à Bar-Malkarth, quinze cents sicles sur le gage de trente esclaves. Mais douze sont morts dans les marais salins. "

— " C'est qu'ils n'étaient pas robustes ", dit en riant le Suffète. " N'importe ! S'il a besoin d'argent, satisfais-le ! Il faut toujours prêter, et à des intérêts divers, selon la richesse des personnes. "

Alors le serviteur s'empressa de lire tout ce qu'avaient rapporté les mines de fer d'Annaba, les pêcheries de corail, les fabriques de pourpre, la ferme de l'impôt sur les Grecs domiciliés, l'exportation de l'argent en Arabie où il valait dix fois l'or, les prises des vaisseaux, déduction faite du dixième pour le temple de la Déesse.

— " Chaque fois j'ai déclaré un quart de moins, Maître ! "

" Hamilcar comptait avec les billes ; elles sonnaient sous ses doigts.

— " Assez ! Qu'as-tu payé ? "

— " A Stratoniclès de Corinthe et à trois marchands d'Alexandrie, sur les lettres que voilà (elles sont rentrées), dix mille drachmes athéniennes et douze talents d'or syriens. La nourriture des équipages s'élevant à vingt mines par mois pour une trirème... "

— " Je le sais ! combien de perdues ? "

— " En voici le compte sur ces lames de plomb. ", dit l'intendant. " Quant aux navires nolisés en commun, comme il a fallu souvent jeter les cargaisons à la mer, on a réparti les pertes inégales par têtes d'associés. Pour des cordages empruntés aux arsenaux et qu'il a été impossible de leur rendre, les Syssites ont exigé huit cents késitah, avant l'expédition d'Utique. " — " Encore eux " fit Hamilcar en baissant la tête ; et il resta quelque temps comme écrasé par le poids de toutes les haines qu'il sentait sur lui.

— " Mais je ne vois pas les dépenses de Mégara ? "

Abdalonim, en pâlisant, alla prendre, dans un autre casier, des planchettes de sycomore enfilées par paquets à des cordes de cuir.

Hamilcar l'écoutait, curieux des détails domestiques, et s'apaisant à la monotonie de cette voix qui énumérait des chiffres ; Abdalonim se ralentissait. Tout à coup il laissa tomber par terre les feuilles de bois et il se jeta lui-même à plat ventre, les bras étendus, dans la position des condamnés. Hamilcar, sans s'émouvoir, ramassa les tablettes ; et ses lèvres s'écartèrent et ses yeux s'agrandirent, lorsqu'il aperçut, à la dépense d'un seul jour, une exorbitante consommation de viandes, de poissons, d'oiseaux, de vins et d'aromates, avec des vases brisés, des esclaves morts, des tapis perdus.

Abdalonim, toujours prosterné, lui apprit le festin des Barbares. Il n'avait pu se soustraire à l'ordre des Anciens, — Salammbo, d'ailleurs, voulant que l'on prodiguât l'argent pour mieux recevoir les soldats.

Au nom de sa fille, Hamilcar se leva d'un bond. Puis, en serrant les lèvres, il s'accroupit sur les coussins ; il en déchirait les franges avec ses ongles, haletant, les prunelles fixes.

— " Lève-toi !, " dit-il ; et il descendit.

Abdalonim le suivait ; ses genoux tremblaient. Mais, saisissant une barre de fer, il se mit comme un furieux à desceller les dalles. Un disque de bois sauta, et bientôt parurent sur la longueur du couloir plusieurs de ces larges couvercles qui bouchaient des fosses où l'on conservait le grain.

— " Tu le vois, Oeil de Baal, " dit le serviteur en tremblant, " ils n'ont pas encore tout pris ! et elles sont profondes, chacune, de cinquante coudées et combles jusqu'au bord ! Pendant ton voyage, j'en ai fait creuser dans les arsenaux, dans les jardins, partout ! ta maison est pleine de blé, comme ton coeur de sagesse. "

Un sourire passa sur le visage d'Hamilcar :

— " C'est bien, Abdalonim ! " Puis, se penchant à son oreille : " Tu en feras venir de l'Etrurie, du Brutium, d'où il te plaira, et n'importe à quel prix ! Entasse et garde ! Il faut que je possède, à moi seul, tout le blé de Carthage. "

Puis, quand ils furent à l'extrémité du couloir, Abdalonim, avec une des clefs qui pendaient à sa ceinture, ouvrit une grande chambre quadrangulaire, divisée au milieu par des piliers de cèdre. Des monnaies d'or, d'argent et d'airain, disposées sur des tables ou enfoncées dans des niches, montaient le long des quatre murs jusqu'aux lambourdes du toit. D'énormes couffes en peau d'hippopotame supportaient, dans les coins, des rangs entiers de sacs plus petits ; des tas de billion faisaient des monticules sur les dalles ; et, çà et là, quelque pile trop haute s'étant écroulée avait l'air d'une colonne en ruine. Les grandes pièces de Carthage, représentant Tanit avec un cheval sous un palmier, se mêlaient à celles des colonies, marquées d'un taureau, d'une étoile, d'un globe ou d'un croissant. Puis l'on voyait disposées, par sommes inégales, des pièces de toutes les valeurs, de toutes les dimensions, de tous les âges, — depuis les vieilles d'Assyrie, minces comme l'ongle, jusqu'aux vieilles du Latium, plus épaisses que la main, avec les boutons d'Egine, les tablettes de la Bactriane, les courtes tringles de l'ancienne Lacédémone ; plusieurs étaient couvertes de rouille, encrassées, verdies par l'eau ou noircies par le feu, ayant été prises dans des filets ou après les sièges parmi les décombres des villes. Le Suffète eut bien vite supputé si les sommes présentes correspondaient aux gains et aux dommages qu'on venait de lui lire ; et il s'en allait lorsqu'il aperçut trois jarres d'airain complètement vides. Abdalonim détourna la tête en signe d'horreur, et Hamilcar résigné ne parla point.

Ils traversèrent d'autres couloirs, d'autres salles et arrivèrent enfin devant une porte où, pour la garder mieux, un homme était attaché par le ventre à une longue chaîne scellée contre le mur, coutume des Romains nouvellement introduite à Carthage. Sa barbe et ses ongles avaient démesurément poussé, et il se balançait de droite et de gauche avec l'oscillation continuelle des bêtes captives. Sitôt qu'il reconnut Hamilcar, il s'élança vers lui en criant :

— " Grâce, Oeil de Baal ! pitié ! tue-moi ! Voilà dix ans que je n'ai vu le soleil ! Au nom de ton père, grâce ! "

Hamilcar, sans lui répondre, frappa dans ses mains, trois hommes parurent ; et, tous les quatre à la fois, en raidissant leurs bras, ils retirèrent de ses anneaux la barre énorme qui fermait la porte. Hamilcar prit un flambeau, et disparut dans les ténèbres.

C'était, croyait-on, l'endroit des sépultures de la famille ; mais on n'eût trouvé qu'un large puits. Il était creusé seulement pour dérouter les voleurs, et ne cachait rien. Hamilcar passa auprès ; puis, en se baissant, il fit tourner sur ses rouleaux une meule très lourde, et, par cette ouverture, il entra dans un appartement bâti en forme de cône.

Des écailles d'airain couvraient les murs ; au milieu, sur un piédestal de granit, s'élevait la statue d'un Kabyre avec le nom d'Alètes, inventeur des mines dans la Celtibérie. Contre sa base, par terre, étaient disposés en croix de larges boucliers d'or et des vases d'argent monstrueux, à goulot fermé, d'une forme extravagante et qui ne pouvaient servir ; car on avait coutume de fondre ainsi des quantités de métal pour que les dilapidations et même les déplacements fussent presque impossibles.

Avec son flambeau, il alluma une lampe de mineur fixée au bonnet de l'idole ; des feux verts, jaunes, bleus, violets, couleur de vin, couleur de sang, tout à coup, illuminèrent la salle. Elle était pleine de pierreries qui se trouvaient dans des calebasses d'or accrochées comme des lampadaires aux lames d'airain, ou dans leurs blocs natifs rangés au bas du mur. C'étaient des callaïs arrachées des montagnes à coups de fronde, des escarboucles formées par l'urine des lynx, des glossopètres tombés de la lune, des tyanos, des diamants, des sandastrum, des béryls, avec les trois espèces de rubis, les quatre espèces de saphir et les douze espèces d'émeraudes. Elles fulguraient, pareilles à des éclaboussures de lait, à des glaçons bleus, à de la poussière d'argent, et jetaient leurs lumières en nappes, en rayons, en étoiles. Les céraunies engendrées par le tonnerre étincelaient près des calcédoines qui guérissent les poisons. Il y avait des topazes du mont Zabarca pour prévenir les terreurs, des opales de la Bactriane qui empêchent les avortements, et des cornes d'Ammon que l'on place sous les lits afin d'avoir des songes.

Les feux des pierres et les flammes de la lampe se miraient dans les grands boucliers d'or. Hamilcar, debout, souriait, les bras croisés ; — et il se délectait moins dans le spectacle que dans la conscience de ses richesses. Elles étaient inaccessibles, inépuisables, infinies. Ses aïeux, dormant sous ses pas, envoyaient à son cœur quelque chose de leur éternité. Il se sentait tout près des génies souterrains. C'était comme la joie d'un Kabyre ; et les grands rayons lumineux frappant son visage lui semblaient l'extrémité d'un invisible réseau, qui, à travers des abîmes, l'attachaient au centre du monde.

Une idée le fit tressaillir, et, s'étant placé derrière l'idole, il marcha droit vers le mur. Puis il examina parmi les tatouages de son bras une ligne horizontale avec deux autres perpendiculaires, ce qui exprimait, en chiffres chananéens, le nombre treize. Alors il compta jusqu'à la treizième des plaques d'airain, releva encore une fois sa large manche ; et, la main droite étendue, il lisait à une autre place de son bras d'autres lignes plus compliquées, tandis qu'il promenait ses doigts délicatement, à la façon d'un joueur de lyre. Enfin, avec son pouce, il frappa sept coups ; et, d'un seul bloc, toute une partie de la muraille tourna.

Elle dissimulait une sorte de caveau, où étaient enfermées des choses mystérieuses, qui n'avaient pas de nom, et d'une incalculable valeur. Hamilcar descendit les trois marches ; il prit dans une cuve d'argent une peau de lama flottant sur un liquide noir, puis il remonta.

Abdalonim se remit alors à marcher devant lui. Il frappait les pavés avec sa haute canne garnie de sonnettes au pommeau, et, devant chaque appartement, criait le nom d'Hamilcar, entouré de louanges et de bénédictions.

Dans la galerie circulaire où aboutissaient tous les couloirs, on avait accumulé le long des murs des poutrelles d'algummin, des sacs de lausonia, des gâteaux en terre de Lemnos, et des carapaces de tortue toutes pleines de perles. Le Suffète, en passant, les effleurait avec sa robe, sans même regarder de gigantesques morceaux d'ambre, matière presque divine formée par les rayons du soleil.

Un nuage de vapeur odorante s'échappa.

— " Pousse la porte ! "

Ils entrèrent.

Des hommes nus pétrissaient des pâtes, broyaient des herbes, agitaient des charbons, versaient de l'huile dans des jarres, ouvraient et fermaient les petites cellules ovoïdes creusées tout autour de la muraille et si nombreuses que l'appartement ressemblait à l'intérieur d'une ruche. Du myrobalon, du bdellium, du safran et des violettes en débordaient. Partout étaient éparpillées des gommes, des poudres, des racines, des fioles de verre, des branches de filipendule, des pétales de roses ; et l'on étouffait dans les senteurs, malgré les tourbillons de styrax qui grésillait au milieu sur un trépied d'airain.

Le Chef-des-odeurs-suaves, pâle et long comme un flambeau de cire, s'avança vers Hamilcar pour écraser dans ses mains un rouleau de métopion, tandis que deux autres lui frottaient les talons avec des feuilles de baccaris. Il les repoussa ; c'étaient des Cyrénéens de moeurs infâmes, mais que l'on considérait à cause de leurs secrets.

Afin de montrer sa vigilance, le Chef-des-odeurs offrit au Suffète, sur une cuiller d'électrum, un peu de malobathre à goûter ; puis, avec une alène, il perça trois besoirs indiens. Le maître, qui savait les artifices, prit une corne pleine de baume, et, l'ayant approchée des charbons, il la pencha sur sa robe ; une tache brune y parut, c'était une fraude. Alors, il considéra le Chef-des-odeurs fixement, et, sans rien dire, lui jeta la corne de gazelle en plein visage.

Si indigné qu'il fût des falsifications commises à son préjudice, en apercevant des paquets de nard qu'on emballait pour les pays d'outre-mer, il ordonna d'y mêler de l'antimoine, afin de le rendre plus lourd.

Puis il demanda où se trouvaient trois boîtes de psagas, destinées à son usage.

Le Chef-des-odeurs avoua qu'il n'en savait rien, des soldats étaient venus avec des couteaux, en hurlant ; il leur avait ouvert les cases.

— " Tu les crains donc plus que moi ! ", s'écria le Suffète ; et, à travers la fumée, ses prunelles, comme des torches, étincelaient sur le grand homme pâle qui commençait à comprendre. " Abdalonim ! avant le coucher du soleil, tu le feras passer par les verges. Déchire-le ! "

Ce dommage, moindre que les autres, l'avait exaspéré ; car, malgré ses efforts pour les bannir de sa pensée, il retrouvait continuellement les Barbares. Leurs débordements se confondaient avec la honte de sa fille, et il en voulait à toute la maison de la connaître et de ne pas la lui dire. Mais quelque chose le poussait à s'enfoncer dans son malheur ; et, pris d'une rage d'inquisition, il visita sous les hangars, derrière la maison-de-commerce, les provisions de bitume, de bois, d'ancres et de cordages, de miel et de cire, le magasin des étoffes, les réserves de nourritures, le chantier des marbres, le grenier du silphium.

Il alla de l'autre côté des jardins inspecter, dans leurs cabanes, les artisans domestiques dont on vendait les produits. Des tailleurs brodaient des manteaux, d'autres tressaient des filets, d'autres peignaient des coussins, découpaient des sandales, des ouvriers d'Egypte avec un coquillage polissaient des papyrus, la navette des tisserands claquait, les enclumes des armuriers retentissaient.

Hamilcar leur dit :

— " Battez des glaives ! battez toujours ! il m'en faudra. " Et il tira de sa poitrine la peau d'antilope macérée dans les poisons pour qu'on lui taillât une cuirasse plus solide que celles d'airain, et qui serait inattaquable au fer et à la flamme.

Dès qu'il abordait les ouvriers, Abdalonim, afin de détourner sa colère, tâchait de l'irriter contre eux en dénigrant leurs ouvrages par des murmures.

— " Quelle besogne ! c'est une honte ! Vraiment le Maître est trop bon. " Hamilcar, sans l'écouter, s'éloignait. Il se ralentit, car de grands arbres calcinés d'un bout à l'autre, comme on en trouve dans les bois où les pasteurs ont campé, barraient les chemins ; et les palissades étaient rompues, l'eau des rigoles se perdait, des éclats de verres, des ossements de singes apparaissaient au milieu des flaques bourbeuses. Quelque bribe d'étoffe ça et là pendait aux buissons ; sous les citronniers, les fleurs pourries faisaient un fumier jaune. En effet, les serviteurs avaient tout abandonné, croyant que le maître ne reviendrait plus.

A chaque pas, il découvrait quelque désastre nouveau, une preuve encore de cette chose qu'il s'était interdit d'apprendre. Voilà maintenant qu'il souillait ses brodequins de pourpre en écrasant des immondices ; et il ne tenait pas ces hommes, tous devant lui au bout d'une catapulte, pour les faire voler en éclats ! Il se sentait humilié de les avoir défendus ; c'était une duperie, une trahison ; et, comme il ne pouvait se venger ni des soldats, ni des Anciens, ni de Salammbô, ni de personne, et que sa colère cherchait quelqu'un, il condamna aux mines, d'un seul coup, tous les esclaves des jardins.

Abdalonim frissonnait chaque fois qu'il le voyait se rapprocher des parcs. Mais Hamilcar prit le sentier du moulin, d'où l'on entendait sortir une mélopée lugubre.

Au milieu de la poussière, les lourdes meules tournaient, c'est-à-dire deux cônes de porphyre superposés, et dont le plus haut, portant un entonnoir, virait sur le second à l'aide de fortes barres. Avec leur poitrine et leurs bras des hommes poussaient, tandis que d'autres, attelés, tiraient. Le frottement de la bricole avait formé autour de leurs aisselles des croûtes purulentes comme on en voit au garrot des ânes, et le haillon noir et flasque qui couvrait à peine leurs reins et pendait par le bout, battait sur leurs jarrets comme une longue queue. Leurs yeux étaient rouges, les fers de leurs pieds sonnaient, toutes leurs poitrines haletaient d'accord. Ils avaient sur la bouche, fixée par deux chaînettes, de bronze, une muselière, pour qu'il leur fût impossible de manger la farine, et des gantelets sans doigts enfermaient leurs mains pour les empêcher d'en prendre.

A l'entrée du maître, les barres de bois craquèrent plus fort. Le grain, en se broyant, grinçait. Plusieurs tombèrent sur les genoux ; les autres, continuant, passaient par-dessus.

Il demanda Giddenem, le gouverneur des esclaves ; et ce personnage parut, étalant sa dignité dans la richesse de son costume ; car sa tunique, fendue sur les côtés, était de pourpre fine, de lourds anneaux tiraient ses oreilles, et, pour joindre les bandes d'étoffes qui enveloppaient ses jambes, un lacet d'or, comme un serpent autour d'un arbre, montait de ses chevilles à ses hanches. Il tenait dans ses doigts, tout chargés de bagues, un collier en grains de gagates pour reconnaître les hommes sujets au mal sacré.

Hamilcar lui fit signe de détacher les muselières. Alors tous, avec des cris de bêtes affamées, se ruèrent sur la farine, qu'ils dévoraient en s'enfonçant le visage dans les tas.

— " Tu les exténues ! " dit le Suffète.

Giddenem répondit qu'il fallait cela pour les dompter.

— " Ce n'était guère la peine de t'envoyer à Syracuse dans l'école des esclaves. Fais venir les autres ! "

Et les cuisiniers, les sommeliers, les palefreniers, les coureurs, les porteurs de litière, les hommes des étuves et les femmes avec leurs enfants, tous se rangèrent dans le jardin sur une seule ligne, depuis la maison-de-commerce jusqu'au parc des bêtes fauves. Ils retenaient leur haleine. Un silence énorme emplissait Mégara. Le soleil s'allongeait sur la lagune, au bas des catacombes. Les paons piaulaient. Hamilcar, pas à pas, marchait.

— " Qu'ai-je à faire de ces vieux ? " dit-il ; " vends-les ! C'est trop de Gaulois, ils sont ivrognes ! et trop de Crétois, ils sont menteurs ! Achète- moi des Cappadociens, des Asiatiques et des Nègres. "

Il s'étonna du petit nombre des enfants. — " Chaque année, Giddenem, la maison doit avoir des naissances ! Tu laisseras toutes les nuits les cases ouvertes pour qu'ils se mêlent en liberté. "

Il se fit montrer ensuite les voleurs, les paresseux, les mutins. Il distribuait des châtiments avec des reproches à Giddenem ; et Giddenem, comme un taureau, baissait son front bas, où s'entrecroisaient deux larges sourcils.

— " Tiens, Oeil de Baal ", dit-il, en désignant un Libyen robuste, " en voilà un que l'on a surpris la corde au cou. "

— " Ah ! tu veux mourir ? " fit dédaigneusement le Suffète.

Et l'esclave, d'un ton intrépide :

— " Oui ! "

Alors, sans se soucier de l'exemple ni du dommage pécuniaire, Hamilcar dit aux valets :

— " Emportez-le ! "

Peut-être y avait-il dans sa pensée l'intention d'un sacrifice. C'était un malheur qu'il s'infligeait afin d'en prévenir de plus terribles.

Giddenem avait caché les mutilés derrière les autres. Hamilcar les aperçut :

— " Qui t'a coupé le bras, à toi ? "

— " Les soldats, Oeil de Baal. "

Puis, à un Samnite qui chancelait comme un héron blessé :

— " Et toi, qui t'a fait cela ? "

C'était le gouverneur, en lui cassant la jambe avec une barre de fer.

Cette atrocité imbécile indigna le Suffète ; et, arrachant des mains de Giddenem son collier de gagates :

— " Malédiction au chien qui blesse le troupeau. Estropier des esclaves, bonté de Tanit ! Ah ! tu ruines ton maître ! Qu'on l'étouffe dans le fumier. Et ceux qui manquent ? Où sont-ils ? Les as-tu assassinés avec les soldats ? "

Sa figure était si terrible que toutes les femmes s'enfuirent. Les esclaves, se reculant, faisaient un grand cercle autour d'eux ; Giddenem baisait frénétiquement ses sandales ; Hamilcar, debout, restait les bras levés sur lui.

Mais, l'intelligence lucide comme au plus fort des batailles, il se rappelait mille choses odieuses, des ignominies dont il s'était détourné ; et, à la lueur de sa colère, comme aux fulgurations d'un orage, il revoyait d'un seul coup tous ses désastres à la fois. Les gouverneurs des campagnes avaient fui par terreur des soldats, par connivence peut-être, tous le trompaient, depuis trop longtemps il se contenait.

— " Qu'on les amène ! " cria-t-il, " et marquez-les au front avec des fers rouges, comme des lâches ! "

Alors, on apporta et l'on répandit au milieu du jardin des entraves, des carcans, des couteaux, des chaînes pour les condamnés aux mines, des cippes qui serraient les jambes, des numella qui enfermaient les épaules, et des scorpions, fouets à triples lanières terminées par des griffes en airain.

Tous furent placés la face vers le soleil, du côté de Moloch-dévorateur, étendus par terre sur le ventre ou sur le dos, et les condamnés à la flagellation, debout contre les arbres, avec deux hommes auprès d'eux, un qui comptait les coups et un autre qui frappait.

Il frappait à deux bras ; les lanières en sifflant faisaient voler l'écorce des platanes. Le sang s'éparpillait en pluie dans les feuillages, et des masses rouges se tordaient au pied des arbres en hurlant. Ceux que l'on ferrait s'arrachaient le visage avec les ongles. On entendait les vis de bois craquer ; des heurts sourds retentissaient ; parfois un cri aigu, tout à coup, traversait l'air. Du côté des cuisines, entre des vêtements en lambeaux et des chevelures abattues, des hommes, avec des éventails, avivaient des charbons, et une odeur de chair qui brûle passait. Les flagellés défaillant, mais retenus par les liens de leurs bras, roulaient leur tête sur leurs épaules en fermant les yeux. Les autres, qui regardaient, se mirent à crier d'épouvante, et les lions, se rappelant peut-être le festin, s'allongeaient en bâillant contre le bord des fosses.

On vit alors Salammbô sur la plate-forme de sa terrasse. Elle la parcourait rapidement de droite et de gauche, tout effarée. Hamilcar l'aperçut. Il lui sembla qu'elle levait les bras de son côté pour demander grâce ; avec un geste d'horreur, il s'enfonça dans le parc des éléphants.

Ces animaux faisaient l'orgueil des grandes maisons puniques. Ils avaient porté les aïeux, triomphé dans les guerres, et on les vénérât comme favoris du Soleil.

Ceux de Mégara étaient les plus forts de Carthage. Hamilcar, avant de partir, avait exigé d'Abdalonim le serment qu'il les surveillerait. Mais ils étaient morts de leurs mutilations ; et trois seulement restaient, couchés au milieu de la cour, sur la poussière, devant les débris de leur mangeoire.

Ils le reconnurent et vinrent à lui.

L'un avait les oreilles horriblement fendues, l'autre au genou une large plaie, et le troisième la trompe coupée.

Cependant, ils le regardaient d'un air triste, comme des personnes raisonnables ; et celui qui n'avait plus de trompe, en baissant sa tête énorme et pliant les jarrets, tâchait de le flatter doucement avec l'extrémité hideuse de son moignon.

A cette caresse de l'animal, deux larmes lui jaillirent des yeux. Il bondit sur Abdalonim.

— " Ah ! misérable ! la croix ! la croix ! "

Abdalonim, s'évanouissant, tomba par terre à la renverse.

Derrière les fabriques de pourpre, dont les lentes fumées bleues montaient dans le ciel, un aboiement de chacal retentit ; Hamilcar s'arrêta.

La pensée de son fils, comme l'attouchement d'un dieu, l'avait tout à coup calmé. C'était un prolongement de sa force, une continuation indéfinie de sa personne qu'il entrevoyait, et les esclaves ne comprenaient pas d'où lui était venu cet apaisement.

En se dirigeant vers les fabriques de pourpre, il passa devant l'ergastule, longue maison de pierre noire bâtie dans une fosse carrée avec un petit chemin tout autour et quatre escaliers aux angles.

Pour achever son signal, Iddibal sans doute attendait la nuit. Rien ne presse encore, songeait Hamilcar ; et il descendit dans la prison. Quelques-uns lui crièrent : — " Retourne " ; les plus hardis le suivirent.

La porte ouverte battait au vent. Le crépuscule entrait par les meurtrières étroites, et l'on distinguait dans l'intérieur des chaînes brisées pendant aux murs.

Voilà tout ce qui restait des captifs de guerre.

Alors Hamilcar pâlit extraordinairement, et ceux qui étaient penchés en dehors sur la fosse le virent qui s'appuyait d'une main contre le mur pour ne pas tomber.

Mais le chacal, trois fois de suite, cria. Hamilcar releva la tête ; il ne proféra pas une parole, il ne fit pas un geste. Puis, quand le soleil fut complètement couché, il disparut derrière la haie de nopals, et le soir, à l'assemblée des Riches, dans le temple d'Eschmoûn, il dit en entrant :

— " Lumières des Baalim, j'accepte le commandement des forces puniques contre l'armée des Barbares ! "

Chapitre 8 LA BATAILLE DU MACAR

Dès le lendemain, il tira des Syssites deux cent vingt-trois mille kikar d'or, il décréta un impôt de quatorze shekel sur les Riches. Les femmes mêmes contribuèrent ; on payait pour les enfants, et, chose monstrueuse dans les habitudes carthaginoises, il força les collèges des prêtres à fournir de l'argent.

Il réclama tous les chevaux, tous les mulets, toutes les armes. Quelques-uns voulurent dissimuler leurs richesses, on vendit leurs biens ; et, pour intimider l'avarice des autres, il donna soixante armures et quinze cents gommor de farine, autant à lui seul que la Compagnie-de-l'ivoire.

Il envoya dans la Ligurie acheter des soldats, trois mille montagnards habitués à combattre des ours ; d'avance on leur paya six lunes, à quinze mines par jour. Cependant, il fallait une armée. Mais il n'accepta pas, comme Hannon, tous les citoyens. Il repoussa d'abord les gens d'occupations sédentaires, puis ceux qui avaient le ventre trop gros ou l'aspect pusillanime ; et il admit des hommes déshonorés, la crapule de Malqua, des fils de Barbares, des affranchis. Pour récompense, il promit à des Carthaginois-nouveaux le droit de cité complet.

Son premier soin fut de réformer la Légion. Ces beaux jeunes hommes qui se considéraient comme la majesté militaire de la République, se gouvernaient eux-mêmes. Il cassa leurs officiers ; il les traitait rudement, les faisait courir, sauter, monter tout d'une haleine la pente de Byrsa, lancer des javelots, lutter corps à corps, coucher la nuit sur les places. Leurs familles venaient les voir et les plaignaient.

Il commanda des glaives plus courts, des brodequins plus forts. Il fixa le nombre des valets et réduisit les bagages ; et comme on gardait dans le temple de Moloch trois cents pilums romains, malgré les réclamations du pontife, il les prit.

Avec ceux qui étaient revenus d'Utique et d'autres que les particuliers possédaient, il organisa une phalange de soixante-douze éléphants et les rendit formidables. Il arma leurs conducteurs d'un maillet et d'un ciseau, afin de pouvoir dans la mêlée leur fendre le crâne s'ils s'emportaient.

Il ne permit point que ses généraux fussent nommés par le Grand-Conseil. Les Anciens tâchaient de lui objecter les lois, il passait au travers ; on n'osait plus murmurer, tout pliait sous la violence de son génie.

A lui seul il se chargeait de la guerre, du gouvernement et des finances ; et, afin de prévenir les accusations, il demanda comme examinateur de ses comptes le suffète Hannon.

Il faisait travailler aux remparts, et, pour avoir des pierres, démolir les vieilles murailles intérieures, à présent inutiles. Mais la différence des fortunes, remplaçant la hiérarchie des races, continuait à maintenir séparés les fils des vaincus et ceux des conquérants ; aussi les patriciens virent d'un oeil irrité la destruction de ces ruines, tandis que la plèbe, sans trop savoir pourquoi, s'en réjouissait.

Les troupes en armes, du matin au soir, défilaient dans les rues ; à chaque moment on entendait sonner les trompettes ; sur des chariots passaient des boucliers, des tentes, des piques : les cours étaient pleines de femmes qui déchiraient de la toile ; l'ardeur de l'un à l'autre se communiquait : l'âme d'Hamilcar emplissait la République.

Il avait divisé ses soldats par nombres pairs, en ayant soin de placer dans la longueur des files, alternativement, un homme fort et un homme faible, pour que le moins vigoureux ou le plus lâche fût conduit à la fois et poussé par deux autres. Mais avec ses trois mille Ligures et les meilleurs de Carthage, il ne put former qu'une phalange simple de quatre mille quatre-vingt-seize hoplites, défendus par des casques de bronze, et qui maniaient des sarisses de frêne, longues de quatorze coudées.

Deux mille jeunes hommes portaient des frondes, un poignard et des sandales. Il les renforça de huit cents autres armés d'un bouclier rond et d'un glaive à la romaine.

La grosse cavalerie se composait des dix-neuf cents gardes qui restaient de la Légion, couverts par des lames de bronze vermeil, comme les Clinabares assyriens. Il avait de plus quatre cents archers à cheval, de ceux qu'on appelait des Tarentins, avec des bonnets en peau de belette, une hache à double tranchant et une tunique de cuir. Enfin douze cents Nègres du quartier des caravanes, mêlés aux Clinabares, devaient courir auprès des étalons, en s'appuyant d'une main sur la crinière. Tout était prêt, et cependant Hamilcar ne partait pas.

Souvent la nuit il sortait de Carthage, seul, et il s'enfonçait plus loin que la lagune, vers les embouchures du Macar. Voulait-il se joindre aux Mercenaires ? Les Ligures campant sur les Mappales entouraient sa maison.

Les appréhensions des Riches parurent justifiées quand on vit, un jour, trois cents Barbares s'approcher des murs. Le Suffète leur ouvrit les portes ; c'étaient des transfuges ; ils accouraient vers leur maître, entraînés par la crainte ou par la fidélité.

Le retour d'Hamilcar n'avait point surpris les Mercenaires ; cet homme, dans leurs idées, ne pouvait pas mourir. Il revenait pour accomplir ses promesses : espérance qui n'avait rien d'absurde tant l'abîme était profond entre la Patrie et l'Armée. D'ailleurs, ils ne se croyaient point coupables ; on avait oublié le festin.

Les espions qu'ils surprirent les détrompèrent. Ce fut un triomphe pour les acharnés ; les tièdes même devinrent furieux. Puis les deux sièges les accablaient d'ennui ; rien n'avancait ; mieux valait une bataille ! Aussi beaucoup d'hommes se débandaient, couraient la campagne. A la nouvelle des armements ils revinrent ; Mâtho en bondit de joie. " Enfin ! enfin ! " s'écria-t-il.

Alors le ressentiment qu'il gardait à Salammbô se tourna contre Hamilcar. Sa haine, maintenant, apercevait une proie déterminée ; et comme la vengeance devenait plus facile à concevoir, il croyait presque la tenir et déjà s'y délectait. En même temps il était pris d'une tendresse plus haute, dévoré par un désir plus âcre. Tour à tour il se voyait au milieu des soldats, brandissant sur une pique la tête du Suffète, puis dans la chambre au lit de pourpre, serrant la vierge entre ses bras, couvrant sa figure de baisers, passant ses mains sur ses grands cheveux noirs ; et cette imagination qu'il savait irréalisable le suppliciait. Il se jura, puisque ses compagnons l'avaient nommé schalischim, de conduire la guerre ; la certitude qu'il n'en reviendrait pas le poussait à la rendre impitoyable.

Il arriva chez Spendius, et lui dit :

— " Tu vas prendre tes hommes ! J'amènerai les miens. Avertis Autharite ! Nous sommes perdus si Hamilcar nous attaque ! M'entends-tu ? Lève- toi ! "

Spendius demeura stupéfait devant cet air d'autorité. Mâtho, d'habitude, se laissait conduire, et les emportements qu'il avait eus étaient vite retombés. Mais à présent il semblait tout à la fois plus calme et plus terrible ; une volonté superbe fulgurait dans ses yeux, pareille à la flamme d'un sacrifice.

Le Grec n'écoula pas ses raisons. Il habitait une des tentes carthaginoises à bordures de perles, buvait des boissons fraîches dans des coupes d'argent, jouait au cottabe, laissait croître sa chevelure et conduisait le siège avec lenteur. Du reste, il avait pratiqué des intelligences dans la ville et ne voulait point partir, sûr qu'avant peu de jours elle s'ouvrirait.

Narr'Havas, qui vagabondait entre les trois armées, se trouvait alors près de lui. Il appuya son opinion, et même il blâma le Libyen de vouloir, par un excès de courage, abandonner leur entreprise.

— " Va-t'en, si tu as peur ! " s'écria Mâtho ; " tu nous avais promis de la poix, du soufre, des éléphants, des fantassins, des chevaux ! où sont-ils ? "

Narr'Havas lui rappela qu'il avait exterminé les dernières cohortes d'Hannon ; — quant aux éléphants, on les chassait dans les bois, il armait les fantassins, les chevaux étaient en marche ; et le Numide, en caressant la plume d'autruche qui lui retombait sur l'épaule, roulait ses yeux comme une femme et souriait d'une manière irritante. Mâtho, devant lui, ne trouvait rien à répondre.

Mais un homme que l'on ne connaissait pas entra, mouillé de sueur, effaré, les pieds saignants, la ceinture dénouée ; sa respiration secouait ses flancs maigres à les faire éclater, et tout en parlant un dialecte inintelligible, il ouvrait de grands yeux, comme s'il eût raconté quelque bataille. Le roi bondit dehors et appela ses cavaliers.

Ils se rangèrent dans la plaine, en formant un cercle devant lui. Narr'Havas, à cheval, baissait la tête et se mordait les lèvres. Enfin il sépara ses hommes en deux moitiés, dit à la première de l'attendre ; puis d'un geste impérieux, enlevant les autres au galop, il disparut dans l'horizon, du côté des montagnes.

— " Maître ! " murmura Spendius, " je n'aime pas ces hasards extraordinaires, le Suffète qui revient, Narr'Havas qui s'en va... "

— " Eh ! qu'importe ? ", fit dédaigneusement Mâtho.

C'était une raison de plus pour prévenir Hamilcar en rejoignant Autharite. Mais si l'on abandonnait le siège des villes, leurs habitants sortiraient, les attaqueraient par-derrière, et l'on aurait en face des Carthaginois. Après beaucoup de paroles, les mesures suivantes furent résolues et immédiatement exécutées.

Spendius, avec quinze mille hommes, se porta jusqu'au pont bâti sur le Macar, à trois milles d'Utique ; on en fortifia les angles par quatre tours énormes garnies de catapultes. Avec des troncs d'arbres, des pans de roches, des entrelacs d'épines et des murs de pierres, on boucha, dans les montagnes, tous les sentiers, toutes les gorges ; sur leurs sommets on entassa des herbes qu'on allumerait pour servir de signaux, et des pasteurs habiles à voir de loin, de place en place, y furent postés.

Sans doute Hamilcar ne prendrait pas comme Hannon par la montagne des Eaux-Chaudes. Il devait penser qu'Autharite, maître de l'intérieur, lui fermerait la route. Puis un échec au début de la campagne le perdrait, tandis que la victoire serait à recommencer bientôt, les Mercenaires étant plus loin. Il pouvait encore débarquer au cap des Raisins, et de là marcher sur une des villes. Mais il se trouvait alors entre les deux armées, imprudence dont il n'était pas capable avec des forces peu nombreuses. Donc il devait longer la base de l'Ariana, puis tourner à gauche pour éviter les embouchures du Macar et venir droit au pont. C'est là que Mâtho l'attendait.

La nuit, à la lueur des torches, il surveillait les pionniers. Il courait à Hippo-Zaryte, aux ouvrages des montagnes, revenait, ne se reposait pas. Spendius enviait sa force ; mais pour la conduite des espions, le choix des sentinelles, l'art des machines et tous les moyens défensifs, Mâtho écoutait docilement son compagnon ; et ils ne parlaient plus de Salammbô, — l'un n'y songeant pas, et l'autre empêché par une pudeur.

Souvent il s'en allait du côté de Carthage pour tâcher d'apercevoir les troupes d'Hamilcar. Il dardait ses yeux sur l'horizon ; il se couchait à plat ventre, et dans le bourdonnement de ses artères croyait entendre une armée.

Il dit à Spendius que si, avant trois jours, Hamilcar n'arrivait pas, il irait avec tous ses hommes à sa rencontre lui offrir la bataille. Deux jours encore se passèrent. Spendius le retenait ; le matin du sixième, il partit.

Les Carthaginois n'étaient pas moins que les Barbares impatients de la guerre. Dans les tentes et dans les maisons, c'était le même désir, la même angoisse ; tous se demandaient ce qui retardait Hamilcar.

De temps à autre, il montait sur la coupole du temple d'Eschmoûn, près de l'Annonciateur-des-Lunes, et il regardait le vent.

Un jour, c'était le troisième du mois de Tibby, on le vit descendre de l'Acropole, à pas précipités. Dans les Mappales une grande clameur s'éleva. Bientôt les rues s'agitèrent, et partout les soldats commençaient à s'armer au milieu des femmes en pleurs qui se jetaient contre leur poitrine, puis ils couraient vite sur la place de Khamon prendre leurs rangs. On ne pouvait les suivre ni même leur parler, ni s'approcher des remparts ; pendant quelques minutes, la ville entière fut silencieuse comme un grand tombeau. Les soldats songeaient, appuyés sur leurs lances, et les autres, dans les maisons, soupiraient.

Au coucher du soleil, l'armée sortit par la porte occidentale ; mais au lieu de prendre le chemin de Tunis ou de gagner les montagnes dans la direction d'Utique, on continua par le bord de la mer ; et bientôt ils atteignirent la Lagune, où des places rondes, toutes blanches de sel, miroitaient comme de gigantesques plats d'argent, oubliés sur le rivage.

Puis les flaques d'eau se multiplièrent. Le sol, peu à peu, devenant plus mou, les pieds s'enfonçaient. Hamilcar ne se retourna pas. Il allait toujours en tête ; et son cheval, couvert de macules jaunes comme un dragon, en jetant de l'écume autour de lui, avançait dans la fange à grands coups de reins. La nuit tomba, une nuit sans lune. Quelques-uns crièrent qu'on allait périr ; il leur arracha leurs armes, qui furent données aux valets. La boue cependant était de plus en plus profonde. Il fallut monter sur les bêtes de sommes ; d'autres se cramponnaient à la queue des chevaux ; les robustes tiraient les faibles, et le corps des Ligures poussait l'infanterie avec la pointe des piques.

L'obscurité redoubla. On avait perdu la route. Tous s'arrêtèrent.

Alors les esclaves du Suffète partirent en avant pour chercher les balises plantées par son ordre de distance en distance. Ils criaient dans les ténèbres, et de loin l'armée les suivait.

Enfin on sentit la résistance du sol. Puis une courbe blanchâtre se dessina vaguement, et ils se trouvèrent sur le bord du Macar. Malgré le froid, on n'alluma pas de feu.

Au milieu de la nuit, des rafales de vent s'élevèrent, Hamilcar fit réveiller les soldats, mais pas une trompette ne sonna : leurs capitaines les frappaient doucement sur l'épaule.

Un homme d'une haute taille descendit dans l'eau. Elle ne venait pas à la ceinture ; on pouvait passer.

Le Suffète ordonna que trente-deux des éléphants se placeraient dans le fleuve cent pas plus loin, tandis que les autres, plus bas, arrêteraient les lignes d'hommes emportées par le courant ; et tous, en tenant leurs armes au-dessus de leur tête, traversèrent le Macar comme entre deux murailles. Il avait remarqué que le vent d'ouest, en poussant les sables, obstruait le fleuve et formait dans sa largeur une chaussée naturelle.

Maintenant il était sur la rive gauche en face d'Utique, et dans une vaste plaine, avantage pour ses éléphants qui faisaient la force de son armée.

Ce tour de génie enthousiasma les soldats. Une confiance extraordinaire leur revenait. Ils voulaient tout de suite courir aux Barbares ; le Suffète les fit se reposer pendant deux heures. Dès que le soleil parut, on s'ébranla dans la plaine sur trois lignes : les éléphants d'abord, l'infanterie légère avec la cavalerie derrière elle, la phalange marchait ensuite.

Les Barbares campés à Utique, et les quinze mille autour du pont, furent surpris de voir au loin la terre onduler. Le vent qui soufflait très fort chassait des tourbillons de sable ; ils se levaient comme arrachés du sol, montaient par grands lambeaux de couleur blonde, puis se déchiraient et recommençaient toujours, en cachant aux Mercenaires l'armée punique. A cause des cornes dressées au bord des casques, les uns croyaient apercevoir un troupeau de boeufs ; d'autres, trompés par l'agitation des manteaux, prétendaient distinguer des ailes, et ceux qui avaient beaucoup voyagé, haussant les épaules, expliquaient tout par les illusions du mirage. Cependant, quelque chose d'énorme continuait à s'avancer. De petites vapeurs, subtiles comme des haleines, couraient sur la surface du désert ; le soleil, plus haut maintenant, brillait plus fort : une lumière âpre, et qui semblait vibrer, reculait la profondeur du ciel, et, pénétrant les objets, rendait la distance incalculable. L'immense plaine se développait de tous les côtés à perte de vue ; et les ondulations des terrains, presque insensibles, se prolongeaient jusqu'à l'extrême horizon, fermé par une grande ligne bleue qu'on savait être la mer. Les deux armées, sorties des tentes, regardaient ; les gens d'Utique, pour mieux voir, se tassaient sur les remparts.

Enfin ils distinguèrent plusieurs barres transversales, hérissées de points égaux. Elles devinrent plus épaisses, grandirent ; des monticules noirs se balançaient ; tout à coup des buissons carrés parurent ; c'étaient des éléphants et des lances ; un seul cri s'éleva : — " Les Carthaginois ! " et, sans signal, sans commandement, les soldats d'Utique et ceux du pont coururent pêle-mêle, pour tomber ensemble sur Hamilcar.

A ce nom, Spendius tressaillit. Il répétait en haletant : " Hamilcar ! Hamilcar ! " et Mâtho n'était pas là ! Que faire ? Nul moyen de fuir ! La surprise de l'événement, sa terreur du Suffète et surtout l'urgence d'une résolution immédiate le bouleversaient ; il se voyait traversé de mille glaives, décapité, mort. Cependant on l'appelait ; trente mille hommes allaient le suivre ; une fureur contre lui-même le saisit ; il se rejeta sur l'espérance de la victoire ; elle était pleine de félicités, et il se crut plus intrépide qu'Epaminondas. Pour cacher sa pâleur, il barbouilla ses joues de vermillon, puis il boucla ses cnémides, sa cuirasse, avala une patère de vin pur et courut après sa troupe, qui se hâtait vers celle d'Utique.

Elles se rejoignirent toutes les deux si rapidement que le Suffète n'eut pas le temps de ranger ses hommes en bataille. Peu à peu, il se ralentissait. Les éléphants s'arrêtèrent ; ils balançaient leurs lourdes têtes, chargées de plumes d'autruche, tout en se frappant les épaules avec leur trompe.

Au fond de leurs intervalles, on distinguait les cohortes des vélites, plus loin les grands casques des Clinabares, avec des fers qui brillaient au soleil, des cuirasses, des panaches des étendards agités. Mais l'armée carthaginoise, grosse de onze mille trois cent-quatre-vingt-seize hommes, semblait à peine les contenir, car elle formait un carré long, étroit des flancs et resserré sur soi-même.

En les voyant si faibles, les Barbares, trois fois plus nombreux, furent pris d'une joie désordonnée ; on n'apercevait pas Hamilcar. Il était resté là-bas, peut-être ? Qu'importait d'ailleurs ! Le dédain qu'ils avaient de ces marchands renforçait leur courage ; et avant que Spendius eût commandé la manoeuvre, tous l'avaient comprise et déjà l'exécutaient.

Ils se développèrent sur une grande ligne droite, qui débordait les ailes de l'armée punique, afin de l'envelopper complètement. Mais, quand on fut à trois cents pas d'intervalle, les éléphants, au lieu d'avancer, se retournèrent ! puis voilà que les Clinabares, faisant volte-face, les suivirent ; et la surprise des Mercenaires redoubla en apercevant tous les hommes de trait qui couraient pour les rejoindre. Les Carthaginois avaient donc peur, ils fuyaient ! Une huée formidable éclata dans les troupes des Barbares, et, du haut de son dromadaire, Spendius s'écriait : — " Ah ! je le savais bien ! En avant ! en avant ! "

Alors les javelots, les dards, les balles des frondes jaillirent à la fois. Les éléphants, la croupe piquée par les flèches, se mirent à galoper plus vite ; une grosse poussière les enveloppait, et, comme des ombres dans un nuage, ils s'évanouirent.

Cependant, on entendait au fond un grand bruit de pas, dominé par le son aigu des trompettes qui soufflaient avec furie. Cet espace, que les Barbares avaient devant eux, plein de tourbillons et de tumulte, attirait comme un gouffre ; quelques-uns s'y lancèrent. Des cohortes d'infanterie apparurent ; elles se refermaient ; et, en même temps, tous les autres voyaient accourir les fantassins avec des cavaliers au galop.

En effet, Hamilcar avait ordonné à la phalange de rompre ses sections, aux éléphants, aux troupes légères et à la cavalerie de passer par ces intervalles pour se porter vivement sur les ailes, et calculé si bien la distance des Barbares, que, au moment où ils arrivaient contre lui, l'armée carthaginoise tout entière faisait une grande ligne droite.

Au milieu se hérissait la phalange, formée par des syntagmes ou carrés pleins, ayant seize hommes de chaque côté. Tous les chefs de toutes les files apparaissaient entre de longs fers aigus qui les débordaient inégalement, car les six premiers rangs croisaient leurs sarisses en les tenant par le milieu, et les dix rangs inférieurs les appuyaient sur l'épaule de leurs compagnons se succédant devant eux. Toutes les figures disparaissaient à moitié dans la visière des casques ; des cnémides en bronze couvraient toutes les jambes droites ; les larges boucliers cylindriques descendaient jusqu'aux genoux ; et cette horrible masse quadrangulaire remuait d'une seule pièce, semblait vivre comme une bête et fonctionner comme une machine. Deux cohortes d'éléphants la bordaient régulièrement ; tout en frissonnant, ils faisaient tomber les éclats des flèches attachés à leur peau noire.

Les Indiens accroupis sur leur garrot, parmi les touffes de plumes blanches, les retenaient avec la cuiller du harpon, tandis que, dans les tours, des hommes cachés jusqu'aux épaules promenaient, au bord de grands arcs tendus, des quenouilles en fer garnies d'étoupes allumées. A la droite et à la gauche des éléphants, voltigeaient les frondeurs, une fronde autour des reins, une seconde sur la tête, une troisième à la main droite. Puis les Clinabares, chacun flanqué d'un nègre, tendaient leurs lances entre les oreilles de leurs chevaux tout couverts d'or comme eux. Ensuite s'espaçaient les soldats armés à la légère avec des boucliers en peau de lynx, d'où dépassaient les pointes des javalots qu'ils tenaient dans leur main gauche ; et les Tarentins, conduisant deux chevaux accouplés, relevaient aux deux bouts cette muraille de soldats.

L'armée des Barbares, au contraire, n'avait pu maintenir son alignement. Sur sa longueur exorbitante il s'était fait des ondulations, des vides ; tous haletaient, essoufflés d'avoir couru.

La phalange s'ébranla lourdement en poussant toutes ses sarisses ; sous ce poids énorme la ligne des Mercenaires, trop mince, bientôt plia par le milieu.

Alors les ailes carthaginoises se développèrent pour les saisir : les éléphants les suivaient. Avec ses lances obliquement tendues, la phalange coupa les Barbares ; deux tronçons énormes s'agitèrent ; les ailes, à coup de fronde et de flèche, les rabattaient sur les phalangistes. Pour s'en débarrasser, la cavalerie manquait ; sauf deux cents Numides qui se portèrent contre l'escadron droit des Clinabares, tous les autres se trouvaient enfermés, ne pouvaient sortir de ces lignes. Le péril était imminent et une résolution urgente.

Spendius ordonna d'attaquer la phalange simultanément par les deux flancs, afin de passer tout au travers. Mais les rangs les plus étroits glissèrent sous les plus longs, revinrent à leur place, et elle se retourna contre les Barbares, aussi terrible de ses côtés qu'elle l'était de front tout à l'heure.

Ils frappaient sur la hampe des sarisses, mais la cavalerie, par derrière, gênait leur attaque ; et la phalange, appuyée aux éléphants, se resserrait et s'allongeait, se présentait en carré, en cône, en rhombe, en trapèze, en pyramide. Un double mouvement intérieur se faisait continuellement de sa tête à sa queue ; car ceux qui étaient au bas des files accouraient vers les premiers rangs, et ceux-là, par lassitude ou à cause des blessés, se repliaient plus bas. Les Barbares se trouvèrent foulés sur la phalange. Il lui était impossible de s'avancer ; on aurait dit un océan où bondissaient des aigrettes rouges avec des écailles d'airain, tandis que les clairs boucliers se roulaient comme une écume d'argent. Quelquefois d'un bout à l'autre, de larges courants descendaient, puis ils remontaient, et au milieu une lourde masse se tenait immobile. Les lances s'inclinaient et se relevaient, alternativement. Ailleurs c'était une agitation de glaives nus si précipitée que les pointes seules apparaissaient, et des turmes de cavalerie élargissaient des cercles, qui se refermaient derrière elles en tourbillonnant.

Par-dessus la voix des capitaines, la sonnerie des clairons et le grincement des lyres, les boules de plomb et les amandes d'argile passant dans l'air, sifflaient, faisaient sauter les glaives des mains, la cervelle des crânes. Les blessés, s'abritant d'un bras sous leur bouclier, tendaient leur épée en appuyant le pommeau contre le sol, et d'autres, dans des mares de sang, se retournaient pour mordre les talons. La multitude était si compacte, la poussière si épaisse, le tumulte si fort, qu'il était impossible de rien distinguer ; les lâches qui offrirent de se rendre ne furent même pas entendus. Quand les mains étaient vides, on s'étreignait corps à corps ; les poitrines craquaient contre les cuirasses et des cadavres pendaient la tête en arrière, entre deux bras crispés. Il y eut une compagnie de soixante Ombriens qui, fermes sur leurs jarrets, la pique devant les yeux, inébranlables et grinçant des dents, forcèrent à reculer deux syntagmes à la fois. Des pasteurs épirotes coururent à l'escadron gauche des Clinabares, saisirent les chevaux à la crinière en faisant tournoyer leurs bâtons ; les bêtes, renversant leurs hommes, s'enfuirent par la plaine. Les frondeurs puniques, écartés çà et là, restaient béants. La phalange commençait à osciller, les capitaines couraient éperdus, les serre-files poussaient les soldats, et les Barbares s'étaient reformés ; ils revenaient ; la victoire était pour eux.

Mais un cri, un cri épouvantable éclata, un rugissement de douleur et de colère : c'étaient les soixante-douze éléphants qui se précipitaient sur une double ligne, Hamilcar ayant attendu que les Mercenaires fussent tassés en une seule place pour les lâcher contre eux ; les Indiens les avaient si vigoureusement piqués que du sang coulait sur leurs larges oreilles. Leurs trompes, barbouillées de minium, se tenaient droites en l'air, pareilles à des serpents rouges ; leurs poitrines étaient garnies d'un épieu, leur dos d'une cuirasse, leurs défenses allongées par des lames de fer courbes comme des sabres, — et pour les rendre plus féroces, on les avait enivrés avec un mélange de poivre, de vin pur et d'encens. Ils secouaient leurs colliers de grelots, criaient ; et les éléphantarques baissaient la tête sous le jet des phalariques qui commençaient à voler du haut des tours.

Afin de mieux leur résister les Barbares se ruèrent, en foule compacte ; les éléphants se jetèrent au milieu, impétueusement. Les éperons de leur poitrail, comme des proues de navire, fendaient les cohortes ; elles refluaient à gros bouillons. Avec leurs trompes, ils étouffaient les hommes, ou bien les arrachant du sol, par-dessus leur tête ils les livraient aux soldats dans les tours ; avec leurs défenses, ils les éventraient, les lançaient en l'air, et de longues entrailles pendaient à leurs crocs d'ivoire comme des paquets de cordages à des mâts. Les Barbares tâchaient de leur crever les yeux, de leur couper les jarrets ; d'autres, se glissant sous leur ventre, y enfonçaient un glaive jusqu'à la garde et périssaient écrasés ; les plus intrépides se cramponnaient à leurs courroies ; sous les flammes, sous les balles, sous les flèches, ils continuaient à scier les cuirs, et la tour d'osier s'écroulait comme une tour de pierre. Quatorze de ceux qui se trouvaient à l'extrémité droite, irrités de leurs blessures, se retournèrent sur le second rang ; les Indiens saisirent leur maillet et leur ciseau et l'appliquant au joint de la tête, à tour de bras, ils frappèrent un grand coup.

Les bêtes énormes s'affaissèrent, tombèrent les unes par-dessus les autres. Ce fut comme une montagne ; et sur ce tas de cadavres et d'armures, un éléphant monstrueux qu'on appelait Fureur de Baal pris par la jambe entre des chaînes, resta jusqu'au soir à hurler, avec une flèche dans l'oeil.

Cependant les autres, comme des conquérants qui se délectent dans leur extermination, renversaient, écrasaient, piétinaient, s'acharnaient aux cadavres, aux débris. Pour repousser les manipules serrés en couronnes autour d'eux, ils pivotaient sur leurs pieds de derrière, dans un mouvement de rotation continue, en avançant toujours. Les Carthaginois sentirent redoubler leur vigueur, et la bataille recommença.

Les Barbares faiblissaient ; des hoplites grecs jetèrent leurs armes, une épouvante prit les autres. On aperçut Spendius penché sur son dromadaire et qui l'éperonnait aux épaules avec deux javelots. Tous alors se précipitèrent par les ailes et coururent vers Utique.

Les Clinabares, dont les chevaux n'en pouvaient plus, n'essayèrent pas de les atteindre. Les Ligures, exténués de soif, criaient pour se porter sur le fleuve. Mais les Carthaginois, placés au milieu des syntagmes, et qui avaient moins souffert, trépignaient de désir devant leur vengeance qui fuyait ; déjà ils s'élançaient à la poursuite des Mercenaires ; Hamilcar parut.

Il retenait avec des rênes d'argent son cheval tigré tout couvert de sueur. Les bandelettes attachées aux cornes de son casque claquaient au vent derrière lui, et il avait mis sous sa cuisse gauche son bouclier ovale. D'un mouvement de sa pique à trois pointes, il arrêta l'armée.

Les Tarentins sautèrent vite de leur cheval sur le second, et partirent à droite et à gauche vers le fleuve et vers la ville.

La phalange extermina commodément tout ce qui restait de Barbares. Quand arrivaient les épées, ils tendaient la gorge en fermant les paupières. D'autres se défendirent à outrance ; on les assomma de loin, sous des cailloux, comme des chiens enragés, Hamilcar avait recommandé de faire des captifs. Mais les Carthaginois lui obéissaient avec rancune, tant ils sentaient de plaisir à enfoncer leurs glaives dans les corps des Barbares. Comme ils avaient trop chaud, ils se mirent à travailler nu-bras, à la manière des faucheurs ; et lorsqu'ils s'interrompaient pour reprendre haleine, ils suivaient des yeux, dans la campagne, un cavalier galopant après un soldat qui courait. Il parvenait à le saisir par les cheveux, le tenait ainsi quelque temps, puis l'abattait d'un coup de hache.

La nuit tomba. Les Carthaginois, les Barbares avaient disparu. Les éléphants, qui s'étaient enfuis, vagabondaient à l'horizon avec leurs tours incendiées. Elles brûlaient dans les ténèbres, çà et là, comme des phares à demi perdus dans la brume ; et l'on n'apercevait d'autre mouvement sur la plaine que l'ondulation du fleuve, exhaussé par les cadavres et qui les charriait à la mer.

Deux heures après, Mâtho arriva. Il entrevit à la clarté des étoiles de longs tas inégaux couchés par terre.

C'étaient des files de Barbares. Il se baissa ; tous étaient morts, il appela au loin ; aucune voix ne lui répondit.

Le matin même, il avait quitté Hippo-Zaryte avec ses soldats pour marcher sur Carthage. A Utique, l'armée de Spendius venait de partir, et les habitants commençaient à incendier les machines. Tous s'étaient battus avec acharnement. Mais le tumulte qui se faisait vers le pont redoublant d'une façon incompréhensible, Mâtho s'était jeté, par le plus court chemin, à travers la montagne, et, comme les Barbares s'enfuyaient par la plaine, il n'avait rencontré personne.

En face de lui, de petites masses pyramidales se dressaient dans l'ombre, et en deçà du fleuve, plus près, il y avait à ras du sol des lumières immobiles. En effet, les Carthaginois s'étaient repliés derrière le pont, et, pour tromper les Barbares, le Suffète avait établi des postes nombreux sur l'autre rive.

Mâtho, s'avançant toujours, crut distinguer des enseignes puniques, car des têtes de cheval qui ne bougeaient pas apparaissaient dans l'air, fixées au sommet des hampes en faisceau que l'on ne pouvait voir ; et il entendit plus loin une grande rumeur, un bruit de chansons et de coupes heurtées.

Alors, ne sachant où il se trouvait, ni comment découvrir Spendius, tout assailli d'angoisses, effaré, perdu dans les ténèbres, il s'en retourna par le même chemin plus impétueusement. L'aube blanchissait, quand du haut de la montagne il aperçut la ville, avec les carcasses des machines noircies par les flammes, comme des squelettes de géant qui s'appuyaient aux murs.

Tout reposait dans un silence et dans un accablement extraordinaires. Parmi ses soldats, au bord des tentes, des hommes presque nus dormaient sur le dos, ou le front contre leur bras que soutenait leur cuirasse. Quelques-uns décollaient de leurs jambes des bandelettes ensanglantées. Ceux qui allaient mourir roulaient leur tête, tout doucement ; d'autres, en se traînant, leur apportaient à boire. Le long des chemins étroits les sentinelles marchaient pour se réchauffer, ou se tenaient la figure tournée vers l'horizon, avec leur pique sur l'épaule, dans une attitude farouche.

Mâtho trouva Spendius abrité sous un lambeau de toile que supportaient deux bâtons par terre, le genou dans les mains, la tête basse.

Ils restèrent longtemps sans parler.

Enfin Mâtho murmura : — " Vaincus !

Spendius reprit d'une voix sombre : — " Oui, vaincus ! "

Et à toutes les questions il répondait par des gestes désespérés.

Cependant des soupirs, des râles arrivaient jusqu'à eux. Mâtho entrouvrit la toile. Alors le spectacle des soldats lui rappela un autre désastre, au même endroit, et en grinçant des dents :

— " Misérable ! une fois déjà... "

Spendius l'interrompit :

— " Tu n'y étais pas non plus. "

— " C'est une malédiction ! " s'écria Mâtho. " A la fin pourtant, je l'atteindrai ! je le vaincrai ! je le tuerai ! Ah ! Si j'avais été là... " L'idée d'avoir manqué la bataille le désespérait plus encore que la défaite. Il arracha son glaive, le jeta par terre. " Mais comment les Carthaginois vous ont-ils battus ? "

L'ancien esclave se mit à raconter les manoeuvres. Mâtho croyait les voir et il s'irritait. L'armée d'Utique, au lieu de courir vers le pont, aurait dû prendre Hamilcar par-derrière.

— " Eh ! je le sais ! " dit Spendius.

— " Il fallait doubler tes profondeurs, ne pas compromettre les vélites contre la phalange, donner des issues aux éléphants. Au dernier moment on pouvait tout regagner : rien ne forçait à fuir. "

Spendius répondit :

— " Je l'ai vu passer dans son grand manteau rouge, les bras levés, plus haut que la poussière, comme un aigle qui volait au flanc des cohortes ; et, à tous les signes de sa tête, elles se resserraient, s'élançaient ; la foule nous a entraînés l'un vers l'autre : il me regardait ; j'ai senti dans mon coeur comme le froid d'une épée. "

— " Il aura peut-être choisi le jour ? " se disait tout bas Mâtho.

Ils s'interrogèrent, tâchant de découvrir ce qui avait amené le Suffète précisément dans la circonstance la plus défavorable. Ils en vinrent à causer de la situation, et, pour atténuer sa faute ou se redonner à lui-même du courage, Spendius avança qu'il restait encore de l'espoir.

— " Qu'il n'en reste plus, n'importe ! " dit Mâtho, " tout seul, je continuerai la guerre ! "

— " Et moi aussi ! " s'écria le Grec en bondissant ; il marchait à grands pas ; ses prunelles étincelaient et un sourire étrange plissait sa figure de chacal.

— " Nous recommencerons, ne me quitte plus ! je ne suis pas fait pour les batailles au grand soleil ; l'éclat des épées me trouble la vue ; c'est une maladie, j'ai trop longtemps vécu dans l'ergastule. Mais donne-moi des murailles à escalader la nuit, et j'entrerais dans les citadelles, et les cadavres seront froids avant que les coqs aient chanté ! Montre-moi quelqu'un, quelque chose, un ennemi, un trésor, une femme " ; il répéta : " Une femme, fut-elle la fille d'un roi, et j'apporterai vivement ton désir devant tes pieds. Tu me reproches d'avoir perdu la bataille contre Hannon, je l'ai regagnée pourtant. Avoue-le ! mon troupeau de porcs nous a plus servi qu'une phalange de Spartiates. " Et, cédant au besoin de se rehausser et de saisir sa revanche, il énuméra tout ce qu'il avait fait pour la cause des Mercenaires. " C'est moi dans les jardins du Suffète, qui ai poussé le Gaulois ! Plus tard, à Sicca, je les ai tous enragés avec la peur de la République ! Giscon les renvoyait, mais je n'ai pas voulu que les interprètes pussent parler. Ah ! comme la langue leur pendait de la bouche ! t'en souviens-tu ? Je t'ai conduit dans Carthage ; j'ai volé le zaïmph. Je t'ai mené chez elle. Je ferai plus encore : tu verras ! " Il éclata de rire comme un fou.

Mâtho le considérait les yeux béants. Il éprouvait une sorte de malaise devant cet homme, qui était à la fois si lâche et si terrible.

Le Grec reprit d'un ton jovial, en faisant claquer ses doigts :

— " Evohé ! Après la pluie, le soleil ! J'ai travaillé aux carrières et j'ai bu du massique dans un vaisseau qui m'appartient, sous un tendelet d'or, comme un Ptolémée. Le malheur doit servir à nous rendre plus habiles. A force de travail, on assouplit la fortune. Elle aime les politiques. Elle cédera ! "

Il revint sur Mâtho et, le prenant au bras :

— " Maître, à présent les Carthaginois sont sûrs de leur victoire. Tu as toute une armée qui n'a pas combattu, et tes hommes t'obéissent, à toi. Place-les en avant ; : les miens, pour se venger, marcheront. Il me reste trois mille Cariens, douze cents frondeurs et des archers, des cohortes entières ! . On peut même former une phalange, retournons ! "

Mâtho, abasourdi par le désastre, n'avait jusqu'à présent rien imaginé pour en sortir. Il écoutait, la bouche ouverte, et les lames de bronze qui cerclaient ses côtes se soulevaient aux bondissements de son coeur. Il ramassa son épée, en criant :

— " Suis-moi, marchons ! "

Mais les éclaireurs, quand ils furent revenus, annoncèrent que les morts des Carthaginois étaient enlevés, le pont tout en ruine et Hamilcar disparu.

Chapitre 9 EN CAMPAGNE

Il avait pensé que les Mercenaires l'attendraient à Utique ou qu'ils reviendraient contre lui ; et, ne trouvant pas ses forces suffisantes pour donner l'attaque ou pour la recevoir, il s'était enfoncé dans le sud, par la rive droite du fleuve, ce qui le mettait immédiatement à couvert d'une surprise.

Il voulait, fermant d'abord les yeux sur leur révolte, détacher toutes les tribus de la cause des Barbares ; puis, quand ils seraient bien isolés au milieu des provinces, il tomberait sur eux et les exterminerait.

En quatorze jours, il pacifia la région comprise entre Thouccaber et Utique, avec les villes de Tignicabah, Tessourah, Vacca et d'autres encore à l'occident ; Zounghar bâtie dans les montagnes ; Assouras célèbre par son temple, Djeraado fertile en genévriers ; Thapitis et Hagour lui envoyèrent des ambassades. Les gens de la campagne arrivaient les mains pleines de vivres, imploraient sa protection, baisaient ses pieds, ceux des soldats, et se plaignaient des Barbares. Quelques-uns venaient lui offrir, dans des sacs, des têtes de Mercenaires, tués par eux, disaient-ils, mais qu'ils avaient coupées à des cadavres ; car beaucoup s'étaient perdus en fuyant, et on les trouvait morts de place en place, sous les oliviers et dans les vignes.

Pour éblouir le peuple, Hamilcar, dès le lendemain de la victoire, avait envoyé à Carthage les deux mille captifs faits sur le champ de bataille. Ils arrivèrent par longues compagnies de cent hommes chacune, tous les bras attachés sur le dos avec une barre de bronze qui les prenait à la nuque, et les blessés, en saignant, couraient aussi ; des cavaliers, derrière eux, les chassaient à coups de fouet.

Ce fut un délire de joie ! On se répétait qu'il y avait eu six mille Barbares de tués ; les autres ne tiendraient pas, la guerre était finie ; on s'embrassait dans les rues, et l'on frotta de beurre et de cinnamome la figure des Dieux-Patæques pour les remercier. Avec leurs gros yeux, leur gros ventre et leurs deux bras levés jusqu'aux épaules, ils semblaient vivre sous leur peinture plus fraîche et participer à l'allégresse du peuple. Les Riches laissaient leurs portes ouvertes ; la ville retentissait du ronflement des tambourins ; les temples toutes les nuits étaient illuminés, et les servantes de la Déesse descendues dans Malqua établirent au coin des carrefours des tréteaux en sycomore, où elles se prostituaient. On vota des terres pour les vainqueurs, des holocaustes pour Melkarth, trois cents couronnes d'or pour le Suffète, et ses partisans proposaient de lui décerner des prérogatives et des honneurs nouveaux.

Il avait sollicité les Anciens de faire des ouvertures à Autharite pour échanger contre tous les Barbares, s'il le fallait, le vieux Giscon avec les autres Carthaginois détenus comme lui. Les Libyens et les Nomades qui composaient l'armée d'Autharite connaissaient à peine ces Mercenaires, hommes de race italote ou grecque ; et puisque la République leur offrait tant de Barbares contre si peu de Carthaginois, c'est que les uns étaient de nulle valeur et que les autres en avaient une considérable. Ils craignaient un piège. Autharite refusa.

Alors les Anciens décrétèrent l'exécution des captifs, bien que le Suffète leur eût écrit de ne pas les mettre à mort. Il comptait incorporer les meilleurs dans ses troupes et exciter par là des défections. Mais la haine emporta toute réserve.

Les deux mille Barbares furent attachés dans les Mappales, contre les stèles des tombeaux ; et des marchands, des goujats de cuisine, des brodeurs et même des femmes, les veuves des morts avec leurs enfants, tous ceux qui voulaient, vinrent les tuer à coups de flèche. On les visait lentement, pour mieux prolonger leur supplice : on baissait son arme, puis on la relevait tour à tour ; et la multitude se poussait en hurlant. Des paralytiques se faisaient amener sur des civières ; beaucoup, par précaution, apportaient leur nourriture et restaient là jusqu'au soir ; d'autres y passaient la nuit. On avait planté des tentes où l'on buvait. Plusieurs gagnèrent de fortes sommes à louer des arcs.

Puis on laissa debout tous ces cadavres crucifiés, qui semblaient sur les tombeaux autant de statues rouges et l'exaltation gagnait jusqu'aux gens de Malqua, issus des familles autochtones et d'ordinaire indifférents aux choses de la patrie. Par reconnaissance des plaisirs qu'elle leur donnait, maintenant ils s'intéressaient à sa fortune, se sentaient Puniques, et les Anciens trouvèrent habile d'avoir ainsi fondu dans une même vengeance le peuple entier.

La sanction des Dieux n'y manqua pas ; car de tous les côtés du ciel des corbeaux s'abattirent. Ils volaient en tournant dans l'air avec de grands cris rauques, et faisaient un nuage énorme qui roulait sur soi-même continuellement. On l'apercevait de Clypéa, de Rhadès et du promontoire Hermaeum. Parfois il se crevait tout à coup, élargissant au loin ses spirales noires ; c'était un aigle qui fondait dans le milieu, puis repartait ; sur les terrasses, sur les dômes, à la pointe des obélisques et au fronton des temples, il y avait, çà et là, de gros oiseaux qui tenaient dans leur bec rougi des lambeaux humains.

A cause de l'odeur, les Carthaginois se résignèrent à délier les cadavres. On en brûla quelques-uns ; on jeta les autres à la mer, et les vagues poussées par le vent du nord, en déposèrent sur la plage, au fond du golfe, devant le camp d'Autharite.

Ce châtiment avait terrifié les Barbares, sans doute, car du haut d'Eschmoûn on les vit abattre leurs tentes, réunir leurs troupeaux, hisser leurs bagages sur des ânes, et le soir du même jour l'armée entière s'éloigna.

Elle devait, en se portant depuis la montagne des Eaux-Chaudes jusqu'à Hippo-Zaryte alternativement, interdire au Suffète l'approche des villes tyriennes avec la possibilité d'un retour sur Carthage.

Pendant ce temps-là, les deux autres armées tâcheraient de l'atteindre dans le sud, Spendius par l'Orient, Mâtho par l'Occident, de manière à se joindre toutes les trois pour le surprendre et l'enlacer. Puis un renfort qu'ils n'espéraient pas leur survint : Narr'Havas reparut, avec trois cents chameaux chargés de bitume, vingt-cinq éléphants et six mille cavaliers.

Le Suffète, pour affaiblir les Mercenaires, avait jugé prudent de l'occuper au loin dans son royaume. Du fond de Carthage, il s'était entendu avec Masgaba, un brigand gétule qui cherchait à se faire un empire. Fort de l'argent punique, le coureur d'aventures avait soulevé les Etats numides en leur promettant la liberté. Mais Narr'Havas, prévenu par le fils de sa nourrice, était tombé dans Cirta, avait empoisonné les vainqueurs avec l'eau des citernes, abattu quelques têtes, tout rétabli, et il arrivait contre le Suffète plus furieux que les Barbares.

Les chefs des quatre armées s'entendirent sur les dispositions de la guerre. Elle serait longue : il fallait tout prévoir.

On convint d'abord de réclamer l'assistance des Romains, et l'on offrit cette mission à Spendius ; comme transfuge, il n'osa s'en charger.

Douze hommes des colonies grecques s'embarquèrent à Annaba sur une chaloupe des Numides. Puis les chefs exigèrent de tous les Barbares le serment d'une obéissance complète. Chaque jour les capitaines inspectaient les vêtements, les chaussures ; on défendit même aux sentinelles l'usage du bouclier, car souvent elles l'appuyaient contre leur lance et s'endormaient debout ; ceux qui traînaient quelque bagage furent contraints de s'en défaire ; tout, à la mode romaine, devait être porté sur le dos. Par précaution contre les éléphants, Mâtho institua un corps de cavaliers cataphractes, où l'homme et le cheval disparaissaient sous une cuirasse en peau d'hippopotame hérissée de clous ; et pour protéger la corne des chevaux, on leur fit des bottines en tresse de sparterie.

Il fut interdit de piller les bourgs, de tyranniser les habitants de race non punique. Mais comme la contrée s'épuisait, Mâtho ordonna de distribuer les vivres par tête de soldat, sans s'inquiéter des femmes. D'abord ils les partagèrent avec elles. Faute de nourriture, beaucoup s'affaiblissaient. C'était une occasion incessante de querelles, d'invectives, plusieurs attirant les compagnes des autres par l'appât ou même la promesse de leur portion. Mâtho commanda de les chasser toutes, impitoyablement. Elles se réfugièrent dans le camp d'Autharite ; mais les Gauloises et les Libyennes, à force d'outrages, les contraignirent à s'en aller.

Enfin elles vinrent sous les murs de Carthage implorer la protection de Cérès et de Proserpine, car il y avait dans Byrsa un temple et des prêtres consacrés à ces déesses, en expiation des horreurs commises autrefois au siège de Syracuse. Les Syssites, alléguant leur droit d'épaves, réclamèrent les plus jeunes pour les vendre ; et des Carthaginois- nouveaux prirent en mariage des Lacédémoniennes qui étaient blondes.

Quelques-unes s'obstinèrent à suivre les armées. Elles couraient sur le flanc des syntagmes, à côté des capitaines. Elles appelaient leurs hommes, les tiraient par le manteau, se frappaient la poitrine en les maudissant, et tendaient au bout de leurs bras leurs petits enfants nus qui pleuraient. Ce spectacle amollissait les Barbares ; elles étaient un embarras, un péril. Plusieurs fois on les repoussa, elles revenaient ; Mâtho les fit charger à coups de lance par les cavaliers de Narr'Havas ; et comme des Baléares lui criaient qu'il leur fallait des femmes :

— " Moi je n'en ai pas ! " répondit-il.

A présent, le génie de Moloch l'envahissait. Malgré les rébellions de sa conscience, il exécutait des choses épouvantables, s'imaginant obéir à la voix d'un Dieu. Quand il ne pouvait les ravager, Mâtho jetait des pierres dans les champs pour les rendre stériles.

Par des messages réitérés, il pressait Autharite et Spendius de se hâter. Mais les opérations du Suffète étaient incompréhensibles. Il campa successivement à Eidous, à Monchar, à Tehent ; des éclaireurs crurent l'apercevoir aux environs d'Ischil, près des frontières de Narr'Havas, et l'on apprit qu'il avait traversé le fleuve au-dessus de Tebourba comme pour revenir à Carthage. A peine dans un endroit, il se transportait vers un autre. Les routes qu'il prenait restaient toujours inconnues. Sans livrer de bataille, le Suffète conservait ses avantages ; poursuivi par les Barbares, il semblait les conduire.

Ces marches et ces contre-marches fatiguaient encore plus les Carthaginois ; et les forces d'Hamilcar, n'étant pas renouvelées, de jour en jour diminuaient. Les gens de la campagne lui apportaient maintenant des vivres avec plus de lenteur. Il rencontrait partout une hésitation, une haine taciturne ; et malgré ses supplications près du Grand-Conseil, aucun secours n'arrivait de Carthage.

On disait (on croyait peut-être) qu'il n'en avait pas besoin. C'était une ruse ou des plaintes inutiles ; et les partisans d'Hannon, afin de le desservir, exagéraient l'importance de sa victoire. Les troupes qu'il commandait, on en faisait le sacrifice ; mais on n'allait pas ainsi continuellement fournir toutes ses demandes. La guerre était bien assez lourde ! elle avait trop coûté, et, par orgueil, les patriciens de sa faction l'appuyaient avec mollesse.

Alors, désespérant de la République, Hamilcar leva de force dans les tribus tout ce qu'il lui fallait pour la guerre : du grain, de l'huile, du bois, des bestiaux et des hommes. Mais les habitants ne tardèrent pas à s'enfuir. Les bourgs que l'on traversait étaient vides, on fouillait les cabanes sans y rien trouver ; bientôt une effroyable solitude enveloppa l'armée punique.

Les Carthaginois, furieux, se mirent à saccager les provinces ; ils comblaient les citernes, incendiaient les maisons. Les flammèches, emportées par le vent, s'éparpillaient au loin, et sur les montagnes des forêts entières brûlaient ; elles bordaient les vallées d'une couronne de feux ; pour passer au-delà, on était forcé d'attendre. Puis ils reprenaient leur marche, en plein soleil, sur des cendres chaudes.

Quelquefois ils voyaient, au bord de la route, luire dans un buisson comme des prunelles de chat-tigre. C'était un Barbare accroupi sur les talons, et qui s'était barbouillé de poussière pour se confondre avec la couleur du feuillage ; ou bien quand on longeait une ravine, ceux qui étaient sur les ailes entendaient tout à coup rouler des pierres ; et, en levant les yeux, ils apercevaient dans l'écartement de la gorge un homme pieds nus qui bondissait.

Cependant Utique et Hippo-Zaryte étaient libres, puisque les Mercenaires ne les assiégeaient plus. Hamilcar leur commanda de venir à son aide. Mais, n'osant se compromettre, elles lui répondirent par des mots vagues, des compliments, des excuses.

Il remonta dans le nord brusquement, décidé à s'ouvrir une des villes tyriennes, dût-il en faire le siège. Il lui fallait un point sur la côte, afin de tirer des îles ou de Cyrène des approvisionnements et des soldats, et il convoitait le port d'Utique comme étant le plus près de Carthage.

Le Suffète partit donc de Zouitin et tourna le lac d'Hippo-Zaryte avec prudence. Mais bientôt il fut contraint d'allonger ses régiments en colonne pour gravir la montagne qui sépare les deux vallées. Au coucher du soleil ils descendaient dans son sommet creusé en forme d'entonnoir, quand ils aperçurent devant eux, à ras du sol, des louves de bronze qui semblaient courir sur l'herbe.

Tout à coup de grands panaches se levèrent, et au grand rythme des flûtes un chant formidable éclata. C'était l'armée de Spendius ; car des Campaniens et des Grecs, par exécration de Carthage, avaient pris les enseignes de Rome. En même temps, sur la gauche, apparurent de longues piques, des boucliers en peau de léopard, des cuirasses de lin, des épaules nues.

C'étaient les Ibériens de Mâtho, les Lusitaniens, les Baléares, les Gétules ; on entendit le hennissement des chevaux de Narr'Havas ; ils se répandirent autour de la colline ; puis arriva la vague cohue que commandait Autharite ; les Gaulois, les Libyens, les Nomades ; et l'on reconnaissait au milieu d'eux les Mangeurs-de-choses-immondes aux arêtes de poisson qu'ils portaient dans la chevelure.

Ainsi les Barbares, combinant exactement leurs marches, s'étaient rejoints. Mais, surpris eux-mêmes, ils restèrent quelques minutes immobiles et se consultant.

Le Suffète avait tassé ses hommes en une masse orbiculaire, de façon à offrir partout une résistance égale. Les hauts boucliers pointus, fichés dans le gazon les uns près des autres, entouraient l'infanterie. Les Clinabares se tenaient en dehors, et plus loin, de place en place, les éléphants. Les Mercenaires étaient harassés de fatigue ; il valait mieux attendre jusqu'au jour ; et, certains de leur victoire, les Barbares, pendant toute la nuit, s'occupèrent à manger.

Ils avaient allumé de grands feux clairs qui, en les éblouissant, laissaient dans l'ombre l'armée punique au-dessous d'eux. Hamilcar fit creuser autour de son camp, comme les Romains, un fossé large de quinze pas, profond de six coudées ; avec la terre exhausser à l'intérieur un parapet sur lequel on planta des pieux aigus qui s'entrelaçaient, et, au soleil levant, les Mercenaires furent ébahis d'apercevoir tous les Carthaginois ainsi retranchés comme dans une forteresse.

Ils reconnaissaient au milieu des tentes Hamilcar qui se promenait en distribuant des ordres. Il avait le corps pris dans une cuirasse brune tailladée en petites écailles ; et, suivi de son cheval, de temps en temps il s'arrêtait pour désigner quelque chose de son bras droit étendu.

Alors plus d'un se rappela des matinées pareilles, quand, au fracas des clairons, il passait devant eux lentement, et que ses regards les fortifiaient comme des coupes de vin. Une sorte d'attendrissement les saisit. Ceux, au contraire, qui ne connaissaient pas Hamilcar, dans leur joie de le tenir, déliraient.

Cependant, si tous attaquaient à la fois, on se nuirait mutuellement dans l'espace trop étroit. Les Numides pouvaient se lancer au travers ; mais les Clinabares défendus par des cuirasses les écraseraient ; puis comment franchir les palissades ? Quant aux éléphants, ils n'étaient pas suffisamment instruits.

— " Vous êtes tous des lâches ! " s'écria Mâtho.

Et, avec les meilleurs, il se précipita contre le retranchement. Une volée de pierres les repoussa ; car le Suffète avait pris sur le pont leurs catapultes abandonnées.

Cet insuccès fit tourner brusquement l'esprit mobile des Barbares.

L'excès de leur bravoure disparut ; ils voulaient vaincre, mais en se risquant le moins possible. D'après Spendius, il fallait garder soigneusement la position que l'on avait et affamer l'armée punique. Mais les Carthaginois se mirent à creuser des puits, et des montagnes entourant la colline, ils découvrirent de l'eau.

Du sommet de leur palissade ils lançaient des flèches, de la terre, du fumier, des cailloux qu'ils arrachaient du sol, pendant que les six catapultes roulaient incessamment sur la longueur de la terrasse.

Mais les sources d'elles-mêmes se tariraient ; on épuiserait les vivres, on userait les catapultes ; les Mercenaires, dix fois plus nombreux, finiraient par triompher. Le Suffète imagina des négociations afin de gagner du temps, et un matin les Barbares trouvèrent dans leurs lignes une peau de mouton couverte d'écritures. Il se justifiait de sa victoire : les Anciens l'avaient forcé à la guerre, et pour leur montrer qu'il gardait sa parole, il leur offrait le pillage d'Utique ou celui d'Hippo-Zaryte, à leur choix ; Hamilcar, en terminant, déclarait ne pas les craindre, parce qu'il avait gagné des traîtres et que, grâce à ceux-là, il viendrait à bout, facilement, de tous les autres.

Les Barbares furent troublés : cette proposition d'un butin immédiat les faisait rêver ; ils appréhendaient une trahison, ne soupçonnant point un piège dans la forfanterie du Suffète, et ils commencèrent à se regarder les uns les autres avec méfiance. On observait les paroles, les démarches ; des terreurs les réveillaient la nuit. Plusieurs abandonnaient leurs compagnons ; suivant sa fantaisie on choisissait son armée, et les Gaulois avec Autharite allèrent se joindre aux hommes de la Cisalpine dont ils comprenaient la langue.

Les quatre chefs se réunissaient tous les soirs dans la tente de Mâtho, et, accroupis autour d'un bouclier, ils avançaient et reculaient attentivement les petites figurines de bois, inventées par Pyrrhus pour reproduire les manœuvres. Spendius démontrait les ressources d'Hamilcar ; il suppliait de ne point compromettre l'occasion et jurait par tous les Dieux. Mâtho, irrité, marchait en gesticulant. La guerre contre Carthage était sa chose personnelle ; il s'indignait que les autres s'en mêlassent sans vouloir lui obéir. Autharite, à sa figure, devinait ses paroles, applaudissait. Narr'Havas levait le menton en signe de dédain ; pas une mesure qu'il ne jugeât funeste ; et il ne souriait plus.

Des soupirs lui échappaient comme s'il eût refoulé la douleur d'un rêve impossible, le désespoir d'une entreprise manquée.

Pendant que les Barbares, incertains, délibéraient, le Suffète augmentait ses défenses : il fit creuser en deçà des palissades un second fossé, élever une seconde muraille, construire aux angles des tours de bois ; et ses esclaves allaient jusqu'au milieu des avant-postes enfoncer les chausse-trapes dans la terre. Mais les éléphants, dont les rations étaient diminuées, se débattaient dans leurs entraves. Pour ménager les herbes, il ordonna aux Clinabares de tuer les moins robustes des étalons. Quelques-uns s'y refusèrent ; il les fit décapiter. On mangea les chevaux. Le souvenir de cette viande fraîche, les jours suivants, fut une grande tristesse.

Du fond de l'amphithéâtre où ils se trouvaient resserrés, ils voyaient tout autour d'eux, sur les hauteurs, les quatre camps des Barbares pleins d'agitation. Des femmes circulaient avec des outres sur la tête, des chèvres en bêlant erraient sous les faisceaux des piques ; on relevait les sentinelles, on mangeait autour des trépieds. En effet, les tribus leur fournissaient des vivres abondamment, et ils ne se doutaient pas eux-mêmes combien leur inaction effrayait l'armée punique.

Dès le second jour, les Carthaginois avaient remarqué dans le camp des Nomades une troupe de trois cents hommes à l'écart des autres. C'étaient les Riches, retenus prisonniers depuis le commencement de la guerre. Des Libyens les rangèrent tous au bord du fossé, et, postés derrière eux, ils envoyaient des javelots en se faisant un rempart de leur corps. A peine pouvait-on reconnaître ces misérables, tant leur visage disparaissait sous la vermine et les ordures. Leurs cheveux arrachés par endroits laissaient à nu les ulcères de leur tête, et ils étaient si maigres et hideux qu'ils ressemblaient à des momies dans des linceuls troués. Quelques-uns, en tremblant, sanglotaient d'un air stupide ; les autres criaient à leurs amis de tirer sur les Barbares. Il y en avait un, tout immobile, le front baissé, qui ne parlait pas ; sa grande barbe blanche tombait jusqu'à ses mains couvertes de chaînes ; et les Carthaginois, en sentant au fond de leur cœur comme l'écroulement de la République, reconnaissaient Giscon. Bien que la place fût dangereuse, ils se poussaient pour le voir. On l'avait coiffé d'une tiare grotesque, en cuir d'hippopotame, incrustée de cailloux. C'était une imagination d'Autharite ; mais cela déplaisait à Mâtho.

Hamilcar, exaspéré, fit ouvrir les palissades, résolu à se faire jour n'importe comment ; et d'un train furieux les Carthaginois montèrent jusqu'à mi-côte, pendant trois cents pas. Un tel flot de Barbares descendit qu'ils furent refoulés sur leurs lignes. Un des gardes de la Légion, resté en dehors, trébuchait parmi les pierres. Zarxas accourut, et, le terrassant, il lui enfonça un poignard dans la gorge ; il l'en retira, se jeta sur la blessure, — et, la bouche collée contre elle, avec des grondements de joie et des soubresauts qui le secouaient jusqu'aux talons, il pompait le sang à pleine poitrine ; puis, tranquillement, il s'assit sur le cadavre, releva son visage en se renversant le cou pour mieux humer l'air, comme fait une biche qui vient de boire à un torrent, et, d'une voix aiguë, il entonna une chanson des Baléares, une vague mélodie pleine de modulations prolongées, s'interrompant, alternant, comme des échos qui se répondent dans les montagnes ; il appelait ses frères morts et les conviait à un festin ; — puis il laissa retomber ses mains entre ses jambes, baissa lentement la tête, et pleura. Cette chose atroce fit horreur aux Barbares, aux Grecs surtout.

Les Carthaginois, à partir de ce moment, ne tentèrent aucune sortie ; — et ils ne songeaient pas à se rendre, certains de périr dans les supplices.

Cependant, les vivres, malgré les soins d'Hamilcar, diminuaient effroyablement. Pour chaque homme, il ne restait plus que dix k'kommer de blé, trois hin de millet et douze betza de fruits secs. Plus de viande, plus d'huile, plus de salaisons, pas un grain d'orge pour les chevaux ; on les voyait, baissant leur encolure amaigrie, chercher dans la poussière des brins de paille piétinés. Souvent les sentinelles en vedette sur la terrasse apercevaient, au clair de la lune, un chien des Barbares qui venait rôder sous le retranchement, dans les tas d'immondices ; on l'assommait avec une pierre, et, s'aidant des courroies du bouclier, on descendait le long des palissades, puis, sans rien dire, on le mangeait. Parfois d'horribles aboiements s'élevaient, et l'homme ne remontait plus. Dans la quatrième dilochie de la douzième syntagme, trois phalangites, en se disputant un rat, se tuèrent à coups de couteau.

Tous regrettaient leurs familles, leurs maisons : les pauvres, leurs cabanes en forme de ruche, avec des coquilles au seuil des portes, un filet suspendu, et les patriciens, leurs grandes salles emplies de ténèbres bleuâtres, quand, à l'heure la plus molle du jour, ils se reposaient, écoutant le bruit vague des rues mêlé au frémissement des feuilles qui s'agitaient dans leurs jardins ; — et, pour mieux descendre dans cette pensée, afin d'en jouir davantage, ils entre-fermaient les paupières ; la secousse d'une blessure les réveillait. A chaque minute, c'était un engagement, une alerte nouvelle ; les tours brûlaient, les Mangeurs-de- choses-immondes sautaient aux palissades ; avec des haches, on leur abattait les mains ; d'autres accouraient ; une pluie de fer tombait sur les tentes. On éleva des galeries en claies de jonc pour se garantir des projectiles. Les Carthaginois s'y enfermèrent ; ils n'en bougeaient plus.

Tous les jours, le soleil qui tournait sur la colline, abandonnant, dès les premières heures, le fond de la gorge, les laissait dans l'ombre. En face et par-derrière, les pentes grises du terrain remontaient, couvertes de cailloux tachetés d'un rare lichen, et, sur leurs têtes, le ciel, continuellement pur, s'étalait, plus lisse et froid à l'oeil qu'une coupole de métal. Hamilcar était si indigné contre Carthage qu'il sentait l'envie de se jeter dans les Barbares pour les conduire sur elle. Puis voilà que les porteurs, les vivandiers, les esclaves commençaient à murmurer, et ni le peuple ni le Grand-Conseil, personne n'envoyait même une espérance. La situation était intolérable surtout par l'idée qu'elle deviendrait pire.

A la nouvelle du désastre, Carthage avait comme bondi de colère et de haine ; on aurait moins exécré le Suffète, si, dès le commencement, il se fût laissé vaincre.

Mais pour acheter d'autres Mercenaires, le temps manquait, l'argent manquait. Quant à lever des soldats dans la ville, comment les équiper ? Hamilcar avait pris toutes les armes ! et qui donc les commanderait ? Les meilleurs capitaines se trouvaient là-bas avec lui ! Cependant, des hommes expédiés par le Suffète arrivaient dans les rues, poussaient des cris. Le Grand-Conseil s'en émut, et il s'arrangea pour les faire disparaître.

C'était une prudence inutile ; tous accusaient Barca de s'être conduit avec mollesse. Il aurait dû, après sa victoire, anéantir les Mercenaires. Pourquoi avait-il ravagé les tribus ? On s'était cependant imposé d'assez lourds sacrifices ! et les patriciens déploraient leur contribution de quatorze shekel, les Syssites leurs deux cent vingt-trois mille kikar d'or ; ceux qui n'avaient rien donné se lamentaient comme les autres. La populace était jalouse des Carthaginois-nouveaux auxquels il avait promis le droit de cité complet ; et même les Ligures, qui s'étaient si intrépidement battus, on les confondait avec les Barbares, on les maudissait comme eux ; leur race devenait un crime, une complicité. Les marchands sur le seuil de leur boutique, les manoeuvres qui passaient, une règle de plomb à la main, les vendeurs de saumure rinçant leurs paniers, les baigneurs dans les étuves et les débitants de boissons chaudes, tous discutaient les opérations de la campagne. On traçait avec son doigt des plans de bataille sur la poussière ; et il n'était si mince goujat qui ne sût corriger les fautes d'Hamilcar.

C'était, disaient les prêtres, le châtiment de sa longue impiété. Il n'avait point offert d'holocaustes ; il n'avait pas pu purifier ses troupes ; il avait même refusé de prendre avec lui des augures ; — et le scandale du sacrilège renforçait la violence des haines contenues, la rage des espoirs trahis. On se rappelait les désastres de la Sicile, tout le fardeau de son orgueil qu'on avait si longtemps porté ! Les collègues des pontifes ne lui pardonnaient pas d'avoir saisi leur trésor, et ils exigèrent du Grand- Conseil l'engagement de le crucifier, si jamais il revenait.

Les chaleurs du mois d'Eloul, excessives cette année-là, étaient une autre calamité. Des bords du Lac, il s'élevait des odeurs nauséabondes ; elles passaient dans l'air avec les fumées des aromates tourbillonnant au coin des rues. On entendait continuellement retentir des hymnes. Des flots de peuple occupaient les escaliers des temples : toutes les murailles étaient couvertes de voiles noirs ; des cierges brûlaient au front des Dieux- Pataèques, et le sang des chameaux égorgés en sacrifice, coulant le long des rampes, formait, sur les marches, des cascades rouges. Un délire funèbre agitait Carthage. Du fond des ruelles les plus étroites, des bouges les plus noirs, des figures pâles sortaient, des hommes à profil de vipère et qui grinçaient des dents. Les hurlements aigus des femmes emplissaient les maisons, et, s'échappant par les grillages, faisaient se retourner sur les places ceux qui causaient debout. On croyait quelquefois que les Barbares arrivaient ; on les avait aperçus derrière la montagne des Eaux-Chaudes ; ils étaient campés à Tunis ; et les voix se multipliaient, grossissaient, se confondaient en une seule clameur. Puis, un silence universel s'établissait, les uns restaient grimpés sur le fronton des édifices, avec leur main ouverte au bord des yeux, tandis que les autres, à plat ventre au pied des remparts, tendaient l'oreille. La terreur passée, les colères recommençaient. Mais la conviction de leur impuissance les replongeait bientôt dans la même tristesse.

Elle redoublait chaque soir, quand tous, montés sur les terrasses, poussaient, en s'inclinant, par neuf fois, un grand cri, pour saluer le Soleil. Il s'abaissait derrière la Lagune, lentement, puis, tout à coup, il disparaissait dans les montagnes, du côté des Barbares.

On attendait la fête trois fois sainte où, du haut d'un bûcher, un aigle s'envolait vers le ciel, symbole de la résurrection de l'année, message du peuple à son Baal suprême, et qu'il considérait comme une sorte d'union, une manière de se rattacher à la force du Soleil.

D'ailleurs, emplis de haine maintenant, il se tournait naïvement vers Moloch-Homicide, et tous abandonnaient Tanit. En effet, la Rabbetna, n'ayant plus son voile, était comme dépouillée d'une partie de sa vertu. Elle refusait la bienfaisance de ses eaux, elle avait déserté Carthage ; c'était une transfuge, une ennemie. Quelques-uns, pour l'outrager, lui jetaient des pierres. Mais en l'invectivant, beaucoup la plaignaient ; on la chérissait encore et plus profondément peut-être.

Tous les malheurs venaient donc de la perte du zaïmph. Salammbô y avait indirectement participé ; on la comprenait dans la même rancune ; elle devait être punie. La vague idée d'une immolation bientôt circula dans le peuple. Pour apaiser les Baalim, il fallait sans doute leur offrir quelque chose d'une incalculable valeur, un être beau, jeune, vierge, d'antique maison, issu des Dieux, un astre humain. Tous les jours des hommes que l'on ne connaissait pas envahissaient les jardins de Mégara ; les esclaves, tremblant pour eux-mêmes, n'osaient leur résister. Cependant, ils ne dépassaient point l'escalier des galères. Ils restaient en bas, les yeux levés sur la dernière terrasse ; ils attendaient Salammbô, et, durant des heures, ils criaient contre elle, comme des chiens qui hurlent après la lune.

Chapitre 10 LE SERPENT

Ces clameurs de la populace n'épouvantaient pas la fille d'Hamilcar.

Elle était troublée par des inquiétudes plus hautes : son grand serpent, le Python noir, languissait ; et le serpent était pour les Carthaginois un fétiche à la fois national et particulier. On le croyait fils du limon de la terre, puisqu'il émerge de ses profondeurs et n'a pas besoin de pieds pour la parcourir ; sa démarche rappelait les ondulations des fleuves, sa température les antiques ténèbres visqueuses pleines de fécondité, et l'orbe qu'il décrit en se mordant la queue l'ensemble des planètes, l'intelligence d'Eschmoûn.

Celui de Salammbô avait déjà refusé plusieurs fois les quatre moineaux vivants qu'on lui présentait à la pleine lune et à chaque nouvelle lune. Sa belle peau, couverte comme le firmament de taches d'or sur un fond tout noir, était jaune maintenant, flasque, ridée et trop large pour son corps ; une moisissure cotonneuse étendait autour de sa tête ; et dans l'angle de ses paupières, on apercevait de petits points rouges qui paraissaient remuer. De temps à autre, Salammbô s'approchait de sa corbeille en fils d'argent ; elle écartait la courtine de pourpre, les feuilles de lotus, le duvet d'oiseau ; il était continuellement enroulé sur lui-même, plus immobile qu'une liane flétrie ; et, à force de le regarder, elle finissait par sentir dans son cœur comme une spirale, comme un autre serpent qui, peu à peu, lui montait à la gorge et l'étranglait.

Elle était désespérée d'avoir vu le zaïmph, et cependant, elle en éprouvait une sorte de joie, un orgueil intime. Un mystère se dérobaît dans la splendeur de ses plis ; c'était le nuage enveloppant les Dieux, le secret de l'existence universelle, et Salammbô, en se faisant horreur à elle-même, regrettait de ne l'avoir pas soulevé.

Presque toujours, elle était accroupie au fond de son appartement, tenant dans ses mains sa jambe gauche repliée, la bouche entrouverte, le menton baissé, l'oeil fixe. Elle se rappelait, avec épouvante, la figure de son père ; elle voulait s'en aller dans les montagnes de la Phénicie, en pèlerinage au temple d'Aphaka, où Tanit est descendue sous la forme d'une étoile ; toutes sortes d'imaginations l'attiraient, l'effrayaient ; d'ailleurs une solitude chaque jour plus large l'environnait. Elle ne savait même pas ce que devenait Hamilcar.

Enfin, lasse de ses pensées, elle se levait, et, en traînant ses petites sandales dont la semelle à chaque pas claquait sur ses talons, elle se promenait au hasard dans la grande chambre silencieuse. Les améthystes et les topazes du plafond faisaient çà et là trembler des taches lumineuses, et Salammbô, tout en marchant, tournait un peu la tête pour les voir. Elle allait prendre par le goulot les amphores suspendues ; elle se rafraîchissait la poitrine sous les larges éventails, ou bien elle s'amusait à brûler du cinnamome dans des perles creuses. Au coucher du soleil, Taanach retirait les losanges de feutre noir bouchant les ouvertures de la muraille ; alors ses colombes, frottées de musc comme les colombes de Tanit, tout à coup entraient, et leurs pattes roses glissaient sur les dalles de verre parmi les grains d'orge qu'elle leur jetait à pleines poignées, comme un semeur dans un champ. Mais soudain elle éclatait en sanglots, et elle restait étendue sur le grand lit fait de courroies de boeuf, sans remuer, en répétant un mot, toujours le même, les yeux ouverts, pâle comme une morte, insensible, froide ; — et cependant elle entendait le cri des singes dans les touffes des palmiers, avec le grincement continu de la grande roue qui, à travers les étages, amenait un flot d'eau pure dans la vasque de porphyre.

Quelquefois, durant plusieurs jours, elle refusait de manger. Elle voyait en rêve des astres troubles qui passaient sous ses pieds. Elle appelait Schahabarim, et, quand il était venu, n'avait plus rien à lui dire.

Elle ne pouvait vivre sans le soulagement de sa présence. Mais elle se révoltait intérieurement contre cette domination ; elle sentait pour le prêtre tout à la fois de la terreur, de la jalousie, de la haine et une espèce d'amour, en reconnaissance de la singulière volupté qu'elle trouvait près de lui.

Il avait reconnu l'influence de la Rabbet, habile à distinguer quels étaient les Dieux qui envoyaient les maladies ; et, pour guérir Salammbô, il faisait arroser son appartement avec des lotions de verveine et d'adiante ; elle mangeait tous les matins des mandragores ; elle dormait, la tête sur un sachet d'aromates mixtionnés par les pontifes ; il avait même employé le baaras, racine couleur de feu qui refoule dans le septentrion les génies funestes ; enfin, se tournant vers l'étoile polaire, il murmura par trois fois le nom mystérieux de Tanit ; mais Salammbô souffrant toujours, ses angoisses s'approfondirent.

Personne à Carthage n'était savant comme lui. Dans sa jeunesse, il avait étudié au collège des Mogbeds, à Borsippa, près de Babylone ; puis visité Samothrace, Pessinunte, Ephèse, la Thessalie, la Judée, les temples des Nabathéens, qui sont perdus dans les sables ; et, des cataractes jusqu'à la mer, parcouru à pied les bords du Nil. La face couverte d'un voile, et en secouant des flambeaux, il avait jeté un coq noir sur un feu de sandaraque, devant le poitrail du Sphinx, le Père-de-la-Terreur. Il était descendu dans les cavernes de Proserpine ; il avait vu tourner les cinq cents colonnes du labyrinthe de Lemnos et resplendir le candélabre de Tarente, portant sur sa tige autant de lampadaires qu'il y a de jours dans l'année ; la nuit, parfois, il recevait des Grecs pour les interroger. La constitution du monde ne l'inquiétait pas moins que la nature des Dieux ; avec les armilles placés dans le portique d'Alexandrie, il avait observé les équinoxes, et accompagné jusqu'à Cyrène les bématises d'Evergète, qui mesurent le ciel en calculant le nombre de leurs pas ; — si bien que maintenant grandissait dans sa pensée une religion particulière, sans formule distincte, et, à cause de cela même, toute pleine de vertiges et d'ardeurs. Il ne croyait plus la terre faite comme une pomme de pin ; il la croyait ronde et tombant éternellement dans l'immensité, avec une vitesse si prodigieuse qu'on ne s'aperçoit pas de sa chute.

De la position du soleil au-dessus de la lune, il concluait à la prédominance de Baal, dont l'astre lui-même n'est que le reflet et la figure ; d'ailleurs, tout ce qu'il voyait des choses terrestres le forçait à reconnaître pour suprême le principe mâle exterminateur. Puis, il accusait secrètement la Rabbet de l'infortune de sa vie. N'était-ce pas pour elle qu'autrefois, le grand pontife, s'avançant dans le tumulte des cymbales, lui avait pris sous une patère d'eau bouillante sa virilité future ? Et il suivait d'un oeil mélancolique des hommes qui se perdaient avec les prêtresses au fond des térébinthes.

Ses jours se passaient à inspecter les encensoirs, les vases d'or, les pinces, les râtaux pour les cendres de l'autel, et toutes les robes des statues, jusqu'à l'aiguille de bronze servant à friser les cheveux d'une vieille Tanit, dans le troisième édicule, près de la vigne d'émeraude.

Aux mêmes heures, il soulevait les grandes tapisseries des mêmes portes qui retombaient ; il restait les bras ouverts dans la même attitude, ; il priait prosterné sur les mêmes dalles, tandis qu'autour de lui un peuple de prêtres circulait pieds nus par les couloirs pleins d'un crépuscule éternel.

Mais sur l'aridité de sa vie, Salammbô faisait comme une fleur dans la fente d'un sépulcre. Cependant, il était dur pour elle, et ne lui épargnait point les pénitences ni les paroles amères. Sa condition établissait entre eux comme l'égalité d'un sexe commun, et il en voulait moins à la jeune fille de ne pouvoir la posséder que de la trouver si belle et surtout si pure. Souvent il voyait bien qu'elle se fatiguait à suivre sa pensée. Alors il s'en retournait plus triste ; il se sentait plus abandonné, plus seul, plus vide.

Des mots étranges quelquefois lui échappaient, et qui passaient devant Salammbô comme de larges éclairs illuminant des abîmes. C'était la nuit, sur la terrasse, quand, seuls tous les deux, ils regardaient les étoiles, et que Carthage s'étalait en bas, sous leurs pieds, avec le golfe et la pleine mer vaguement perdus dans la couleur des ténèbres.

Il lui exposait la théorie des âmes qui descendent sur la terre, en suivant la même route que le soleil par les signes du zodiaque. De son bras étendu, il montrait dans le Bélier la porte de la génération humaine, dans le Capricorne, celle du retour vers les Dieux ; et Salammbô s'efforçait de les apercevoir, car elle prenait ces conceptions pour des réalités ; elle acceptait comme vrais en eux-mêmes de purs symboles et jusqu'à des manières de langage, distinction qui n'était pas, non plus, toujours bien nette pour le prêtre.

— " Les âmes des morts ", disait-il, " se résolvent dans la lune comme les cadavres dans la terre. Leurs larmes composent son humidité ; c'est un séjour obscur plein de fange, de débris et de tempêtes. "

Elle demanda ce qu'elle y deviendrait.

D'abord, tu languiras, légère comme une vapeur qui se balance sur les flots ; et, après des épreuves et des angoisses plus longues, tu t'en iras dans le foyer du soleil, à la source même de l'Intelligence !

Cependant il ne parlait pas de la Rabbet. Salammbô s'imaginait que c'était par pudeur pour sa déesse vaincue, et, l'appelant d'un nom commun qui désignait la lune, elle se répandait en bénédictions sur l'astre fertile et doux. A la fin, il s'écria :

— " Non ! non ! elle tire de l'autre toute sa fécondité ! Ne la vois-tu pas vagabondant autour de lui comme une femme amoureuse qui court après un homme dans un champ ? " Et sans cesse, il exaltait la vertu de la lumière.

Loin d'abattre ses désirs mystiques, au contraire il les sollicitait, et même il semblait prendre de la joie à la désoler par les révélations d'une doctrine impitoyable. Salammbô, malgré les douleurs de son amour, se jetait dessus avec emportement.

Mais plus Schahabarim se sentait douter de Tanit, plus il voulait y croire. Au fond de son âme un remords l'arrêtait. Il lui aurait fallu quelque preuve, une manifestation des Dieux, et, dans l'espoir de l'obtenir, le prêtre imagina une entreprise qui pouvait à la fois sauver sa patrie et sa croyance.

Dès lors il se mit, devant Salammbô, à déplorer le sacrilège et les malheurs qui en résultaient jusque dans les régions du ciel. Puis, tout à coup, il lui annonça le péril du Suffète, assailli par trois armées que commandait Mâtho ; car Mâtho, pour les Carthaginois, était, à cause du voile, comme le roi des Barbares ; et il ajouta que le salut de la République et de son père dépendait d'elle seule.

— " De moi ! " s'écria-t-elle, " comment puis-je ... ? "

Mais le prêtre, avec un sourire de dédain :

— " Jamais tu ne consentiras ! "

Elle le suppliait. Enfin Schahabarim lui dit :

— " Il faut que tu ailles chez les Barbares reprendre le zaïmph ! "

Elle s'affaissa sur l'escabeau d'ébène ; et elle restait les bras allongés entre ses genoux, avec un frisson de tous ses membres, comme une victime au pied de l'autel quand elle attend le coup de massue. Ses tempes bourdonnaient, elle voyait tourner des cercles de feu, et, dans sa stupeur, ne comprenait plus qu'une chose, c'est que certainement elle allait bientôt mourir.

Mais si Rabbetna triomphait, si le zaïmph était rendu et Carthage délivrée, qu'importe la vie d'une femme ! pensait Schahabarim. D'ailleurs, elle obtiendrait peut-être le voile et ne périrait pas.

Il fut trois jours sans revenir, ; le soir du quatrième, elle l'envoya chercher.

Pour mieux enflammer son coeur, il lui apportait toutes les invectives que l'on hurlait contre Hamilcar en plein Conseil ; il lui disait qu'elle avait failli, qu'elle devait réparer son crime, et que la Rabbetna ordonnait ce sacrifice.

Souvent une large clameur traversant les Mappales arrivait dans Mégara. Schahabarim et Salammbô sortaient vivement ; et, du haut de l'escalier des galères, ils regardaient.

C'étaient des gens sur la place de Khamon qui criaient pour avoir des armes. Les Anciens ne voulaient pas leur en fournir, estimant cet effort inutile ; d'autres partis, sans général, avaient été massacrés. Enfin on leur permit de s'en aller, et, par une sorte d'hommage à Moloch ou un vague besoin de destruction, ils arrachèrent dans les bois des temples de grands cyprès et, les ayant allumés aux flambeaux des Kabyres, ils les portaient dans les rues en chantant. Ces flammes monstrueuses s'avançaient, balancées doucement ; elles envoyaient des feux sur des boules de verre à la crête des temples, sur les ornements des colosses, sur les éperons des navires, dépassaient les terrasses et faisaient comme des soleils qui se roulaient par la ville. Elles descendirent l'Acropole. La porte de Malqua s'ouvrit.

— " Es-tu prête ? " s'écria Schahabarim, " ou leur as-tu recommandé de dire à ton père que tu l'abandonnais. " Elle se cacha le visage dans ses voiles, et les grandes lueurs s'éloignèrent, en s'abaissant peu à peu au bord des flots.

Une épouvante indéterminée la retenait : elle avait peur de Moloch, peur de Mâtho. Cet homme à taille de géant, et qui était maître du zaïmph, dominait la Rabbetna autant que le Baal et lui apparaissait entouré des mêmes fulgurations ; puis l'âme des Dieux, quelquefois, visitait le corps des hommes. Schahabarim, en parlant de celui-là, ne disait-il pas qu'elle devait vaincre Moloch ? Ils étaient mêlés l'un à l'autre ; elle les confondait ; tous les deux la poursuivaient.

Elle voulut connaître l'avenir et elle s'approcha du serpent, car on tirait des augures d'après l'attitude des serpents. Mais la corbeille était vide ; Salammbô fut troublée.

Elle le trouva enroulé par la queue à un des balustres d'argent, près du lit suspendu, et il le frottait pour se dégager de sa vieille peau jaunâtre, tandis que son corps tout luisant et clair s'allongeait comme un glaive à moitié sorti du fourreau.

Puis les jours suivants, à mesure qu'elle se laissait convaincre, qu'elle était plus disposée à secourir Tanit, le python se guérissait, grossissait, il semblait revivre.

La certitude que Schahabarim exprimait la volonté des Dieux s'établit alors dans sa conscience. Un matin, elle se réveilla déterminée, et elle demanda ce qu'il fallait pour que Mâtho rendît le voile.

— " Le réclamer ", dit Schahabarim.

— " Mais s'il refuse ? " reprit-elle.

Le prêtre la considéra fixement, et avec un sourire qu'elle n'avait jamais vu.

— " Oui, comment faire ? " répéta Salammbô.

Il roulait entre ses doigts l'extrémité des bandelettes qui tombaient de sa tiare sur ses épaules, les yeux baissés, immobile. Enfin, voyant qu'elle ne comprenait pas :

— " Tu seras seule avec lui. "

— " Après ? " dit-elle.

— " Seule dans sa tente. "

— " Et alors ? "

Schahabarim se mordit les lèvres. Il cherchait quelque phrase, un détour.

— " Si tu dois mourir, ce sera plus tard ", dit-il, plus tard ! ne crains rien ! et quoi qu'il entreprenne, n'appelle pas ! ne t'effraye pas ! Tu seras humble, entends-tu, et soumise à son désir qui est l'ordre du ciel !

— " Mais le voile ? "

— " Les Dieux y aviseront ", répondit Schahabarim. Elle ajouta :

— " Si tu m'accompagnais, ô père ? "

— " Non ! "

Il la fit se mettre à genoux, et, gardant la main gauche levée et la droite étendue, il jura pour elle de rapporter dans Carthage le manteau de Tanit. Avec des imprécations terribles, elle se dévouait aux Dieux, et chaque fois que Schahabarim prononçait un mot, en défaillant, elle le répétait.

Il lui indiqua toutes les purifications, les jeûnes qu'elle devait faire et comment parvenir jusqu'à Mâtho. D'ailleurs, un homme connaissant les routes l'accompagnerait.

Elle se sentit comme délivrée. Elle ne songeait plus qu'au bonheur de revoir le zäïmph, et maintenant elle bénissait Schahabarim de ses exhortations.

C'était l'époque où les colombes de Carthage émigraient en Sicile, dans la montagne d'Eryx, autour du temple de Vénus. Avant leur départ, durant plusieurs jours, elles se cherchaient, s'appelaient pour se réunir ; enfin elles s'envolèrent un soir ; le vent les poussait, et cette grosse nuée blanche glissait dans le ciel, au-dessus de la mer, très haut.

Une couleur de sang occupait l'horizon. Elles semblaient descendre vers les flots, peu à peu ; puis elles disparurent comme englouties et tombant d'elles-mêmes dans la gueule du soleil. Salammbô, qui les regardait s'éloigner, baissa la tête, et Taanach, croyant deviner son chagrin, lui dit alors doucement :

— " Mais elles reviendront, Maîtresse. "

— " Oui ! Je le sais. "

— " Et tu les reverras. "

— " Peut-être ! " fit-elle en soupirant.

Elle n'avait confié à personne sa résolution ; pour l'accomplir plus discrètement, elle envoya Taanach acheter dans le faubourg de Kinisdo (au lieu de les demander aux intendants), toutes les choses qu'il lui fallait : du vermillon, des aromates, une ceinture de lin et des vêtements neufs. La vieille esclave s'ébahissait de ces préparatifs, sans oser pourtant lui faire de questions ; et le jour arriva, fixé par Schahabarim, où Salammbô devait partir.

Vers la douzième heure, elle aperçut au fond des sycomores un vieillard aveugle, la main appuyée sur l'épaule d'un enfant qui marchait devant lui, et de l'autre il portait contre sa hanche une espèce de cithare en bois noir. Les eunuques, les esclaves, les femmes avaient été scrupuleusement éloignés : aucun ne pouvait savoir le mystère qui se préparait.

Taanach alluma dans les angles de l'appartement quatre trépieds pleins de stobus et de cardamone ; puis elle déploya de grandes tapisseries babyloniennes et elle les tendit sur des cordes, tout autour de la chambre : car Salammbô ne voulait pas être vue, même par les murailles. Le joueur de kinnor se tenait accroupi derrière la porte, et le jeune garçon, debout, appliquait contre ses lèvres une flûte de roseau. Au loin la clameur des rues s'affaiblissait, des ombres violettes s'allongeaient devant le péristyle des temples, et, de l'autre côté du golfe, les bases des montagnes, les champs d'oliviers et les vagues terrains jaunes, ondulant indéfiniment, se confondaient dans une vapeur bleuâtre ; on n'entendait aucun bruit, un accablement indicible pesait dans l'air.

Salammbô s'accroupit sur la marche d'onyx, au bord du bassin ; elle releva ses larges manches qu'elle attacha derrière ses épaules, et elle commença ses ablutions, méthodiquement, d'après les rites sacrés.

Enfin Taanach lui apporta, dans une fiole d'albâtre, quelque chose de liquide et de coagulé ; c'était le sang d'un chien noir, égorgé par des femmes stériles, une nuit d'hiver, dans les décombres d'un sépulcre. Elle s'en frotta les oreilles, les talons, le pouce de la main droite, et même son ongle resta un peu rouge, comme si elle eût écrasé un fruit.

La lune se leva ; alors la cithare et la flûte, toutes les deux à la fois, se mirent à jouer.

Salammbô défit ses pendants d'oreilles, son collier, ses bracelets, sa longue simarre blanche ; elle dénoua le bandeau de ses cheveux, et pendant quelques minutes elle les secoua sur ses épaules, doucement, pour se rafraîchir en les éparpillant. La musique au-dehors continuait ; c'étaient trois notes, toujours les mêmes, précipitées, furieuses ; les cordes grinçaient, la flûte ronflait ; Taanach marquait la cadence en frappant dans ses mains ; Salammbô, avec un balancement de tout son corps, psalmodiait des prières, et ses vêtements, les uns après les autres, tombaient autour d'elle.

La lourde tapisserie trembla, et par-dessus la corde qui la supportait, la tête du python apparut. Il descendit lentement, comme une goutte d'eau qui coule le long d'un mur, rampa entre les étoffes épandues, puis, la queue collée contre le sol, il se leva tout droit ; et ses yeux, plus brillants que des escarboucles, se dardaient sur Salammbô.

L'horreur du froid ou une pudeur, peut-être, la fit d'abord hésiter. Mais elle se rappela les ordres de Schahabarim, elle s'avança ; le python se rabattit et lui posant sur la nuque le milieu de son corps, il laissait pendre sa tête et sa queue, comme un collier rompu dont les deux bouts traînent jusqu'à terre. Salammbô l'entoura autour de ses flancs, sous ses bras, entre ses genoux ; puis le prenant à la mâchoire, elle approcha cette petite gueule triangulaire jusqu'au bord de ses dents, et, en fermant à demi les yeux, elle se renversait sous les rayons de la lune. La blanche lumière semblait l'envelopper d'un brouillard d'argent, la forme de ses pas humides brillait sur les dalles, des étoiles palpitaient dans la profondeur de l'eau ; il serrait contre elle ses noirs anneaux tigrés de plaques d'or. Salammbô haletait sous ce poids trop lourd, ses reins pliaient, elle se sentait mourir ; et du bout de sa queue il lui battait la cuisse tout doucement ; puis la musique se taisant, il retomba.

Taanach revint près d'elle ; et quand elle eut disposé deux candélabres dont les lumières brûlaient dans les boules de cristal pleines d'eau, elle teignit de lausonia l'intérieur de ses mains, passa du vermillon sur ses joues, de l'antimoine au bord de ses paupières, et allongea ses sourcils avec un mélange de gomme, de musc, d'ébène et de pattes de mouches écrasées.

Salammbô, assise dans une chaise à montants d'ivoire, s'abandonnait aux soins de l'esclave. Mais ces attouchements, l'odeur des aromates et les jeûnes qu'elle avait subis, l'énervaient. Elle devint si pâle que Taanach s'arrêta.

— " Continue ! " dit Salammbô, et, se roidissant contre elle-même, elle se ranima tout à coup. Alors une impatience la saisit ; elle pressait Taanach de se hâter, et la vieille esclave en grommelant :

— " Bien ! bien ! Maîtresse ! ... Tu n'as d'ailleurs personne qui t'attende ! "

— " Oui ! " dit Salammbô, " quelqu'un m'attend. "

Taanach se recula de surprise, et, afin d'en savoir plus long :

— " Que m'ordonnes-tu, Maîtresse ? car si tu dois rester partie... "

Mais Salammbô sanglotait ; l'esclave s'écria :

— " Tu souffres ! qu'as-tu donc ? Ne t'en va pas ! emmène-moi ! Quand tu étais toute petite et que tu pleurais, je te prenais sur mon coeur et je te faisais rire avec la pointe de mes mamelles ; tu les as taries, Maîtresse ! " Elle se donnait des coups sur sa poitrine desséchée. " Maintenant, je suis vieille ! je ne peux rien pour toi ! tu ne m'aimes plus ! tu me caches tes douleurs, tu dédaignes ta nourrice ! " Et de tendresse et de dépit, des larmes coulaient le long de ses joues, dans les balafres de son tatouage.

— " Non ! " dit Salammbô, " non, je t'aime ! console-toi ! "

Taanach, avec un sourire pareil à la grimace d'un vieux singe, reprit sa besogne. D'après les recommandations de Schahabarim, Salammbô lui avait ordonné de la rendre magnifique ; et elle l'accommodait dans un goût barbare, plein à la fois de recherche et d'ingénuité.

Sur une première tunique, mince, et de couleur vineuse, elle en passa une seconde, brodée en plumes d'oiseaux. Des écailles d'or se collaient à ses hanches, et de cette large ceinture descendaient les flots de ses caleçons bleus, étoilés d'argent. Ensuite Taanach lui emmancha une grande robe, faite avec la toile du pays des Sères, blanche et bariolée de lignes vertes. Elle attacha au bord de son épaule un carré de pourpre, appesanti dans le bas par des grains de sandastrum ; et par-dessus tous ces vêtements, elle posa un manteau noir à queue traînante ; puis elle la contempla, et, fière de son oeuvre, ne put s'empêcher de dire :

— " Tu ne seras pas plus belle le jour de tes noces ! "

— " Mes noces ! " répéta Salammbô ; elle rêvait, le coude appuyé sur la chaise d'ivoire.

Mais Taanach dressa devant elle un miroir de cuivre si large et si haut qu'elle s'y aperçut tout entière. Alors elle se leva, et, d'un coup de doigt léger, remonta une boucle de ses cheveux, qui descendait trop bas.

Ils étaient couverts de poudre d'or, crépus sur le front et par-derrière ils pendaient dans le dos, en longues torsades que terminaient des perles. Les clartés des candélabres avivaient le fard de ses joues, l'or de ses vêtements, la blancheur de sa peau ; elle avait autour de la taille, sur les bras, sur les mains et aux doigts des pieds une telle abondance de pierreries que le miroir, comme un soleil, lui renvoyait des rayons ; — et Salammbô, debout à côté de Taanach, se penchant pour la voir, souriait dans cet éblouissement.

Puis elle se promena de long en large, embarrassée du temps qui lui restait.

Tout à coup, le chant d'un coq retentit. Elle piqua vivement sur ses cheveux un long voile jaunes, se passa une écharpe autour du cou, enfonça ses pieds dans des bottines de cuir bleu, et elle dit à Taanach :

— " Va voir sous les myrtes s'il n'y a pas un homme avec deux chevaux. "

Taanach était à peine rentrée qu'elle descendait l'escalier des galeries.

— " Maîtresse ! " cria la nourrice.

Salammbô se retourna, un doigt sur la bouche, en signe de discrétion et d'immobilité.

Taanach se coula doucement le long des proues jusqu'au bas de la terrasse ; et de loin, à la clarté de la lune, elle distingua, dans l'avenue des cyprès, une ombre gigantesque marchant à la gauche de Salammbô obliquement, ce qui était un présage de mort.

Taanach remonta dans la chambre. Elle se jeta par terre, en se déchirant le visage avec ses ongles ; elle s'arrachait les cheveux, et à pleine poitrine poussait des hurlements aigus.

L'idée lui vint que l'on pouvait les entendre ; alors elle se tut. Elle sanglotait tout bas, la tête dans ses mains et la figure sur les dalles.

Chapitre 11 SOUS LA TENTE

L'homme qui conduisait Salammbô la fit remonter au-delà du phare, vers les Catacombes, puis descendre le long faubourg Molouya, plein de ruelles escarpées. Le ciel commençait à blanchir. Quelquefois, des poutres de palmier, sortant des murs, les obligeaient à baisser la tête. Les deux chevaux, marchant au pas, glissaient ; et ils arrivèrent ainsi à la porte de Teveste.

Ses lourds battants étaient entrebâillés ; ils passèrent ; elle se referma derrière eux.

D'abord ils suivirent pendant quelque temps le pied des remparts, et, à la hauteur des Citernes, ils prirent par la Taenia, étroit ruban de terre jaune, qui, séparant le golfe du lac, se prolonge jusqu'au Rhadès.

Personne n'apparaissait autour de Carthage, ni sur la mer, ni dans la campagne. Les flots couleur d'ardoise clapotaient doucement, et le vent léger, poussant leur écume çà et là, les tachetait de déchirures blanches. Malgré tous ses voiles, Salammbô frissonnait sous la fraîcheur du matin ; le mouvement, le grand air l'étourdissaient. Puis le soleil se leva ; il la mordait sur le derrière de la tête, et, involontairement, elle s'assoupissait un peu. Les deux bêtes, côte à côte, trottaient l'amble en enfonçant leurs pieds dans le sable muet.

Quand ils eurent dépassé la montagne des Eaux-Chaudes, ils continuèrent d'un train plus rapide, le sol étant plus ferme.

Mais les champs, bien qu'on fût à l'époque des semailles et des labours, d'aussi loin qu'on les apercevait, étaient vides comme le désert. Il y avait, de place en place, des tas de blé répandus ; ailleurs des orges roussies s'égrenaient. Sur l'horizon clair, les villages apparaissaient en noir, avec des formes incohérentes et découpées.

De temps à autre, un pan de muraille à demi calciné se dressait au bord de la route. Les toits des cabanes s'effondraient, et, dans l'intérieur, on distinguait des éclats de poteries, des lambeaux de vêtements, toutes sortes d'ustensiles et de choses brisées méconnaissables. Souvent un être couvert de haillons, la face terreuse et les prunelles flamboyantes, sortait de ces ruines. Mais bien vite il se mettait à courir ou disparaissait dans un trou. Salammbô et son guide ne s'arrêtaient pas.

Les plaines abandonnées se succédaient. Sur de grands espaces de terre toute blonde s'étalait, par traînées inégales, une poudre de charbon que leurs pas soulevaient derrière eux. Quelquefois ils rencontraient de petits endroits paisibles, un ruisseau qui coulait parmi de longues herbes ; et, en remontant sur l'autre bord, Salammbô, pour se rafraîchir les mains, arrachait des feuilles mouillées. Au coin d'un bois de lauriers-roses, son cheval fit un grand écart devant le cadavre d'un homme, étendu par terre.

L'esclave, aussitôt, la rétablit sur les coussins. C'était un des serviteurs du Temple, un homme que Schahabarim employait dans les missions périlleuses.

Par excès de précaution, maintenant il allait à pied, près d'elle entre les chevaux ; et il les fouettait avec le bout d'un lacet de cuir enroulé à son bras, ou bien il tirait d'une panetière suspendue contre sa poitrine des boulettes de froment, de dattes et de jaunes d'œufs, enveloppées dans des feuilles de lotus, et il les offrait à Salammbô, sans parler, tout en courant.

Au milieu du jour, trois Barbares, vêtus de peaux de bêtes, les croisèrent sur le sentier. Peu à peu, il en parut d'autres, vagabondant par troupes de dix, douze, vingt-cinq hommes ; plusieurs poussaient des chèvres ou quelque vache qui boitait. Leurs lourds bâtons étaient hérissés de pointes en airain ; des coutelas luisaient sur leurs vêtements d'une saleté farouche, et ils ouvraient les yeux avec un air de menace et d'ébahissement. Tout en passant, quelques-uns envoyaient une bénédiction banale ; d'autres, des plaisanteries obscènes ; et l'homme de Schahabarim répondait à chacun dans son propre idiome. Il leur disait que c'était un jeune garçon malade allant pour se guérir vers un temple lointain.

Cependant le jour tombait. Des aboiements retentirent ; ils s'en rapprochèrent.

Puis, aux clartés du crépuscule, ils aperçurent un enclos de pierres sèches, enfermant une vague construction. Un chien courait sur le mur. L'esclave lui jeta des cailloux ; et ils entrèrent dans une haute salle voûtée.

Au milieu, une femme accroupie se chauffait à un feu de broussailles dont la fumée s'envolait par les trous du plafond. Ses cheveux blancs, qui lui tombaient jusqu'aux genoux, la cachaient à demi ; et sans vouloir répondre, d'un air idiot, elle marmottait des paroles de vengeance contre les Barbares et contre les Carthaginois.

Le coureur furetait de droite et de gauche. Puis il revint près d'elle, en réclamant à manger. La vieille branlait la tête, et, les yeux fixés sur les charbons, murmurait :

— " J'étais la main. Les dix doigts sont coupés. La bouche ne mange plus. "

L'esclave lui montra une poignée de pièces d'or. Elle se rua dessus, mais bientôt elle reprit son immobilité.

Enfin il lui posa sous la gorge un poignard qu'il avait dans sa ceinture. Alors, en tremblant, elle alla soulever une large pierre et rapporta une amphore de vin avec des poissons d'Hippo-Zaryte confits dans du miel.

Salammbô se détourna de cette nourriture immonde, et elle s'endormit sur les caparaçons des chevaux étendus dans un coin de la salle.

Avant le jour, il la réveilla.

Le chien hurlait. L'esclave s'en approcha tout doucement ; et d'un seul coup de poignard, lui abattit la tête. Puis il frotta de sang les naseaux des chevaux pour les ranimer. La vieille lui lança par derrière une malédiction. Salammbô l'aperçut, et elle pressa l'amulette qu'elle portait sur son coeur.

Ils se remirent en marche.

De temps à autre, elle demandait si l'on ne serait pas bientôt arrivé. La route ondulait sur de petites collines. On n'entendait que le grincement des cigales. Le soleil chauffait l'herbe jaunie ; la terre était toute fendillée par des crevasses, qui faisaient, en la divisant, comme des dalles monstrueuses. Quelquefois une vipère passait, des aigles volaient ; l'esclave courait toujours ; Salammbô rêvait sous ses voiles, et malgré la chaleur ne les écartait pas, dans la crainte de salir ses beaux vêtements.

A des distances régulières, des tours s'élevaient, bâties par les Carthaginois, afin de surveiller les tribus. Ils entraînaient dedans pour se mettre à l'ombre, puis repartaient.

La veille, par prudence, ils avaient fait un grand détour. Mais, à présent, on ne rencontrait personne ; la région étant stérile, les Barbares n'y avaient point passé.

La dévastation peu à peu recommença. Parfois, au milieu d'un champ, une mosaïque s'étalait, seul débris d'un château disparu ; et les oliviers, qui n'avaient pas de feuilles, semblaient au loin de larges buissons d'épines. Ils traversèrent un bourg dont les maisons étaient brûlées à ras du sol. On voyait le long des murailles des squelettes humains. Il y en avait aussi de dromadaires et de mulets. Des charognes à demi rongées barraient les rues. La nuit descendait. Le ciel était bas et couvert de nuages.

Ils remontèrent encore pendant deux heures dans la direction de l'Occident, et, tout à coup, devant eux, ils aperçurent quantité de petites flammes.

Elles brillaient au fond d'un amphithéâtre. Çà et là des plaques d'or miroitaient, en se déplaçant. C'étaient les cuirasses des Clinabares, le camp punique ; puis ils distinguèrent aux alentours d'autres lueurs plus nombreuses, car les armées des Mercenaires, confondues maintenant, s'étendaient sur un grand espace.

Salammbô fit un mouvement pour s'avancer. Mais l'homme de Schahabarim l'entraîna plus loin, et ils longèrent la terrasse qui fermait le camp des Barbares. Une brèche s'y ouvrait, l'esclave disparut.

Au sommet du retranchement, une sentinelle se promenait avec un arc à la main et une pique sur l'épaule.

Salammbô se rapprochait toujours ; le Barbare s'agenouilla, et une longue flèche vint percer le bas de son manteau. Puis, comme elle restait immobile, en criant, il lui demanda ce qu'elle voulait.

— " Parler à Mâtho ", répondit-elle. " Je suis un transfuge de Carthage. "

Il poussa un sifflement, qui se répéta de loin en loin.

Salammbô attendit ; son cheval, effrayé, tournoyait en reniflant.

Quand Mâtho arriva, la lune se levait derrière elle. Mais elle avait sur le visage un voile jaune à fleurs noires et tant de draperies autour du corps qu'il était impossible d'en rien deviner. Du haut de la terrasse, il considérait cette forme vague se dressant comme un fantôme dans les pénombres du soir.

Enfin elle lui dit :

— " Mène-moi dans ta tente ! Je le veux ! "

Un souvenir qu'il ne pouvait préciser lui traversa la mémoire. Il sentait battre son coeur. Cet air de commandement l'intimidait.

— " Suis-moi ! " dit-il.

La barrière s'abaissa ; aussitôt elle fut dans le camp des Barbares.

Un grand tumulte et une grande foule l'emplissaient. Des feux clairs brûlaient sous des marmites suspendues ; et leurs reflets empourprés, illuminant certaines places, en laissaient d'autres dans les ténèbres, complètement. On criait, on appelait ; des chevaux attachés à des entraves formaient de longues lignes droites au milieu des tentes ; elles étaient rondes, carrées, de cuir ou de toile ; il y avait des huttes en roseaux et des trous dans le sable comme en font les chiens. Les soldats charriaient des fascines, s'accoudaient par terre, ou, s'enroulant dans une natte, se disposaient à dormir ; et le cheval de Salammbô, pour passer par-dessus, quelquefois allongea une jambe et sautait.

Elle se rappelait les avoir déjà vus ; mais leurs barbes étaient plus longues, leurs figures encore plus noires, leurs voix plus rauques. Mâtho, en marchant devant elle, les écartait par un geste de son bras qui soulevait son manteau rouge. Quelques-uns baisaient ses mains ; d'autres, en pliant l'échine, l'abordaient pour lui demander des ordres ; car il était maintenant le véritable, le seul chef des Barbares ; Spendius, Autharite et Narr'Havas étaient découragés, et il avait montré tant d'audace et d'obstination que tous lui obéissaient.

Salammbô, en le suivant, traversa le camp entier. Sa tente était au bout, à trois cents pas du retranchement d'Hamilcar.

Elle remarqua sur la droite une large fosse, et il lui sembla que des visages posaient contre le bord, au niveau du sol, comme eussent fait des têtes coupées. Cependant leurs yeux remuaient, et de ces bouches entrouvertes il s'échappait des gémissements en langage punique.

Deux nègres, portant des fanaux de résine, se tenaient aux deux côtés de la porte. Mâtho écarta la toile brusquement. Elle le suivit.

C'était une tente profonde, avec un mât dressé au milieu. Un grand lampadaire en forme de lotus l'éclairait, tout plein d'une huile jaune où flottaient des poignées d'étoupes, et on distinguait dans l'ombre des choses militaires qui reluisaient. Un glaive nu s'appuyait contre un escabeau, près d'un bouclier ; des fouets en cuir d'hippopotame, des cymbales, des grelots, des colliers s'étaient pêle-mêle sur des corbeilles en sparterie ; les miettes d'un pain noir salissaient une couverture de feutre ; dans un coin, sur une pierre ronde, de la monnaie de cuivre était négligemment amoncelée, et, par les déchirures de la toile, le vent apportait la poussière du dehors avec la senteur des éléphants, que l'on entendait manger, tout en secouant leurs chaînes.

— " Qui es-tu ? " dit Mâtho.

Sans répondre, elle regardait autour d'elle, lentement, puis ses yeux s'arrêtèrent au fond, où, sur un lit en branches de palmier, retombait quelque chose de bleuâtre et de scintillant.

Elle s'avança vivement. Un cri lui échappa. Mâtho, derrière elle, frappait du pied.

— " Qui t'amène ? pourquoi viens-tu ? "

Elle répondit en montrant le zäïmph :

— " Pour le prendre ! " et de l'autre main elle arracha les voiles de sa tête. Il se recula, les coudes en arrière, béant, presque terrifié.

Elle se tenait comme appuyée sur la force des Dieux ; et, le regardant face à face, elle lui demanda le zäïmph ; elle le réclamait en paroles abondantes et superbes.

Mâtho n'entendait pas ; il la contemplait, et les vêtements, pour lui, se confondaient avec le corps. La moire des étoffes était, comme la splendeur de sa peau, quelque chose de spécial et n'appartenant qu'à elle. Ses yeux, ses diamants étincelaient ; le poli de ses ongles continuait la finesse des pierres qui chargeaient ses doigts ; les deux agrafes de sa tunique, soulevant un peu de ses seins, les rapprochaient l'un de l'autre, et il se perdait par la pensée dans leur étroit intervalle, où descendait un fil tenant une plaque d'émeraudes, que l'on apercevait plus bas sous la gaze violette. Elle avait pour pendants d'oreilles deux petites balances de saphir supportant une perle creuse, pleine d'un parfum liquide. Par les trous de la perle, de moment en moment, une gouttelette qui tombait mouillait son épaule nue. Mâtho la regardait tomber.

Une curiosité indomptable l'entraîna ; et, comme un enfant qui porte la main sur un fruit inconnu, tout en tremblant, du bout de son doigt, il la toucha légèrement sur le haut de sa poitrine ; la chair un peu froide céda avec une résistance élastique.

Ce contact, à peine sensible pourtant, ébranla Mâtho jusqu'au fond de lui-même. Un soulèvement de tout son être le précipitait vers elle. Il aurait voulu l'envelopper, l'absorber, la boire. Sa poitrine haletait, il claquait des dents.

En la prenant par les deux poignets, il l'attira doucement, et il s'assit alors sur une cuirasse, près du lit de palmier que couvrait une peau de lion. Elle était debout. Il la regardait de bas en haut, en la tenant ainsi entre ses jambes, et il répétait :

— " Comme tu es belle ! comme tu es belle ! "

Ses yeux continuellement fixés sur les siens la faisaient souffrir ; et ce malaise, cette répugnance augmentaient d'une façon si aiguë que Salammbô se retenait pour ne pas crier. La pensée de Schahabarim lui revint ; elle se résigna.

Mâtho gardait toujours ses petites mains dans les siennes ; et, de temps à autre, malgré l'ordre du prêtre, en tournant le visage, elle tâchait de l'écarter avec des secousses de ses bras. Il ouvrait les narines pour mieux humer le parfum s'exhalant de sa personne. C'était une émanation indéfinissable, fraîche, et cependant qui étourdissait comme la fumée d'une cassolette. Elle sentait le miel, le poivre, l'encens, les roses, et une autre odeur encore.

Mais comment se trouvait-elle près de lui, dans sa tente, à sa discrétion ? Quelqu'un, sans doute, l'avait poussée ? Elle n'était pas venue pour le zaïmph ? Ses bras retombèrent, et il baissa la tête, accablé par une rêverie soudaine.

Salammbô, afin de l'attendrir, lui dit d'une voix plaintive :

— " Que t'ai-je donc fait pour que tu veuilles ma mort ? "

— " Ta mort ! "

Elle reprit :

— " Je t'ai aperçu un soir, à la lueur de mes jardins qui brûlaient, entre des coupes fumantes et mes esclaves égorgés, et ta colère était si forte que tu as bondi vers moi et qu'il a fallu m'enfuir ! Puis une terreur est entrée dans Carthage. On criait la dévastation des villes, l'incendie des campagnes, le massacre des soldats ; c'est toi qui les avais perdus, c'est toi qui les avais assassinés ! Je te hais ! Ton nom seul me ronge comme un remords. Tu es plus exécré que la peste et que la guerre romaine ! Les provinces tressaillent de ta fureur, les sillons sont pleins de cadavres ! J'ai suivi la trace de tes feux, comme si je marchais derrière Moloch ! "

Mâtho se leva d'un bond ; un orgueil colossal lui gonflait le coeur ; il se trouvait haussé à la taille d'un Dieu.

Les narines battantes, les dents serrées, elle continuait :

— " Comme si ce n'était pas assez de ton sacrilège, tu es venu chez moi, dans mon sommeil, tout couvert du zaïmph ! Tes paroles, je ne les ai pas comprises ; mais je voyais bien que tu voulais m'entraîner vers quelque chose d'épouvantable, au fond d'un abîme. "

Mâtho, en se tordant les bras, s'écria :

— " Non ! non ! c'était pour te le donner ! pour te le rendre ! Il me semblait que la Déesse avait laissé son vêtement pour toi, et qu'il t'appartenait ! Dans son temple ou dans ta maison, qu'importe ? n'es-tu pas toute-puissante, immaculée, radieuse et belle comme Tanit ! " Et avec un regard plein d'une adoration infinie :

— " A moins, peut-être que tu ne sois Tanit ? "

— " Moi, Tanit ! " se disait Salammbô.

Ils ne parlaient plus. Le tonnerre au loin roulait. Des moutons bêlaient, effrayés par l'orage.

— " Oh ! approche ! " reprit-il, " approche ! ne crains rien ! " — Autrefois, je n'étais qu'un soldat confondu dans la plèbe des Mercenaires, et même si doux, que je portais pour les autres du bois sur mon dos. Est-ce que je m'inquiète de Carthage ! La foule de ses hommes s'agite comme perdue dans la poussière de tes sandales, et tous ses trésors avec les provinces, les flottes et les îles, ne me font pas envie comme la fraîcheur de tes lèvres et le tour de tes épaules. Mais je voulais abattre ses murailles afin de parvenir jusqu'à toi, pour te posséder ! D'ailleurs, en attendant, je me vengeais ! A présent, j'écrase les hommes comme des coquilles, et je me jette sur les phalanges, j'écarte les sarisses avec mes mains, j'arrête les étalons par les naseaux ; une catapulte ne me tuerait pas ! Oh ! Si tu savais, au milieu de la guerre, comme je pense à toi ! Quelquefois, le souvenir d'un geste, d'un pli de ton vêtement, tout à coup me saisit et m'enlace comme un filet ! j'aperçois tes yeux dans les flammes des phalariques et sur la dorure des boucliers ! j'entends ta voix dans le retentissement des cymbales. Je me détourne, tu n'es pas là ! et alors je me replonge dans la bataille ! "

Il levait ses bras où des veines s'entrecroisaient comme des lierres sur des branches d'arbre. De la sueur coulait sur sa poitrine, entre ses muscles carrés ; et son haleine secouait ses flancs avec sa ceinture de bronze toute garnie de lanières qui pendaient jusqu'à ses genoux, plus fermes que du marbre. Salammbo, accoutumée aux eunuques, se laissait ébahir par la force de cet homme. C'était le châtiment de la Déesse ou l'influence de Moloch circulant autour d'elle, dans les cinq armées. Une lassitude l'accablait ; elle écoutait avec stupeur le cri intermittent des sentinelles, qui se répondaient.

Les flammes de la lampe vacillaient sous des rafales d'air chaud. Il venait, par moment, de larges éclairs ; puis l'obscurité redoublait ; et elle ne voyait plus que les prunelles de Mâtho, comme deux charbons dans la nuit. Cependant, elle sentait bien qu'une fatalité l'entourait, qu'elle touchait à un moment suprême, irrévocable, et, dans un effort, elle remonta vers le zaïmph et leva les mains pour le saisir.

— " Que fais-tu ? " s'écria Mâtho.

Elle répondit avec placidité :

— " Je m'en retourne à Carthage. "

Il s'avança en croisant les bras, et d'un air si terrible qu'elle fut immédiatement comme clouée sur ses talons.

— " T'en retourner à Carthage ! " Il balbutiait, et il répétait, en grinçant des dents :

— " T'en retourner à Carthage ! Ah ! tu venais pour prendre le zaïmph, pour me vaincre, puis disparaître ! Non ! non, tu m'appartiens ! et personne à présent ne t'arrachera d'ici ! Oh ! je n'ai pas oublié l'insolence de tes grands yeux tranquilles et comme tu m'écrasais avec la hauteur de ta beauté ! A mon tour, maintenant ! Tu es ma captive, mon esclave, ma servante ! Appelle, si tu veux, ton père et son armée, les Anciens, les Riches et ton exécration peuple, tout entier ! Je suis le maître de trois cent mille soldats ! j'irai en chercher dans la Lusitanie, dans les Gaules et au fond du désert, et je renverserai ta ville, je brûlerai tous ses temples ; les trirèmes vogueront sur des vagues de sang ! Je ne veux pas qu'il en reste une maison, une pierre ni un palmier ! Et si les hommes me manquent, j'attirerai les ours des montagnes et je pousserai les lions ! N'essaye pas de t'enfuir, je te tue ! "

Blême et les poings crispés, il frémissait comme une harpe dont les cordes vont éclater. Tout à coup des sanglots l'étouffèrent et, en s'affaissant sur les jarrets :

— " Ah ! pardonne-moi ! Je suis un infâme et plus vil que les scorpions, que la fange et la poussière ! Tout à l'heure, pendant que tu parlais, ton haleine a passé sur ma face, et je me délectais comme un moribond qui boit à plat ventre au bord d'un ruisseau. Ecrase-moi, pourvu que je sente tes pieds ! maudis-moi, pourvu que j'entende ta voix ! Ne t'en va pas ! pitié ! je t'aime ! je t'aime ! "

Il était à genoux, par terre, devant elle ; et il lui entourait la taille de ses deux bras, la tête en arrière, les mains errantes ; les disques d'or suspendus à ses oreilles luisaient sur son cou bronzé ; de grosses larmes roulaient dans ses yeux pareils à des globes d'argent ; il soupirait d'une façon caressante, et murmurait de vagues paroles, plus légères qu'une brise et suaves comme un baiser.

Salammbô était envahie par une mollesse où elle perdait toute conscience d'elle-même. Quelque chose à la fois d'intime et de supérieur, un ordre des Dieux la forçait à s'y abandonner ; des nuages la soulevaient, et, en défaillant, elle se renversa sur le lit dans les poils du lion. Mâtho lui saisit les talons, la chaînette d'or éclata, et les deux bouts, en s'envolant, frappèrent la toile comme deux vipères rebondissantes. Le zaïmph tomba, l'enveloppait ; elle aperçut la figure de Mâtho se courbant sur sa poitrine.

— " Moloch, tu me brûles ! " et les baisers du soldat, plus dévorateurs que des flammes, la parcouraient ; elle était comme enlevée dans un ouragan, prise dans la force du soleil.

Il baisa tous les doigts de ses mains, ses bras, ses pieds, et d'un bout à l'autre les longues tresses de ses cheveux.

— " Emporte-le ", disait-il, est-ce que j'y tiens ! Emmène-moi avec lui ! j'abandonne l'armée ! je renonce à tout ! Au-delà de Gadès, à vingt jours dans la mer, on rencontre une île couverte de poudre d'or, de verdure et d'oiseaux. Sur les montagnes, de grandes fleurs pleines de parfums qui fument se balancent comme d'éternels encensoirs ; dans les citronniers plus hauts que des cèdres, des serpents couleur de lait font avec les diamants de leur gueule tomber les fruits sur le gazon ; l'air est si doux qu'il empêche de mourir. Oh ! je la trouverai, tu verras. Nous vivrons dans les grottes de cristal, taillées au bas des collines. Personne encore ne l'habite, ou je deviendrai le roi du pays. "

Il balaya la poussière de ses cothurnes ; il voulut qu'elle mît entre ses lèvres le quartier d'une grenade, il accumula derrière sa tête des vêtements pour lui faire un coussin. Il cherchait les moyens de la servir, de s'humilier, et même il étala sur ses jambes le zaïmph, comme un simple tapis.

— " As-tu toujours ", disait-il, " ces petites cornes de gazelle où sont suspendus tes colliers ? Tu me les donneras ; je les aime ! " Car il parlait comme si la guerre était finie, des rires de joie lui échappaient ; et les Mercenaires, Hamilcar, tous les obstacles avaient maintenant disparu. La lune glissait entre deux nuages. Ils la voyaient par une ouverture de la tente.

— " Ah ! que j'ai passé de nuits à la contempler ! elle me semblait un voile qui cachait ta figure ; tu me regardais à travers ; ton souvenir se mêlait à ses rayonnements ; je ne vous distinguais plus ! " Et la tête entre ses seins, il pleurait abondamment.

— " C'est donc là ! ", songeait-elle " cet homme formidable qui fait trembler Carthage ! "

Il s'endormit. Alors, en se dégageant de son bras, elle posa un pied par terre, et elle s'aperçut que sa chaînette était brisée.

On accoutumait les vierges dans les grandes familles à respecter ces entraves comme une chose presque religieuse, et Salammbô, en rougissant, roula autour de ses jambes les deux tronçons de la chaîne d'or.

Carthage, Mégara, sa maison, sa chambre et les campagnes qu'elle avait traversées, tourbillonnaient dans sa mémoire en images tumultueuses et nettes cependant. Mais un abîme survenu les reculait loin d'elle, à une distance infinie.

L'orage s'en allait ; de rares gouttes d'eau en claquant une à une faisaient osciller le toit de la tente.

Mâtho, tel qu'un homme ivre, dormait étendu sur le flanc, avec un bras qui dépassait le bord de la couche. Son bandeau de perles était un peu remonté et découvrait son front. Un sourire écartait ses dents. Elles brillaient entre sa barbe noire, et dans les paupières à demi closes il y avait une gaieté silencieuse et presque outragante.

Salammbô le regardait immobile, la tête basse, les mains croisées.

Au chevet du lit, un poignard s'étalait sur une table de cyprès ; la vue de cette lame luisante l'enflamma d'une envie sanguinaire. Des voix lamentables se traînaient au loin, dans l'ombre, et, comme un chœur de Génies, la sollicitaient. Elle se rapprocha ; elle saisit le fer par le manche. Au frôlement de sa robe, Mâtho entrouvrit les yeux, en avançant la bouche sur ses mains, et le poignard tomba.

Des cris s'élevèrent ; une lueur effrayante fulgurait derrière la toile. Mâtho la souleva ; ils aperçurent de grandes flammes qui enveloppaient le camp des Libyens.

Leurs cabanes de roseaux brûlaient, et les tiges, en se tordant, éclataient dans la fumée et s'envolaient comme des flèches ; sur l'horizon tout rouge, des ombres noires couraient éperdues. On entendait les hurlements de ceux qui étaient dans les cabanes ; les éléphants, les boeufs et les chevaux bondissaient au milieu de la foule en l'écrasant, avec les munitions et les bagages que l'on tirait de l'incendie. Des trompettes sonnaient. On appelait : " Mâtho ! Mâtho ! " Des gens à la porte voulaient entrer.

— " Viens donc ! c'est Hamilcar qui brûle le camp d'Autharite ! "

Il fit un bond. Elle se trouva toute seule.

Alors elle examina le zaïmph ; et quand elle l'eut bien contemplé, elle fut surprise de ne pas avoir ce bonheur qu'elle s'imaginait autrefois. Elle restait mélancolique devant son rêve accompli.

Mais le bas de la tente se releva, et une forme monstrueuse apparut. Salammbô ne distingua d'abord que les deux yeux, avec une longue barbe blanche qui pendait jusqu'à terre ; car le reste du corps, embarrassé dans les guenilles d'un vêtement fauve, traînait contre le sol ; et, à chaque mouvement pour avancer, les deux mains entraient dans la barbe, puis retombaient. En rampant ainsi, elle arriva jusqu'à ses pieds, et Salammbô reconnut le vieux Giscon.

En effet, les Mercenaires, pour empêcher les anciens captifs de s'enfuir, à coups de barre d'airain leur avaient cassé les jambes ; et ils pourrissaient tous pêle-mêle, dans une fosse, au milieu des immondices. Les plus robustes, quand ils entendaient le bruit des gamelles, se haussaient en criant : c'est ainsi que Giscon avait aperçu Salammbô. Il avait deviné une Carthaginoise, aux petites boules de sandastrum qui battaient contre ses cothurnes ; et, dans le pressentiment d'un mystère considérable, en se faisant aider par ses compagnons, il était parvenu à sortir de la fosse ; puis, avec les coudes et les mains, il s'était traîné vingt pas plus loin, jusqu'à la tente de Mâtho. Deux voix y parlaient. Il avait écouté du dehors et tout entendu.

— " C'est toi ! " dit-elle enfin, presque épouvantée.

En se haussant sur les poignets, il répliqua :

— " Oui, c'est moi ! On me croit mort, n'est-ce pas ? "

Elle baissa la tête. Il reprit :

— " Ah ! pourquoi les Baals ne m'ont-ils pas accordé cette miséricorde ! "

" Et se rapprochant de si près, qu'il la frôlait : " Ils m'auraient épargné la peine de te maudire . ! "

Salammbô se rejeta vivement en arrière, tant elle eut peur de cet être immonde, qui était hideux comme une larve et terrible comme un fantôme.

— " J'ai cent ans, bientôt ", dit-il. " J'ai vu Agathodès ; j'ai vu Régulus et les aigles des Romains passer sur les moissons des champs puniques ! J'ai vu toutes les épouvantes des batailles et la mer encombrée par les débris de nos flottes ! Des Barbares que je commandais m'ont enchaîné aux quatre membres, comme un esclave homicide. Mes compagnons, l'un après l'autre, sont à mourir autour de moi ; l'odeur de leurs cadavres me réveille la nuit ; j'écarte les oiseaux qui viennent becqueter leurs yeux ; et pourtant, pas un seul jour je n'ai désespéré de Carthage ! Quand même j'aurais vu contre elle toutes les armées de la terre, et les flammes du siège dépasser la hauteur des temples, j'aurais cru encore à son éternité ! Mais, à présent, tout est fini ! tout est perdu ! Les Dieux l'exècrent ! Malédiction sur toi qui as précipité sa ruine par ton ignominie ! "

Elle ouvrit ses lèvres.

— " Ah ! j'étais là ! " s'écria-t-il. " Je t'ai entendue râler d'amour comme une prostituée ; puis il te racontait son désir, et tu te laissais baiser les mains ! Mais, si la fureur de ton impudicité te poussait, tu devais faire au moins comme les bêtes fauves qui se cachent dans leurs accouplements, et ne pas étaler ta honte jusque sous les yeux de ton père ! " — " Comment ? ", dit-elle.

— " Ah ! tu ne savais pas que les deux retranchements sont à soixante coudées l'un de l'autre, et que ton Mâtho, par excès d'orgueil, s'est établi tout en face d'Hamilcar. Il est là, ton père, derrière toi ; et si je pouvais gravir le sentier qui mène sur la plate-forme, je lui crierais : Viens donc voir ta fille dans les bras du Barbare ! Elle a mis pour lui plaire le vêtement de la Déesse ; et, en abandonnant son corps, elle livre, avec la gloire de ton nom, la majesté des Dieux, la vengeance de la patrie, le salut même de Carthage ! " Le mouvement de sa bouche édentée remuait sa barbe tout du long ; ses yeux, tendus sur elle, la dévoraient ; et il répétait en haletant dans la poussière :

— " Ah ! sacrilège ! Maudite sois-tu ! maudite ! maudite ! "

Salammbô avait écarté la toile, elle la tenait soulevée au bout de son bras, et, sans lui répondre, elle regardait du côté d'Hamilcar.

— " C'est par ici, n'est-ce pas ? " dit-elle.

— " Que t'importe ! Détourne-toi ! Va-t'en ! Ecrase plutôt ta face contre la terre ! C'est un lieu saint que ta vue souillerait. "

Elle jeta le zaïmph autour de sa taille, ramassa vivement ses voiles, son manteau, son écharpe. — " J'y cours ! " s'écria-t-elle ; et, s'échappant, Salammbô disparut.

D'abord, elle marcha dans les ténèbres sans rencontrer personne, car tous se portaient vers l'incendie ; et la clameur redoublait, de grandes flammes empourpraient le ciel par-derrière ; une longue terrasse l'arrêta.

Elle tourna sur elle-même, de droite et de gauche au hasard, cherchant une échelle, une corde, une pierre, quelque chose enfin pour l'aider. Elle avait peur de Giscon, et il lui semblait que des cris et des pas la poursuivaient. Le jour commençait à blanchir. Elle aperçut un sentier dans l'épaisseur du retranchement. Elle prit avec ses dents le bas de sa robe qui la gênait, et, en trois bonds, elle se trouva sur la plate-forme.

Un cri sonore éclata sous elle, dans l'ombre, le même qu'elle avait entendu au bas de l'escalier des galères ; et, en se penchant, elle reconnut l'homme de Schahabarim avec ses chevaux accouplés.

Il avait erré toute la nuit entre les deux retranchements ; puis, inquiet par l'incendie, il était revenu en arrière, tâchant d'apercevoir ce qui se passait dans le camp de Mâtho ; et, comme il savait que cette place était la plus voisine de sa tente, pour obéir au prêtre, il n'en avait pas bougé.

Il monta debout sur un des chevaux. Salammbô se laissa glisser jusqu'à lui ; et ils s'enfuirent au grand galop en faisant le tour du camp unique, pour trouver une porte quelque part.

Mâtho était rentré dans sa tente. La lampe toute fumeuse éclairait à peine, et même il crut que Salammbô dormait. Alors, il palpa délicatement la peau du lion, sur le lit de palmier. Il appela, elle ne répondit pas ; il arracha vivement un lambeau de la toile pour faire venir du jour ; le zaïmph avait disparu.

La terre tremblait sous des pas multipliés. De grands cris, des hennissements, des chocs d'armures s'élevaient dans l'air, et les fanfares des clairons sonnaient la charge. C'était comme un ouragan tourbillonnant autour de lui. Une fureur désordonnée le fit bondir sur ses armes, il se lança dehors.

Les longues files des Barbares descendaient en courant la montagne, et les carrés puniques s'avançaient contre eux, avec une oscillation lourde et régulière. Le brouillard, déchiré par les rayons du soleil, formait de petits nuages qui se balançaient, et peu à peu, en s'élevant, ils découvraient les étendards, les casques et la pointe des piques. Sous les évolutions rapides, des portions de terrain encore dans l'ombre semblaient se déplacer d'un seul morceau ; ailleurs, on aurait dit des torrents qui s'entrecroisaient, et, entre eux, des masses épineuses restaient immobiles. Mâtho distinguait les capitaines, les soldats, les hérauts et jusqu'aux valets par-derrrière, qui étaient montés sur des ânes. Mais au lieu de garder sa position pour couvrir les fantassins, Narr'Havas tourna brusquement à droite, comme s'il voulait se faire écraser par Hamilcar.

Ses cavaliers dépassèrent les éléphants qui se ralentissaient ; et tous les chevaux, allongeant leur tête sans bride, galopaient d'un train si furieux que leur ventre paraissait frôler la terre. Puis, tout à coup, Narr'Havas marcha résolument vers une sentinelle. Il jeta son épée, sa lance, ses javelots, et disparut au milieu des Carthaginois.

Le roi des Numides arriva dans la tente d'Hamilcar ; et il dit, en lui montrant ses hommes qui se tenaient au loin arrêtés :

— " Barca ! je te les amène. Ils sont à toi. "

Alors il se prosterna en signe d'esclavage, et, comme preuve de sa fidélité, il rappela toute sa conduite depuis le commencement de la guerre.

D'abord il avait empêché le siège de Carthage et le massacre des captifs ; puis, il n'avait point profité de la victoire contre Hannon après la défaite d'Utique. Quant aux villes tyriennes, c'est qu'elles se trouvaient sur les frontières de son royaume. Enfin, il n'avait pas participé à la bataille de Macar ; et même il s'était absenté tout exprès pour fuir l'obligation de combattre le Suffète.

Narr'Havas, en effet, avait voulu s'agrandir par des empiétements sur les provinces puniques, et, selon les chances de la victoire, tour à tour secouru et délaissé les Mercenaires. Mais voyant que le plus fort serait définitivement Hamilcar, il s'était tourné vers lui ; et peut-être y avait-il dans sa défection une rancune contre Mâtho, soit à cause du commandement ou de son ancien amour.

Le Suffète l'écouta sans l'interrompre. L'homme qui se présentait ainsi dans une armée où on lui devait des vengeances n'était pas un auxiliaire à dédaigner ; Hamilcar devina tout de suite l'utilité d'une telle alliance pour ses grands projets. Avec les Numides, il se débarrasserait des Libyens. Puis il entraînerait l'Occident à la conquête de l'Ibérie ; et, sans lui demander pourquoi il n'était pas venu plus tôt, ni relever aucun de ses mensonges, il baisa Narr'Havas, en heurtant trois fois sa poitrine contre la sienne.

C'était pour en finir, et par désespoir, qu'il avait incendié le camp des Libyens. Cette armée lui arrivait comme un secours des Dieux ; en dissimulant sa joie, il répondit :

— " Que les Baals te favorisent ! J'ignore ce que fera pour toi la République, mais Hamilcar n'a pas d'ingratitude. "

Le tumulte redoublait ; des capitaines entraient. Il s'armait tout en parlant :

— " Allons, retourne ! Avec les cavaliers, tu rabattras leur infanterie entre tes éléphants et les miens ! Courage ! extermine ! "

Et Narr'Havas se précipitait, quand Salammbô parut.

Elle sauta vite à bas de son cheval. Elle ouvrit son large manteau, et, en écartant les bras, elle déploya le zaïmph.

La tente de cuir, relevée dans les coins, laissait voir le tour entier de la montagne couverte de soldats, et comme elle se trouvait au centre, de tous les côtés on apercevait Salammbô. Une clameur immense éclata, un long cri de triomphe et d'espoir. Ceux qui étaient en marche s'arrêtèrent ; les moribonds, s'appuyant sur le coude, se retournaient pour la bénir. Tous les Barbares savaient maintenant qu'elle avait repris le zaïmph ; de loin ils la voyaient, ils croyaient la voir ; et d'autres cris, mais de rage et de vengeance, retentissaient, malgré les applaudissements des Carthaginois ; les cinq armées, s'étageant sur la montagne, trépignaient et hurlaient ainsi tout autour de Salammbô.

Hamilcar, sans pouvoir parler, la remerciait par des signes de tête.

Ses yeux se portaient alternativement sur le zaïmph et sur elle, et il remarqua que sa chaînette était rompue. Alors il frissonna, saisi par un soupçon terrible. Mais reprenant vite son impassibilité, il considéra Narr'Havas obliquement, sans tourner la figure.

Le roi des Numides se tenait à l'écart dans une attitude discrète ; il portait au front un peu de la poussière qu'il avait touchée en se prosternant. Enfin le Suffète s'avança vers lui et, avec un air plein de gravité :

— " En récompense des services que tu m'as rendus, Narr'Havas, je te donne ma fille. "

" Il ajouta :

" Sois mon fils et défends ton père ! "

Narr'Havas eut un grand geste de surprise, puis se jeta sur ses mains qu'il couvrit de baisers.

Salammbô, calme comme une statue, semblait ne pas comprendre. Elle rougissait un peu, tout en baissant les paupières ; ses longs cils recourbés faisaient des ombres sur ses joues.

Hamilcar voulut immédiatement les unir par des fiançailles indissolubles. On mit entre les mains de Salammbô une lance qu'elle offrit à Narr'Havas : on attachait leurs pouces l'un contre l'autre avec une lanière de boeuf, puis on leur versa du blé sur la tête, et les grains qui tombaient autour d'eux sonnèrent comme de la grêle en rebondissant.

Chapitre 12 L'AQUEDUC

Douze heures après, il ne restait plus des Mercenaires qu'un tas de blessés, de morts et d'agonisants.

Hamilcar, sorti brusquement du fond de la gorge, était redescendu sur la pente occidentale qui regarde Hippo-Zaryte, et, l'espace étant plus large en cet endroit, il avait eu soin d'y attirer les Barbares. Narr'Havas les avait enveloppés avec ses chevaux ; le Suffète, pendant ce temps-là, les refoulait, les écrasait ; puis ils étaient vaincus d'avance par la perte du zaïmph ; ceux mêmes qui ne s'en souciaient avaient senti une angoisse et comme un affaiblissement. Hamilcar, ne mettant pas son orgueil à garder pour lui le champ de bataille, s'était retiré un peu plus loin, à gauche sur des hauteurs d'où il les dominait.

On reconnaissait la forme des camps à leurs palissades inclinées. Un long amas de cendres noires fumait sur l'emplacement des Libyens ; le sol bouleversé avait des ondulations comme la mer, et les tentes, avec leurs toiles en lambeaux, semblaient de vagues navires à demi perdus dans les écueils. Des cuirasses, des fourches, des clairons, des morceaux de bois, de fer et d'airain, du blé, de la paille et des vêtements s'éparpillaient au milieu des cadavres ; ça et là quelque phalarique prête à s'éteindre brûlait contre un monceau de bagages ; la terre, en de certains endroits, disparaissait sous les boucliers ; des charognes de chevaux se suivaient comme une série de monticules ; on apercevait des jambes, des sandales, des bras, des cottes de mailles et des têtes dans leurs casques, maintenues par la mentonnière et qui roulaient comme des boules ; des chevelures pendaient aux épines ; dans des mares de sang, des éléphants, les entrailles ouvertes, râlaient couchés avec leurs tours ; on marchait sur des choses gluantes et il y avait des flaques de boue, bien que la pluie n'eût pas tombé.

Cette confusion de cadavres occupait, du haut en bas, la montagne tout entière.

Ceux qui survivaient ne bougeaient pas plus que les morts. Accroupis par groupes inégaux, ils se regardaient, effarés, et ne parlaient pas.

Au bout d'une longue prairie, le lac d'Hippo-Zaryte resplendissait sous le soleil couchant. A droite, de blanches maisons agglomérées dépassaient une ceinture de murailles ; puis la mer s'étalait, indéfiniment ; — et, le menton dans la main, les Barbares soupiraient en songeant à leurs patries. Un nuage de poudre grise retombait.

Le vent du soir souffla ; alors toutes les poitrines se dilatèrent ; et, à mesure que la fraîcheur augmentait, on pouvait voir la vermine abandonner les morts qui se refroidissaient, et courir sur le sable chaud. Au sommet des grosses pierres, des corbeaux immobiles restaient tournés vers les agonisants.

Quand la nuit fut descendue, des chiens à poil jaune, de ces bêtes immondes qui suivaient les armées, arrivèrent tout doucement au milieu des Barbares. D'abord ils léchèrent les caillots de sang sur les moignons encore tièdes ; et bientôt ils se mirent à dévorer les cadavres, en les entamant par le ventre.

Les fugitifs reparaissaient un à un, comme des ombres ; les femmes aussi se hasardèrent à revenir, car il en restait encore, chez les Libyens surtout, malgré le massacre effroyable que les Numides en avaient fait.

Quelques-uns prirent des bouts de corde qu'ils allumèrent pour servir de flambeaux. D'autres tenaient des piques entrecroisées. On plaçait dessus les cadavres et on les transportait à l'écart.

Ils se trouvaient étendus par longues lignes, sur le dos, la bouche ouverte, avec leurs lances auprès d'eux ; ou bien ils s'entassaient pêle-mêle, et souvent, pour découvrir ceux qui manquaient, il fallait creuser tout un monceau. Puis on promenait la torche sur leur visage, lentement. Des armes hideuses leur avaient fait des blessures compliquées. Des lambeaux verdâtres leur pendaient du front ; ils étaient tailladés en morceaux, écrasés jusqu'à la moelle, bleuis sous des strangulations, ou largement fendus par l'ivoire des éléphants. Bien qu'ils fussent morts presque en même temps, des différences existaient dans leur corruption. Les hommes du Nord étaient gonflés d'une bouffissure livide, tandis que les Africains, plus nerveux, avaient l'air enfumés, et déjà se desséchaient. On reconnaissait les Mercenaires aux tatouages de leurs mains : les vieux soldats d'Antiochus portaient un épervier ; ceux qui avaient servi en Egypte, la tête d'un cynocéphale ; chez les princes de l'Asie, une hache, une grenade, un marteau ; dans les Républiques grecques, le profil d'une citadelle ou le nom d'un archonte ; et on en voyait dont les bras étaient couverts entièrement par ces symboles multipliés, qui se mêlaient à leurs cicatrices et aux blessures nouvelles.

Pour les hommes de race latine, les Samnites, les Etrusques, les Campaniens et les Brutiens, on établit quatre grands bûchers.

Les Grecs, avec la pointe de leurs glaives, creusèrent des fosses. Les Spartiates, retirant leurs manteaux rouges, en enveloppèrent les morts ; les Athéniens les étendaient la face vers le soleil levant ; les Cantabres les enfouissaient sous un monceau de cailloux ; les Nasamons les pliaient en deux avec des courroies de boeufs, et les Garamantes allèrent les ensevelir sur la plage, afin qu'ils fussent perpétuellement arrosés par les flots. Mais les Latins se désolaient de ne pas recueillir leurs cendres dans les urnes ; les Nomades regrettaient la chaleur des sables où les corps se momifient, et les Celtes, trois pierres brutes, sous un ciel pluvieux, au fond d'un golfe plein d'îlots.

Des vociférations s'élevaient, suivies d'un long silence. C'était pour forcer les âmes à revenir. Puis la clameur reprenait, à intervalles réguliers, obstinément.

On s'excusait près des morts de ne pouvoir les honorer comme le prescrivaient les rites : car ils allaient, par cette privation, circuler, durant des périodes infinies, à travers toutes sortes de hasards et de métamorphoses : on les interpellait, on leur demandait ce qu'ils désiraient ; d'autres les accablaient d'injures pour s'être laissé vaincre.

La lueur des grands bûchers apparaissait les figures exsangues, renversées de place en place sur les débris d'armures : et les larmes excitaient les larmes, les sanglots devenaient plus aigus, ; les reconnaissances et les étreintes plus frénétiques. Des femmes s'étaient étalées sur les cadavres, bouche contre bouche, front contre front : il fallait les battre pour qu'elles se retirassent, quand on jetait la terre. Ils se noircissaient les joues ; ils se coupaient les cheveux ; ils se tiraient du sang et le versaient dans les fosses ; ils se faisaient des entailles à l'imitation des blessures qui défiguraient les morts. Des rugissements éclataient à travers le tapage des cymbales. Quelques-uns arrachaient leurs amulettes, crachaient dessus. Les moribonds se roulaient dans la boue sanglante en mordant de rage leurs poings mutilés ; et quarante- trois Samnites, tout un printemps sacré, s'entr'égorgèrent comme des gladiateurs. Bientôt le bois manqua pour les bûchers, les flammes s'éteignirent, toutes les places étaient prises ; — et, las d'avoir crié, affaiblis, chancelants, ils s'endormirent auprès de leurs frères morts, ceux qui tenaient à vivre pleins d'inquiétudes, et les autres désirant ne pas se réveiller.

Aux blancheurs de l'aube, il parut sur les limites des Barbares des soldats qui défilaient avec des casques levés au bout des piques ; en saluant les Mercenaires, ils leur demandaient s'ils n'avaient rien à faire dire dans leurs patries.

D'autres se rapprochèrent, et les Barbares reconnurent quelques-uns de leurs anciens compagnons.

Le Suffète avait proposé à tous les captifs de servir dans ses troupes. Plusieurs avaient intrépidement refusé ; et, bien résolu à ne point les nourrir ni à les abandonner au Grand-Conseil, il les avait renvoyés, en leur ordonnant de ne plus combattre Carthage. Quant à ceux que la peur des supplices rendait dociles, on leur avait distribué les armes de l'ennemi ; et maintenant ils se présentaient aux vaincus, moins pour les séduire que par un mouvement d'orgueil et de curiosité.

D'abord ils racontèrent les bons traitements du Suffète ; les Barbares les écoutaient tout en les jalousant, bien qu'ils les méprisassent. Puis, aux premières paroles de reproche, les lâches s'emportèrent ; de loin ils leur montraient leurs propres épées, leurs cuirasses, et les conviaient avec des injures à venir les prendre. Les Barbares ramassèrent des cailloux ; tous s'enfuirent ; et l'on ne vit plus au sommet de la montagne que les pointes des lances dépassant le bord des palissades.

Alors une douleur, plus lourde que l'humiliation de la défaite, accabla les Barbares. Ils songeaient à l'inanité de leur courage. Ils restaient les yeux fixes en grinçant des dents.

La même idée leur vint. Ils se précipitèrent en tumulte sur les prisonniers carthaginois. Les soldats du Suffète, par hasard, n'avaient pu les découvrir, et comme il s'était retiré du champ de bataille, ils se trouvaient encore dans la fosse profonde.

On les rangea par terre, dans un endroit aplati. Des sentinelles firent un cercle autour d'eux, et on laissa les femmes entrer, par trente ou quarante successivement. Voulant profiter du peu de temps qu'on leur donnait, elles couraient de l'un à l'autre, incertaines, palpitantes ; puis, inclinées sur ces pauvres corps, elles les frappaient à tour de bras comme des lavandières qui battent des linges ; en hurlant le nom de leurs époux, elles les déchiraient sous leurs ongles ; elles leur crevèrent les yeux avec les aiguilles de leurs chevelures. Les hommes y vinrent ensuite, et ils les suppliciaient depuis les pieds, qu'ils coupaient aux chevilles, jusqu'au front, dont ils levaient des couronnes de peau pour se mettre sur la tête. Les Mangeurs-de-choses-immondes furent atroces dans leurs imaginations. Ils envenimaient les blessures en y versant de la poussière, du vinaigre, des éclats de poterie : d'autres attendaient derrière eux ; le sang coulait et ils se réjouissaient comme font les vengeurs autour des cuves fumantes.

Cependant Mâtho était assis par terre, à la place même où il se trouvait quand la bataille avait fini, les coudes sur les genoux, les tempes dans les mains ; il ne voyait rien, n'entendait rien, ne pensait plus.

Aux hurlements de joie que la foule poussait, il releva la tête. Devant lui, un lambeau de toile accroché à une perche, et qui traînait par le bas, abritait confusément des corbeilles, des tapis, une peau de lion. Il reconnut sa tente ; et ses yeux s'attachaient contre le sol comme si la fille d'Hamilcar, en disparaissant, se fût enfoncée sous la terre.

La toile déchirée battait au vent ; quelquefois ses longues bribes lui passaient devant la bouche, et il aperçut une marque rouge, pareille à l'empreinte d'une main. C'était la main de Narr'Havas, le signe de leur alliance. Alors Mâtho se leva. Il prit un tison qui fumait encore, et il le jeta sur les débris de sa tente, dédaigneusement. Puis, du bout de son cothurne, il repoussait vers la flamme des choses qui débordaient, pour que rien n'en subsistât.

Tout à coup, et sans qu'on pût deviner de quel point il surgissait, Spendius parut.

L'ancien esclave s'était attaché contre la cuisse deux éclats de lance ; il boitait d'un air piteux, tout en exhalant des plaintes.

— " Retire donc cela ", lui dit Mâtho, " je sais que tu es un brave ! " Car il était si écrasé par l'injustice des Dieux qu'il n'avait plus assez de force pour s'indigner contre les hommes.

Spendius lui fit un signe, et il le mena dans le creux d'un mamelon, où Zarxas et Autharite se tenaient cachés.

Ils avaient fui comme l'esclave, l'un bien qu'il fût cruel, et l'autre malgré sa bravoure. Mais qui aurait pu s'attendre, disaient-ils, à la trahison de Narr'Havas, à l'incendie des Libyens, à la perte du zaïmph, à l'attaque soudaine d'Hamilcar, et surtout à ses manoeuvres les forçant à revenir dans le fond de la montagne sous les coups immédiats des Carthaginois ? Spendius n'avouait point sa terreur et persistait à soutenir qu'il avait la jambe cassée.

Enfin, les trois chefs et le schalischim se demandèrent ce qu'il fallait maintenant décider.

Hamilcar leur fermait la route de Carthage ; on était pris entre ses soldats et les provinces de Narr'Havas ; les villes tyriennes se joindraient aux vainqueurs ; ils allaient se trouver acculés au bord de la mer, et toutes ces forces réunies les écraseraient. Voilà ce qui arriverait inmanquablement.

Ainsi pas un moyen ne s'offrait d'éviter la guerre. Donc, ils devaient la poursuivre à outrance. Mais comment faire comprendre la nécessité d'une interminable bataille à tous ces gens découragés et saignant encore de leurs blessures ?

— " Je m'en charge ! " dit Spendius.

Deux heures après, un homme, qui arrivait du côté d'Hippo-Zaryte, gravit en courant la montagne. Il agitant des tablettes au bout de son bras, et, comme il criait très fort, les Barbares l'entourèrent.

Elles étaient expédiées par les soldats grecs de la Sardaigne. Ils recommandaient à leurs compagnons d'Afrique de surveiller Giscon avec les autres captifs. Un marchand de Samos, un certain Hipponax, venant de Carthage, leur avait appris qu'un complot s'organisait pour les faire évader, et on engageait les Barbares à tout prévoir ; la République était puissante.

Le stratagème de Spendius ne réussit point d'abord comme il l'avait espéré. Cette assurance d'un péril nouveau, loin d'exciter de la fureur, souleva des craintes ; et, se rappelant l'avertissement d'Hamilcar jeté naguère au milieu d'eux, ils s'attendaient à quelque chose d'imprévu et qui serait terrible. La nuit se passa dans une grande angoisse ; plusieurs même se débarrassèrent de leurs armes pour attendre le Suffète quand il se présenterait.

Mais le lendemain, à la troisième veille du jour, un second coureur parut, encore plus haletant et noir de poussière. Le Grec lui arracha des mains un rouleau de papyrus chargé d'écritures phéniciennes. On y suppliait les Mercenaires de ne pas se décourager ; les braves de Tunis allaient venir avec de grands renforts.

Spendius lut d'abord la lettre trois fois de suite ; et, soutenu par deux Cappadociens qui le tenaient assis sur leurs épaules, il se faisait transporter de place en place, et il la relisait. Pendant sept heures, il harangua.

Il rappelait aux Mercenaires les promesses du Grand-Conseil ; aux Africains, les cruautés des intendants ; à tous les Barbares, l'injustice de Carthage. La douceur du Suffète était un appât pour les prendre. Ceux qui se livreraient, on les vendrait comme des esclaves ; les vaincus périraient suppliciés. Quant à s'enfuir, par quelles routes ? Pas un peuple ne voudrait les recevoir. Tandis qu'en continuant leurs efforts, ils obtiendraient à la fois la liberté, la vengeance, de l'argent ! Et ils n'attendraient pas longtemps, puisque les gens de Tunis, la Libye entière se précipitaient à leur secours. Il montrait le papyrus déroulé : — " Regardez donc ! lisez ! voilà leurs promesses ! Je ne mens pas. "

Des chiens erraient, avec leur museau noir tout plaqué de rouge. Le grand soleil chauffait les têtes nues. Une odeur nauséabonde s'exhalait des cadavres mal enfouis. Quelques-uns même sortaient de terre jusqu'au ventre. Spendius les appelait à lui pour témoigner des choses qu'il disait ; puis il levait ses poings du côté d'Hamilcar.

Mâtho l'observait d'ailleurs et, afin de couvrir sa lâcheté, il étalait une colère où peu à peu il se trouvait pris lui-même. En se dévouant aux Dieux, il accumula des malédictions sur les Carthaginois. Le supplice des captifs était un jeu d'enfants. Pourquoi donc les épargner et traîner toujours derrière soi ce bétail inutile ! — " Non ! il faut en finir ! leurs projets sont connus ! un seul peut nous perdre ! pas de pitié ! On reconnaîtra les bons à la vitesse des jambes et à la force du coup. "

Alors ils se retournèrent sur les captifs. Plusieurs râlaient encore ; on les acheva en leur enfonçant le talon dans la bouche, ou bien on les poignardait avec la pointe d'un javelot.

Ensuite ils songèrent à Giscon. Nulle part on ne l'apercevait ; une inquiétude les troubla. Ils voulaient tout à la fois se convaincre de sa mort et y participer. Enfin, trois pasteurs samnites le découvrirent à quinze pas de l'endroit où s'élevait naguère la tente de Mâtho. Ils le reconnurent à sa longue barbe, et ils appelèrent les autres.

Etendu sur le dos, les bras contre les hanches et les genoux serrés, il avait l'air d'un mort disposé pour le sépulcre. Cependant, ses côtes maigres s'abaissaient et remontaient, et ses yeux, largement ouverts au milieu de sa figure toute pâle, regardaient d'une façon continue et intolérable.

Les Barbares le considérèrent, d'abord, avec un grand étonnement. Depuis le temps qu'il vivait dans la fosse, on l'avait presque oublié ; gênés par de vieux souvenirs, ils se tenaient à distance et n'osaient porter la main sur lui.

Mais ceux qui étaient par-derrière murmuraient et se poussaient, quand un Garamante traversa la foule ; il brandissait une faucille ; tous comprirent sa pensée ; leurs visages s'empourprèrent, et, saisis de honte, ils hurlaient : " Oui ! oui ! "

L'homme au fer recourbé s'approcha de Giscon. Il lui prit la tête, et, l'appuyant sur son genou, il la sciait à coups rapides ; elle tomba ; deux gros jets de sang firent un trou dans la poussière. Zarxas avait sauté dessus, et, plus léger qu'un léopard, il courait vers les Carthaginois.

Puis, quand il fut aux deux tiers de la montagne, il retira de sa poitrine la tête de Giscon en la tenant par la barbe, il tourna son bras rapidement plusieurs fois, — et la masse, enfin lancée, décrivit une longue parabole et disparut derrière le retranchement punique.

Bientôt se dressèrent au bord des palissades deux étendards entrecroisés, signe convenu pour réclamer les cadavres.

Alors quatre hérauts, choisis sur la largeur de leur poitrine, s'en allèrent avec de grands clairons, et, parlant dans les tubes d'airain, ils déclarèrent qu'il n'y avait plus désormais, entre les Carthaginois et les Barbares, ni foi, ni pitié, ni dieux, qu'ils se refusaient d'avance à toutes les ouvertures et que l'on renverrait les parlementaires avec les mains coupées.

Immédiatement après, on députa Spendius à Hippo-Zaryte afin d'avoir des vivres ; la cité tyrienne leur en envoya le soir même. Ils mangèrent avidement. Puis, quand ils se furent réconfortés, ils ramassèrent bien vite les restes de leurs bagages et leurs armes rompues ; les femmes se tassèrent au centre, et sans souci des blessés pleurant derrière eux, ils partirent par le bord du rivage à pas rapides, comme un troupeau de loups qui s'éloignent.

Ils marchaient sur Hippo-Zaryte, décidés à la prendre, car ils avaient besoin d'une ville.

Hamilcar, en les apercevant au loin, eut un désespoir, malgré l'orgueil qu'il sentait à les voir fuir devant lui. Il aurait fallu les attaquer tout de suite avec des troupes fraîches. Encore une journée pareille, et la guerre était finie ! Si les choses traînaient, ils reviendraient plus forts ; les villes tyriennes se joindraient à eux ; sa clémence envers les vaincus n'avait servi de rien. Il prit la résolution d'être impitoyable.

Le soir même, il envoya au Grand-Conseil un dromadaire chargé de bracelets recueillis sur les morts, et, avec des menaces horribles, il ordonnait qu'on lui expédiât une autre armée.

Tous, depuis longtemps, le croyaient perdu ; si bien qu'en apprenant sa victoire, ils éprouvèrent une stupéfaction qui était presque de la terreur. Le retour du zaïmph, annoncé vaguement, complétait la merveille. Ainsi, les Dieux et la force de Carthage semblaient maintenant lui appartenir.

Personne de ses ennemis ne hasarda une plainte ou une récrimination. Par l'enthousiasme des uns et la pusillanimité des autres, avant le délai prescrit, une armée de cinq mille hommes fut prête.

Elle gagna promptement Utique pour appuyer le Suffète sur ses derrières, tandis que trois mille des plus considérables montèrent sur des vaisseaux qui devaient les débarquer à Hippo-Zaryte, d'où ils repousseraient les Barbares.

Hannon en avait accepté le commandement ; mais il confia l'armée à son lieutenant Magdassan, afin de conduire les troupes de débarquement lui-même, car il ne pouvait plus endurer les secousses de la litière. Son mal, en rongant ses lèvres et ses narines, avait creusé dans sa face un large trou ; à dix pas, on lui voyait le fond de sa gorge, et il se savait tellement hideux qu'il se mettait, comme une femme, un voile sur la tête.

Hippo-Zaryte n'écouta point ses sommations, ni celles des Barbares non plus ; mais chaque matin les habitants leur descendaient des vivres dans des corbeilles, et, en criant du haut des tours, ils s'excusaient sur les exigences de la République et les conjuraient de s'éloigner. Ils adressaient par signes les mêmes protestations aux Carthaginois qui stationnaient dans la mer.

Hannon se contentait de bloquer le port sans risquer une attaque. Cependant, il persuada aux juges d'Hippo-Zaryte de recevoir chez eux trois cents soldats. Puis il s'en alla vers le cap des Raisins et il fit un long détour afin de cerner les Barbares, opération inopportune et même dangereuse. Sa jalousie l'empêchait de secourir le Suffète ; il arrêtait ses espions, le gênait dans tous ses plans, compromettait l'entreprise. Enfin, Hamilcar écrivit au Grand-Conseil de l'en débarrasser, et Hannon rentra dans Carthage, furieux contre la bassesse des Anciens et la folie de son collègue. Donc, après tant d'espérances, on se retrouvait dans une situation encore plus déplorable ; mais on tâchait de n'y pas réfléchir et même de n'en point parler.

Comme si ce n'était pas assez d'infortunes à la fois, on apprit que les Mercenaires de la Sardaigne avaient crucifié leur général, saisi les places fortes et partout égorgé les hommes de la race chananéenne. Le peuple romain menaça la République d'hostilités immédiates, si elle ne donnait douze cents talents avec l'île de Sardaigne tout entière. Il avait accepté l'alliance des Barbares, et il leur expédia des bateaux plats chargés de farine et de viandes sèches. Les Carthaginois les poursuivirent, capturèrent cinq cents hommes : mais, trois jours après, une flotte qui venait de la Bysacène, apportant des vivres à Carthage, sombra dans une tempête. Les Dieux évidemment se déclaraient contre elle.

Alors, les citoyens d'Hippo-Zaryte, prétextant une alarme, firent monter sur leurs murailles les trois cents hommes d'Hannon ; puis, survenant derrière eux, ils les prirent aux jambes et les jetèrent par-dessus les remparts, tout à coup. Quelques-uns qui n'étaient pas morts furent poursuivis et allèrent se noyer dans la mer.

Utique endurait des soldats, car Magdassan avait fait comme Hannon, et, d'après ses ordres, il entourait la ville, sourd aux prières d'Hamilcar. Pour ceux-là, on leur donna du vin mêlé de mandragore, puis on les égorga dans leur sommeil. En même temps, les Barbares arrivèrent : Magdassan s'enfuit, les portes s'ouvrirent, et dès lors les deux villes tyriennes montrèrent à leurs nouveaux amis un opiniâtre dévouement, et à leurs anciens alliés une haine inconcevable.

Cet abandon de la cause punique était un conseil, un exemple. Les espoirs de délivrance se ranimèrent. Des populations, incertaines encore, n'hésitèrent plus. Tout s'ébranla. Le Suffète l'apprit, et il n'attendait aucun secours ! Il était maintenant irrévocablement perdu.

Aussitôt il congédia Narr'Havas, qui devait garder les limites de son royaume. Quant à lui, il résolut de rentrer à Carthage pour y prendre des soldats et recommencer la guerre.

Les Barbares établis à Hippo-Zaryte aperçurent son armée comme elle descendait la montagne.

Où donc les Carthaginois allaient-ils ? La faim sans doute les poussait ; et, affolés par les souffrances, malgré leur faiblesse, ils venaient de livrer bataille. Mais ils tournèrent à droite : ils fuyaient. On pouvait les atteindre, les écraser tous. Les Barbares s'élancèrent à leur poursuite.

Les Carthaginois furent arrêtés par le fleuve. Il était large cette fois, et le vent d'ouest n'avait pas soufflé. Les uns le passèrent à la nage, les autres sur leurs boucliers. Ils se remirent en marche. La nuit tomba. On ne les vit plus.

Les Barbares ne s'arrêtèrent pas ; ils remontèrent plus loin, pour trouver une place plus étroite. Les gens de Tunis accoururent ; ils entraînaient ceux d'Utique. A chaque buisson, leur nombre augmentait ; et les Carthaginois, en se couchant par terre, entendaient le battement de leurs pas dans les ténèbres. De temps à autre, pour les ralentir, Barca faisait lancer, derrière lui, des volées de flèches ; plusieurs en furent tués. Quand le jour se leva, on était dans les montagnes de l'Ariane, à cet endroit où le chemin fait un coude.

Alors Mâtho, qui marchait en tête, crut distinguer dans l'horizon quelque chose de vert, au sommet d'une éminence. Puis le terrain s'abaissa, et des obélisques, des dômes, des maisons parurent ; c'était Carthage ! Il s'appuya contre un arbre pour ne pas tomber, tant son cœur battait vite.

Il songeait à tout ce qui était survenu dans son existence depuis la dernière fois qu'il avait passé par là ! C'était une surprise infinie, un étourdissement. Puis une joie l'emporta, à l'idée de revoir Salammbô. Les raisons qu'il avait de l'exécrer lui revinrent à la mémoire ; il les rejeta bien vite. Frémissant et les prunelles tendues, il contemplait, au-delà d'Eschmoûn, la haute terrasse d'un palais, par-dessus des palmiers ; un ' sourire d'extase illuminait sa figure, comme s'il fût arrivé jusqu'à lui quelque grande lumière ; il ouvrait les bras, il envoyait des baisers dans la brise et murmurait :

— " Viens ! viens ! " un soupir lui gonfla la poitrine, et deux larmes, longues comme des perles, tombèrent sur sa barbe.

— " Qui te retient ? " s'écria Spendius. " Hâte-toi donc ! En marche ! Le Suffète va nous échapper ! Mais tes genoux chancellent et tu me regardes comme un homme ivre ! "

Il trépignait d'impatience ; il pressait Mâtho ; et, avec des clignements d'yeux, comme à l'approche d'un but longuement visé :

— " Ah ! nous y sommes ! Nous y voilà ! Je les tiens ! "

Il avait l'air si convaincu et triomphant que Mâtho, surpris dans sa torpeur, se sentit entraîné. Ces paroles survenaient au plus fort de sa détresse, poussaient son désespoir à la vengeance, montraient une pâture à sa colère. Il bondit sur un des chameaux qui étaient dans les bagages, lui arracha son licou ; avec la longue corde, il frappait à tour de bras les traînardes ; et il courait de droite et de gauche, alternativement, sur le derrière de l'armée, comme un chien qui pousse un troupeau.

A sa voix tonnante, les lignes d'hommes se resserrèrent ; les boiteux même précipitèrent leurs pas ; au milieu de l'isthme, l'intervalle diminua. Les premiers des Barbares marchaient dans la poussière des Carthaginois. Les deux armées se rapprochaient, allaient se toucher. Mais la porte de Malqua, la porte de Tagaste et la grande porte de Khamon déployèrent leurs battants. Le carré punique se divisa ; trois colonnes s'y engloutirent, elles tourbillonnaient sous les porches. Bientôt, la masse, trop serrée sur elle-même, n'avança plus ; les piques en l'air se heurtaient, et les flèches des Barbares éclataient contre les murs.

Sur le seuil de Khamon, on aperçut Hamilcar. Il se retourna en criant à ses hommes de s'écarter. Il descendit de son cheval ; et, du glaive qu'il tenait, en le piquant à la croupe, il l'envoya sur les Barbares.

C'était un étalon oryngé qu'on nourrissait avec des boulettes de farine, et qui pliait les genoux pour laisser monter son maître. Pourquoi donc le renvoyait-il ? Était-ce un sacrifice ?

Le grand cheval galopait au milieu des lances, renversait les hommes, et, s'embarrassant les pieds dans ses entrailles, tombait, puis se relevait avec des bonds furieux ; et pendant qu'ils s'écartaient, tâchaient de l'arrêter ou regardaient tout surpris, les Carthaginois s'étaient rejoints ; ils entrèrent : la porte énorme se referma derrière eux, en retentissant.

Elle ne céda pas. Les Barbares vinrent s'écraser contre elle ; — et, durant quelques minutes, sur toute la longueur de l'armée, il y eut une oscillation de plus en plus molle et qui enfin s'arrêta.

Les Carthaginois avaient mis des soldats sur l'aqueduc ; ils commençaient à lancer des pierres, des balles, des poutres. Spendius représenta qu'il ne fallait point s'obstiner. Ils allèrent s'établir plus loin, tous bien résolus à faire le siège de Carthage.

Cependant, la rumeur de la guerre avait dépassé les confins de l'empire punique ; et, des colonnes d'Hercule jusqu'au-delà de Cyrène, les pasteurs en rêvaient en gardant leurs troupeaux, et les caravanes en causaient la nuit, à la lueur des étoiles. Cette grande Carthage, dominatrice des mers, splendide comme le soleil et effrayante comme un dieu, il se trouvait des hommes qui l'osaient attaquer ! On avait même plusieurs fois affirmé sa chute ; et tous y avaient cru, car tous la souhaitaient : les populations soumises, les villages tributaires, les provinces alliées, les hordes indépendantes, ceux qui l'exécraient pour sa tyrannie, ou qui jalousaient sa puissance, ou qui convoitaient sa richesse. Les plus braves s'étaient joints bien vite aux Mercenaires. La défaite du Macar avait arrêté tous les autres. Enfin, ils avaient repris confiance, peu à peu s'étaient avancés, rapprochés ; et maintenant, les hommes des régions orientales se tenaient dans les dunes de Clypea, de l'autre côté du golfe. Dès qu'ils aperçurent les Barbares, ils se montrèrent.

Ce n'étaient pas les Libyens des environs de Carthage ; depuis longtemps, ils composaient la troisième armée ; mais les nomades du plateau de Barca, les bandits du cap Phiscus et du promontoire de Derné, ceux du Phazzana et de la Marmarique. Ils avaient traversé le désert en buvant aux puits saumâtres maçonnés avec des ossements de chameau ; les Zuaèces, couverts de plumes d'autruche, étaient venus sur des quadriges ; les Garamantes, masqués d'un voile noir, assis en arrière sur leurs cavales peintes ; d'autres sur des ânes, sur des onagres, sur des zèbres, sur des buffles ; et quelques-uns traînaient avec leurs familles et leurs idoles le toit de leur cabane en forme de chaloupe. Il y avait des Ammoniens aux membres ridés par l'eau chaude des fontaines ; des Atarantes, qui maudissent le soleil ; des Troglodytes, qui enterrent en riant leurs morts sous des branches d'arbres ; et les hideux Auséens, qui mangent des sauterelles ; les Achyrmachides, qui mangent des poux, et les Gysantes, peints de vermillon, qui mangent des singes.

Tous s'étaient rangés sur le bord de la mer, en une grande ligne droite. Ils s'avancèrent ensuite comme des tourbillons de sable soulevés par le vent. Au milieu de l'isthme, leur foule s'arrêta, les Mercenaires établis devant eux, près des murailles, ne voulant point bouger.

Puis, du côté de l'Ariane, apparurent les hommes de l'Occident, le peuple des Numides. En effet. Narr'Havas ne gouvernait que les Massyliens ; et d'ailleurs, une coutume leur permettant après les revers d'abandonner le roi, ils s'étaient rassemblés sur le Zaine, puis l'avaient franchi au premier mouvement d'Hamilcar. On vit d'abord accourir tous les chasseurs de Malethut-Baal et du Garaphos, habillés de peaux de lion, et qui conduisaient avec la hampe de leurs piques de petits chevaux maigres à longue crinière ; puis marchaient les Gétules dans des cuirasses en peau de serpent ; puis les Pharusiens, portant de hautes couronnes faites de cire et de résine : et les Caunes, les Macares, les Tillabares, chacun tenant deux javelots et un bouclier rond en cuir d'hippopotame. Ils s'arrêtèrent au bas des Catacombes, dans les premières flagues de la Lagune.

Mais quand les Libyens se furent déplacés, on aperçut à l'endroit qu'ils occupaient, et comme un nuage à ras du sol, la multitude des Nègres. Il en était venu du Harousch-blanc, du Harousch-noir, du désert d'Augyles et même de la grande contrée d'Agazymba, qui est à quatre mois au sud des Garamantes, et de plus loin encore ! Malgré leurs bijoux de bois rouge, la crasse de leur peau noire les faisait ressembler à des mûres longtemps roulées dans la poussière. Ils avaient des caleçons en fils d'écorce, des tuniques d'herbes desséchées, des mufles de bêtes fauves sur la tête, et, hurlant comme des loups, ils secouaient des tringles garnies d'anneaux et brandissaient des queues de vache au bout d'un bâton, en manière d'étendards.

Puis derrière les Numides, les Maurusiens et les Gétules, se pressaient les hommes jaunâtres répandus au-delà de Taggir dans les forêts de cèdres. Des carquois en poils de chat leur battaient sur les épaules, et ils menaient en laisse des chiens énormes, aussi hauts que des ânes, et qui n'aboyaient pas.

Enfin, comme si l'Afrique ne s'était point suffisamment vidée, et que, pour recueillir plus de fureurs, il eût fallu prendre jusqu'au bas des racés, on voyait, derrière tous les autres, des hommes à profil de bête et ricanant d'un rire idiot ; — misérables ravagés par de hideuses maladies, pygmées difformes, mulâtres d'un sexe ambigu, albinos dont les yeux rouges clignotaient au soleil ; tout en bégayant des sons inintelligibles, ils mettaient un doigt dans leur bouche pour faire voir qu'ils avaient faim.

La confusion des armes n'était pas moindre que celle des vêtements et des peuples. Pas une invention de mort qui n'y fût, depuis les poignards de bois, les haches de pierre et les tridents d'ivoire, jusqu'à de longs sabres dentelés comme des scies, minces, et faits d'une lame de cuivre qui pliait. Ils maniaient des coutelas, se bifurquant en plusieurs branches pareilles à des ramures d'antilopes, des serpes attachées au bout d'une corde, des triangles de fer, des massues, des poinçons. Les Ethiopiens du Bambotus cachaient dans leurs cheveux de petits dards empoisonnés. Plusieurs avaient apporté des cailloux dans des sacs. D'autres, les mains vides, faisaient claquer leurs dents.

Une houle continuelle agitait cette multitude. Des dromadaires, tout barbouillés de goudron comme des navires, renversaient les femmes qui portaient leurs enfants sur la hanche. Les provisions dans les couffes se répandaient ; on écrasait en marchant des morceaux de sel, des paquets de gomme, des dattes pourries, des noix de gourou ; — et parfois, sur des seins couverts de vermine, pendait à un mince cordon quelque diamant qu'avaient cherché les Satrapes, une pierre presque fabuleuse et suffisante pour acheter un empire. Ils ne savaient même pas, la plupart, ce qu'ils désiraient. Une fascination, une curiosité les poussaient ; des Nomades qui n'avaient jamais vu de ville étaient effrayés par l'ombre des murailles.

L'isthme disparaissait maintenant sous les hommes ; et cette longue surface, où les tentes faisaient comme des cabanes dans une inondation, s'étalait jusqu'aux premières lignes des autres Barbares, toutes ruisselantes de fer et symétriquement établies sur les deux flancs de l'aqueduc.

Les Carthaginois se trouvaient encore dans l'effroi de leur arrivée, quand ils aperçurent, venant droit vers eux, comme des monstres et comme des édifices, — avec leurs mâts, leurs bras, leurs cordages, leurs articulations, leurs chapiteaux et leurs carapaces, — les machines de siège qu'envoyaient les villes tyriennes : soixante carrobalistes, quatre-vingts onagres, trente scorpions, cinquante tollénones, douze béliers et trois gigantesques catapultes qui lançaient des morceaux de roche du poids de quinze talents. Des masses d'hommes les poussaient cramponnés à leur base ; à chaque pas un frémissement les secouait ; elles arrivèrent ainsi jusqu'en face des murs.

Mais il fallait plusieurs jours encore pour finir les préparatifs du siège. Les Mercenaires, instruits par leurs défaites, ne voulaient point se risquer dans des engagements inutiles ; — et, de part et d'autre, on n'avait aucune hâte, sachant bien qu'une action terrible allait s'ouvrir et qu'il en résulterait une victoire ou une extermination complète.

Carthage pouvait longtemps résister ; ses larges murailles offraient une série d'angles rentrants et sortants, disposition avantageuse pour repousser les assauts.

Cependant, du côté des Catacombes, une portion s'était écroulée, — et, par les nuits obscures, entre les blocs disjoints, on apercevait des lumières dans les bouges de Malqua. Ils dominaient en de certains endroits la hauteur des remparts. C'était là que vivaient, avec leurs nouveaux époux, les femmes des Mercenaires chassées par Mâtho. En les revoyant, leur coeur n'y tint plus. Elles agitèrent de loin leurs écharpes ; puis elles venaient, dans les ténèbres, causer avec les soldats par la fente du mur, et le Grand-Conseil apprit un matin que toutes s'étaient enfuies. Les unes avaient passé entre les pierres : d'autres, plus intrépides, étaient descendues avec des cordes.

Enfin, Spendius résolut d'accomplir son projet.

La guerre, en le retenant au loin, l'en avait jusqu'alors empêché ; et depuis qu'on était revenu devant Carthage, il lui semblait que les habitants soupçonnaient son entreprise. Mais bientôt ils diminuèrent les sentinelles de l'aqueduc. On n'avait pas trop de monde pour la défense de l'enceinte.

L'ancien esclave s'exerça pendant plusieurs jours à tirer des flèches contre les phénicoptères du Lac. Puis, un soir que la lune brillait, il pria Mâtho d'allumer au milieu de la nuit un grand feu de paille, en même temps que tous ses hommes pousseraient des cris ; et, prenant avec lui Zarxas, il s'en alla par le bord du golfe, dans la direction de Tunis.

A la hauteur des dernières arches, ils revinrent droit vers l'aqueduc ; la place était découverte : ils s'avancèrent en rampant jusqu'à la base des piliers.

Les sentinelles de la plate-forme se promenaient tranquillement.

De hautes flammes parurent ; des clairons retentirent ; les soldats en vedette, croyant à un assaut, se précipitèrent du côté de Carthage.

Un homme était resté. Il apparaissait en noir sur le fond du ciel. La lune donnait derrière lui, et son ombre démesurée faisait au loin sur la plaine comme un obélisque qui marchait.

Ils attendirent qu'il fût bien placé devant eux Zarxas saisit sa fronde ; par prudence ou par férocité, Spendius l'arrêta. — " Non, le ronflement de la balle ferait du bruit ! A moi ! "

Alors, il banda son arc de toutes ses forces, en l'appuyant par le bas contre l'orteil de son pied gauche ; il visa, et la flèche partit.

L'homme ne tomba point. Il disparut.

— " S'il était blessé, nous l'entendrions ! " dit Spendius ; et il monta vivement d'étagage en étagage, comme il avait fait la première fois, en s'aidant d'une corde et d'un harpon. Puis, quand il fut en haut, près du cadavre, il la laissa retomber. Le Baléare y attacha un pic avec un maillet et s'en retourna.

Les trompettes ne sonnaient plus. Tout maintenant était tranquille. Spendius avait soulevé une des dalles, était entré dans l'eau, et l'avait refermée sur lui.

En calculant la distance d'après le nombre de ses pas, il arriva juste à l'endroit où il avait remarqué une fissure oblique ; et, pendant trois heures, jusqu'au matin, il travailla d'une façon continue, furieuse, respirant à peine par les interstices des dalles supérieures, assailli d'angoisses et vingt fois croyant mourir. Enfin, on entendit un craquement ; une pierre énorme, en ricochant sur les arcs inférieurs, roula jusqu'en bas, — et, tout à coup, une cataracte, un fleuve entier tomba du ciel dans la plaine. L'aqueduc, coupé par le milieu, se déversait. C'était la mort pour Carthage, et la victoire pour les Barbares.

En un instant, les Carthaginois réveillés apparurent sur les murailles, sur les maisons, sur les temples. Les Barbares se poussaient, criaient. Ils dansaient en délire autour de la grande chute d'eau, et, dans l'extravagance de leur joie, venaient s'y mouiller la tête.

On aperçut au sommet de l'aqueduc un homme avec une tunique brune, déchirée. Il se tenait penché tout au bord, les deux mains sur les hanches, et il regardait en bas, sous lui, comme étonné de son oeuvre.

Puis il se redressa. Il parcourut l'horizon d'un air superbe qui semblait dire : " Tout cela maintenant est à moi ! " Les applaudissements des Barbares éclatèrent ; les Carthaginois, comprenant enfin leur désastre, hurlaient de désespoir. Alors, il se mit à courir sur la plate-forme, d'un bout à l'autre, — et, comme un conducteur de char triomphant aux jeux Olympiques, Spendius, éperdu d'orgueil, levait les bras.

Chapitre 13 MOLOCH

Les Barbares n'avaient pas besoin d'une circonvallation du côté de l'Afrique : elle leur appartenait. Mais, pour rendre plus facile l'approche des murailles, on abattit le retranchement qui bordait le fossé. Ensuite, Mâtho divisa l'armée par grands demi-cercles, de façon à envelopper mieux Carthage. Les hoplites des Mercenaires furent placés au premier rang ; derrière eux, les frondeurs et les cavaliers ; tout au fond, les bagages, les chariots, les chevaux ; en deçà de cette multitude, à trois cents pas des tours, se hérissaient les machines.

Sous la variété infinie de leurs appellations (qui changèrent plusieurs fois dans le cours des siècles), elles pouvaient se réduire à deux systèmes : les unes agissant comme des frondes et les autres comme des arcs.

Les premières, les catapultes, se composaient d'un châssis carré, avec deux montants verticaux et une barre horizontale. A sa partie antérieure, un cylindre, muni de câbles, retenait un gros timon portant une cuillère pour recevoir les projectiles ; la base en était prise dans un écheveau de fils tordus, et, quand on lâchait les cordes, il se relevait et venait frapper contre la barre, ce qui, l'arrêtant par une secousse, multipliait sa vigueur.

Les secondes offraient un mécanisme plus compliqué : sur une petite colonne, une traverse était fixée par son milieu où aboutissait à angle droit une espèce de canal ; aux extrémités de la traverse s'élevaient deux chapiteaux qui contenaient un entortillage de crins ; deux poutrelles s'y trouvaient prises pour maintenir les bouts d'une corde que l'on amenait jusqu'au bas du canal, sur une tablette de bronze. Par un ressort, cette plaque de métal se détachait, et, glissant sur des rainures, poussait les flèches.

Les catapultes s'appelaient également des onagres, comme les ânes sauvages qui lancent des cailloux avec leurs pieds, et les balistes des scorpions, à cause d'un crochet dressé sur la tablette, et qui, s'abaissant d'un coup de poing, faisait partir le ressort.

Leur construction exigeait de savants calculs ; leurs bois devaient être choisis dans les essences les plus dures, leurs engrenages, tous d'airain ; elles se bandaient avec des leviers, des moufles, des cabestans ou des tympanes ; de forts pivots variaient la direction de leur tir, des cylindres les faisaient s'avancer, et les plus considérables, que l'on apportait pièce à pièce, étaient remontées en face de l'ennemi.

Spendius disposa les trois grandes catapultes vers les trois angles principaux ; devant chaque porte, il plaça un bélier, devant chaque tour une baliste, et des carrobalistes circuleraient par-dérrière. Mais il fallait les garantir contre les feux des assiégés et combler d'abord le fossé qui les séparait des murailles.

On avança des galeries en claies de joncs verts et des cintres en chêne, pareils à d'énormes boucliers glissant sur trois roues ; de petites cabanes couvertes de peaux fraîches et rembourrées de varech abritaient les travailleurs ; les catapultes et les balistes furent défendues par des rideaux de cordages que l'on avait trempés dans du vinaigre pour les rendre incombustibles sur la grève. Les femmes et les enfants allaient prendre des cailloux sur la grève, ramassaient de la terre avec leurs mains et l'apportaient aux soldats.

Les Carthaginois se préparaient aussi.

Hamilcar les avait bien vite rassurés en déclarant qu'il restait de l'eau dans les citernes pour cent vingt-trois jours. Cette affirmation, sa présence au milieu d'eux, et celle du zaimph surtout, leur donnèrent bon espoir. Carthage se releva de son accablement ; ceux qui n'étaient pas d'origine chananéenne furent emportés dans la passion des autres.

On arma les esclaves, on vida les arsenaux ; les citoyens eurent chacun leur poste et leur emploi. Douze cents hommes survivaient des transfuges, le Suffète les fit tous capitaines ; et les charpentiers, les armuriers, les forgerons et les orfèvres furent préposés aux machines. Les Carthaginois en avaient gardé quelques-unes, malgré les conditions de la paix romaine. On les répara. Ils s'entendaient à ces ouvrages.

Les deux côtés, septentrional et oriental, défendus par la mer et par le golfe, restaient inaccessibles. Sur la muraille faisant face aux Barbares, on monta des troncs d'arbre, des meules de moulin, des vases pleins de soufre, des cuves pleines d'huile, et l'on bâtit des fourneaux. On entassa des pierres sur la plate-forme des tours, et les maisons qui touchaient immédiatement au rempart furent bourrées avec du sable pour l'affermir et augmenter son épaisseur.

Devant ces dispositions, les Barbares s'irritèrent. Ils voulurent combattre tout de suite. Les poids qu'ils mirent dans les catapultes étaient d'une pesanteur si exorbitante, que les timons se rompirent ; l'attaque fut retardée.

Enfin, le treizième jour du mois de Schabar, — au soleil levant — , on entendit contre la porte de Khamon un grand coup.

Soixante-quinze soldats tiraient des cordes, disposées à la base d'une poutre gigantesque, horizontalement suspendue par des chaînes descendant d'une potence, et une tête de béliet, tout en airain, la terminait. On l'avait emmaillotée de peaux de boeuf ; des bracelets en fer la cerclaient de place en place ; elle était trois fois grosse comme le corps d'un homme, longue de cent vingt coudées, et, sous la foule des bras nus la poussant et la ramenant, elle avançait et reculait avec une oscillation régulière.

Les autres béliers devant les autres portes commencèrent à se mouvoir. Dans les roues creuses des tympanes, on aperçut des hommes qui montaient d'échelon en échelon. Les poulies, les chapiteaux grincèrent, les rideaux de cordages s'abattirent, et des volées de pierres et des volées de flèches s'élancèrent à la fois ; tous les frondeurs éparpillés couraient. Quelques-uns s'approchaient du rempart, en cachant sous leurs boucliers des pots de résine ; puis ils les lançaient à tour de bras. Cette grêle de balles, de dards et de feux passait par-dessus les premiers rangs et faisait une courbe qui retombait derrière les murs. Mais, à leur sommet, de longues grues à mâter les vaisseaux se dressèrent ; et il en descendit de ces pinces énormes qui se terminaient par deux demi-cercles dentelés à l'intérieur. Elles mordirent les béliers. Les soldats, se cramponnant à la poutre, tiraient en arrière. Les Carthaginois halaient pour la faire monter ; et l'engagement se prolongea jusqu'au soir.

Quand les Mercenaires, le lendemain, reprirent leur besogne, le haut des murailles se trouvait entièrement tapissé par des balles de coton, des toiles, des coussins ; les créneaux étaient bouchés avec des nattes ; et, sur le rempart, entre les grues, on distinguait un alignement de fourches et de tranchoirs emmanchés à des bâtons. Aussitôt, une résistance furieuse commença.

Des troncs d'arbres, tenus par des câbles, tombaient et retombaient alternativement en battant les béliers ; des crampons, lancés par des balistes, arrachaient le toit des cabanes ; et, de la plate-forme des tours, des ruisseaux de silex et de galets se déversaient.

Enfin, les béliers rompirent la porte de Khamon et la porte de Tagaste. Mais les Carthaginois avaient entassé à l'intérieur une telle abondance de matériaux que leurs battants ne s'ouvrirent pas. Ils restèrent debout.

Alors, on poussa contre les murailles des tarières, qui, s'appliquant aux joints des blocs, les descellerait. Les machines furent mieux gouvernées, leurs servants répartis par escouades ; du matin au soir, elles fonctionnaient, sans s'interrompre, avec la monotone précision d'un métier de tisserand.

Spendius ne se fatiguait pas de les conduire. C'était lui-même qui bandait les écheveaux des balistes. Pour qu'il y eût, dans leurs tensions jumelles, une parité complète, on serrait leurs cordes en frappant tour à tour de droite et de gauche, jusqu'au moment où les deux côtés rendaient un son égal. Spendius montait sur leur membrure. Avec le bout de son pied, il les battait tout doucement, — et il tendait l'oreille comme un musicien qui accorde une lyre. Puis, quand le timon de la catapulte se relevait, quand la colonne de la baliste tremblait à la secousse du ressort, que les pierres s'élançaient en rayons et que les dards couraient en ruisseau, il se penchait le corps tout entier et jetait ses bras dans l'air, comme pour les suivre.

Les soldats, admirant son adresse, exécutaient ses ordres. Dans la gaieté de leur travail, ils débitaient des plaisanteries sur les noms des machines. Ainsi, les tenailles à prendre les béliers s'appelaient des loups, et les galexies couvertes des treilles, on était des agneaux, on allait faire la vendange ; et, en armant leurs pièces, ils disaient aux onagres : " Allons, rue bien ! ", et aux scorpions : " Traverse-les jusqu'au cœur ! " Ces facéties, toujours les mêmes, soutenaient leur courage.

Cependant, les machines ne démolissaient point le rempart. Il était formé par deux murailles et tout rempli de terre ; elles abattaient leurs parties supérieures. Mais les assiégés, chaque fois, les relevaient. Mâtho ordonna de construire des tours en bois qui devaient être aussi hautes que les tours de pierre. On jeta, dans le fossé, du gazon, des pieux, des galets et des chariots avec leurs roues afin de l'emplir plus vite ; avant qu'il fût comblé, l'immense foule des Barbares ondula sur la plaine d'un seul mouvement, et vint battre le pied des murs, comme une mer débordée.

On avança les échelles de corde, les échelles droites et les sambuques, c'est-à-dire deux mâts d'où s'abaissaient, par des palans, une série de bambous que terminait un pont mobile. Elles formaient de nombreuses lignes droites appuyées contre le mur, et les Mercenaires, à la file les uns des autres, montaient en tenant leurs armes à la main. Pas un Carthaginois ne se montrait ; déjà, ils touchaient aux deux tiers du rempart. Les créneaux s'ouvrirent, en vomissant, comme des gueules de dragon, des feux et de la fumée ; le sable s'éparpillait, entraît par le joint des armures ; le pétrole s'attachait aux vêtements ; le plomb liquide sautillait sur les casques, faisait des trous dans les chairs ; une pluie d'étincelles s'éclaboussait contre les visages, — et des orbites sans yeux semblaient pleurer des larmes grosses comme des amandes. Des hommes, tout jaunes d'huile, brûlaient par la chevelure. Ils se mettaient à courir, enflammaient les autres. On les étouffait en leur jetant, de loin, sur la face, des manteaux trempés de sang. Quelques-uns qui n'avaient pas de blessure restaient immobiles, plus raides que des pieux, la bouche ouverte et les deux bras écartés.

L'assaut, pendant plusieurs jours de suite, recommença, — les Mercenaires espérant triompher par un excès de force et d'audace.

Quelquefois un homme sur les épaules d'un autre enfonçait une fiche entre les pierres, puis s'en servait comme d'un échelon pour atteindre au-delà, en plaçant une seconde, une troisième ; et, protégés par le bord des créneaux dépassant la muraille, peu à peu, ils s'élevaient ainsi ; mais, toujours, à une certaine hauteur, ils retombaient. Le grand fossé trop plein débordait ; sous les pas des vivants, les blessés pêle-mêle s'entassaient avec les cadavres et les moribonds. Au milieu des entrailles ouvertes, des cervelles épandues et des flaques de sang, les troncs calcinés faisaient des taches noires ; et des bras et des jambes à moitié sortis d'un monceau se tenaient tout debout, comme des échelas dans un vignoble incendié.

Les échelles se trouvant insuffisantes, on employa les tollénones, — instruments composés d'une longue poutre établie transversalement sur une autre, et portant à son extrémité une corbeille quadrangulaire où trente fantassins pouvaient se tenir avec leurs armes.

Mâtho voulut monter dans la première qui fut prête. Spendius l'arrêta.

Des hommes se courbèrent sur un moulinet ; la grande poutre se leva, devint horizontale, se dressa presque verticalement, et, trop chargée par le bout, elle pliait comme un immense roseau. Les soldats cachés jusqu'au menton se tassaient ; on n'apercevait que les plumes des casques. Enfin, quand elle fut à cinquante coudées dans l'air, elle tourna de droite et de gauche plusieurs fois, puis s'abassa ; et, comme un bras de géant qui tiendrait sur sa main une cohorte de pygmées, elle déposa au bord du mur la corbeille pleine d'hommes. Ils sautèrent dans la foule et jamais ils ne revinrent.

Tous les autres tollénones furent bien vite disposés. Mais il en aurait fallu cent fois davantage pour prendre la ville. On les utilisa d'une façon meurtrière : des archers éthiopiens se plaçaient dans les corbeilles ; puis, les câbles étant assujettis, ils restaient suspendus et tiraient des flèches empoisonnées. Les cinquante tollénones, dominant les créneaux, entouraient ainsi Carthage, comme de monstrueux vautours ; et les Nègres riaient de voir les gardes sur le rempart mourir dans des convulsions atroces.

Hamilcar y envoya des hoplites. : il leur faisait boire chaque matin le jus de certaines herbes qui les gardait du poison.

Un soir, par un temps obscur, il embarqua les meilleurs de ses soldats sur des gabares, des planches, et, tournant à la droite du port, il vint débarquer à la Taenia. Puis ils s'avancèrent jusqu'aux premières lignes des Barbares, et, les prenant par le flanc, ils en firent un grand carnage. Des hommes suspendus à des cordes descendaient la nuit du haut des murs avec des torches à la main, brûlaient les ouvrages des Mercenaires, et remontaient.

Mâtho était acharné ; chaque obstacle renforçait sa colère ; il en arrivait à des choses terribles et extravagantes. Il convoqua Salammbô, mentalement, à un rendez-vous ; puis il l'attendit. Elle ne vint pas ; cela lui parut une trahison nouvelle, — et, désormais, il l'exécula. S'il avait vu son cadavre, il se serait peut-être en allé. Il doubla les avant-postes, il planta des fourches au bas du rempart, il enfouit des chausse-trapes dans la terre, et il commanda aux Libyens de lui apporter toute une forêt pour y mettre le feu et brûler Carthage, comme une tanière de renards.

Spendius s'obstinait au siège. Il cherchait à inventer des machines épouvantables et comme jamais on n'en avait construit.

Les autres Barbares, campés au loin sur l'isthme, s'ébahissaient de ces lenteurs ; ils murmuraient ; on les lâcha.

Alors, ils se précipitèrent avec leurs coutelas et leurs javelots, dont ils battaient les portes. Mais la nudité de leurs corps facilitant leurs blessures, les Carthaginois les massacraient abondamment ; et les Mercenaires s'en réjouirent, sans doute par jalousie du pillage. Il en résulta des querelles, des combats entre eux. Puis, la campagne étant ravagée, bientôt on s'arracha les vivres. Ils se décourageaient. Des hordes nombreuses s'en allèrent. La foule était si grande qu'il n'y parut pas.

Les meilleurs tentèrent de creuser des mines ; le terrain mal soutenu s'éboula. Ils les recommencèrent en d'autres places ; Hamilcar devinait toujours leur direction en appliquant son oreille contre un bouclier de bronze. Il perça des contre-mines sous le chemin que devaient parcourir les tours de bois ; quand on voulut les pousser, elles s'enfoncèrent dans des trous.

Enfin, tous reconnurent que la ville était imprenable, tant que l'on n'aurait pas élevé jusqu'à la hauteur des murailles une longue terrasse qui permettrait de combattre sur le même niveau, on en paverait le sommet pour faire rouler dessus les machines. Alors, il serait bien impossible à Carthage de résister.

Elle commençait à souffrir de la soif. L'eau, qui valait au début du siège deux késitah le bât, se vendait maintenant un shekel d'argent ; les provisions de viande et de blé s'épuisaient aussi ; on avait peur de la faim ; quelques-uns même parlaient de bouches inutiles, ce qui effrayait tout le monde.

Depuis la place de Khamon jusqu'au temple de Melkarth, des cadavres encombraient les rues ; et, comme on était à la fin de l'été, de grosses mouches noires harcelaient les combattants. Des vieillards transportaient les blessés, et les gens dévots continuaient les funérailles fictives de leurs proches et de leurs amis, défunts au loin pendant la guerre. Des statues de cire avec des cheveux et des vêtements s'étaient étalées en travers des portes. Elles se fondaient à la chaleur des cierges brûlant près d'elles ; la peinture coulait sur leurs épaules, et des pleurs ruisselaient sur la face des vivants, qui psalmodiaient à côté des chansons lugubres. La foule, pendant ce temps-là, courait ; des bandes armées passaient ; les capitaines criaient des ordres, et l'on entendait toujours le heurt des béliers qui battaient le rempart.

La température devint si lourde que les corps, se gonflant, ne pouvaient plus entrer dans les cercueils. On les brûlait au milieu des cours. Mais les feux, trop à l'étroit, incendiaient les murailles voisines, et de longues flammes, tout à coup, s'échappaient des maisons comme du sang qui jaillit d'une artère. Ainsi Moloch possédait Carthage ; il éteignait les remparts, il se roulait dans les rues, il dévorait jusqu'aux cadavres.

Des hommes qui portaient, en signe de désespoir, des manteaux faits de haillons ramassés, s'établirent au coin des carrefours. Ils déclamaient contre les Anciens, contre Hamilcar, prédisaient au peuple une ruine entière et l'engageaient à tout détruire et à tout se permettre. Les plus dangereux étaient les buveurs de jusquiamme ; dans leurs crises, ils se croyaient des bêtes féroces et sautaient sur les passants qu'ils déchiraient. Des attroupements se faisaient autour d'eux ; ; on en oubliait la défense de Carthage. Le Suffète imagina d'en payer d'autres pour soutenir sa politique.

Afin de retenir dans la ville le génie des Dieux, on avait couvert de chaînes leurs simulacres. On posa des voiles noirs sur les Patæques et des cilices autour des autels ; on tâchait d'exciter l'orgueil et la jalousie des Baals en leur chantant à l'oreille : " Tu vas te laisser vaincre ! les autres sont plus forts, peut-être ? Montre-toi ! aide-nous ! afin que les peuples ne disent pas : Où sont maintenant leurs Dieux ? "

Une anxiété permanente agitait les collèges des pontifes. Ceux de la Rabbetna surtout avaient peur, — le rétablissement du zaïmph n'ayant pas servi. Ils se tenaient enfermés dans la troisième enceinte, inexpugnable comme une forteresse. Un seul d'entre eux se hasardait à sortir, le grand-prêtre Schahabarim.

Il venait chez Salammbô. Mais il restait tout silencieux, la contemplant, les prunelles fixes, ou bien il prodiguait les paroles, et les reproches qu'il lui faisait étaient plus durs que jamais.

Par une contradiction inconcevable, il ne pardonnait pas à la jeune fille d'avoir suivi ses ordres ; — Schahabarim avait tout deviné, — et l'obsession de cette idée avivait les jalousies de son impuissance. Il l'accusait d'être la cause de la guerre. Mâtho, à l'en croire, assiégeait Carthage pour reprendre le zaïmph ; et il déversait des imprécations et des ironies sur ce Barbare, qui prétendait posséder des choses saintes.

Ce n'était pas cela pourtant que le prêtre voulait dire.

Mais, à présent, Salammbô n'éprouvait pour lui aucune terreur. Les angoisses dont elle souffrait autrefois l'avaient abandonnée. Une tranquillité singulière l'occupait. Ses regards, moins errants, brillaient d'une flamme limpide.

Cependant, le python était redevenu malade ; et, comme Salammbô paraissait au contraire se guérir, la vieille Taanach s'en réjouissait, convaincue qu'il prenait par ce dépérissement la langue de sa maîtresse.

Un matin, elle le trouva derrière le lit de peaux de boeuf, tout enroulé sur lui-même, plus froid qu'un marbre, et la tête disparaissant sous un amas de vers. A ses cris, Salammbô survint. Elle le retourna quelque temps avec le bout de sa sandale, et l'esclave fut ébahie de son insensibilité.

La fille d'Hamilcar ne prolongeait plus ses jeûnes avec tant de ferveur. Elle passait des journées au haut de sa terrasse, les deux coudes contre la balustrade, s'amusant à regarder devant elle. Le sommet des murailles au bout de la ville découpait sur le ciel des zigzags inégaux, et les lances des sentinelles y faisaient, tout du long, comme une bordure d'épis. Elle apercevait au-delà, entre les tours, les manoeuvres des Barbares ; les jours que le siège était interrompu, elle pouvait même distinguer leurs occupations. Ils raccommodaient leurs armes, se graissaient la chevelure, ou bien lavaient dans la mer leurs bras sanglants ; les tentes étaient closes ; les bêtes de somme mangeaient ; et, au loin, les faux des chars, tous rangés en demi-cercle, semblaient un cimeterre d'argent étendu à la base des monts. Les discours de Schahabarim revenaient à sa mémoire. Elle attendait son fiancé Narr'Havas. Elle aurait voulu, malgré sa haine, revoir Mâtho. De tous les Carthaginois, elle était la seule personne, peut-être, qui lui eût parlé sans peur.

Souvent son père arrivait dans sa chambre. Il s'asseyait en haletant sur les coussins et il la considérait d'un air presque attendri, comme s'il eût trouvé dans ce spectacle un délassement à ses fatigues. Il l'interrogeait quelquefois sur son voyage au camp des Mercenaires. Il lui demanda même si personne, par hasard, ne l'y avait poussée ; et, d'un signe de tête, elle répondit que non, tant Salammbô était fière d'avoir sauvé le zaïmph.

Mais le Suffète revenait toujours à Mâtho, sous prétexte de renseignements militaires. Il ne comprenait rien à l'emploi des heures qu'elle avait passées dans la tente. En effet, Salammbo ne parlait pas de Giscon ; car, les mots ayant par eux-mêmes un pouvoir effectif, les malédictions que l'on rapportait à quelqu'un pouvaient se tourner contre lui ; et elle taisait son envie d'assassinat, de peur d'être blâmée de n'y avoir point cédé. Elle disait que le schalischim paraissait furieux, qu'il avait crié beaucoup, puis qu'il s'était endormi. Salammbo n'en racontait pas davantage, par honte peut-être, ou bien par un excès de candeur faisant qu'elle n'attachait guère d'importance aux baisers du soldat. Tout cela, du reste, flottait dans sa tête, mélancolique et brumeux comme le souvenir d'un rêve accablant ; et elle n'aurait su de quelle manière, par quels discours l'exprimer.

Un soir qu'ils se trouvaient ainsi l'un en face de l'autre, Taanach tout effarée survint. Un vieillard, avec un enfant, était là, dans les cours, et voulait voir le Suffète.

Hamilcar pâlit, puis répliqua vivement :

— " Qu'il monte ! "

Iddibal entra, sans se prosterner. Il tenait par la main un jeune garçon couvert d'un manteau en poil de bouc ; et aussitôt relevant le capuchon qui abritait sa figure :

— " Le voilà, Maître ! Prends-le ! "

Le Suffète et l'esclave s'enfoncèrent dans un coin de la chambre.

L'enfant était resté au milieu, tout debout ; et, d'un regard plus attentif qu'étonné, il parcourait le plafond, les meubles, les colliers de perles traînant sur les draperies de pourpre, et cette majestueuse jeune femme inclinée vers lui.

Il avait dix ans peut-être, et n'était pas plus haut qu'un glaive romain. Ses cheveux crépus ombrageaient son front bombé. On aurait dit que ses prunelles cherchaient des espaces. Les narines de son nez mince palpaient largement ; sur toute sa personne s'étalait l'indéfinissable splendeur de ceux qui sont destinés aux grandes entreprises. Quand il eut rejeté son manteau trop lourd, il resta revêtu d'une peau de lynx attachée autour de sa taille, et il appuyait résolument sur les dalles ses petits pieds nus tout blancs de poussière. Mais, sans doute, il devina que l'on agissait des choses importantes, car il se tenait immobile, une main derrière le dos et le menton baissé, avec un doigt dans la bouche.

Enfin Hamilcar, d'un signe, attira Salammbô et il lui dit à voix basse :

— " Tu le garderas chez toi, entends-tu ! Il faut que personne, même de la maison, ne connaisse son existence ! "

Puis, derrière la porte, il demanda encore une fois à Iddibal s'il était bien sûr qu'on ne les eût pas remarqués.

— " Non ! " fit l'esclave ; " les rues étaient vides. "

La guerre emplissant toutes les provinces, il avait eu peur pour le fils de son maître. Alors ne sachant où le cacher, il était venu le long des côtes, sur une chaloupe : et, depuis trois jours Iddibal louvoyait dans le golfe, en observant les remparts. Enfin ce soir-là, comme les alentours de Khamon semblaient déserts, il avait franchi la passe lestement et débarqué près de l'arsenal, l'entrée du port étant libre.

Mais bientôt les Barbares établirent, en face, un immense radeau pour empêcher les Carthaginois d'en sortir. Ils relevaient les tours de bois, et, en même temps, la terrasse montait.

Les communications avec le dehors étant interceptées, une famine intolérable commença.

On tua tous les chiens, tous les mulets, tous les ânes, puis les quinze éléphants que le Suffète avait ramenés. Les lions du temple de Moloch étaient devenus furieux et les hiérodoules n'osaient plus s'en approcher. On les nourrit d'abord avec les blessés des Barbares ; ensuite on leur jeta des cadavres encore tièdes ; ils les refusèrent et tous moururent. Au crépuscule, des gens erraient le long des vieilles enceintes, et cueillaient entre les pierres des herbes et des fleurs qu'ils faisaient bouillir dans du vin ; — le vin coûtait moins cher que l'eau. D'autres se glissaient jusqu'aux avant-postes de l'ennemi et venaient sous les tentes voler de la nourriture ; les Barbares, pris de stupéfaction, quelquefois les laissaient s'en retourner. Enfin un jour arriva où les Anciens résolurent d'égorger, entre eux, les chevaux d'Eschmoûn. C'étaient des bêtes saintes, dont les pontifes tressaient les crinières avec des rubans d'or, et qui signifiaient par leur existence le mouvement du soleil, l'idée du feu sous la forme la plus haute. Leurs chairs, coupées en portions égales, furent enfouies derrière l'autel. Puis, tous les soirs, alléguant quelque dévotion, les Anciens montaient vers le temple, se régalaient en cachette ; et ils remportaient sous leur tunique un morceau pour leurs enfants. Dans les quartiers déserts, loin des murs, les habitants moins misérables, par peur des autres, s'étaient barricadés.

Les pierres des catapultes et les démolitions ordonnées pour la défense avaient accumulé des tas de ruines au milieu des rues. Aux heures les plus tranquilles, tout à coup, des masses de peuple se précipitaient en criant ; et, du haut de l'Acropole, les incendies faisaient comme des haillons de pourpre dispersés sur les terrasses, et que le vent tordait.

Les trois grandes catapultes, malgré tous ces travaux, ne s'arrêtaient pas. Leurs ravages étaient extraordinaires ; ainsi, la tête d'un homme alla rebondir sur le fronton des Syssites ; dans la rue de Kinisdo, une femme qui accouchait fut écrasée par un bloc de marbre, et son enfant avec le lit emporté jusqu'au carrefour de Cinasyn où l'on retrouva la couverture.

Ce qu'il y avait de plus irritant, c'était les balles des frondeurs. Elles tombaient sur les toits, dans les jardins et au milieu des cours, tandis que l'on mangeait attablé devant un maigre repas et le coeur gros de soupirs. Ces atroces projectiles portaient des lettres gravées qui s'imprimaient dans les chairs ; et, sur les cadavres, on lisait des injures, telles que pourceau, chacal, vermine, et parfois des plaisanteries : attrapé ! ou : je l'ai bien mérité.

La partie du rempart qui s'étendait depuis l'angle des ports jusqu'à la hauteur des citernes fut enfoncée. Alors les gens de Malqua se trouvèrent pris entre la vieille enceinte de Byrsa par-derrière et les Barbares par-devant. Mais on avait assez que d'épaissir la muraille et de la rendre le plus haut possible sans s'occuper d'eux ; on les abandonna ; tous périrent, et, bien qu'ils fussent haïs généralement, on en conçut pour Hamilcar une grande horreur.

Le lendemain, il ouvrit les fosses où il gardait du blé ; ses intendants le donnèrent au peuple. Pendant trois jours on se gorgea.

La soif n'en devint que plus intolérable ; et toujours ils voyaient devant eux la longue cascade que faisait en tombant l'eau claire de l'aqueduc. Sous les rayons du soleil, une vapeur fine remontait de sa base, avec un arc-en-ciel à côté, et un petit ruisseau, formant des courbes sur la plage, se déversait dans le golfe.

Hamilcar ne faiblissait pas. Il comptait sur un événement, sur quelque chose de décisif, d'extraordinaire.

Ses propres esclaves arrachèrent les lames d'argent du temple de Melkarth, on tira du port quatre longs bateaux, avec des cabestans, on les amena jusqu'au bas des Mappales, le mur qui donnait sur le rivage fut troué : et ils partirent pour les Gaules afin d'y acheter, à n'importe à quel prix, des Mercenaires. Cependant Hamilcar se désolait de ne pouvoir communiquer avec le roi des Numides, car il le savait derrière les Barbares et prêt à tomber sur eux. Mais Narr'Havas, trop faible, n'allait pas se risquer seul ; et le Suffète fit rehausser le rempart de douze palmes, entasser dans l'Acropole tout le matériel des arsenaux et encore une fois réparer les machines.

On se servait, pour les entortillages des catapultes, de tendons pris au cou des taureaux ou bien aux jarrets des cerfs. Cependant, il n'existait dans Carthage ni cerfs ni taureaux. Hamilcar demanda aux Anciens les cheveux de leurs femmes ; toutes les sacrifièrent ; la quantité ne fut pas suffisante. On avait, dans les bâtiments des Syssites, douze cents esclaves nubiles, de celles que l'on destinait aux prostitutions de la Grèce et de l'Italie, et leurs cheveux, rendus élastiques par l'usage des onguents, se trouvaient merveilleux pour les machines de guerre. Mais la perte plus tard serait trop considérable. Donc, il fut décidé qu'on choisirait, parmi les épouses des plébéiens, les plus belles chevelures. Sans aucun souci des besoins de la patrie, elles crièrent en désespérées quand les serviteurs des Cent vinrent, avec des ciseaux, mettre la main sur elles.

Un redoublement de fureur animait les Barbares. On les voyait au loin prendre la graisse des morts pour huiler leurs machines, et d'autres en arrachaient les ongles qu'ils cousaient bout à bout afin de se faire des cuirasses. Ils imaginèrent de mettre dans les catapultes des vases pleins de serpents apportés par les Nègres ; les pots d'argile se cassaient sur les dalles, les serpents couraient, semblaient pulluler, et, tant ils étaient nombreux, sortir des murs naturellement. Puis, les Barbares, mécontents de leur invention, la perfectionnèrent ; ils lançaient toutes sortes d'immondices, des excréments humains, des morceaux de charogne, des cadavres. La peste reparut. Les dents des Carthaginois leur tombaient de la bouche, et ils avaient les gencives décolorées comme celles des chameaux après un voyage trop long.

Les machines furent dressées sur la terrasse, bien qu'elle n'atteignît pas encore partout à la hauteur du rempart. Devant les Vingt-trois tours des fortifications se dressaient vingt-trois autres tours de bois. Tous les tollénones étaient remontés, et au milieu, un peu plus en arrière, apparaissait la formidable hélépole de Démétrius Poliorcète, que Spendius, enfin, avait reconstruite. Pyramidale comme le phare d'Alexandrie, elle était haute de cent trente coudées et large de vingt-trois, avec neuf étages allant tous en diminuant vers le sommet et qui étaient défendus par des écailles d'airain, percés de portes nombreuses, remplis de soldats ; sur la plate-forme supérieure se dressait une catapulte flanquée de deux balistes.

Alors Hamilcar fit planter des croix pour ceux qui parleraient de se rendre ; les femmes mêmes furent embrigadées. Ils couchaient dans les rues et l'on attendait plein d'angoisses.

Puis un matin, un peu avant le lever du soleil (c'était le septième jour du mois de Nyssan), ils entendirent un grand cri poussé par tous les Barbares à la fois ; les trompettes à tube de plomb ronflaient, les grandes cornes paphlagoniennes mugissaient comme des taureaux. Tous se levèrent et coururent au rempart.

Une forêt de lances, de piques et d'épées se hérissait à sa base. Elle sauta contre les murailles, les échelles s'y accrochèrent ; et, dans la baie des créneaux, des têtes de Barbares parurent.

Des poutres soutenues par de longues files d'hommes battaient les portes ; et, aux endroits où la terrasse manquait, les Mercenaires, pour démolir le mur, arrivaient en cohortes serrées, la première ligne se tenant accroupie, la seconde pliant le jarret, et les autres successivement se dressaient jusqu'aux derniers qui restaient tout droits : tandis qu'ailleurs, pour monter dessus, les plus hauts s'avançaient en tête, les plus bas à la queue, et tous, du bras gauche, appuyaient sur leurs casques leurs boucliers en les réunissant par le bord si étroitement, qu'on aurait dit un assemblage de grandes tortues. Les projectiles glissaient sur ces masses obliques.

Les Carthaginois jetaient des meules de moulin, des pilons, des cuves, des tonneaux, des lits, tout ce qui pouvait faire un poids et assommer. Quelques-uns guettaient dans les embrasures avec un filet de pêcheur, et quand arrivait le Barbare, il se trouvait pris sous les mailles et se débattait comme un poisson. Ils démolissaient eux-mêmes leurs créneaux ; des pans de mur s'écroulaient en soulevant une grande poussière ; et, les catapultes de la terrasse tirant les unes contre les autres, leurs pierres se heurtaient, et éclataient en mille morceaux qui faisaient sur les combattants une large pluie.

Bientôt les deux foules ne formèrent plus qu'une grosse chaîne de corps humains ; elle débordait dans les intervalles de la terrasse, et, un peu plus lâche aux deux bouts, se roulait sans avancer perpétuellement. Ils s'étreignaient couchés à plat ventre comme des lutteurs. On s'écrasait. Les femmes penchées sur les créneaux hurlaient. On les tirait par leurs voiles, et la blancheur de leurs flancs, tout à coup découverts, brillait entre les bras des nègres y enfonçant des poignards. Des cadavres, trop pressés dans la foule, ne tombaient pas ; soutenus par les épaules de leurs compagnons, ils allaient quelques minutes tout debout et les yeux fixes. Quelques-uns, les deux tempes traversées par une javeline, balançaient leur tête comme des ours. Des bouches ouvertes pour crier restaient béantes ; des mains s'envolaient coupées. Il y eut là de grands coups, et dont parlèrent pendant longtemps ceux qui survécurent.

Cependant, des flèches jaillissaient du sommet des tours de bois et des tours de pierre. Les tollénones faisaient aller rapidement leurs longues antennes ; et comme les Barbares avaient saccagé sous les Catacombes le vieux cimetière des autochtones, ils lançaient sur les Carthaginois des dalles de tombeaux. Sous le poids des corbeilles trop lourdes, quelquefois les câbles se coupaient, et des masses d'hommes, tous levant les bras, tombaient du haut des airs.

Jusqu'au milieu du jour, les vétérans des hoplites s'étaient acharnés contre la Taenia pour pénétrer dans le port et détruire la flotte. Hamilcar fit allumer sur la toiture de Khamon un feu de paille humide ; et la fumée les aveuglant, ils se rabattirent à gauche et vinrent augmenter l'horrible cohue qui se poussait dans Malqua. Des syntagmes, composés d'hommes robustes, choisis tout exprès, avaient enfoncé trois portes. De hauts barrages, faits avec des planches garnies de clous, les arrêtaient ; une quatrième céda facilement ; ils s'élancèrent par-dessus en courant, et roulèrent dans une fosse où l'on avait caché des pièges. A l'angle sud-est, Autharite et ses hommes abattirent le rempart, dont la fissure était bouchée avec des briques. Le terrain par-derrière montait ; ils le gravirent lestement. Mais ils trouvèrent en haut une seconde muraille, composée de pierres et de longues poutres étendues tout à plat et qui alternaient comme les pièces d'un échiquier. C'était une mode gauloise adaptée par le Suffète au besoin de la situation ; les Gaulois se crurent devant une ville de leur pays. Ils attaquèrent avec mollesse et furent repoussés.

Depuis la rue de Khamon jusqu'au Marché-aux-herbes, tout le chemin de ronde appartenait maintenant aux Barbares, et les Samnites achevaient à coups d'épieux les moribonds ; ou bien, un pied sur le mur, ils contemplaient en bas, sous eux, les ruines fumantes, et au loin la bataille qui recommençait.

Les frondeurs, distribués par-derrrière, tiraient toujours. Mais à force d'avoir servi, le ressort des frondes acarnaniennes était brisé, et plusieurs, comme des pâtres, envoyaient des cailloux avec la main : les autres lançaient des boules de plomb avec le manche d'un fouet. Zarxas, les épaules couvertes de ses longs cheveux noirs, se portait partout en bondissant et entraînait les Baléares. Deux panetières étaient suspendues à ses hanches ; il y plongeait continuellement la main gauche et son bras droit tournoyait, comme la roue d'un char.

Mâtho s'était d'abord retenu de combattre, pour mieux commander tous les Barbares à la fois. On l'avait vu le long du golfe avec les Mercenaires, près de la lagune avec les Numides, sur les bords du lac entre les Nègres, et du fond de la plaine il poussait les masses de soldats qui arrivaient incessamment contre les lignes de fortifications. Peu à peu il s'était rapproché ; l'odeur du sang, le spectacle du carnage et le vacarme des clairons avaient fini par lui faire bondir le coeur. Alors il était rentré dans sa tente, et, jetant sa cuirasse, avait pris sa peau de lion, plus commode pour la bataille. Le mufle s'adaptait sur la tête en bordant le visage d'un cercle de crocs ; les deux pattes antérieures se croisaient sur la poitrine, et celles de derrière avançaient leurs ongles jusqu'au bas de ses genoux.

Il avait gardé son fort ceinturon, où luisait une hache à double tranchant, et avec sa grande épée dans les deux mains s'était précipité par la brèche, impétueusement. Comme un émondeur qui coupe des branches de saule, et qui tâche d'en abattre le plus possible afin de gagner plus d'argent, il marchait en fauchant autour de lui les Carthaginois. Ceux qui tentaient de le saisir par les flancs, il les renversait à coups de pommeau ; quand ils l'attaquaient en face, il les perçait ; s'ils fuyaient, il les fendait. Deux hommes à la fois sautèrent sur son dos ; il recula d'un bond contre une porte et les écrasa. Son épée s'abaissait, se relevait. Elle éclata sur l'angle d'un mur. Alors il prit sa lourde hache, et par-devant, par-derrrière, il éventrait les Carthaginois comme un troupeau de brebis. Ils s'écartaient de plus en plus, et il arriva tout seul devant la seconde enceinte, au bas de l'Acropole. Les matériaux lancés du sommet encombraient les marches et débordaient par-dessus la muraille. Mâtho, au milieu des ruines, se retourna pour appeler ses compagnons.

Il aperçut leurs aigrettes disséminées sur la multitude ; elles s'enfonçaient, ils allaient périr ; il s'élança vers eux ; alors, la vaste couronne de plumes rouges se resserrant, bientôt ils se rejoignirent et l'entourèrent. Mais des rues latérales une foule énorme se dégorgeait. Il fut pris aux hanches, soulevé, et entraîné jusqu'en dehors du rempart, dans un endroit où la terrasse était haute.

Mâtho cria un commandement : tous les boucliers se rabattirent sur les casques ; il sauta dessus, pour s'accrocher quelque part afin de rentrer dans Carthage ; et, tout en brandissant la terrible hache, il courait sur les boucliers, pareils à des vagues de bronze, comme un dieu marin sur des flots et qui secoue son trident.

Cependant un homme en robe blanche se promenait au bord du rempart, impassible et indifférent à la mort qui l'entourait. Parfois il étendait sa main droite contre ses yeux pour découvrir quelqu'un. Mâtho vint à passer sous lui. Tout à coup ses prunelles flamboyèrent, sa face livide se crispa ; et en levant ses deux bras maigres il lui criait des injures.

Mâtho ne les entendit pas ; mais il sentit entrer dans son coeur un regard si cruel et furieux qu'il en poussa un rugissement. Il lança vers lui la longue hache ; des gens se jetèrent sur Schahabarim ; et Mâtho, ne le voyant plus, tomba à la renverse, épuisé.

Un craquement épouvantable se rapprochait, mêlé au rythme de voix rauques qui chantaient en cadence.

C'était la grande hélépole, entourée par une foule de soldats. Ils la tiraient à deux mains, halaient avec des cordes et poussaient de l'épaule ; — car le talus, montant de la plaine sur la terre, bien qu'il fût extrêmement doux, se trouvait impraticable pour des machines d'un poids prodigieux. Elle avait cependant huit roues cerclées de fer, et depuis le matin elle avançait ainsi, lentement, pareille à une montagne qui se fût élevée sur une autre. Puis il sortit de sa base un immense bélier ; le long des trois faces regardant la ville les portes s'abattirent, et dans l'intérieur apparurent, comme des colonnes de fer, des soldats cuirassés. On en voyait qui grimpaient et descendaient les deux escaliers traversant ses étages. Quelques-uns attendaient pour s'élancer que les crampons des portes touchassent le mur ; au milieu de la plate-forme supérieure, les écheveaux des balistes tournaient, et le grand timon de la catapulte s'abaissait.

Hamilcar était, à ce moment-là, debout sur le toit de Melkarth. Il avait jugé qu'elle devait venir directement vers lui, contre l'endroit de la muraille le plus invulnérable, et, à cause de cela même, dégarni de sentinelles. Depuis longtemps déjà ses esclaves apportaient des outres sur le chemin de ronde, où ils avaient élevé, avec de l'argile, deux cloisons transversales formant une sorte de bassin. L'eau coulait insensiblement sur la terrasse, et Hamilcar, chose extraordinaire, ne semblait point s'en inquiéter.

Mais, quand l'hélépole fut à trente pas environ, il commanda d'établir des planches par-dessus les rues, entre les maisons, depuis les citernes jusqu'au rempart ; et des gens à la file se passaient, de main en main, des casques et des amphores qu'ils vidaient continuellement. Les Carthaginois cependant s'indignaient de cette eau perdue. Le bélier démolissait la muraille ; tout à coup, une fontaine s'échappa des pierres disjointes. Alors la haute masse d'airain, à neuf étages et qui contenait et occupait plus de trois mille soldats, commença doucement à osciller comme un navire. En effet, l'eau pénétrant la terrasse avait devant elle effondré le chemin ; ses roues s'embourbèrent ; au premier étage, entre des rideaux de cuir, la tête de Spendius apparut soufflant à pleines joues dans un cornet d'ivoire. La grande machine, comme soulevée convulsivement, avança de dix pas peut-être ; mais le terrain de plus en plus s'amollissait, la fange gagnait les essieux et l'hélépole s'arrêta en penchant effroyablement d'un seul côté. La catapulte roula jusqu'au bord de la plate-forme ; et, emportée par la charge de son timon, elle tomba, fracassant sous elle les étages inférieurs. Les soldats, debout sur les portes, glissèrent dans l'abîme, ou bien ils se retenaient à l'extrémité des longues poutres, et augmentaient, par leur poids, l'inclinaison de l'hélépole — qui se démembrait en craquant dans toutes ses jointures.

Les autres Barbares s'élancèrent pour les secourir. Ils se tassaient en foule compacte. Les Carthaginois descendirent le rempart, et, les assaillant par-derrière, ils les tuèrent tout à leur aise. Mais les chars garnis de faux accoururent. Ils galopèrent sur le contour de cette multitude ; elle remonta la muraille ; la nuit survint ; peu à peu les Barbares se retirèrent.

On ne voyait plus, sur la plaine, qu'une sorte de fourmillement tout noir, depuis le golfe bleuâtre jusqu'à la lagune toute blanche ; et le lac, où du sang avait coulé, s'étalait, plus loin, comme une grande mare pourpre.

La terrasse était maintenant si chargée de cadavres qu'on l'aurait crue construite avec des corps humains. Au milieu se dressait l'hélépole couverte d'armures ; et, de temps à autre, des fragments énormes s'en détachaient comme les pierres d'une pyramide qui s'écroule. On distinguait sur les murailles de larges traînées faites par les ruisseaux de plomb. Une tour de bois abattue, çà et là, brûlait ; et les maisons apparaissaient vaguement, comme les gradins d'un amphithéâtre en ruine.

De lourdes fumées montaient, en roulant des étincelles qui se perdaient dans le ciel noir.

Cependant, les Carthaginois, que la soif dévorait, s'étaient précipités vers les citernes. Ils en rompirent les portes. Une flaque bourbeuse s'étalait au fond.

Que devenir à présent ? D'ailleurs les Barbares étaient innombrables, et, leur fatigue passée, ils recommenceraient.

Le peuple, toute la nuit, délibéra par sections, au coin des rues. Les uns disaient qu'il fallait renvoyer les femmes, les malades et les vieillards ; d'autres proposèrent d'abandonner la ville pour s'établir au loin dans une colonie. Mais les vaisseaux manquaient, et le soleil parut qu'on n'avait rien décidé.

On ne se battit point ce jour-là, tous étant trop accablés. Les gens qui donnaient avaient l'air de cadavres.

Alors les Carthaginois, en réfléchissant sur la cause de leurs désastres, se rappelèrent qu'ils n'avaient point expédié en Phénicie l'offrande annuelle due à Melkarth-Tyrien ; et une immense terreur les prit. Les Dieux, indignés contre la République, allaient sans doute poursuivre leur vengeance.

On les considérait comme des maîtres cruels, que l'on apaisait avec des supplications et qui se laissaient corrompre à force de présents. Tous étaient faibles près de Moloch-le-dévorateur. L'existence, la chair même des hommes lui appartenait ; — aussi, pour la sauver, les Carthaginois avaient coutume de lui en offrir une portion qui calmait sa fureur. On brûlait les enfants au front ou à la nuque avec des mèches de laine ; et cette façon de satisfaire le Baal rapportant aux prêtres beaucoup d'argent, ils ne manquaient pas de la recommander comme plus facile et plus douce.

Mais cette fois, il s'agissait de la République elle-même. Or, tout profit devant être racheté par une perte quelconque, toute transaction se réglant d'après le besoin du plus faible et l'exigence du plus fort, il n'y avait pas de douleur trop considérable pour le Dieu, puisqu'il se délectait dans les plus horribles et que l'on était maintenant à sa discrétion. Il fallait donc l'assouvir complètement. Les exemples prouvaient que ce moyen-là contraignait le fléau à disparaître. D'ailleurs, ils croyaient qu'une immolation par le feu purifierait Carthage. La férocité du peuple en était d'avance alléchée. Puis, le choix devait exclusivement tomber sur les grandes familles.

Les Anciens s'assemblèrent. La séance fut longue. Hannon y était venu. Comme il ne pouvait plus s'asseoir, il resta couché près de la porte, à demi perdu dans les franges de la haute tapisserie ; et quand le pontife de Moloch leur demanda s'ils consentaient à livrer leurs enfants, sa voix, tout à coup, éclata dans l'ombre comme le rugissement d'un Génie au fond d'une caverne. Il regrettait, disait-il, de n'avoir pas à en donner de son propre sang ; et il contemplait Hamilcar, en face de lui à l'autre bout de la salle. Le Suffète fut tellement troublé par ce regard qu'il en baissa les yeux. Tous approuvèrent en opinant de la tête successivement ; et, d'après les rites, il dut répondre au grand prêtre : " Oui, que cela soit. " Alors les Anciens décrétèrent le sacrifice par une périphrase traditionnelle, — parce qu'il y a des choses plus gênantes à dire qu'à exécuter.

La décision, presque immédiatement, fut connue dans Carthage ; des lamentations retentirent. Partout on entendait les femmes crier ; leurs époux les consolaient ou les invectivaient en leur faisant des remontrances.

Mais trois heures après, une nouvelle plus extraordinaire se répandit : le Suffète avait trouvé des sources au bas de la falaise. On y courut. Des trous creusés dans le sable laissaient voir de l'eau ; et déjà quelques-uns étendus à plat ventre y buvaient.

Hamilcar ne savait pas lui-même si c'était par un conseil des Dieux ou le vague souvenir d'une révélation que son père autrefois lui aurait faite ; mais, en quittant les Anciens, il était descendu sur la plage, et, avec ses esclaves, il s'était mis à fouir le gravier.

Il donna des vêtements, des chaussures et du vin. Il donna tout le reste du blé qu'il gardait chez lui. Il fit même entrer la foule dans son palais, et il ouvrit les cuisines, les magasins et toutes les chambres, — celle de Salammbô exceptée. Il annonça que six mille Mercenaires gaulois allaient venir, et que le roi de Macédoine envoyait des soldats.

Mais, dès le second jour, les sources diminuèrent ; le soir du troisième, elles étaient complètement taries. Alors le décret des Anciens circula de nouveau sur toutes les lèvres et les prêtres de Moloch commencèrent leur besogne.

Des hommes en robes noires se présentèrent dans les maisons. Beaucoup d'avance les désertaient sous le prétexte d'une affaire ou d'une friandise qu'ils allaient acheter ; les serviteurs de Moloch survenaient et prenaient les enfants. D'autres les livraient eux-mêmes, stupidement. Puis on les emmenait dans le temple de Tanit, où les prêtresses étaient chargées jusqu'au jour solennel de les amuser et de les nourrir.

Ils arrivèrent chez Hamilcar tout à coup et, le trouvant dans ses jardins :

— " Barca ! nous venons pour la chose que tu sais... ton fils ! " Ils ajoutèrent que des gens l'avaient rencontré un soir de l'autre lune, au milieu des Mappales, conduit par un vieillard.

Il fut d'abord comme suffoqué. Mais bien vite comprenant que toute dénégation serait vaine, Hamilcar s'inclina : et il les introduisit dans la maison-de-commerce. Des esclaves accourus d'un signe en surveillaient les alentours.

Il entra dans la chambre de Salammbô tout éperdu.

Il saisit d'une main Hannibal, arracha de l'autre la ganse d'un vêtement qui traînait, attacha ses pieds, ses mains, en passa l'extrémité dans la bouche pour lui faire un bâillon et il le cacha sous le lit de peaux de boeuf, en laissant retomber jusqu'à terre une large draperie.

Ensuite il se promena de droite et de gauche ; il levait les bras, il tournait sur lui-même, il se mordait les lèvres. Puis il resta les prunelles fixes et haletant comme s'il allait mourir.

Mais il frappa trois fois dans ses mains. Giddenem parut.

— " Ecoute ! " dit-il. " tu vas prendre parmi les esclaves un enfant mâle de huit à neuf ans avec les cheveux noirs et le front bombé ! Amène-le ! hâte-toi ! "

Bientôt, Giddenem rentra, en présentant un jeune garçon.

C'était un pauvre enfant, à la fois maigre et bouffi ; sa peau semblait grisâtre comme l'infect haillon suspendu à ses flancs ; il baissait la tête dans ses épaules, et, du revers de sa main, frottait ses yeux, tout remplis de mouches.

Comment pourrait-on jamais le confondre avec Hannibal ! et le temps manquait pour en choisir un autre ! Hamilcar regardait Giddenem ; il avait envie de l'étrangler.

— " Va-t'en ! " cria-t-il ; le maître-des-esclaves s'enfuit.

Donc le malheur qu'il redoutait depuis si longtemps était venu, et il cherchait avec des efforts démesurés s'il n'y avait pas une manière, un moyen d'y échapper.

Abdalonim, tout à coup, parla derrière la porte. On demandait le Suffète. Les serviteurs de Moloch s'impatientsaient.

Hamilcar retint un cri, comme à la brûlure d'un fer rouge ; et il recommença de nouveau à parcourir la chambre tel qu'un insensé. Puis il s'affaissa au bord de la balustrade, et, les coudes sur ses genoux, il serrait son front dans ses deux poings fermés.

La vasque de porphyre contenait encore un peu d'eau claire pour les ablutions de Salammô. Malgré sa répugnance et tout son orgueil, le Suffète y plonge l'enfant, et, comme un marchand d'esclaves, il se mit à le laver et à le frotter avec les strigiles et la terre rouge. Il prit ensuite dans les casiers autour de la muraille deux carrés de pourpre, lui en posa un sur la poitrine, l'autre sur le dos, et il les réunit contre ses clavicules par deux agrafes de diamants. Il versa un parfum sur sa tête ; il passa autour de son cou un collier d'électrum, et il le chaussa de sandales à talons de perles, — les propres sandales de sa fille ! Mais il trépidait de honte et d'irritation ; Salammô, qui s'empressait à le servir, était aussi pâle que lui. L'enfant souriait, ébloui par ces splendeurs, et même, s'enhardissant, il commençait à battre des mains et à sauter quand Hamilcar l'entraîna.

Il le tenait par le bras, fortement, comme s'il avait eu peur de le perdre ; et l'enfant, auquel il faisait mal, pleurait un peu tout en courant près de lui.

A la hauteur de l'ergastule, sous un palmier, une voix s'éleva, une voix lamentable et suppliante. Elle murmurait : " Maître ! oh ! Maître ! "

Hamilcar se retourna, et il aperçut à ses côtés un homme d'apparence abjecte, un de ces misérables vivant au hasard dans la maison.

— " Que veux-tu ? " dit le Suffète.

L'esclave, qui tremblait horriblement, balbutia :

— " Je suis son père ! "

Hamilcar marchait toujours ; l'autre le suivait, les reins courbés, les jarrets fléchis, la tête en avant. Son visage était convulsé par une angoisse indicible, et les sanglots qu'il retenait l'étouffaient, tant il avait envie tout à la fois de le questionner et de lui crier :

— " Grâce ! "

Enfin il osa le toucher d'un doigt, sur le coude, légèrement.

— " Est-ce que tu vas le ? ... " Il n'eut pas la force d'achever, et Hamilcar s'arrêta, tout ébahi de cette douleur.

Il n'avait jamais pensé, — tant l'abîme les séparant l'un de l'autre se trouvait immense, — qu'il pût y avoir entre eux rien de commun. Cela même lui parut une sorte d'outrage et comme un empiétement sur ses privilèges. Il répondit par un regard plus froid et plus lourd que la hache d'un bourreau ; l'esclave, s'évanouissant, tomba dans la poussière, à ses pieds. Hamilcar enjamba par-dessus.

Les trois hommes en robes noires l'attendaient dans la grande salle, debout contre le disque de pierre. Tout de suite, il déchira ses vêtements et il se roulait sur les dalles en poussant des cris aigus :

— " Ah ! pauvre petit Hannibal ! oh ! mon fils ! ma consolation ! mon espoir ! ma vie ! Tuez-moi aussi ! emportez-moi ! Malheur ! malheur ! " Il se labourait la face avec ses ongles, s'arrachait les cheveux et hurlait comme les pleureuses des funérailles. " Emmenez-le donc ! je souffre trop ! allez-vous-en ! tuez-moi comme lui. " Les serviteurs de Moloch s'étonnaient que le grand Hamilcar eût le coeur si faible. Ils en étaient presque attendris.

On entendit un bruit de pieds nus avec un râle saccadé, pareil à la respiration d'une bête féroce qui accourt ; et, sur le seuil de la troisième galerie, entre les montants d'ivoire, un homme apparut, blême, terrible, les bras écartés ; il s'écria :

— " Mon enfant ! "

Hamilcar, d'un bond, s'était jeté sur l'esclave ; et, en lui couvrant la bouche de ses mains, il criait encore plus haut :

— " C'est le vieillard qui l'a élevé ! il l'appelle mon enfant ! il en deviendra fou ! assez ! assez ! " Et, chassant par les épaules les trois prêtres et leur victime, il sortit avec eux, et, d'un grand coup de pied, referma la porte derrière lui.

Hamilcar tendit l'oreille pendant quelques minutes, craignant toujours de les voir revenir. Il songea ensuite à se défaire de l'esclave pour être bien sûr qu'il ne parlerait pas ; mais le péril n'était point complètement disparu, et cette mort, si les Dieux s'en irritaient, pouvait se retourner contre son fils. Alors, changeant d'idée, il lui envoya par Taanach les meilleures choses des cuisines : un quartier de bouc, des fèves et des conserves de grenades. L'esclave, qui n'avait pas mangé depuis longtemps, se rua dessus ; ses larmes tombaient dans les plats.

Hamilcar, revenu enfin près de Salammbô, dénoua les cordes d'Hannibal. L'enfant, exaspéré, le mordit à la main jusqu'au sang. Il le repoussa d'une caresse.

Pour le faire se tenir paisible, Salammbô voulut l'effrayer avec Lamia, une ogresse de Cyrène.

— " Où donc est-elle ! " demanda-t-il.

On lui conta que les brigands allaient venir pour le mettre en prison. Il reprit : — " Qu'ils viennent, et je les tue ! "

Hamilcar lui dit alors l'épouvantable vérité. Mais il s'emporta contre son père, prétendant qu'il pouvait bien anéantir tout le peuple, puisqu'il était le maître de Carthage.

Enfin, épuisé d'efforts et de colère, il s'endormit, d'un sommeil farouche. Il parlait en rêvant, le dos appuyé contre un coussin d'écarlate ; sa tête retombait un peu en arrière, et son petit bras, écarté de son corps, restait tout droit dans une attitude impérative.

Quand la nuit fut noire, Hamilcar l'enleva doucement et descendit sans flambeau l'escalier des galères. En passant par la maison-de-commerce, il prit une couffe de raisins avec une buire d'eau pure ; l'enfant se réveilla devant la statue d'Alètes, dans le caveau des pierreries ; et il souriait, — comme l'autre — , sur le bras de son père, à la lueur des clartés qui l'environnaient.

Hamilcar était bien sûr qu'on ne pouvait lui prendre son fils. C'était un endroit impénétrable, communiquant avec le rivage par un souterrain que lui seul connaissait, et, en jetant les yeux à l'entour, il aspira une large bouffée d'air. Puis il le déposa sur un escabeau, près des boucliers d'or.

Personne, à présent, ne le voyait ; il n'avait plus rien à observer ; alors, il se soulagea. Comme une mère qui retrouve son premier-né perdu, il se jeta sur son fils ; il l'étreignait contre sa poitrine, il riait et pleurait à la fois, l'appelait des noms les plus doux, le couvrait de baisers ; le petit Hannibal, effrayé par cette tendresse terrible, se taisait maintenant.

Hamilcar s'en revint à pas muets, en tâtant les murs autour de lui ; et il arriva dans la grande salle, où la lumière de la lune entraît par une des fentes du dôme ; au milieu, l'esclave, repu, dormait, couché de tout son long sur les pavés de marbre. Il le regarda, et une sorte de pitié l'émut. Du bout de son cothurne, il lui avança un tapis sous la tête. Puis il releva les yeux et considéra Tanit, dont le mince croissant brillait dans le ciel, et il se sentit plus fort que les Baals et plein de mépris pour eux.

Les dispositions du sacrifice étaient déjà commencées.

On abattit dans le temple de Moloch un pan de mur pour en tirer le dieu d'airain, sans toucher aux cendres de l'autel. Puis, dès que le soleil se montra, les hiérodoules le poussèrent vers la place de Khamon.

Il allait à reculons, en glissant sur des cylindres ; ses épaules dépassaient la hauteur des murailles ; du plus loin qu'ils l'apercevaient, les Carthaginois s'enfuyaient bien vite, car on ne pouvait contempler impunément le Baal que dans l'exercice de sa colère.

Une senteur d'aromates se répandit par les rues. Tous les temples à la fois venaient de s'ouvrir ; il en sortit des tabernacles montés sur des chariots ou sur des litières que des pontifes portaient. De gros panaches de plumes se balançaient à leurs angles, et des rayons s'échappaient de leurs faîtes aigus, terminés par des boules de cristal, d'or, d'argent ou de cuivre.

C'étaient les Baalim chananéens, dédoublements du Baal suprême, qui retournaient vers leur principe, pour s'humilier devant sa force et s'anéantir devant sa splendeur.

Le pavillon de Melkarth, en pourpre fine, abritait une flamme de pétrole ; sur celui de Khamon, couleur d'hyacinthe, se dressait un phallus d'ivoire, bordé d'un cercle de pierreries ; entre les rideaux d'Eschmoûn, bleus comme l'éther, un python endormi faisait un cercle avec sa queue ; et les Dieux-Patæques, tenus dans les bras de leurs prêtres, semblaient de grands enfants emmaillotés, dont les talons frôlaient la terre.

Ensuite venaient toutes les formes inférieures de la divinité : Baal-Samin, dieu des espaces célestes ; Baal-Peor, dieu des monts sacrés ; Baal- Zeboub, dieu de la corruption et ceux des pays voisins et des races congénères ; l'Iarbal de la Libye, l'Adrammelech de la Chaldée, le Kijun des Syriens ; Derceto, à figure de vierge, rampait sur ses nageoires, et le cadavre de Tammouz était traîné au milieu d'un catafalque, entre des flambeaux et des chevelures. Pour asservir les rois du firmament au Soleil et empêcher que leurs influences particulières ne gênassent la sienne, on brandissait au bout de longues perches des étoiles en métal diversement colorées ; et tous s'y trouvaient, depuis le noir Nebo, génie de Mercure, jusqu'au hideux Rahab, qui est la constellation du Crocodile. Les Abaddirs, pierres tombées de la lune, tournaient dans des frondes en fils d'argent ; de petits pains, reproduisant le sexe d'une femme, étaient portés sur des corbeilles par les prêtres de Cérès ; d'autres amenaient leurs fétiches, leurs amulettes ; des idoles oubliées réparurent ; et même on avait pris aux vaisseaux leurs symboles mystiques, comme si Carthage eût voulu se recueillir tout entière dans une pensée de mort et de désolation.

Devant chacun des tabernacles, un homme tenait en équilibre, sur sa tête, un large vase où fumait de l'encens. Des nuages çà et là planaient, et l'on distinguait, dans ces grosses vapeurs, les tentures, les pendeloques et les broderies des pavillons sacrés. Ils avançaient lentement, à cause de leur poids énorme. L'essieu des chars quelquefois s'accrochait dans les rues, alors les dévots profitaient de l'occasion pour toucher les Baalim avec leurs vêtements, qu'ils gardaient ensuite comme des choses saintes.

La statue d'airain continuait à s'avancer vers la place de Khamon.

Les Riches, portant des sceptres à pomme d'émeraude, partirent du fond de Mégara ; les Anciens, coiffés de diadèmes, s'étaient assemblés dans Kinisdo, et les maîtres des finances, les gouverneurs des provinces, les marchands, les soldats, les matelots et la horde nombreuse employée aux funérailles, tous, avec les insignes de leur magistrature ou les instruments de leur métier, se dirigeaient vers les tabernacles qui descendaient de l'Acropole, entre les collègues des pontifes.

Par déférence pour Moloch, ils s'étaient ornés de leurs bijoux les plus splendides. Des diamants étincelaient sur les vêtements noirs, mais les anneaux trop larges tombaient des mains amaigries, — et rien n'était lugubre comme cette foule silencieuse où les pendants d'oreilles battaient contre des faces pâles, où les tiars d'or serraient des fronts crispés par un désespoir atroce.

Enfin le Baal arriva juste au milieu de la place. Ses pontifes, avec des treillages, disposèrent une enceinte pour écarter la multitude, et ils restèrent à ses pieds, autour de lui.

Les prêtres de Khamon, en robes de laine fauve, s'alignèrent devant leur temple, sous les colonnes du portique ; ceux d'Eschmoûn, en manteaux de lin, avec des colliers à tête de coucoupha et des tiars pointues, s'établirent sur les marches de l'Acropole ; les prêtres de Melkarth, en tuniques violettes, prirent pour eux le côté de l'Occident ; les prêtres des Abaddirs, serrés dans des bandes d'étoffes phrygiennes, se placèrent à l'Orient ; et l'on rangea sur le côté du Midi, avec les nécromanciens tout couverts de tatouages, les hurleurs en manteaux rapiécés, les desservants des Patæques et les Yidonim qui, pour connaître l'avenir, se mettaient dans la bouche un os de mort. Les prêtres de Cérès, habillés de robes bleues, s'étaient arrêtés, prudemment, dans la rue de Satheb, et psalmodiaient à voix basse un thesmophorion en dialecte mégarien.

De temps en temps, il arrivait des files d'hommes complètement nus, les bras écartés et tous se tenant par les épaules. Ils tiraient, des profondeurs de leur poitrine, une intonation rauque et caverneuse ; leurs prunelles, tendues vers le colosse, brillaient dans la poussière, et ils se balançaient le corps à intervalles égaux, tous à la fois, comme ébranlés par un seul mouvement. Ils étaient si furieux que, pour établir l'ordre, les hiérodoules, à coups de bâton, les firent se coucher sur le ventre, la face posée contre les treillages d'airain.

Ce fut alors que, du fond de la Place, un homme en robe blanche s'avança. Il perça lentement la foule et l'on reconnut un prêtre de Tanit, — le grand-prêtre Schahabarim. Des huées s'élevèrent, car la tyrannie du principe mâle prévalait ce jour-là dans toutes les consciences, et la Déesse était même tellement oubliée, que l'on n'avait pas remarqué l'absence de ses pontifes. Mais l'ébahissement redoubla quand on l'aperçut ouvrant dans les treillages une des portes destinées à ceux qui entreraient pour offrir les victimes. C'était, croyaient les prêtres de Moloch, un outrage qu'il venait faire à leur dieu ; avec de grands gestes, ils essayaient de le repousser. Nourris par les viandes des holocaustes, vêtus de pourpre comme des rois et portant des couronnes à triple étage, ils conspuaient ce pâle eunuque exténué de macérations, et des rires de colère secouaient sur leur poitrine leur barbe noire étalée en soleil.

Schahabarim, sans répondre, continuait à marcher ; et, traversant pas à pas toute l'enceinte, il arriva sous les jambes du colosse, puis il le toucha des deux côtés en écartant les deux bras, ce qui était une formule solennelle d'adoration. Depuis trop longtemps, la Rabbet le torturait ; et, par désespoir, ou peut-être à défaut d'un dieu satisfaisant complètement sa pensée, il se déterminait enfin pour celui-là.

La foule, épouvantée par cette apostasie, poussa un long murmure. On sentait se rompre le dernier lien qui attachait les âmes à une divinité clémente.

Mais Schahabarim, à cause de sa mutilation, ne pouvait participer au culte du Baal. Les hommes en manteaux rouges l'exclurent de l'enceinte ; puis, quand il fut dehors, il tourna autour de tous les collègues, successivement, et le prêtre, désormais sans dieu, disparut dans la foule. Elle s'écartait à son approche.

Cependant, un feu d'aloès, de cèdre et de laurier brûlait entre les jambes du colosse. Ses longues ailes enfonçaient leur pointe dans la flamme ; les onguents dont il était frotté coulaient comme de la sueur sur ses membres d'airain. Autour de la dalle ronde où il appuyait ses pieds, les enfants, enveloppés de voiles noirs, formaient un cercle immobile ; et ses bras démesurément longs abaissaient leurs paumes jusqu'à eux, comme pour saisir cette couronne et l'emporter dans le ciel.

Les Riches, les Anciens, les femmes, toute la multitude se tassait derrière les prêtres et sur les terrasses des maisons. Les grandes étoiles peintes ne tournaient plus : les tabernacles étaient posés par terre ; et les fumées des encensoirs montaient perpendiculairement, telles que des arbres gigantesques étalant au milieu de l'azur leurs rameaux bleuâtres.

Plusieurs s'évanouirent ; d'autres devenaient inertes et pétrifiés dans leur extase. Une angoisse infinie pesait sur les poitrines. Les dernières clameurs une à une s'éteignaient ; — et le peuple de Carthage haletait, absorbé dans le désir de sa terreur.

Enfin, le grand-prêtre de Moloch passa la main gauche sous les voiles des enfants, et il leur arracha du front une mèche de cheveux qu'il jeta sur les flammes. Alors, les hommes en manteaux rouges entonnèrent l'hymne sacré.

— " Hommage à toi, Soleil ! roi des deux zones, créateur qui s'engendre, Père et Mère, Père et Fils, Dieu et Déesse, Déesse et Dieu ! " Et leur voix se perdit dans l'explosion des instruments sonnans tous à la fois, pour étouffer les cris des victimes. Les scheminith à huit cordes, les kinnor, qui en avaient dix, et les nebal, qui en avaient douze, grinçaient, sifflaient, tonnaient. Des outres énormes hérissées de tuyaux faisaient un clapotement aigu ; les tambourins, battus à tour de bras, retentissaient de coups sourds et rapides ; et, malgré la fureur des clairons, les salsalim claquaient, comme des ailes de sauterelle.

Les hiérodoules, avec un long crochet, ouvrirent les sept compartiments étagés sur le corps du Baal. Dans le plus haut, on introduisit de la farine ; dans le second, deux tourterelles ; dans le troisième, un singe ; dans le quatrième, un bélier ; dans le cinquième, une brebis ; et, comme on n'avait pas de boeufs pour le sixième, on y jeta une peau tannée prise au sanctuaire. La septième case restait béante.

Avant de rien entreprendre, il était bon d'essayer les bras du Dieu. De minces chaînettes partant de ses doigts gagnaient ses épaules et redescendaient par-derrière, où des hommes, tirant dessus, faisaient monter, jusqu'à la hauteur de ses coudes, ses deux mains ouvertes qui, en se rapprochant, arrivaient contre son ventre ; elles remuèrent plusieurs fois de suite, à petits coups saccadés. Puis les instruments se turent. Le feu ronflait.

Les pontifes de Moloch se promenaient sur la grande dalle, en examinant la multitude.

Il fallait un sacrifice individuel, une oblation toute volontaire et qui était considérée comme entraînant les autres. Mais personne, jusqu'à présent, ne se montrait, et les sept allées conduisant des barrières au colosse étaient complètement vides. Alors, pour encourager le peuple, les prêtres tirèrent de leurs ceintures des poinçons et ils se balafrèrent le visage. On fit entrer dans l'enceinte les Dévoués, étendus sur terre, en dehors. On leur jeta un paquet d'horribles ferrailles et chacun choisit sa torture. Ils se passaient des broches entre les seins ; ils se fendaient les joues ; ils se mirent des couronnes d'épines sur la tête ; puis ils s'enlacèrent par les bras, et, entourant les enfants, ils formaient un autre grand cercle qui se contractait et s'élargissait. Ils arrivaient contre la balustrade, se rejetaient en arrière et recommençaient toujours, attirant à eux la foule par le vertige de ce mouvement tout plein de sang et de cris.

Peu à peu, des gens entrèrent jusqu'au fond des allées ; ils lançaient dans la flamme des perles, des vases d'or, des coupes, des flambeaux, toutes leurs richesses ; les offrandes, de plus en plus, devenaient splendides et multipliées. Enfin, un homme qui chancelait, un homme pâle et hideux de terreur, poussa un enfant ; puis on aperçut entre les mains du colosse une petite masse noire ; elle s'enfonça dans l'ouverture ténébreuse. Les prêtres se penchèrent au bord de la grande dalle, — et un chant nouveau éclata, célébrant les joies de la mort et les renaissances de l'éternité.

Ils montaient lentement, et, comme la fumée en s'envolant faisait de hauts tourbillons, ils semblaient de loin disparaître dans un nuage. Pas un ne bougeait. Ils étaient liés aux poignets et aux chevilles, et la sombre draperie les empêchait de rien voir et d'être reconnus.

Hamilcar, en manteau rouge comme les prêtres de Moloch, se tenait auprès du Baal, debout devant l'orteil de son pied droit. Quand on amena le quatorzième enfant, tout le monde put s'apercevoir qu'il eut un grand geste d'horreur. Mais bientôt, reprenant son attitude, il croisa ses bras et il regardait par terre. De l'autre côté de la statue, le Grand-Pontife restait immobile comme lui. Baissant sa tête chargée d'une mitre assyrienne, il observait sur sa poitrine la plaque d'or recouverte de pierres fatidiques, et où la flamme se mirant faisait des lueurs irisées. Il pâissait, éperdu. Hamilcar inclinait son front ; et ils étaient tous les deux si près du bûcher que le bas de leurs manteaux, se soulevant, de temps à autre l'effleurait.

Les bras d'airain allaient plus vite. Ils ne s'arrêtaient plus. Chaque fois que l'on y posait un enfant, les prêtres de Moloch étendaient la main sur lui, pour le charger des crimes du peuple, en vociférant : " Ce ne sont pas des hommes, mais des boeufs ! " et la multitude à l'entour répétait : " Des boeufs ! des boeufs ! " Les dévots criaient : " Seigneur ! mange ! " et les prêtres de Proserpine, se conformant par la terreur au besoin de Carthage, marmottaient la formule éleusienne : " Verse la pluie ! enfante ! "

Les victimes, à peine au bord de l'ouverture, disparaissaient comme une goutte d'eau sur une plaque rougie, et une fumée blanche montait dans la grande couleur écarlate.

Cependant, l'appétit du Dieu ne s'apaisait pas. Il en voulait toujours. Afin de lui en fournir davantage, on les empila sur ses mains avec une grosse chaîne par-dessus, qui les retenait. Des dévots au commencement avaient voulu les compter, pour voir si leur nombre correspondait aux jours de l'année solaire ; mais on en mit d'autres, et il était impossible de les distinguer dans le mouvement vertigineux des horribles bras. Cela dura longtemps, indéfiniment jusqu'au soir. Puis les parois intérieures prirent un éclat plus sombre. Alors, on aperçut des chairs qui brûlaient. Quelques-uns même croyaient reconnaître des cheveux, des membres, des corps entiers.

Le jour tomba ; des nuages s'amoncelèrent au-dessus du Baal. Le bûcher, sans flammes à présent, faisait une pyramide de charbons jusqu'à ses genoux ; complètement rouge comme un géant tout couvert de sang, il semblait, avec sa tête qui se renversait, chanceler sous le poids de son ivresse.

A mesure que les prêtres se hâtaient, la frénésie du peuple augmentait ; le nombre des victimes diminuant, les uns criaient de les épargner, les autres qu'il en fallait encore. On aurait dit que les murs chargés de monde s'écroulaient sous les hurlements d'épouvante et de volupté mystique. Puis des fidèles arrivèrent dans les allées, traînant leurs enfants qui s'accrochaient à eux ; et ils les battaient pour leur faire lâcher prise et eux ; et les remettre aux hommes rouges. Les joueurs d'instruments quelquefois s'arrêtaient, épuisés ; alors, on entendait les cris des mères et le grésillement de la graisse qui tombait sur les charbons. Les buveurs de jusquiame, marchant à quatre pattes, tournaient autour du colosse et rugissaient comme des tigres, les Yidonim vaticinaient, les Dévoués chantaient avec leurs lèvres fendues ; on avait rompu les grillages, tous voulaient leur part du sacrifice ; et les pères dont les enfants étaient morts autrefois jetaient dans le feu leurs effigies, leurs jouets, leurs ossements conservés.

Quelques-uns qui avaient des couteaux se précipitèrent sur les autres. On s'entr'égorgea. Avec des vans de bronze, les hiérodoules prirent au bord de la dalle les cendres tombées ; et ils les lançaient dans l'air, afin que le sacrifice s'éparpillât sur la ville et jusqu'à la région des étoiles.

Ce grand bruit et cette grande lumière avaient attiré les Barbares au pied des murs ; se cramponnant pour mieux voir sur les débris de l'hélépole, ils regardaient, béants d'horreur.

Chapitre 14 LE DEFILE DE LA HACHE

Les Carthaginois n'étaient pas rentrés dans leurs maisons que les nuages s'amoncelèrent plus épais ; ceux qui levaient la tête vers le colosse sentirent sur leur front de grosses gouttes, et la pluie tomba.

Elle tomba toute la nuit, abondamment, à flots ; le tonnerre grondait ; c'était la voix de Moloch ; il avait vaincu Tanit ; et, maintenant fécondée, elle ouvrait du haut du ciel son vaste sein. Parfois on l'apercevait dans une éclaircie lumineuse étendue sur des coussins de nuages ; puis les ténèbres se refermaient comme si, trop lasse encore, elle voulait se rendormir ; les Carthaginois, — croyant tous que l'eau est enfantée par la lune, — criaient pour faciliter son travail.

La pluie battait les terrasses et débordait par-dessus, formait des lacs dans les cours, des cascades sur les escaliers, des tourbillons au coin des rues. Elle se versait en lourdes masses tièdes et en rayons pressés ; des angles de tous les édifices de gros jets écumeux sautaient ; contre les murs il y avait comme des nappes blanchâtres vaguement suspendues, et les toits des temples, lavés, brillaient en noir à la lueur des éclairs. Par mille chemins des torrents descendaient de l'Acropole ; des maisons s'écroulaient tout à coup ; et des poutrelles, des plâtras, des meubles passaient dans les ruisseaux, qui couraient sur les dalles impétueusement.

On avait exposé des amphores, des buires, des toiles ; mais les torches s'éteignaient ; on prit des brandons au bûcher du Baal, et les Carthaginois, pour boire, se tenaient le cou renversé, la bouche ouverte. D'autres, au bord des flaques bourbeuses, y plongeaient leurs bras jusqu'à l'aisselle, et se gorgeaient d'eau si abondamment qu'ils la vomissaient comme des buffles. La fraîcheur peu à peu se répandait ; ils aspiraient l'air humide en faisant jouer leurs membres, et, dans le bonheur de cette ivresse, bientôt un immense espoir surgit. Toutes les misères furent oubliées. La patrie encore une fois renaissait.

Ils éprouvaient comme le besoin de rejeter sur d'autres l'excès de la fureur qu'ils n'avaient pu employer contre eux-mêmes. Un tel sacrifice ne devait pas être inutile ; — bien qu'ils n'eussent aucun remords, ils se trouvaient emportés par cette frénésie que donne la complicité des crimes irréparables.

Les Barbares avaient reçu l'orage dans leurs tentes mal closes ; et, tout transis encore le lendemain, ils pataugeaient au milieu de la boue, en cherchant leurs munitions et leurs armes, gâtées, perdues.

Hamilcar, de lui-même, alla trouver Hannon ; et, suivant ses pleins pouvoirs, il lui confia le commandement. Le vieux Suffète hésita quelques minutes entre sa rancune et son appétit de l'autorité. Il accepta cependant.

Ensuite Hamilcar fit sortir une galère armée d'une catapulte à chaque bout. Il la plaça dans le golfe en face du radeau ; puis il embarqua sur les vaisseaux disponibles ses troupes les plus robustes. Il s'enfuyait donc ; et, cinglant vers le nord, il disparut dans la brume.

Mais trois jours après (on allait recommencer l'attaque), des gens de la côte Lybique arrivèrent tumultueusement. Barca était entré chez eux. Il avait partout levé des vivres et il s'étendait dans le pays.

Alors les Barbares furent indignés comme s'il les trahissait. Ceux qui s'ennuyaient le plus du siège, les Gaulois surtout, n'hésitèrent pas à quitter les murs pour tâcher de le rejoindre. Spendius voulait reconstruire l'hélepole ; Mâtho s'était tracé une ligne idéale depuis sa tente jusqu'à Mégara, il s'était juré de la suivre ; et aucun de leurs hommes ne bougea. Mais les autres, commandés par Autharite, s'en allèrent, abandonnant la portion occidentale du rempart. L'incurie était si profonde que l'on ne songea même pas à les remplacer.

Narr'Havas les épiait de loin dans les montagnes. Il fit, pendant la nuit, passer tout son monde sur le côté extérieur de la Lagune, par le bord de la mer, et il entra dans Carthage.

Il s'y présenta comme un sauveur, avec six mille hommes, tous portant de la farine sous leurs manteaux, et quarante éléphants chargés de fourrages et de viandes sèches. On s'empressa vite autour d'eux ; on leur donna des noms. L'arrivée d'un pareil secours réjouissait encore moins les Carthaginois que le spectacle même de ces forts animaux consacrés au Baal ; c'était un gage de sa tendresse, une preuve qu'il allait enfin, pour les défendre, se mêler de la guerre.

Narr'Havas reçut les compliments des Anciens. Puis il monta vers le palais de Salammbô.

Il ne l'avait pas revue depuis cette fois où, dans la tente d'Hamilcar, entre les cinq armées, il avait senti sa petite main froide et douce attachée contre la sienne ; après les fiançailles, elle était partie pour Carthage. Son amour, détourné par d'autres ambitions, lui était revenu ; et maintenant, il comptait jouir de ses droits, l'épouser, la prendre.

Salammbô ne comprenait pas comment ce jeune homme pourrait jamais devenir son maître ! Bien qu'elle demandât, tous les jours, à Tanit la mort de Mâtho, son horreur pour le Libyen diminuait. Elle sentait confusément que la haine dont il l'avait persécutée était une chose presque religieuse, — et elle aurait voulu voir dans la personne de Narr'Havas comme un reflet de cette violence qui la tenait encore éblouie. Elle souhaitait le connaître davantage et cependant sa présence l'eût embarrassée. Elle lui fit répondre qu'elle ne devait pas le recevoir.

D'ailleurs, Hamilcar avait défendu à ses gens d'admettre chez elle le roi des Numides ; en reculant jusqu'à la fin de la guerre cette récompense, il espérait l'entretenir son dévouement ; et Narr'Havas, par crainte du Suffète, se retira.

Mais il se montra hautain envers les Cent. Il changea leurs dispositions. Il exigea des prérogatives pour ses hommes et les établit dans les postes importants ; aussi les Barbares ouvrirent tous de grands yeux en apercevant les Numides sur les tours.

La surprise des Carthaginois fut encore plus forte lorsque arrivèrent, sur une vieille trirème punique, quatre cents des leurs, faits prisonniers pendant la guerre de Sicile. En effet, Hamilcar avait secrètement renvoyé aux Quirites les équipages des vaisseaux latins pris avant la défection des villes tyriennes ; et Rome, par échange de bons procédés, lui rendait maintenant ses captifs. Elle dédaigna les ouvertures des Mercenaires dans la Sardaigne, et même elle ne voulut point reconnaître comme sujets les habitants d'Utique.

Hiéron, qui gouvernait à Syracuse, fut entraîné par cet exemple. Il lui fallait, pour conserver ses Etats, un équilibre entre les deux peuples ; il avait donc intérêt au salut des Chananéens, et il se déclara leur ami en leur envoyant douze cents boeufs avec cinquante-trois mille nebel de pur froment.

Une raison plus profonde faisait secourir Carthage : on sentait bien que si les Mercenaires triomphaient, depuis le soldat jusqu'au laveur d'écuelles, tout s'insurgerait, et qu'aucun gouvernement, aucune maison ne pourrait y résister.

Hamilcar, pendant ce temps-là, battait les campagnes orientales. Il refoula les Gaulois et tous les Barbares se trouvèrent eux-mêmes comme assiégés.

Alors il se mit à les harceler. Il arrivait, s'éloignait, et, renouvelant toujours cette manoeuvre, peu à peu, il les détacha de leurs campements. Spendius fut obligé de les suivre ; Mâtho, à la fin, céda comme lui.

Il ne dépassa point Tunis. Il s'enferma dans ses murs. Cette obstination était pleine de sagesse ; car bientôt on aperçut Narr'Havas qui sortait par la porte de Khamon avec ses éléphants et ses soldats ; Hamilcar le rappelait. Mais déjà les autres Barbares erraient dans les provinces à la poursuite du Suffète.

Il avait reçu à Clypea trois mille Gaulois. Il fit venir des chevaux de la Cyrénaïque, des armures du Brutium, et il recommença la guerre.

Jamais son génie ne fut aussi impérieux et fertile. Pendant cinq lunes il les traîna derrière lui. Il avait un but où il voulait les conduire.

Les Barbares avaient tenté d'abord de l'envelopper par de petits détachements ; il leur échappait toujours. Ils ne se quittèrent plus. Leur armée était de quarante mille hommes environ, et plusieurs fois ils eurent la jouissance de voir les Carthaginois reculer.

Ce qui les tourmentait, c'était les cavaliers de Narr'Havas ! Souvent, aux heures les plus lourdes, quand on avançait par les plaines en sommeillant sous le poids des armes, tout à coup une grosse ligne de poussière montait à l'horizon ; des galops accouraient, et du sein d'un nuage plein de prunelles flamboyantes, une pluie de dards se précipitait. Les Numides, couverts de manteaux blancs, poussaient de grands cris, levaient les bras en serrant des genoux leurs étalons cabrés, les faisaient tourner brusquement, puis disparaissaient. Ils avaient toujours à quelque distance, sur les dromadaires, des provisions de javelots, et ils revenaient plus terribles, hurlaient comme des loups, s'enfuyaient comme des vautours. Ceux des Barbares placés au bord des files tombaient un à un, — et l'on continuait ainsi jusqu'au soir, où l'on tâchait d'entrer dans les montagnes.

Bien qu'elles fussent périlleuses pour les éléphants, Hamilcar s'y engagea. Il suivit la longue chaîne qui s'étend depuis le promontoire Hermaeum jusqu'au sommet du Zagouan. C'était, croyaient-ils, un moyen de cacher l'insuffisance de ses troupes. Mais l'incertitude continuelle où il les maintenait finissait par les exaspérer plus qu'aucune défaite. Ils ne se décourageaient pas, et marchaient derrière lui.

Enfin, un soir, entre la Montagne-d'Argent et la Montagne-de-Plomb, au milieu de grosses roches, à l'entrée d'un défilé, ils surprirent un corps de vélites ; et l'armée entière était certainement devant eux-là, car on entendait un bruit de pas avec des clairons ; aussitôt les Carthaginois s'enfuirent par la gorge. Elle dévalait dans une plaine ayant la forme d'un fer de hache et environnée de hautes falaises. Pour atteindre les vélites, les Barbares s'y élancèrent ; tout au fond, parmi des boeufs qui galopaient, d'autres Carthaginois couraient tumultueusement. On aperçut un homme en manteau rouge, c'était le Suffète, on se le criait ; un redoublement de fureur et de joie les emporta. Plusieurs, soit paresse ou prudence, étaient restés au seuil du défilé. Mais de la cavalerie, débouchant d'un bois, à coups de pique et de sabre, les rabattit sur les autres ; et bientôt tous les Barbares furent en bas, dans la plaine.

Puis, cette grande masse d'hommes ayant oscillé quelque temps, s'arrêta ; ils ne découvraient aucune issue.

Ceux qui étaient le plus près du défilé revinrent en arrière ; mais le passage avait entièrement disparu. On héla ceux de l'avant pour les faire continuer ; ils s'écrasaient contre la montagne, et de loin ils invectivèrent leurs compagnons qui ne savaient pas retrouver la route.

En effet, à peine les Barbares étaient-ils descendus, que des hommes, tapis derrière les roches, en les soulevant avec des poutres, les avaient renversées ; et comme la pente était rapide, ces blocs énormes, roulant pêle-mêle, avaient bouché l'étroit orifice, complètement.

À l'autre extrémité de la plaine s'étendait un long couloir, çà et là fendu par des crevasses, et qui conduisait à un ravin montant vers le plateau supérieur où se tenait l'armée punique. Dans ce couloir, contre la paroi de la falaise, on avait d'avance disposé des échelles ; et, protégés par les détours des crevasses, les vélites, avant d'être rejoints, purent les saisir et remonter. Plusieurs même s'engagèrent jusqu'au bas de la ravine ; on les tira avec des câbles, car le terrain en cet endroit était un sable mouvant et d'une telle inclinaison que, même sur les genoux, il eût été impossible de le gravir. Les Barbares, presque immédiatement, y arrivèrent. Mais une herse, haute de quarante coudées, et faite à la mesure exacte de l'intervalle, s'abassa devant eux tout à coup, comme un rempart qui serait tombé du ciel.

Donc les combinaisons du Suffète avaient réussi. Aucun des Mercenaires ne connaissait la montagne, et, marchant à la tête des colonnes, ils avaient entraîné les autres. Les roches, un peu étroites par la base, s'étaient facilement abattues, et, tandis que tous couraient, son armée, dans l'horizon, avait crié comme en détresse. Hamilcar, il est vrai, pouvait perdre ses vélites, la moitié seulement y resta. Il en eût sacrifié vingt fois davantage pour le succès d'une pareille entreprise.

Jusqu'au matin, les Barbares se poussèrent en files compactes d'un bout à l'autre de la plaine. Ils tâtaient la montagne avec leurs mains, cherchant à découvrir un passage.

Enfin le jour se leva ; ils aperçurent partout autour d'eux une grande muraille blanche, taillée à pic. Et pas un moyen de salut, pas un espoir ! Les deux sorties naturelles de cette impasse étaient fermées par la herse et par l'amoncellement des roches.

Alors, tous se regardèrent sans parler. Ils s'affaissèrent sur eux-mêmes, en se sentant un froid de glace dans les reins, et aux paupières une pesanteur accablante.

Ils se relevèrent, et bondirent contre les roches. Mais les plus basses, pressées par le poids des autres, étaient inébranlables. Ils tâchèrent de s'y cramponner pour atteindre au sommet ; la forme ventrue de ces grosses masses repoussait toute prise. Ils voulurent fendre le terrain des deux côtés de la gorge : leurs instruments se brisèrent. Avec les mâts des tentes, ils firent un grand feu ; le feu ne pouvait pas brûler la montagne.

Ils revinrent sur la herse ; elle était garnie de longs clous, épais comme des pieux, aigus comme les dards d'un porc-épic et plus serrés que les crins d'une brosse. Mais tant de rage les animait qu'ils se précipitèrent contre elle. Les premiers y entrèrent jusqu'à l'échine, les seconds refluèrent par-dessus ; et tout retomba, en laissant à ces horribles branches des lambeaux humains et des chevelures ensanglantées.

Quand le découragement se fut un peu calmé, on examina ce qu'il y avait de vivres. Les Mercenaires, dont les bagages étaient perdus, en possédaient à peine pour deux jours ; et tous les autres s'en trouvaient dénués, — car ils attendaient un convoi promis par les villages du Sud.

Cependant des taureaux vagabondaient, ceux que les Carthaginois avaient lâchés dans la gorge afin d'attirer les Barbares. Ils les tuèrent à coups de lance ; on les mangea, et, les estomacs étant remplis, les pensées furent moins lugubres.

Le lendemain, ils égorgèrent tous les mulets, une quarantaine environ, puis on racla leurs peaux, on fit bouillir leurs entrailles, on pila les ossements, et ils ne désespéraient pas encore ; l'armée de Tunis, prévenue sans doute, allait venir.

Mais le soir du cinquième jour, la faim redoubla ; ils rongèrent les baudriers des glaives et les petites éponges bordant le fond des casques.

Ces quarante mille hommes étaient tassés dans l'espace d'hippodrome que formait autour d'eux la montagne. Quelques-uns restaient devant la herse ou à la base des roches ; les autres couvraient la plaine confusément. Les forts s'évitaient, et les timides recherchaient les braves, qui ne pouvaient pourtant les sauver.

On avait, à cause de leur infection, enterré vivement les cadavres des vélites ; la place des fosses ne s'apercevait plus.

Tous les Barbares languissaient, couchés par terre. Entre leurs lignes, çà et là, un vétérán passait ; et ils hurlaient des malédictions contre les Carthaginois, contre Hamilcar — et contre Mâtho, bien qu'il fût innocent de leur désastre ; mais il leur semblait que leurs douleurs eussent été moindres s'il les avait partagées. Puis ils gémissaient ; quelques-uns pleuraient tout bas, comme de petits enfants.

Ils venaient vers les capitaines et ils les suppliaient de leur accorder quelque chose qui apaisât leurs souffrances. Les autres ne répondaient rien, — ou, saisis de fureur, ils ramassaient une pierre et la leur jetaient au visage.

Plusieurs, en effet, conservaient soigneusement, dans un trou en terre, une réserve de nourriture, quelques poignées de dattes, un peu de farine ; et on mangeait cela pendant la nuit, en baissant la tête sous son manteau. Ceux qui avaient des épées les gardaient nues dans leurs mains ; les plus défiants se tenaient debout, adossés contre la montagne.

Ils accusaient leurs chefs et les menaçaient. Autharite ne craignait pas de se montrer. Avec cette obstination de Barbare que rien ne rebute, vingt fois par jour il s'avancait jusqu'au fond, vers les roches, espérant chaque fois les trouver peut-être déplacées ; et balançant ses lourdes épaules couvertes de fourrures, il rappelait à ses compagnons un ours qui sort de sa caverne, au printemps, pour voir si les neiges sont fondues. Spendius, entouré de Grecs, se cachait dans une des crevasses ; comme il avait peur, il fit répandre le bruit de sa mort.

Ils étaient maintenant d'une maigreur hideuse ; leur peau se plaquait de marbrures bleuâtres. Le soir du neuvième jour, trois Ibériens moururent.

Leurs compagnons, effrayés, quittèrent la place. On les dépouilla ; et ces corps nus et blancs restèrent sur le sable, au soleil.

Alors des Garamantes se mirent lentement à rôder tout autour. C'étaient des hommes accoutumés à l'existence des solitudes et qui ne respectaient aucun dieu. Enfin le plus vieux de la troupe fit un signe, et se baissant vers les cadavres, avec leurs couteaux, ils en prirent des lanières ; puis, accroupis sur les talons, ils mangeaient. Les autres regardaient de loin ; on poussa des cris d'horreur ; — beaucoup cependant, au fond de l'âme, jalousaient leur courage.

Au milieu de la nuit, quelques-uns de ceux-là se rapprochèrent, et, dissimulant leur désir, ils en demandaient une mince bouchée, seulement pour essayer, disaient-ils. De plus hardis survinrent ; leur le nombre augmenta ; ce fut bientôt une foule. Mais presque tous, en sentant cette chair froide au bord des lèvres, laissaient leur main retomber ; d'autres, au contraire, la dévoraient avec délices.

Afin d'être entraînés par l'exemple, ils s'excitaient mutuellement. Tel qui avait d'abord refusé allait voir les Garamantes et ne revenait plus. Ils faisaient cuire les morceaux sur des charbons à la pointe d'une épée ; on les salait avec de la poussière et l'on se disputait les meilleurs. Quand il ne resta plus rien des trois cadavres, les yeux se portèrent sur toute la plaine pour en trouver d'autres.

Mais ne possédait-on pas des Carthaginois, vingt captifs faits dans la dernière rencontre et que personne, jusqu'à présent, n'avait remarqués ? Ils disparurent ; c'était une vengeance, d'ailleurs. — Puis, comme il fallait vivre, comme le goût de cette nourriture s'était développé, comme on se mourait, on égorgea les porteurs d'eau, les palefreniers, tous les valets des Mercenaires. Chaque jour on en tuait. Quelques-uns mangeaient beaucoup, reprenaient des forces et n'étaient plus tristes.

Bientôt cette ressource vint à manquer. Alors l'envie se tourna sur les blessés et les malades. Puisqu'ils ne pouvaient se guérir, autant les délivrer de leurs tortures ; et, sitôt qu'un homme chancelait, tous s'écriaient qu'il était maintenant perdu et devait servir aux autres. Pour accélérer leur mort, on employait des ruses ; on leur volait le dernier reste de leur immonde portion ; comme par mégarde, on marchait sur eux ; les agonisants, pour faire croire à leur vigueur, tâchaient d'étendre les bras, de se relever, de rire. Des gens évanouis se réveillaient au contact d'une lame ébréchée qui leur sciait un membre ; — et ils tuaient encore par férocité, sans besoin, pour assouvir leur fureur.

Un brouillard lourd et tiède, comme il en arrive dans ces régions à la fin de l'hiver, le quatorzième jour, s'abattit sur l'armée. Ce changement de la température amena des morts nombreuses, et la corruption se développait effroyablement vite dans la chaude humidité retenue par les parois de la montagne. La bruine qui tombait sur les cadavres, en les amollissant, fit bientôt de toute la plaine une large pourriture. Des vapeurs blanchâtres flottaient au-dessus ; elles piquaient les narines, pénétraient la peau, troublaient les yeux ; et les Barbares croyaient entrevoir les souffles exhalés, les âmes de leurs compagnons. Un dégoût immense les accabla. Ils n'en voulaient plus, ils aimaient mieux mourir.

Deux jours après, le temps redevint pur et la faim les reprit. Il leur semblait parfois qu'on leur arrachait l'estomac avec des tenailles. Alors, ils se roulaient saisis de convulsions, jetaient dans leur bouche des poignées de terre, se mordaient les bras et éclataient en rires frénétiques.

La soif les tourmentait encore plus, car ils n'avaient pas une goutte d'eau, les outres, depuis le neuvième jour, étant complètement taries. Pour tromper le besoin, ils s'appliquaient sur la langue les écailles métalliques des ceinturons, les pommeaux en ivoire, les fers des glaives. D'anciens conducteurs de caravane se comprimaient le ventre avec des cordes. D'autres suçaient un caillou. On buvait de l'urine refroidie dans les casques d'airain.

Et ils attendaient toujours l'armée de Tunis ! La longueur du temps qu'elle mettait à venir, d'après leurs conjectures, certifiait son arrivée prochaine. D'ailleurs Mâtho, qui était un brave, ne les abandonnerait pas. " Ce sera pour demain ! " se disaient-ils ; et demain se passait.

Au commencement, ils avaient fait des prières, des vœux, pratiqué toutes sortes d'incantations. A présent ils ne sentaient, pour leurs Divinités, que de la haine, et, par vengeance, tâchaient de ne plus y croire.

Les hommes de caractère violent périrent les premiers ; les Africains résistèrent mieux que les Gaulois. Zarxas, entre les Baléares, restait étendu tout de son long, les cheveux par-dessus le bras, inerte. Spendius trouva une plante à larges feuilles emplies d'un suc abondant, et, l'ayant déclarée vénéneuse afin d'en écarter les autres, il s'en nourrissait.

On était trop faible pour abattre, d'un coup de pierre, les corbeaux qui volaient. Quelquefois, lorsqu'un gypaète, posé sur un cadavre, le déchiquetait depuis longtemps déjà, un homme se mettait à ramper vers lui avec un javelot entre les dents. Il s'appuyait d'une main, et, après avoir bien visé, il lançait son arme. La bête aux plumes blanches, troublée par le bruit, s'interrompait, regardait tout à l'entour d'un air tranquille, comme un cormoran sur un écueil, puis elle replongeait son hideux bec jaune ; et l'homme désespéré retombait à plat ventre dans la poussière. Quelques-uns parvenaient à découvrir des caméléons, des serpents. Mais ce qui les faisait vivre, c'était l'amour de la vie. Ils tendaient leur âme sur cette idée, exclusivement, — et se rattachaient à l'existence par un effort de volonté qui la prolongeait.

Les plus stoïques se tenaient les uns près des autres, assis en rond, au milieu de la plaine, çà et là, entre les morts ; et, enveloppés dans leurs manteaux, ils s'abandonnaient silencieusement à leur tristesse.

Ceux qui étaient nés dans les villes se rappelaient des rues toutes retentissantes, des tavernes, des théâtres, des bains, et les boutiques des barbiers où l'on écoute des histoires. D'autres revoyaient des campagnes au coucher du soleil, quand les blés jaunes ondulent et que les grands boeufs remontent les collines avec le soc des charrues sur le cou. Les voyageurs rêvaient à des citernes, les chasseurs à leurs forêts, les vétérans à des batailles, — et, dans la somnolence qui les engourdisait, leurs pensées se heurtaient avec l'emportement et la netteté des songes. Des hallucinations les envahissaient tout à coup ; ils cherchaient dans la montagne une porte pour s'enfuir et voulaient passer au travers. D'autres, croyant naviguer par une tempête, commandaient la manœuvre d'un navire, ou bien ils se reculaient épouvantés, apercevant, dans les nuages, des bataillons puniques. Il y en avait qui se figuraient être à un festin, et ils chantaient.

Beaucoup, par une étrange manie, répétaient le même mot ou faisaient continuellement le même geste. Puis, quand ils venaient à relever la tête et à se regarder, des sanglots les étouffaient en découvrant l'horrible ravage de leurs figures. Quelques-uns ne souffraient plus, et, pour employer les heures, ils se racontaient les périls auxquels ils avaient échappé.

Leur mort à tous était certaine, imminente. Combien de fois n'avaient-ils pas tenté de s'ouvrir un passage ! Quant à implorer les conditions du vainqueur, par quel moyen ? ils ne savaient même pas où se trouvait Hamilcar.

Le vent soufflait du côté de la ravine. Il faisait couler le sable par-dessus la herse en cascades, perpétuellement ; et les manteaux et les chevelures des Barbares s'en recouvraient comme si la terre, montant sur eux, avait voulu les ensevelir. Rien ne bougeait ; l'éternelle montagne, chaque matin, leur semblait encore plus haute.

Quelquefois des bandes d'oiseaux passaient à tire d'aile, en plein ciel bleu, dans la liberté de l'air. Ils fermaient les yeux pour ne pas les voir.

On sentait d'abord un bourdonnement dans les oreilles, les ongles noircissaient, le froid gagnait la poitrine, on se couchait sur le côté et l'on s'éteignait sans un cri.

Le dix-neuvième jour, deux mille Asiatiques étaient morts, quinze cents de l'Archipel, huit mille de la Libye, les plus jeunes des Mercenaires et des tribus complètes ; — en tout vingt mille soldats, la moitié de l'armée.

Autharite, qui n'avait plus que cinquante Gaulois, allait se faire tuer pour en finir, quand, au sommet de la montagne, en face de lui, il crut voir un homme.

Cet homme, à cause de l'élévation, ne paraissait pas plus grand qu'un nain. Cependant Autharite reconnut à son bras gauche un bouclier en forme de trèfle. Il s'écria : " Un Carthaginois ! " Et, dans la plaine, devant la herse et sous les roches, immédiatement tous se levèrent. Le soldat se promenait au bord du précipice ; d'en bas, les Barbares le regardaient.

Spendius ramassa une tête de boeuf ; puis avec deux ceintures ayant composé un diadème, il le planta sur les cornes au bout d'une perche, en témoignage d'intentions pacifiques. Le Carthaginois disparut. Ils attendirent.

Enfin, le soir, comme une pierre se détachant de la falaise, tout à coup il tomba d'en haut un baudrier. Fait de cuir rouge et couvert de broderie avec trois étoiles de diamant, il portait empreint à son milieu la marque du Grand-Conseil : un cheval sous un palmier. C'était la réponse d'Hamilcar, le sauf-conduit qu'il envoyait.

Ils n'avaient rien à craindre ; tout changement de fortune amenait la fin de leurs maux. Une joie démesurée les agita, ils s'embrassaient, pleuraient. Spendius, Autharite et Zaxras, quatre Italiotes, un Nègre et deux Spartiates s'offrirent comme parlementaires. On les accepta tout de suite . Ils ne savaient cependant par quel moyen s'en aller.

Mais un craquement retentit dans la direction des roches ; et la plus élevée, ayant oscillé sur elle-même, rebondit jusqu'en bas. En effet, si du côté des Barbares elles étaient inébranlables, car il aurait fallu leur faire remonter un plan oblique (et, d'ailleurs, elles se trouvaient tassées par l'étroitesse de la gorge), de l'autre, au contraire, il suffisait de les heurter fortement pour qu'elles descendissent. Les Carthaginois les poussèrent, et, au jour levant, elles s'avançaient dans la plaine comme les gradins d'un immense escalier en ruine.

Les Barbares ne pouvaient encore les gravir. On leur tendit des échelles ; tous s'y élancèrent. La décharge d'une catapulte les refoula ; les Dix seulement furent emmenés.

Ils marchaient entre les Clinabares, et appuyaient leur main sur la croupe des chevaux pour se soutenir. Maintenant que leur première joie était passée, ils commençaient à concevoir des inquiétudes. Les exigences d'Hamilcar seraient cruelles. Mais Spendius les rassurait.

— " C'est moi qui parlerai ! " Et il se vantait de connaître les choses bonnes à dire pour le salut de l'armée.

Derrière tous les buissons, ils rencontraient des sentinelles en embuscade. Elles se prosternaient devant le baudrier que Spendius avait mis sur son épaule.

Quand ils arrivèrent dans le camp punique, la foule s'empressa autour d'eux, et ils entendaient comme des chuchotements, des rires. La porte d'une tente s'ouvrit.

Hamilcar était tout au fond, assis sur un escabeau, près d'une table basse où brillait un glaive nu. Des capitaines, debout, l'entouraient.

En apercevant ces hommes, il fit un geste en arrière, puis il se pencha pour les examiner.

Ils avaient les pupilles extraordinairement dilatées avec un grand cercle noir autour des yeux, qui se prolongeait jusqu'au bas de leurs oreilles ; leurs nez bleuâtres saillaient entre leurs joues creuses, fendillées par des rides profondes ; la peau de leur corps, trop large pour leurs muscles, disparaissait sous une poussière de couleur ardoise ; leurs lèvres se collaient contre leurs dents jaunes ; ils exhalaient une infecte odeur ; on aurait dit des tombeaux entrouverts, des sépulcres vivants.

Au milieu de la tente, il y avait, sur une natte où les capitaines allaient s'asseoir, un plat de courges qui fumait. Les Barbares y attachaient leurs yeux en grelottant de tous les membres, et des larmes venaient à leurs paupières. Ils se contenaient, cependant.

Hamilcar se détourna pour parler à quelqu'un. Alors, ils se ruèrent dessus, tous, à plat ventre. Leurs visages trempaient dans la graisse, et le bruit de leur déglutition se mêlait aux sanglots de joie qu'ils poussaient. Plutôt par étonnement que par pitié, sans doute, on les laissa finir la gamelle. Puis, quand ils se furent relevés, Hamilcar commanda, d'un signe, à l'homme qui portait le baudrier de parler. Spendius avait peur ; il balbutiait.

Hamilcar, en l'écoutant, faisait tourner autour de son doigt une grosse bague d'or, celle qui avait empreint sur le baudrier le sceau de Carthage. Il la laissa tomber par terre : Spendius, tout de suite, la ramassa ; devant son maître, ses habitudes d'esclave le reprenaient. Les autres frémirent, indignés de cette bassesse.

Mais le Grec haussa la voix, et, rapportant les crimes d'Hannon, qu'il savait être l'ennemi de Barca, tâchant de l'apitoyer avec le détail de leurs misères et les souvenirs de leur dévouement, il parla pendant longtemps, d'une façon rapide, insidieuse, violente même ; à la fin, il s'oubliait, entraîné par la chaleur de son esprit.

Hamilcar répliqua qu'il acceptait leurs excuses. Donc la paix allait se conclure, et maintenant elle serait définitive ! Mais il exigeait qu'on lui livrât dix des Mercenaires, à son choix, sans armes et sans tunique.

Ils ne s'attendaient pas à cette clémence ; Spendius s'écria :

— " Oh ! vingt, si tu veux Maître ! "

— " Non ! dix me suffisent ", répondit doucement Hamilcar.

On les fit sortir de la tente afin qu'ils pussent délibérer. Dès qu'ils furent seuls, Autharite réclama pour les compagnons sacrifiés, et Zarxas dit à Spendius :

— " Pourquoi ne l'as-tu pas tué ? son glaive était là, près de toi ! "

— " Lui ! ", fit Spendius ; et il répéta plusieurs fois :

" Lui ! lui ! " comme si la chose eût été impossible et Hamilcar quelqu'un d'immortel.

Tant de lassitude les accablait qu'ils s'étendirent par terre, sur le dos, ne sachant à quoi se résoudre.

Spendius les engageait à céder. Enfin, ils y consentirent, et ils rentrèrent.

Alors le Suffète mit sa main dans les mains des dix Barbares tour à tour, en serrant leurs pouces ; puis il la frota sur son vêtement, car leur peau visqueuse causait au toucher une impression rude et molle, un fourmillement gras qui horripilait. Ensuite, il leur dit :

— " Vous êtes bien tous les chefs des Barbares et vous avez juré pour eux ? "

— " Oui ! " répondirent-ils.

— " Sans contrainte, du fond de l'âme, avec l'intention d'accomplir vos promesses ? "

Ils assurèrent qu'ils s'en retournaient vers les autres pour les exécuter.

— " Eh bien ! " reprit le Suffète, " d'après la convention passée entre moi, Barca, et les ambassadeurs des Mercenaires, c'est vous que je choisis, et je vous garde ! "

Spendius tomba évanoui sur la natte. Les Barbares, comme l'abandonnant, se resserrèrent les uns près des autres : et il n'y eut pas un mot, pas une plainte.

Leurs compagnons, qui les attendaient, ne les voyant pas revenir, se crurent trahis. Sans doute, les parlementaires s'étaient donnés au Suffète.

Ils attendirent encore deux jours : puis, le matin du troisième, leur résolution fut prise. Avec des cordes, des pics et des flèches disposées comme des échelons entre des lambeaux de toile, ils parvinrent à escalader les roches ; et, laissant derrière eux les plus faibles, trois mille environ, ils se mirent en marche pour rejoindre l'armée de Tunis.

Au haut de la gorge s'étalait une prairie clairsemée d'arbustes ; les Barbares en dévorèrent les bourgeons. Ensuite, ils trouvèrent un champ de fèves ; et tout disparut comme si un nuage de sauterelles eût passé par là. Trois heures après, ils arrivèrent sur un second plateau, que bordait une ceinture de collines vertes.

Entre les ondulations de ces monticules, des gerbes couleur d'argent brillaient, espacées les unes des autres ; les Barbares, éblouis par le soleil, apercevaient confusément, en dessous, de grosses masses noires qui les supportaient. Elles se levèrent, comme si elles se fussent épanouies. C'étaient des lances dans des tours, sur des éléphants effroyablement armés.

Outre l'épieu de leur poitrail, les poinçons de leurs défenses, les plaques d'airain qui couvraient leurs flancs, et les poignards tenus à leurs grenouillères, — ils avaient au bout de leurs trompes un bracelet de cuir où était passé le manche d'un large coutelas ; partis tous à la fois du fond de la plaine, ils s'avançaient de chaque côté, parallèlement.

Une terreur sans nom glaça les Barbares. Ils ne tentèrent même pas de s'enfuir. Déjà, ils se trouvaient enveloppés.

Les éléphants entrèrent dans cette masse d'hommes ; et les éperons de leur poitrail la divisaient, les lances de leurs défenses la retournaient comme des socs de charrues ; ils coupaient, taillaient, hachaient avec les faux de leurs trompes ; les tours, pleines de phalariques, semblaient des volcans en marche ; on ne distinguait qu'un large amas où les chairs humaines faisaient des taches blanches, les morceaux d'airain des plaques grises, le sang des fusées rouges ; les horribles animaux, passant au milieu de tout cela, creusaient des sillons noirs. Le plus furieux était conduit par un Numide couronné d'un diadème de plumes. Il lançait des javelots avec une vitesse effrayante, tout en jetant par intervalles un long sifflement aigu ; — les grosses bêtes, dociles comme des chiens, pendant le carnage tournaient un oeil de son côté.

Leur cercle peu à peu se rétrécissait ; les Barbares, affaiblis, ne résistaient pas ; bientôt, les éléphants furent au centre de la plaine.

L'espace leur manquait ; ils se tassaient, à demi cabrés, les ivoires s'entrechoquaient. Tout à coup, Narr'Havas les apaisa, et, tournant la croupe, ils s'en revinrent au trot vers les collines.

Cependant, deux syntagmes s'étaient réfugiés à droite dans un pli du terrain, avaient jeté leurs armes, et, tous à genoux vers les tentes puniques, ils levaient leurs bras pour implorer grâce.

On leur attacha les jambes et les mains ; puis, quand ils furent étendus par terre les uns près des autres, on ramena les éléphants.

Les poitrines craquaient comme des coffres que l'on brise ; chacun de leurs pas en écrasait deux ; leurs gros pieds enfonçaient dans les corps avec un mouvement des hanches qui les faisait paraître boiter. Ils continuaient, et allèrent jusqu'au bout.

Le niveau de la plaine redevint immobile. La nuit tomba. Hamilcar se délectait devant le spectacle de sa vengeance ; mais soudain il tressaillit.

Il voyait, et tous voyaient à six cents pas de là, sur la gauche, au sommet d'un mamelon, des Barbares encore ! En effet, quatre cents des plus solides, des Mercenaires Etrusques, Libyens et Spartiates, dès le commencement avaient gagné les hauteurs, et jusque-là s'y étaient tenus incertains. Après ce massacre de leurs compagnons, ils résolurent de traverser les Carthaginois ; déjà ils descendaient en colonnes serrées, d'une façon merveilleuse et formidable.

Un héraut leur fut immédiatement expédié. Le Suffète avait besoin de soldats ; il les recevait sans condition, tant il admirait leur bravoure. Ils pouvaient même, ajouta l'homme de Carthage, se rapprocher quelque peu, dans un endroit qu'il leur désigna, et où ils trouveraient des vivres.

Les Barbares y coururent et passèrent la nuit à manger. Alors, les Carthaginois éclatèrent en rumeurs contre la partialité du Suffète pour les Mercenaires.

Céda-t-il à ces expansions d'une haine insatiable, ou bien était-ce un raffinement de perfidie ? Le lendemain, il vint lui-même sans épée, tête nue, dans une escorte de Clinabares, et il leur déclara qu'ayant trop de monde à nourrir, son intention n'était pas de les conserver. Cependant, comme il lui fallait des hommes et qu'il ne savait par quel moyen choisir les bons, ils allaient se combattre à outrance ; puis il admettrait les vainqueurs dans sa garde particulière. Cette mort-là en valait bien une autre ; — et alors, écartant ses soldats (car les étendards puniques cachaient aux Mercenaires l'horizon), il leur montra les cent quatre-vingt-douze éléphants de Narr'Havas formant une seule ligne droite et dont les trompes brandissaient de larges fers, pareils à des bras de géant qui auraient tenu des haches sur leurs têtes.

Les Barbares s'entre-regardèrent silencieusement. Ce n'était pas la mort qui les faisait pâlir, mais l'horrible contrainte où ils se trouvaient réduits.

La communauté de leur existence avait établi entre ces hommes des amitiés profondes. Le camp, pour la plupart, remplaçait la patrie ; vivant sans famille, ils reportaient sur un compagnon leur besoin de tendresse, et l'on s'endormait côte à côte, sous le même manteau, à la clarté des étoiles. Puis, dans ce vagabondage perpétuel à travers toutes sortes de pays, de meurtres et d'aventures, il s'était formé d'étranges amours, — unions obscènes aussi sérieuses que des mariages, où le plus fort défendait le plus jeune au milieu des batailles, l'aidait à franchir les précipices, épongeait sur son front la sueur des fièvres, volait pour lui de la nourriture ; et l'autre, enfant ramassé au bord d'une route, puis devenu Mercenaire, payait ce dévouement par mille soins délicats et des complaisances d'épouse.

Ils échangèrent leurs colliers et leurs pendants d'oreilles, cadeaux qu'ils s'étaient faits autrefois, après un grand péril, dans des heures d'ivresse. Tous demandaient à mourir, et aucun ne voulait frapper. On en voyait un jeune, çà et là, qui disait à un autre dont la barbe était grise : " Non ! non, tu es le plus robuste ! Tu nous vengeras, tue-moi ! " et l'homme répondait : " J'ai moins d'années à vivre ! Frappe au coeur, et n'y pense plus ! Les frères se contemplaient, les deux mains serrées, et l'amant faisait à son amant des adieux éternels, debout, en pleurant sur son épaule.

Ils retirèrent leurs cuirasses pour que la pointe des glaives s'enfonçât plus vite. Alors, parurent les marques des grands coups qu'ils avaient reçus pour Carthage ; on aurait dit des inscriptions sur des colonnes.

Ils se mirent sur quatre rangs égaux à la façon des gladiateurs, et ils commencèrent par des engagements timides. Quelques-uns s'étaient bandé les yeux, et leurs glaives ramaient dans l'air, doucement, comme des bâtons d'aveugle. Les Carthaginois poussèrent des huées en leur criant qu'ils étaient des lâches. Les Barbares s'animèrent, et bientôt le combat fut général, précipité, terrible.

Parfois deux hommes s'arrêtaient tout sanglants, tombaient dans les bras l'un de l'autre et mouraient en se donnant des baisers. Aucun ne reculait. Ils se ruaient contre les lames tendues. Leur délire était si furieux que les Carthaginois, de loin, avaient peur.

Enfin, ils s'arrêtèrent. Leurs poitrines faisaient un grand bruit rauque, et l'on apercevait leurs prunelles, entre leurs longs cheveux qui pendaient comme s'ils fussent sortis d'un bain de pourpre. Plusieurs tournaient sur eux-mêmes, rapidement, tels que des panthères blessées au front. D'autres se tenaient immobiles en considérant un cadavre à leurs pieds ; puis, tout à coup, ils s'arrachaient le visage avec les ongles, prenaient leur glaive à deux mains et se l'enfonçaient dans le ventre.

Il en restait soixante encore. Ils demandèrent à boire. On leur cria de jeter leurs glaives ; et, quand ils les eurent jetés, on leur apporta de l'eau.

Pendant qu'ils buvaient, la figure enfoncée dans les vases, soixante Carthaginois, sautant sur eux, les tuèrent avec des stylets, dans le dos.

Hamilcar avait fait cela pour complaire aux instincts de son armée, et, par cette trahison, l'attacher à sa personne.

Donc, la guerre était finie ; du moins, il le croyait ; Mâtho ne résisterait pas ; dans son impatience, le Suffète ordonna tout de suite le départ.

Ses éclaireurs vinrent lui dire que l'on avait distingué un convoi qui s'en allait vers la Montagne-de-Plomb. Hamilcar ne s'en soucia. Une fois les Mercenaires anéantis, les Nomades ne l'embarrasseraient plus. L'important était de prendre Tunis. A grandes journées, il marcha dessus.

Il avait envoyé Narr'Havas à Carthage porter la nouvelle de la victoire ; et le roi des Numides, fier de ses succès, se présenta chez Salammbô.

Elle le reçut dans ses jardins, sous un large sycomore, entre des oreillers de cuir jaune, avec Taanach auprès d'elle. Son visage était couvert d'une écharpe blanche, qui, lui passant sur la bouche et sur le front, ne laissait voir que les yeux ; mais ses lèvres brillaient dans la transparence du tissu comme les pierreries de ses doigts, — car

Salammbô tenait ses deux mains enveloppées, et, tout le temps qu'ils parlèrent, elle ne fit pas un geste.

Narr'Havas lui annonça la défaite des Barbares. Elle le remercia par une bénédiction des services qu'il avait rendus à son père. Alors il se mit à raconter toute la campagne.

Les colombes, sur les palmiers autour d'eux, roucoulaient doucement, et d'autres oiseaux voletaient parmi les herbes : des galéoles à collier, des cailles de Tartessus et des pintades puniques. Le jardin, depuis longtemps inculte, avait multiplié ses verdure ; des coloquintes montaient dans le branchage des canéficiers, des ascléplas parsemaient les champs de roses, toutes sortes de végétations formaient des entrelacements, des berceaux ; et des rayons de soleil, qui descendaient obliquement, marquaient çà et là, comme dans les bois, l'ombre d'une feuille sur la terre. Les bêtes domestiques, redevenues sauvages, s'enfuyaient au moindre bruit. Parfois on apercevait une gazelle traînant à ses petits sabots noirs des plumes de paon, dispersées. Les clameurs de la ville, au loin, se perdaient dans le murmure des flots. Le ciel était tout bleu ; pas une voile n'apparaissait sur la mer.

Narr'Havas ne parlait plus ; Salammbô, sans lui répondre, le regardait. Il avait une robe de lin, où des fleurs étaient peintes, avec des franges d'or par le bas ; deux flèches d'argent retenaient ses cheveux tressés au bord de ses oreilles ; il s'appuyait de la main droite contre le bois d'une pique, orné par des cercles d'électrum et des touffes de poil.

En le considérant, une foule de pensées vagues l'absorbait. Ce jeune homme à voix douce et à taille féminine captivait ses yeux par la grâce de sa personne et lui semblait être comme une soeur aînée que les Baals envoyaient pour la protéger. Le souvenir de Mâtho la saisit : elle ne résista pas au désir de savoir ce qu'il devenait.

Narr'Havas répondit que les Carthaginois s'avançaient vers Tunis, afin de le prendre. A mesure qu'il exposait leurs chances de réussite et la faiblesse de Mâtho, elle paraissait se réjouir dans un espoir extraordinaire. Ses lèvres tremblaient, sa poitrine haletait. Quand il promit enfin de le tuer lui-même, elle s'écria :

— " Oui ! tue-le, il le faut ! "

Le Numide répliqua qu'il souhaitait ardemment cette mort puisque, la guerre terminée, il serait son époux.

Salammbô tressaillit, et elle baissa la tête.

Mais Narr'Havas, poursuivant, compara ses désirs à des fleurs qui languissent après la pluie, à des voyageurs perdus qui attendent le jour. Il lui dit encore qu'elle était plus belle que la lune, meilleure que le vent du matin et que le visage de l'hôte. Il ferait venir pour elle, du pays des Noirs, des choses comme il n'y en avait pas à Carthage, et les appartements de leur maison seraient sablés avec de la poudre d'or.

Le soir tombait, des senteurs de baume s'exhalaient. Pendant longtemps, ils se regardèrent en silence, — et les yeux de Salammbô, au fond de ses longues draperies, avaient l'air de deux étoiles dans l'ouverture d'un nuage. Avant que le soleil fût couché, il se retira.

Les Anciens se sentirent soulagés d'une grande inquiétude quand il partit de Carthage. Le peuple l'avait reçu avec des acclamations encore plus enthousiastes que la première fois. Si Hamilcar et le roi des Numides triomphaient seuls des Mercenaires, il serait impossible de leur résister. Donc ils résolurent, pour affaiblir Barca, de faire participer à la délivrance de la République celui qu'ils aimaient, le vieil Hannon.

Il se porta immédiatement vers les provinces occidentales, afin de se venger dans les lieux mêmes qui avaient vu sa honte. Mais les habitants et les Barbares étaient morts, cachés ou enfuis. Alors sa colère se déchargea sur la campagne. Il brûla les ruines des ruines, il ne laissa pas un seul arbre, pas un brin d'herbe ; les enfants et les infirmes que l'on rencontrait, on les suppliciait ; il donnait à ses soldats les femmes à violer avant leur égorgement ; les plus belles étaient jetées dans sa litière, — car son atroce maladie l'enflammait de désirs impétueux ; il les assouvissait avec toute la fureur d'un homme désespéré.

Souvent, à la crête des collines, des tentes noires s'abattaient comme renversées par le vent, et de larges disques à bordure brillante, que l'on reconnaissait pour des roues de chariot, en tournant avec un son plaintif, peu à peu s'enfonçaient dans les vallées. Les tribus, qui avaient abandonné le siège de Carthage, erraient ainsi par les provinces, attendant une occasion, quelque victoire des Mercenaires pour revenir. Mais, soit terreur ou famine, elles reprirent toutes le chemin de leurs contrées, et disparurent.

Hamilcar ne fut point jaloux des succès d'Hannon. Cependant il avait hâte d'en finir ; il lui ordonna de se rabattre sur Tunis ; et Hannon, qui aimait sa patrie, au jour fixé se trouva sous les murs de la ville.

Elle avait pour se défendre sa population d'autochtones, douze mille Mercenaires, puis tous les Mangeurs-de-choses-immondes, car ils étaient comme Mâtho rivés à l'horizon de Carthage, et la plèbe et le Schalischim contemplaient de loin ses hautes murailles, en rêvant par-delà des jouissances infinies. Dans cet accord de haines, la résistance fut lestement organisée. On prit des outres pour faire des casques, on coupa tous les palmiers dans les jardins pour avoir des lances, on creusa des citernes et, quant aux vivres, ils pêchaient aux bords du lac de gros poissons blancs, nourris de cadavres et d'immondices. Leurs remparts, maintenus en ruine par la jalousie de Carthage, étaient si faibles, que l'on pouvait, d'un coup d'épaule, les abattre. Mâtho en boucha les trous avec les pierres des maisons. C'était la dernière lutte ; il n'espérait rien, et cependant il se disait que la fortune était changeante.

Les Carthaginois, en approchant, remarquèrent, sur le rempart, un homme qui dépassait les créneaux de toute la ceinture. Les flèches volant autour de lui n'avaient pas l'air de plus l'effrayer qu'un essaim d'hirondelles. Aucune, par extraordinaire, ne le toucha.

Hamilcar établit son camp sur le côté méridional -. Narr'Havas, à sa droite, occupait la plaine de Rhâdès. Hannon le bord du Lac ; et les trois généraux devaient garder leur position respective pour attaquer l'enceinte, tous, en même temps.

Mais Hamilcar voulut d'abord montrer aux Mercenaires qu'il les châtierait comme des esclaves. Il fit crucifier les dix ambassadeurs, les uns près des autres, sur un monticule, en face de la ville.

A ce spectacle, les assiégés abandonnèrent le rempart.

Mâtho s'était dit que, s'il pouvait passer entre les murs et les tentes de Narr'Havas assez rapidement pour que les Numides n'eussent pas le temps de sortir, il tomberait sur les derrières de l'infanterie carthaginoise, qui se trouverait prise entre sa division et ceux de l'intérieur. Il s'élança dehors avec les vétérans.

Narr'Havas l'aperçut ; il franchit la plage du Lac et vint avertir Hannon d'expédier des hommes au secours d'Hamilcar. Croyait-il Barca trop faible pour résister aux Mercenaires ? Était-ce une perfidie ou une sottise ? Nul jamais ne put le savoir.

Hannon, par désir d'humilier son rival, ne balança pas. Il cria de sonner les trompettes, et toute son armée se précipita sur les Barbares. Ils se retournèrent et coururent droit aux Carthaginois ; ils les renversaient, les écrasaient sous leurs pieds, et, les refoulant ainsi, ils arrivèrent jusqu'à la tente d'Hannon qui était alors, au milieu de trente Carthaginois, les plus illustres des Anciens.

Il parut stupéfait de leur audace ; il appelait ses capitaines. Tous avançaient leurs poings sous sa gorge, en vociférant des injures. La foule se poussait, et ceux qui avaient la main sur lui le retenaient à grand-peine. Cependant, il tâchait de leur dire à l'oreille : — " Je te donnerai tout ce tu veux ! Je suis riche ! Sauve-moi ! - " Ils le tiraient ; si lourd qu'il fût, ses pieds ne touchaient plus la terre. On avait entraîné les Anciens. Sa terreur redoubla. — " Vous m'avez battu ! Je suis votre captif ! Je me rachète ! Ecoutez-moi, mes amis ! " Et, porté par toutes ces épaules qui le serraient aux flancs, il répétait : " Qu'allez-vous faire ? Que voulez-vous ? Je ne m'obstine pas, vous voyez bien ! J'ai toujours été bon ! "

Une croix gigantesque était dressée à la porte. Les Barbares hurlaient : " Ici ! ici ! " mais il éleva la voix encore plus haut ; et, au nom de leurs Dieux, il les somma de le mener au Schalischim, parce qu'il avait à lui confier une chose d'où leur salut dépendait.

Ils s'arrêtèrent, quelques-uns prétendant qu'il était sage d'appeler Mâtho. On partit à sa recherche.

Hannon tomba sur l'herbe ; et il voyait, autour de lui, encore d'autres croix, comme si le supplice dont il allait périr se fût d'avance multiplié, il faisait des efforts pour se convaincre qu'il se trompait, qu'il n'y en avait qu'une seule, et même pour croire qu'il n'y en avait pas du tout. Enfin on le releva.

— " Parle ! " dit Mâtho.

Il offrit de livrer Hamilcar, puis ils entrèrent dans Carthage et seraient rois tous les deux.

Mâtho s'éloigna, en faisant signe aux autres de se hâter. C'était, pensait-il, une ruse pour gagner du temps.

Le Barbare se trompait ; Hannon était dans une de ces extrémités où l'on ne considère plus rien, et d'ailleurs il exécrait tellement Hamilcar que, sur le moindre espoir de salut, il l'aurait sacrifié avec tous ses soldats.

A la base des trente croix, les Anciens languissaient par terre ; déjà des cordes étaient passées sous leurs aisselles. Alors le vieux Suffète, comprenant qu'il fallait mourir, pleura. Ils arrachèrent ce qui lui restait de vêtements — et l'horreur de sa personne apparut. Des ulcères couvraient cette masse sans nom ; la graisse de ses jambes lui cachait les ongles des pieds ; il pendait à ses doigts comme des lambeaux verdâtres ; et les larmes qui ruisselaient entre les tubercules de ses joues donnaient à son visage quelque chose d'effroyablement triste, ayant l'air d'occuper plus de place que sur un autre visage humain. Son bandeau royal, à demi dénoué, traînait avec ses cheveux blancs dans la poussière.

Ils crurent n'avoir pas de cordes assez fortes pour le grimper jusqu'au bout de la croix, et ils le clouèrent dessus, avant qu'elle fût dressée, à la mode punique. Mais son orgueil se réveilla dans la douleur. Il se mit à les accabler d'injures. Il écumait et se tordait, comme un monstre marin que l'on égorge sur un rivage, en leur prédisant qu'ils finiraient tous plus horriblement encore et qu'il serait vengé.

Il l'était. De l'autre côté de la ville, d'où s'échappaient maintenant des jets de flammes avec des colonnes de fumée, les ambassadeurs des Mercenaires agonisaient.

Quelques-uns, évanouis d'abord, venaient de se ranimer sous la fraîcheur du vent ; mais ils restaient le menton sur la poitrine, et leur corps descendait un peu, malgré les clous de leurs bras fixés plus haut que leur tête ; de leurs talons et de leurs mains, du sang tombait par grosses gouttes, lentement, comme des branches d'un arbre tombent des fruits mûrs, — et Carthage, le golfe, les montagnes et les plaines, tout leur paraissait tourner, tel qu'une immense roue ; quelquefois, un nuage de poussière montant du sol les enveloppait dans ses tourbillons ; ils étaient brûlés par une soif horrible, leur langue se retournait dans leur bouche, et ils sentaient sur eux une sueur glaciale couler, avec leur âme qui s'en allait.

Cependant, ils entrevoyaient à une profondeur infinie des rues, des soldats en marche, des balancements de glaives ; et le tumulte de la bataille leur arrivait vaguement, comme le bruit de la mer à des naufragés qui meurent dans la mâture d'un navire. Les Italiotes, plus robustes que les autres, criaient encore ; les Lacédémoniens, se taisant, gardaient leurs paupières fermées ; Zarxas, si vigoureux autrefois, penchait comme un roseau brisé ; l'Ethiopien, près de lui, avait la tête renversée en arrière par-dessus les bras de la croix ; Autharite, immobile, roulait des yeux ; sa grande chevelure, prise dans une fente de bois, se tenait droite sur son front, et le râle qu'il poussait semblait plutôt un rugissement de colère. Quant à Spendius, un étrange courage lui était venu ; maintenant il méprisait la vie, par la certitude qu'il avait d'un affranchissement presque immédiat et éternel, et il attendait la mort avec impassibilité.

Au milieu de leur défaillance, quelquefois ils tressaillaient à un frôlement de plumes, qui leur passait contre la bouche. De grandes ailes balançaient des ombres autour d'eux, des croassements claquaient dans l'air ; et comme la croix de Spendius était la plus haute, ce fut sur la sienne que le premier vautour s'abattit. Alors il tourna son visage vers Autharite, et lui dit lentement, avec un indéfinissable sourire :

— " Te rappelles-tu les lions sur la route de Sicca ? " — " C'étaient nos frères ! " répondit le Gaulois en expirant.

Le Suffète, pendant ce temps-là, avait troué l'enceinte, et il était parvenu à la citadelle. Sous une rafale de vent, la fumée tout à coup s'envola, découvrant l'horizon jusqu'aux murailles de Carthage ; il crut même distinguer des gens qui regardaient sur la plate-forme d'Eschmoûn ; puis, en ramenant ses yeux, il aperçut, à gauche, au bord du Lac, trente croix démesurées.

En effet, pour les rendre plus effroyables, ils les avaient construites avec les mâts de leurs tentes attachés bout à bout ; et les trente cadavres des Anciens apparaissaient tout en haut dans le ciel. Il y avait sur leurs poitrines comme des papillons blancs ; c'étaient les barbes des flèches qu'on leur avait tirées d'en bas.

Au faite de la plus grande, un large ruban d'or brillait ; il pendait sur l'épaule, le bras manquait de ce côté-là, et Hamilcar eut de la peine à reconnaître Hannon. Ses os spongieux ne tenant pas sous les fiches de fer, des portions de ses membres s'étaient détachées, — et il ne restait à la croix que d'informes débris, pareils à ces fragments d'animaux suspendus contre la porte des chasseurs.

Le Suffète n'avait rien pu savoir : la ville, devant lui, masquait tout ce qui était au-delà, par-derrière ; et les capitaines envoyés successivement aux deux généraux n'avaient pas reparu. Alors, des fuyards arrivèrent, racontant la déroute ; et l'armée punique s'arrêta. Cette catastrophe, tombant au milieu de leur victoire, les stupéfiait. Ils n'entendaient plus les ordres d'Hamilcar.

Mâtho en profitait pour continuer ses ravages dans les Numides.

Le camp d'Hannon bouleversé, il était revenu sur eux. Les éléphants sortirent. Mais les Mercenaires, avec des brandons arrachés aux murs, s'avancèrent par la plaine en agitant des flammes, et les grosses bêtes, effrayées, coururent se précipiter dans le golfe, où elles se tuaient les unes les autres en se débattant, et se noyèrent sous le poids de leurs cuirasses. Déjà Narr'Havas avait lâché sa cavalerie ; tous se jetèrent la face contre le sol ; puis, quand les chevaux furent à trois pas d'eux, ils bondirent sous leurs ventres qu'ils ouvraient d'un coup de poignard, et la moitié des Numides avait péri quand Barca survint.

Les Mercenaires, épuisés, ne pouvaient tenir contre ses troupes. Ils reculèrent en bon ordre jusqu'à la montagne des Eaux-Chaudes. Le Suffète eut la prudence de ne pas les poursuivre. Il se porta vers les embouchures du Macar.

Tunis lui appartenait ; mais elle ne faisait plus qu'un amoncellement de décombres fumants. Les ruines descendaient par les brèches des murs, jusqu'au milieu de la plaine ; — tout au fond, entre les bords du golfe, les cadavres des éléphants, poussés par la brise, s'entrechoquaient, comme un archipel de rochers noirs flottant sur l'eau.

Narr'Havas, pour soutenir cette guerre, avait épuisé ses forêts, pris les jeunes et les vieux, les mâles et les femelles, et la force militaire de son royaume ne s'en releva pas. Le peuple, qui les avait vus de loin périr, en fut désolé ; des hommes se lamentaient dans les rues en les appelant par leurs noms, comme des amis défunts :

— " Ah ! l'invincible ! la Victoire ! le Foudroyant ! l'Hirondelle ! " Le premier jour même, on en parla plus que des citoyens morts. Mais le lendemain on aperçut les tentes des Mercenaires sur la montagne des Eaux-Chaudes. Alors le désespoir fut si profond, que beaucoup de gens, des femmes surtout, se précipitèrent, la tête en bas, du haut de l'Acropole.

On ignorait les desseins d'Hamilcar. Il vivait seul, dans sa tente, n'ayant près de lui qu'un jeune garçon, et jamais personne ne mangeait avec eux, pas même Narr'Havas. Cependant, il lui témoignait des égards extraordinaires depuis la défaite d'Hannon ; mais le roi des Numides avait trop d'intérêts à devenir son fils pour ne pas s'en méfier.

Cette inertie voilait des manoeuvres habiles. Par toutes sortes d'artifices, Hamilcar séduisit les chefs des villages ; et les Mercenaires furent chassés, repoussés, traqués comme des bêtes féroces. Dès qu'ils entraient dans un bois, les arbres s'enflammaient autour d'eux ; quand ils buvaient à une source, elle était empoisonnée ; on murait les cavernes où ils se cachaient pour dormir. Les populations qui les avaient jusque-là défendus, leurs anciens complices, maintenant les poursuivaient ; ils reconnaissaient toujours dans ces bandes des armures carthaginoises.

Plusieurs étaient rongés au visage par des dartres rouges ; cela leur était venu, pensaient-ils, en touchant Hannon. D'autres s'imaginaient que c'était pour avoir mangé les poissons de Salammbô, et, loin de s'en repentir, ils rêvaient des sacrilèges encore plus abominables, afin que l'abaissement des Dieux puniques fût plus grand. Ils auraient voulu les exterminer.

Ils se traînèrent ainsi pendant trois mois le long de la côte orientale, puis derrière la montagne de Selloum et jusqu'aux premiers sables du désert. Ils cherchaient une place de refuge, n'importe laquelle. Utique et Hippo-Zaryte seules ne les avaient pas trahis ; mais Hamilcar enveloppait ces deux villes. Puis ils remontèrent dans le nord, au hasard, sans même connaître les routes. A force de misères, leur tête était troublée.

Ils n'avaient plus que le sentiment d'une exaspération qui allait en se développant ; et ils se retrouvèrent un jour dans les gorges du Cobus, encore une fois devant Carthage !

Alors les engagements se multiplièrent. La fortune se maintenait égale ; mais ils étaient, les uns et les autres, tellement excédés, qu'ils souhaitaient, au lieu de ces escarmouches, une grande bataille, pourvu qu'elle fût bien la dernière.

Mâtho avait envie d'en porter lui-même la proposition au Suffète. Un de ses Libyens se dévoua. Tous, en le voyant partir, étaient convaincus qu'il ne reviendrait pas.

Il revint le soir même.

Hamilcar acceptait leur défi. On se rencontrerait le lendemain, au soleil levant, dans la plaine de Rhadès.

Les Mercenaires voulurent savoir s'il n'avait rien dit de plus, et le Libyen ajouta :

— " Comme je restais devant lui, il m'a demandé ce que j'attendais : j'ai répondu : " Qu'on me tue ! " "

Alors il a repris : " Non, va-t'en ! ce sera pour demain avec les autres. " "

Cette générosité étonna les Barbares ; quelques-uns en furent terrifiés, et Mâtho regretta que le parlementaire n'eût pas été tué.

Il lui restait encore trois mille Africains, douze cents Grecs, quinze cents Campaniens, deux cents Ibères, quatre cents Etrusques, cinq cents Samnites, quarante Gaulois et une troupe de Naffur, bandits nomades rencontrés dans la région-des-dattes, en tout, sept mille deux cent dix- neuf soldats, mais pas une syntagme complète. Ils avaient bouché les trous de leurs cuirasses avec des omoplates de quadrupèdes et remplacé leurs cothurnes d'airain par des sandales en chiffons. Des plaques de cuivre ou de fer alourdisaient leurs vêtements ; leurs cottes de mailles pendaient en guenilles autour d'eux et les balafres apparaissaient, comme des fils de pourpre, entre les poils de leurs bras et de leurs visages.

Les colères de leurs compagnons morts leur revenaient à l'âme et multipliaient leur vigueur ; ils sentaient confusément qu'ils étaient les desservants d'un dieu épandu dans les coeurs d'opprimés, et comme les pontifes de la vengeance universelle ! Puis la douleur d'une injustice exorbitante les enrageait et surtout la vue de Carthage à l'horizon. Ils firent le serment de combattre les uns pour les autres jusqu'à la mort.

On tua les bêtes de somme et l'on mangea le plus possible, afin de se donner des forces ; ensuite ils dormirent. Quelques-uns prièrent, tournés vers des constellations différentes.

Les Carthaginois arrivèrent dans la plaine avant eux. Ils frottèrent le bord des boucliers avec de l'huile pour faciliter le glissement des flèches ; les fantassins, qui portaient de longues chevelures, se les coupèrent sur le front, par prudence ; et Hamilcar, dès la cinquième heure, fit renverser toutes les gamelles, sachant qu'il est désavantageux de combattre l'estomac trop plein. Son armée montait à quatorze mille hommes, le double environ de l'armée barbare. Jamais il n'avait éprouvé, cependant, une pareille inquiétude ; s'il succombait, c'était l'anéantissement de la république et il périrait crucifié ; s'il triomphait au contraire, par les Pyrénées, les Gaules et les Alpes il gagnerait l'Italie, et l'empire des Barca deviendrait éternel. Vingt fois pendant la nuit il se releva pour surveiller tout, lui-même, jusque dans les détails les plus minimes. Quant aux Carthaginois, ils étaient exaspérés par leur longue épouvante.

Narr'Havas doutait de la fidélité de ses Numides. D'ailleurs les Barbares pouvaient les vaincre. Une faiblesse étrange l'avait pris ; à chaque moment, il buvait de larges coupes d'eau.

Mais un homme qu'il ne connaissait pas ouvrit sa tente, et déposa par terre une couronne de sel gemme, ornée de dessins hiératiques faits avec du soufre et des losanges de nacre ; on envoyait quelquefois au fiancé sa couronne de mariage : c'était une preuve d'amour, une sorte d'invitation.

Cependant la fille d'Hamilcar n'avait point de tendresse pour Narr'Havas.

Le souvenir de Mâtho la gênait d'une façon intolérable ; il lui semblait que la mort de cet homme débarrasserait sa pensée, comme pour se guérir de la blessure des vipères, on les écrase sur la plaie. Le roi des Numides était dans sa dépendance ; il attendait impatiemment les noces, et comme elles devaient suivre la victoire, Salammbô lui faisait ce présent afin d'exciter son courage. Alors ses angoisses disparurent, et il ne songea plus qu'au bonheur de posséder une femme si belle.

La même vision avait assailli Mâtho ; mais il la rejeta tout de suite, et son amour, qu'il refoulait, se répandit sur ses compagnons d'armes. Il les chérissait comme des portions de sa propre personne, de sa haine, — et il se sentait l'esprit plus haut, les bras plus forts ; tout ce qu'il fallait exécuter lui apparut nettement. Si parfois des soupirs lui échappaient, c'est qu'il pensait à Spendius.

Il rangea les Barbares sur six rangs égaux. Au milieu, il établit les Etrusques, tous attachés par une chaîne de bronze, les hommes de trait se tenaient par-derrière, et sur deux ailes il distribua des Naffur, montés sur des chameaux à poils ras, couverts de plumes d'autruche.

Le Suffète disposa les Carthaginois dans un ordre pareil. En dehors de l'infanterie, près des vélites, il plaça les Clinabares, au-delà les Numides ; quand le jour parut, ils étaient les uns et les autres ainsi alignés face à face. Tous, de loin, se contemplaient avec leurs grands yeux farouches. Il y eut d'abord une hésitation. Enfin les deux armées s'ébranlèrent.

Les Barbares s'avançaient lentement, pour ne point s'essouffler, en battant la terre avec leurs pieds ; le centre de l'armée punique formait une courbe convexe. Puis un choc terrible éclata, pareil au craquement de deux flottes qui s'abordent. Le premier rang des Barbares s'était vite entrouvert, et les gens de trait, cachés derrière les autres, lançaient leurs balles, leurs flèches, leurs javelots. Cependant, la courbe des Carthaginois peu à peu s'aplatissait, elle devint toute droite, puis s'infléchit ; alors les deux sections des vélites se rapprochèrent parallèlement, comme les branches d'un compas qui se referme. Les Barbares, acharnés contre la phalange, entraient dans sa crevasse ; ils se perdaient. Mâtho les arrêta, — et tandis que les ailes carthagoises continuaient à s'avancer, il fit écouler en dehors les trois rangs intérieurs de sa ligne ; bientôt ils débordèrent ses flancs, et son armée apparut sur une triple longueur.

Mais les Barbares placés aux deux bouts se trouvaient les plus faibles, ceux de la gauche surtout, qui avaient épuisé leurs carquois, et la troupe des vélites, enfin arrivée contre eux, les entamait largement.

Mâtho les tira en arrière. Sa droite contenait des Campaniens armés de haches ; il la poussa sur la gauche carthaginoise ; le centre attaquait l'ennemi et ceux de l'autre extrémité, hors de péril, tenaient les vélites en respect.

Alors Hamilcar divisa ses cavaliers par escadrons, mit entre eux des hoplites, et il les lâcha sur les Mercenaires.

Ces masses en forme de cône présentaient un front de chevaux, et leurs parois plus larges se hérissaient toutes remplies de lances. Il était impossible aux Barbares de résister ; seuls, les fantassins grecs avaient des armures d'airain ; tous les autres, des coutelas au bout d'une perche, des faux prises dans les métairies, des glaives fabriqués avec la jante d'une roue ; les lames trop molles se tordaient en frappant, et pendant qu'ils étaient à les redresser sous leurs talons, les Carthaginois, de droite et de gauche, les massacraient commodément.

Mais les Etrusques, rivés à leur chaîne, ne bougeaient pas ; ceux qui étaient morts, ne pouvant tomber, faisaient obstacle avec leurs cadavres ; et cette grosse ligne de bronze tour à tour s'écartait et se resserrait, souple comme un serpent, inébranlable comme un mur. Les Barbares venaient se reformer derrière elle, haletaient une minute, — puis ils repartaient, avec les tronçons de leurs armes à la main.

Beaucoup déjà n'en avaient plus, et ils sautaient sur les Carthaginois qu'ils mordaient au visage, comme des chiens. Les Gaulois, par orgueil, se dépouillèrent de leurs sayons ; ils montraient de loin leurs grands corps tout blancs ; pour épouvanter l'ennemi, ils élargissaient leurs blessures. Au milieu des syntagmes puniques on n'entendait plus la voix du crieur annonçant les ordres ; les étendards au-dessus de la poussière répétaient leurs signaux, et chacun allait, emporté dans l'oscillation de la grande masse qui l'entourait.

Hamilcar commanda aux Numides d'avancer. Mais les Naffur se précipitèrent à leur rencontre.

Habillés de vastes robes noires, avec une houppe de cheveux au sommet du crâne et un bouclier en cuir de rhinocéros, ils manoeuvraient un fer sans manche retenu par une corde ; et leurs chameaux, tout hérissés de plumes, poussaient de longs gloussements rauques. Les lames tombaient à des places précises, puis remontaient d'un coup sec, avec un membre après elles. Les bêtes furieuses galopaient à travers les syntagmes. Quelques-unes, dont les jambes étaient rompues, allaient en sautillant, comme des autruches blessées.

L'infanterie punique tout entière revint sur les Barbares ; elle les coupa. Leurs manipules tournoyaient, espacées les unes des autres. Les armes des Carthaginois plus brillantes les encerclaient comme des couronnes d'or ; un fourmillement s'agitait au milieu, et le soleil, frappant dessus, mettait aux pointes des glaives des lueurs blanches qui voltigeaient. Cependant, des files de Clinabares restaient étendues sur la plaine ; des Mercenaires arrachaient leurs armures, s'en revêtaient, puis ils retournaient au combat. Les Carthaginois, trompés, plusieurs fois s'engagèrent au milieu d'eux. Une hébétude les immobilisait, ou bien ils refluaient, et de triomphantes clameurs s'élevant au loin avaient l'air de les pousser comme des épaves dans une tempête. Hamilcar se désespérait ; tout allait périr sous le génie de Mâtho et l'invincible courage des Mercenaires !

Mais un large bruit de tambourins éclata dans l'horizon. C'était une foule, des vieillards, des malades, des enfants de quinze ans et même des femmes qui, ne résistant plus à leur angoisse, étaient partis de Carthage, et, pour se mettre sous la protection d'une chose formidable, ils avaient pris, chez Hamilcar, le seul éléphant que possédait maintenant la République, celui dont la trompe était coupée.

Alors il sembla aux Carthaginois que la Patrie, abandonnant ses murailles, venait leur commander de mourir pour elle. Un redoublement de fureur les saisit, et les Numides entraînèrent tous les autres.

Les Barbares, au milieu de la plaine, s'étaient adossés contre un monticule. Ils n'avaient aucune chance de vaincre, pas même de survivre ; mais c'étaient les meilleurs, les plus intrépides et les plus forts.

Les gens de Carthage se mirent à envoyer, par-dessus les Numides, des broches, des lardoires, des marteaux ; ceux dont les consuls avaient eu peur mouraient sous des bâtons lancés par des femmes ; la populace punique exterminait les Mercenaires.

Ils s'étaient réfugiés sur le haut de la colline. Leur cercle, à chaque brèche nouvelle, se refermait ; deux fois il descendit, une secousse le repoussait aussitôt ; et les Carthaginois, pêle-mêle, étendaient les bras ; ils allongeaient leurs piques entre les jambes de leurs compagnons et fouillaient, au hasard, devant eux. Ils glissaient dans le sang ; la pente du terrain trop rapide faisait rouler en bas les cadavres. L'éléphant qui tâchait de gravir le monticule en avait jusqu'au ventre ; et sa trompe écourtée, large du bout, de temps à autre se levait, comme une énorme sangsue.

Puis tous s'arrêtèrent. Les Carthaginois, en grinçant des dents, contemplaient le haut de la colline où les Barbares se tenaient debout.

Enfin, ils s'élancèrent brusquement, et la mêlée recommença. Souvent les Mercenaires les laissaient approcher en leur criant qu'ils voulaient se rendre ; puis avec un ricanement effroyable, d'un coup, ils se tuaient, et à mesure que les morts tombaient, les autres pour se défendre montaient dessus. C'était comme une pyramide, qui peu à peu grandissait.

Bientôt ils ne furent que cinquante, puis que vingt, que trois et que deux seulement, un Samnite armé d'une hache, et Mâtho qui avait encore son épée.

Le Samnite, courbé sur ses jarrets, poussait alternativement sa hache de droite et de gauche, en avertissant Mâtho des coups qu'on lui portait. " Maître, par-ci ! par-là ! baisse-toi ! "

Mâtho avait perdu ses épaulières, son casque, sa cuirasse : il était complètement nu, — plus livide que les morts, les cheveux tout droits, avec deux plaques d'écume au coin des lèvres, — et son épée tournoyait si rapidement, qu'elle faisait une auréole autour de lui. Une pierre la brisa près de la garde ; le Samnite était tué et le flot des Carthaginois se resserrait, ils le touchaient. Alors il leva vers le ciel ses deux mains vides, puis il ferma les yeux, — et ouvrant les bras, comme un homme du haut d'un promontoire qui se jette à la mer, il se lança dans les piques.

Elles s'écartèrent devant lui. Plusieurs fois il courut contre les Carthaginois. Mais toujours ils reculaient, en détournant leurs armes.

Son pied heurta un glaive. Mâtho voulut le saisir. Il se sentit lié par les poings et les genoux, et il tomba.

C'était Narr'Havas qui le suivait depuis quelque temps, pas à pas, avec un de ces larges filets à prendre les bêtes farouches, et profitant du moment qu'il se baissait, il l'en avait enveloppé.

Puis on l'attacha sur l'éléphant, les quatre membres en croix ; et tous ceux qui n'étaient pas blessés, l'escortant, se précipitèrent à grand tumulte vers Carthage.

La nouvelle de la victoire y était parvenue, chose inexplicable, dès la troisième heure de la nuit ; la clepsydre de Khamon avait versé la cinquième comme ils arrivaient à Malqua ; alors Mâtho ouvrit les yeux. Il y avait tant de lumières sur les maisons que la ville paraissait toute en flammes.

Une immense clameur venait à lui, vaguement, et, couché sur le dos, il regardait les étoiles.

Puis une porte se referma, et des ténèbres l'enveloppèrent.

Le lendemain, à la même heure, le dernier des hommes restés dans le défilé de la Hache expirait.

Le jour que leurs compagnons étaient partis, les Zuaèces qui s'en retournaient avaient fait ébouler les roches, et ils les avaient nourris quelque temps.

Les Barbares s'attendaient toujours à voir paraître Mâtho, — et ils ne voulaient point quitter la montagne par découragement, par langueur, par cette obstination des malades qui se refusent à changer de place ; enfin, les provisions épuisées, les Zuaèces s'en allèrent. On savait qu'ils n'étaient plus que treize cents à peine, et l'on n'eut pas besoin, pour en finir, d'employer des soldats.

Les bêtes féroces, les lions surtout, depuis trois ans que la guerre durait, s'étaient multipliés. Narr'Havas avait fait une grande battue, puis courant sur eux, après avoir attaché des chèvres de distance en distance, il les avait poussés vers le défilé de la Hache ; — et tous maintenant y vivaient, quand arriva l'homme envoyé par les Anciens pour savoir ce qui restait des Barbares.

Sur l'étendue de la plaine, des lions et des cadavres étaient couchés, et les morts se confondaient avec des vêtements et des armures. A presque tous le visage ou bien un bras manquait ; quelques-uns paraissaient intacts encore ; d'autres étaient desséchés complètement et des crânes poudreux emplissaient des casques ; des pieds qui n'avaient plus de chair sortaient tout droit des cnémides, des squelettes gardaient leurs manteaux ; des ossements, nettoyés par le soleil, faisaient des taches luisantes au milieu du sable.

Les lions reposaient, la poitrine contre le sol et les deux pattes allongées, tout en clignant leurs paupières sous l'éclat du jour, exagéré par la réverbération des roches blanches. D'autres, assis sur leur croupe, regardaient fixement devant eux ; ou bien, à demi perdus dans leurs grosses crinières, ils dormaient roulés en boule, et tous avaient l'air repus, las, ennuyés. Ils étaient immobiles comme la montagne et comme les morts. La nuit descendait ; de larges bandes rouges rayaient le ciel à l'Occident.

Dans un de ces amas qui bosselaient irrégulièrement la plaine, quelque chose de plus vague qu'un spectre se leva. Alors un des lions se mit à marcher, découpant avec sa forme monstrueuse une ombre noire sur le fond du ciel pourpre ; — quand il fut tout près de l'homme, il le renversa, d'un seul coup de patte.

Puis étalé dessus à plat ventre, du bout de ses crocs, lentement, il étirait les entrailles.

Ensuite il ouvrit sa gueule toute grande, et durant quelques minutes il poussa un long rugissement, que les échos de la montagne répétèrent, et qui se perdit enfin dans la solitude.

Tout à coup, de petits graviers roulèrent d'en haut. On entendit un frôlement de pas rapides, — et du côté de la herse, du côté de la gorge, des museaux pointus, des oreilles droites parurent ; des prunelles fauves brillaient. C'étaient les chacals arrivant pour manger les restes.

Le Carthaginois, qui regardait penché au haut du précipice, s'en retourna.

Chapitre 15 MATHO

Carthage était en joie, — une joie profonde, universelle, démesurée, frénétique ; on avait bouché les trous des ruines, repeint les statues des Dieux, des branches de myrte parsemaient les rues, au coin des carrefours, l'encens fumait, et la multitude sur les terrasses faisait avec ses vêtements bigarrés comme des tas de fleurs qui s'épanouissaient dans l'air.

Le continuel glapisement des voix était dominé par le cri des porteurs d'eau arrosant les dalles ; des esclaves d'Hamilcar offraient, en son nom, de l'orge grillée et des morceaux de viande crue ; on s'abordait ; on s'embrassait en pleurant ; les villes tyriennes étaient prises, les Nomades dispersés, tous les Barbares anéantis. L'Acropole disparaissait sous des velariums de couleur ; les éperons des trirèmes, alignés en dehors du môle, resplendissaient comme une digue de diamants ; partout on sentait l'ordre rétabli, une existence nouvelle qui recommençait, un vaste bonheur épandu : c'était le jour du mariage de Salammbô avec le roi des Numides.

Sur la terrasse du temple de Khamon, de gigantesques orfèvreries chargeaient trois longues tables où allaient s'asseoir les Prêtres, les Anciens et les Riches, et il y en avait une quatrième plus haute, pour Hamilcar, pour Narr'Havas et pour elle ; car Salammbô par la restitution du voile ayant sauvé la Patrie, le peuple faisait de ses noces une réjouissance nationale, et en bas, sur la place, il attendait qu'elle parût.

Mais un autre désir, plus âcre, irritait son impatience : la mort de Mâtho était promise pour la cérémonie.

On avait proposé d'abord de l'écorcher vif, de lui couler du plomb dans les entrailles, de le faire mourir de faim ; on l'attacherait contre un arbre, et un singe, derrière lui, le frapperait sur la tête avec une pierre ; il avait offensé Tanit, les Cynocéphales de Tanit la vengeraient. D'autres étaient d'avis qu'on le promenât sur un dromadaire, après lui avoir passé en plusieurs endroits du corps des mèches de lin trempées d'huile ; — et ils se plaisaient à l'idée du grand animal vagabondant par les rues avec cet homme qui se tordrait sous les feux comme un candélabre agité par le vent.

Mais quels citoyens seraient chargés de son supplice et pourquoi en frustrer les autres ? On aurait voulu un genre de mort où la ville entière participât, et que toutes les mains, toutes les armes, toutes les choses carthaginoises, et jusqu'aux dalles des rues et aux flots du golfe pussent le déchirer, l'écraser, l'anéantir. Donc les Anciens décidèrent qu'il irait de sa prison à la place de Khamon, sans aucune escorte, les bras attachés dans le dos ; et il était défendu de le frapper au coeur, pour le faire vivre plus longtemps, de lui crever les yeux, afin qu'il pût voir jusqu'au bout sa torture, de rien lancer contre sa personne et de porter sur elle plus de trois doigts d'un seul coup.

Bien qu'il ne dût paraître qu'à la fin du jour, quelquefois on croyait l'apercevoir, et la foule se précipitait vers l'Acropole, les rues se vidaient, puis elle revenait avec un long murmure. Des gens, depuis la veille, se tenaient debout à la même place, et de loin ils s'interpellaient en se montrant leurs ongles, qu'ils avaient laissés croître pour les enfoncer mieux dans sa chair. D'autres se promenaient agités ; quelques-uns étaient pâles comme s'ils avaient attendu leur propre exécution.

Tout à coup, derrière les Mappales, de hauts éventails de plumes se levèrent au-dessus des têtes. C'était Salammbô qui sortait de son palais ; un soupir d'allègement s'exhala.

Mais le cortège fut longtemps à venir ; il marchait pas à pas.

D'abord défilèrent les prêtres des Patæques, puis ceux Eschmoûn, ceux de Melkartb et tous les autres collèges successivement, avec les mêmes insignes et dans le même ordre qu'ils avaient observé lors du sacrifice. Les pontifes de Moloch passèrent le front baissé, et la multitude, par une espèce de remords, s'écartait d'eux. Mais les prêtres de la Rabbetna s'avançaient d'un pas fier, avec des lyres à la main ; les prêtresses les suivaient dans des robes transparentes de couleur jaune ou noire, en poussant des cris d'oiseau, en se tordant comme des vipères ; ou bien au son des flûtes, elles tournaient pour imiter la danse des étoiles, et leurs vêtements légers envoyaient dans les rues des bouffées de senteurs molles. On applaudissait parmi ces femmes les Kedeschim aux paupières peintes, symbolisant l'hermaphrodisme de la Divinité, et parfumés et vêtus comme elles, ils leur ressemblaient malgré leurs seins plats et leurs hanches plus étroites. D'ailleurs le principe femelle, ce jour- là, dominait, confondait tout : une lasciveté mystique circulait dans l'air pesant ; déjà les flambeaux s'allumaient au fond des bois sacrés ; il devait y avoir pendant la nuit une grande prostitution ; trois vaisseaux avaient amené de la Sicile des courtisanes et il en était venu du désert.

Les collèges, à mesure qu'ils arrivaient, se rangeaient dans les cours du temple, sur les galeries extérieures et le long des doubles escaliers qui montaient contre les murailles, en se rapprochant par le haut. Des files de robes blanches apparaissaient entre les colonnades, et l'architecture se peuplait de statues de pierre.

Puis survinrent les maîtres des finances, les gouverneurs des provinces et tous les Riches. Il se fit en bas un large tumulte. Des rues avoisinantes la foule se dégorgeait ; des hiérodoules la repoussaient à coups de bâton ; et au milieu des Anciens, couronnés de tiaras d'or, sur une litière que surmontait un dais de pourpre, on aperçut Salammhô.

Alors s'éleva un immense cri ; les cymbales et les crotales sonnèrent plus fort, les tambourins tonnaient et le grand dais de pourpre s'enfonça entre les deux pylônes.

Il reparut au premier étage. Salammhô marchait dessous, lentement ; puis elle traversa la terrasse pour aller s'asseoir au fond, sur une espèce de trône taillé dans une carapace de tortue. On lui avança sous les pieds un escabeau d'ivoire à trois marches : au bord de la première, deux enfants nègres se tenaient à genoux, et quelquefois elle appuyait sur leur tête ses deux bras, chargés d'anneaux trop lourds.

Des chevilles aux hanches, elle était prise dans un réseau de mailles étroites imitant les écailles d'un poisson et qui luisaient comme de la nacre : une zone toute bleue serrant sa taille laissait voir ses deux seins, par deux échancrures en forme de croissant. Des pendeloques d'escarboucles en cachaient les pointes. Elle avait une coiffure faite avec des plumes de paon étoilées de pierreries ; un large manteau, blanc comme de la neige, retombait derrière elle, et les coudes au corps, les genoux serrés, avec des cercles de diamants au haut des bras, elle restait toute droite, dans une attitude hiératique.

Sur deux sièges plus bas étaient son père et son époux. Narr'Havas, habillé d'une simarre blonde, portait sa couronne de sel gemme d'où s'échappaient deux tresses de cheveux, tordues comme des cornes d'Ammon ; et Hamilcar, en tunique violette brochée de pampres d'or, gardait à son flanc un glaive de bataille.

Dans l'espace que les tables enfermaient, le python du temple d'Eschmoûn, couché par terre, entre des flaques d'huile rose, décrivait en se mordant la queue un grand cercle noir. Il y avait au milieu du cercle une colonne de cuivre supportant un oeuf de cristal ; et, comme le soleil frappait dessus, des rayons de tous les côtés en partaient.

Derrière Salammbô se développaient les prêtres de Tanit en robe de lin ; les Anciens, à sa droite, formaient, avec leurs tiares, une grande ligne d'or, et, de l'autre côté, les Riches, avec leurs sceptres d'émeraude, une grande ligne verte, — tandis que, tout au fond, où étaient rangés les prêtres de Moloch, on aurait dit, à cause de leurs manteaux, une muraille de pourpre. Les autres collèges occupaient les terrasses inférieures. La multitude encombrait les rues. Elle remontait sur les maisons et allait par longues files jusqu'au haut de l'Acropole. Ayant ainsi le peuple à ses pieds, le firmament sur sa tête, et autour d'elle l'immensité de la mer, le golfe, les montagnes et les perspectives des provinces, Salammbô resplendissante se confondait avec Tanit et semblait le génie même de Carthage, son âme corporifiée.

Le festin devait durer toute la nuit, et des lampadaires à plusieurs branches étaient plantés, comme des arbres, sur les tapis de laine peinte qui enveloppaient les tables basses. De grandes buires d'électrum, des amphores de verre bleu, des cuillères d'écaille et des petits pains ronds se pressaient dans la double série des assiettes à bordures de perles ; des grappes de raisin avec leurs feuilles étaient enroulées comme des thyrses à des ceps d'ivoire ; des blocs de neige se fondaient sur des plateaux d'ébène, et des limons, des grenades, des courges et des pastèques faisaient des monticules sous les hautes argenteries ; des sangliers, la gueule ouverte, se vautraient dans la poussière des épices ; des lièvres, couverts de leurs poils, paraissaient bondir entre les fleurs ; des viandes composées emplissaient des coquilles ; les pâtisseries avaient des formes symboliques ; quand on retirait les cloches des plats, il s'envolait des colombes.

Cependant les esclaves, la tunique retroussée, circulaient sur la pointe des orteils ; de temps à autre, les lyres sonnaient un hymne, ou bien un chœur de voix s'élevait. La rumeur du peuple, continue comme le bruit de la mer, flottait vaguement autour du festin et semblait le bercer dans une harmonie plus large ; quelques-uns se rappelaient le banquet des Mercenaires ; on s'abandonnait à des rêves de bonheur ; le soleil commençait à descendre, et le croissant de la lune se levait déjà dans l'autre partie du ciel.

Mais Salammhô, comme si quelqu'un l'eût appelée, tourna la tête : le peuple, qui la regardait, suivit la direction de ses yeux.

Au sommet de l'Acropole, la porte du cachot, taillé dans le roc au pied du temple, venait de s'ouvrir ; et dans ce trou noir, un homme sur le seuil était debout.

Il en sortit courbé en deux, avec l'air effaré des bêtes fauves quand on les rend libres tout à coup.

La lumière l'éblouissait, ; il resta quelque temps immobile. Tous l'avaient reconnu et ils retenaient leur haleine.

Le corps de cette victime était pour eux une chose particulière et décorée d'une splendeur presque religieuse. Ils se penchaient pour le voir, les femmes surtout. Elles brûlaient de contempler celui qui avait fait mourir leurs enfants et leurs époux ; et du fond de leur âme, malgré elles, surgissait une infâme curiosité, le désir de le connaître complètement, envie mêlée de remords et qui se tournait en un surcroît d'exécration.

Enfin il s'avança ; alors l'étourdissement de la surprise s'évanouit. Quantité de bras se levèrent et on ne le vit plus.

L'escalier de l'Acropole avait soixante marches. Il les descendit comme s'il eût roulé dans un torrent, du haut d'une montagne ; trois fois on l'aperçut qui bondissait, puis en bas, il retomba sur les deux talons.

Ses épaules saignaient, sa poitrine haletait à larges secousses ; et il faisait pour rompre ses liens de tels efforts que ses bras croisés sur ses reins nus se gonflaient, comme des tronçons de serpent.

De l'endroit où il se trouvait, plusieurs rues partaient devant lui. Dans chacune d'elles, un triple rang de chaînes en bronze, fixées au nombril des Dieux Patæques, s'étendait d'un bout à l'autre, parallèlement : la foule était tassée contre les maisons, et, au milieu des serviteurs, des Anciens se promenaient en brandissant des lanières.

Un d'eux le poussa en avant, d'un grand coup ; Mâtho se mit à marcher.

Ils allongeaient leurs bras par-dessus les chaînes, en criant qu'on lui avait laissé le chemin trop large ; et il allait, palpé, piqué, déchiqueté par tous ces doigts ; lorsqu'il était au bout d'une rue, une autre apparaissait, plusieurs fois il se jeta de côté pour les mordre, on s'écartait bien vite, les chaînes le retenaient, et la foule éclatait de rire.

Un enfant lui déchira l'oreille ; une jeune fille, dissimulant sous sa manche la pointe d'un fuseau, lui fendit la joue ; on lui enlevait des poignées de cheveux, des lambeaux de chair ; d'autres avec des bâtons où tenaient des éponges imbibées d'immondices lui tamponnaient le visage. Du côté droit de sa gorge, un flot de sang jaillit : aussitôt le délire commença. Ce dernier des Barbares leur représentait tous les Barbares, toute l'armée ; ils se vengeaient sur lui de tous les désastres, de leurs terreurs, de leurs opprobres. La rage du peuple se développait en s'assouvissant ; les chaînes trop tendues se courbaient, allaient se rompre ; ils ne sentaient pas les coups des esclaves frappant sur eux pour les refouler ; d'autres se cramponnaient aux saillies des maisons ; toutes les ouvertures dans les murailles étaient bouchées par des têtes ; et le mal qu'ils ne pouvaient lui faire, ils le hurlaient.

C'étaient des injures atroces, immondes, avec des encouragements ironiques et des imprécations ; et comme ils n'avaient pas assez de sa douleur présente, ils lui en annonçaient d'autres plus terribles encore pour l'éternité.

Ce vaste aboiement emplissait Carthage, avec une continuité stupide. Souvent une seule syllabe, — une intonation rauque, profonde, frénétique, — était répétée durant quelques minutes par le peuple entier. De la base au sommet les murs en vibraient, et les deux parois de la rue semblaient à Mâtho venir contre lui et l'enlever du sol, comme deux bras immenses qui l'étouffaient dans l'air.

Cependant il se souvenait d'avoir, autrefois, éprouvé quelque chose de pareil. C'était la même foule sur les terrasses, les mêmes regards, la même colère ; mais alors il marchait libre, tous s'écartaient, un Dieu le recouvrait ; — et ce souvenir, peu à peu se précisant, lui apportait une tristesse écrasante. Des ombres passaient devant ses yeux ; la ville tourbillonnait dans sa tête, son sang ruisselait par une blessure de sa hanche, il se sentait mourir ; ses jarrets plièrent, et il s'affaissa tout doucement, sur les dalles.

Quelqu'un alla prendre, au péristyle du temple de Melkarth, la barre d'un trépied rougie par des charbons, et, la glissant sous la première chaîne, il l'appuya contre sa plaie. On vit la chair fumer ; les huées du peuple étouffèrent sa voix ; il était debout.

Six pas plus loin, et une troisième, une quatrième fois encore il tomba ; toujours un supplice nouveau le relevait. On lui envoyait avec des tubes des gouttelettes d'huile bouillante ; on sema sous ses pas des tessons de verre ; il continuait à marcher. Au coin de la rue de Sateb, il s'accota sous l'auvent d'une boutique, le dos contre la muraille, et n'avança plus.

Les esclaves du Conseil le frappèrent avec leurs fouets en cuir d'hippopotame, si furieusement et pendant si longtemps que les franges de leur tunique étaient trempées de sueur. Mâtho paraissait insensible ; tout à coup, il prit son élan et il se mit à courir au hasard, en faisant avec ses lèvres le bruit des gens qui grelottent par un grand froid. Il enfila la rue de Boudès, la rue de Scepo, traversa le Marché-aux-Herbes et arriva sur la place de Khamon.

Il appartenait aux prêtres, maintenant ; les esclaves venaient d'écarter la foule ; il y avait plus d'espace. Mâtho regarda autour de lui, et ses yeux rencontrèrent Salammbô.

Dès le premier pas qu'il avait fait, elle s'était levée ; puis, involontairement, à mesure qu'il se rapprochait, elle s'était avancée peu à peu jusqu'au bord de la terrasse ; et bientôt, toutes les choses extérieures s'effaçant, elle n'avait aperçu que Mâtho. Un silence s'était fait dans son âme, — un de ces abîmes où le monde entier disparaît sous la pression d'une pensée unique, d'un souvenir, d'un regard. Cet homme, qui marchait vers elle, l'attirait.

Il n'avait plus, sauf les yeux, d'apparence humaine ; c'était une longue forme complètement rouge ; ses liens rompus pendaient le long de ses cuisses, mais on ne les distinguait pas des tendons de ses poignets tout dénudés ; sa bouche restait grande ouverte ; de ses orbites sortaient deux flammes qui avaient l'air de monter jusqu'à ses cheveux ; — et le misérable marchait toujours !

Il arriva juste au pied de la terrasse. Salammbô était penchée sur la balustrade ; ces effroyables prunelles la contemplaient, et la conscience lui surgit de tout ce qu'il avait souffert pour elle. Bien qu'il agonisât, elle le revoyait dans sa tente, à genoux, lui entourant la taille de ses bras, balbutiant des paroles douces ; elle avait soif de les sentir encore, de les entendre ; : elle ne voulait pas qu'il mourût ! A ce moment-là. Mâtho eut un grand tressaillement ; elle allait crier. Il s'abattit à la renverse et ne bougea plus. Salammbô, presque évanouie, fut rapportée sur son trône par les prêtres s'empressant autour d'elle. Ils la félicitaient ; c'était son oeuvre. Tous battaient des mains et trépignaient, en hurlant son nom. Un homme s'élança sur le cadavre. Bien qu'il fût sans barbe, il avait à l'épaule le manteau des prêtres de Moloch, et à la ceinture l'espèce de couteau leur servant à dépecer les viandes sacrées et que terminait, au bout du manche, une spatule d'or. D'un seul coup il fendit la poitrine de Mâtho, puis en arracha le coeur, le posa sur la cuiller, et Schahabarim, levant son bras, l'offrit au soleil.

Le soleil s'abaissait derrière les flots ; ses rayons arrivaient comme de longues flèches sur le coeur tout rouge. L'astre s'enfonçait dans la mer à mesure que les battements diminuaient ; à la dernière palpitation, il disparut.

Alors, depuis le golfe jusqu'à la lagune et de l'isthme jusqu'au phare, dans toutes les rues, sur toutes les maisons et sur tous les temples, ce fut un seul cri ; quelquefois il s'arrêtait, puis recommençait ; les édifices en tremblaient ; Carthage était comme convulsée dans le spasme d'une joie titanique et d'un espoir sans bornes.

Narr'Havas, enivré d'orgueil, passa son bras gauche sous la taille de Salammbô, en signe de possession ; et, de la droite, prenant une patère d'or, il but au génie de Carthage.

Salammbô se leva comme son époux, avec une coupe à la main, afin de boire aussi. Elle retomba, la tête en arrière, par-dessus le dossier du trône, — blême, raidie, les lèvres ouvertes, — et ses cheveux dénoués pendaient jusqu'à terre.

Ainsi mourut la fille d'Hamilcar pour avoir touché au manteau de Tanit.

SENTIMENTAL EDUCATION

Translated by M. Walter Dunne

First published in 1869, this was Flaubert's last novel to be published during his lifetime. The novel concerns the life of Frederic Moreau, a young man living through the revolution of 1848 and the founding of the Second French Empire, and his love for an older woman. Flaubert based many of the protagonist's experiences, including the romantic events, on his own life. The writer later explained, "I want to write the moral history of the men of my generation-- or, more accurately, the history of their feelings. It's a book about love, about passion; but passion such as can exist nowadays--that is to say, inactive."

Many of the novel's characters are marked by fickleness and self-interest. For example, Frederic is originally infatuated with Madame Arnoux, but throughout the novel his love increases and decreases. He is unable to decide on a profession and instead lives on his uncle's inheritance. The novel is noted for its cynical tone, stressing Flaubert's harsh judgment of his times.

L'ÉDUCATION SENTIMENTALE

— HISTOIRE D'UN JEUNE HOMME —

PAR

GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

TOME PREMIER

PARIS

MICHEL LÉVY FRÈRES, ÉDITEURS
RUE VIVIENNE, 2 BIS, ET BOULEVARD DES FILLES-DU-CALVAIRE, 15
À LA LIBRAIRIE NOUVELLE

1870

Droits de reproduction et de traduction réservés

1869

The titlepage of an early edition

The 1962 film adaptation

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I.

A Promising Pupil.

CHAPTER II.

Damon and Pythias.

CHAPTER III.

Sentiment and Passion.

CHAPTER IV.

The Inexpressible She!

CHAPTER V.

"Love Knoweth No Laws."

CHAPTER VI.

Blighted Hopes.

CHAPTER VII.

A Change of Fortune.

CHAPTER VIII.

Frederick Entertains

CHAPTER IX.

The Friend of the Family.

CHAPTER X.

At the Races.

CHAPTER XI.

A Dinner and a Duel.

CHAPTER XII.

Little Louise Grows Up.

CHAPTER XIII.

Rosanette as a Lovely Turk.

CHAPTER XIV.

The Barricade.

CHAPTER XV.

"How Happy Could I Be With Either."

CHAPTER XVI.

Unpleasant News from Rosanette.

CHAPTER XVII.

A Strange Betrothal.

CHAPTER XVIII.

An Auction.

CHAPTER XIX.

A Bitter-Sweet Reunion.

CHAPTER XX.

"Wait Till You Come to Forty Year."

An original illustration

CHAPTER I.

A Promising Pupil.

On the 15th of September, 1840, about six o'clock in the morning, the Ville de Montereau, just on the point of starting, was sending forth great whirlwinds of smoke, in front of the Quai St. Bernard.

People came rushing on board in breathless haste. The traffic was obstructed by casks, cables, and baskets of linen. The sailors answered nobody. People jostled one another. Between the two paddle-boxes was piled up a heap of parcels; and the uproar was drowned in the loud hissing of the steam, which, making its way through the plates of sheet-iron, enveloped everything in a white cloud, while the bell at the prow kept ringing continuously.

At last, the vessel set out; and the two banks of the river, stocked with warehouses, timber-yards, and manufactories, opened out like two huge ribbons being unrolled.

A young man of eighteen, with long hair, holding an album under his arm, remained near the helm without moving. Through the haze he surveyed steeples, buildings of which he did not know the names; then, with a parting glance, he took in the Île St. Louis, the Cité, Notre Dame; and presently, as Paris disappeared from his view, he heaved a deep sigh.

Frederick Moreau, having just taken his Bachelor's degree, was returning home to Nogent-sur-Seine, where he would have to lead a languishing existence for two months, before going back to begin his legal studies. His mother had sent him, with enough to cover his expenses, to Havre to see an uncle, from whom she had expectations of his receiving an inheritance. He had returned from that place only yesterday; and he indemnified himself for not having the opportunity of spending a little time in the capital by taking the longest possible route to reach his own part of the country.

The hubbub had subsided. The passengers had all taken their places. Some of them stood warming themselves around the machinery, and the chimney spat forth with a slow, rhythmic rattle its plume of black smoke. Little drops of dew trickled over the copper plates; the deck quivered with the vibration from within; and the two paddle-wheels, rapidly turning round, lashed the water. The edges of the river were covered with sand. The vessel swept past rafts of wood which began to oscillate under the rippling of the waves, or a boat without sails in which a man sat fishing. Then the wandering haze cleared off; the sun appeared; the hill which ran along the course of the Seine to the right subsided by degrees, and another rose nearer on the opposite bank.

It was crowned with trees, which surrounded low-built houses, covered with roofs in the Italian style. They had sloping gardens divided by fresh walls, iron railings, grass-plots, hot-houses, and vases of geraniums, laid out regularly on the terraces where one could lean forward on one's elbow. More than one spectator longed, on beholding those attractive residences which looked so peaceful, to be the owner of one of them, and to dwell there till the end of his days with a good billiard-table, a sailing-boat, and a woman or some other object to dream about. The agreeable novelty of a journey by water made such outbursts natural. Already the wags on board were beginning their jokes. Many began to sing. Gaiety prevailed, and glasses of brandy were poured out.

Frederick was thinking about the apartment which he would occupy over there, on the plan of a drama, on subjects for pictures, on future passions. He found that the happiness merited by the excellence of his soul was slow in arriving. He declaimed some melancholy verses. He walked with rapid step along the deck. He went on till he reached the end at which the bell was; and, in the centre of a group of passengers and sailors, he saw a gentleman talking soft nothings to a country-woman, while fingering the gold cross which she wore over her breast. He was a jovial blade of forty with frizzled hair. His robust form was encased in a jacket of black velvet, two emeralds sparkled in his cambric shirt, and his wide, white trousers fell over odd-looking red boots of Russian leather set off with blue designs.

The presence of Frederick did not discompose him. He turned round and glanced several times at the young man with winks of enquiry. He next offered cigars to all who were standing around him. But getting tired, no doubt, of their society, he moved away from them and took a seat further up. Frederick followed him.

The conversation, at first, turned on the various kinds of tobacco, then quite naturally it glided into a discussion about women. The gentleman in the red boots gave the young man advice; he put forward theories, related anecdotes, referred to himself by way of illustration, and he gave utterance to all these things in a paternal tone, with the ingenuousness of entertaining depravity.

He was republican in his opinions. He had travelled; he was familiar with the inner life of theatres, restaurants, and newspapers, and knew all the theatrical celebrities, whom he called by their Christian names. Frederick told him confidentially about his projects; and the elder man took an encouraging view of them.

But he stopped talking to take a look at the funnel, then he went mumbling rapidly through a long calculation in order to ascertain "how much each stroke of the piston at so many times per minute would come to," etc., and having found the number, he spoke about the scenery, which he admired immensely. Then he gave expression to his delight at having got away from business.

Frederick regarded him with a certain amount of respect, and politely manifested a strong desire to know his name. The stranger, without a moment's hesitation, replied:

"Jacques Arnoux, proprietor of L'Art Industriel, Boulevard Montmartre."

A man-servant in a gold-laced cap came up and said:

"Would Monsieur have the kindness to go below? Mademoiselle is crying."

L'Art Industriel was a hybrid establishment, wherein the functions of an art-journal and a picture-shop were combined. Frederick had seen this title several times in the bookseller's window in his native place on big prospectuses, on which the name of Jacques Arnoux displayed itself magisterially.

The sun's rays fell perpendicularly, shedding a glittering light on the iron hoops around the masts, the plates of the barricades, and the surface of the water, which, at the prow, was cut into two furrows that spread out as far as the borders of the meadows. At each winding of the river, a screen of pale poplars presented itself with the utmost uniformity. The surrounding country at this point had an empty look. In the sky there were little white clouds which remained motionless, and the sense of weariness, which vaguely diffused itself over everything, seemed to retard the progress of the steamboat and to add to the insignificant appearance of the passengers. Putting aside a few persons of good position who were travelling first class, they were artisans or shopmen with their wives and children. As it was customary at that time to wear old clothes when travelling, they nearly all had their heads covered with shabby Greek caps or discoloured hats, thin black coats that had become quite threadbare from constant rubbing against writing-desks, or frock-coats with the casings of their buttons loose from continual service in the shop. Here and there some roll-collar waistcoat afforded a glimpse of a calico shirt stained with coffee. Pinchbeck pins were stuck into cravats that were all torn. List shoes were kept up by stitched straps. Two or three roughs who held in their hands bamboo canes with leathern loops, kept looking askance at their fellow-passengers; and fathers of families opened their eyes wide while making enquiries. People chatted either standing up or squatting over their luggage; some went to sleep in various corners of the vessel; several occupied themselves with eating. The deck was soiled with walnut shells, butt-ends of cigars, peelings of pears, and the droppings of pork-butchers' meat, which had been carried wrapped up in paper. Three cabinet-makers in blouses took their stand in front of the bottle case; a harp-player in rags was resting with his elbows on his instrument. At intervals could be heard the sound of falling coals in the furnace, a shout, or a laugh; and the captain kept walking on the bridge from one paddle-box to the other without stopping for a moment.

Frederick, to get back to his place, pushed forward the grating leading into the part of the vessel reserved for first-class passengers, and in so doing disturbed two sportsmen with their dogs.

What he then saw was like an apparition. She was seated in the middle of a bench all alone, or, at any rate, he could see no one, dazzled as he was by her eyes. At the moment when he was passing, she raised her head; his shoulders bent involuntarily; and, when he had seated himself, some distance away, on the same side, he glanced towards her.

She wore a wide straw hat with red ribbons which fluttered in the wind behind her. Her black tresses, twining around the edges of her large brows, descended very low, and seemed amorously to press the oval of her face. Her robe of light muslin spotted with green spread out in numerous folds. She was in the act of embroidering something; and her straight nose, her chin, her entire person was cut out on the background of the luminous air and the blue sky.

As she remained in the same attitude, he took several turns to the right and to the left to hide from her his change of position; then he placed himself close to her parasol which lay against the bench, and pretended to be looking at a sloop on the river.

Never before had he seen more lustrous dark skin, a more seductive figure, or more delicately shaped fingers than those through which the sunlight gleamed. He stared with amazement at her work-basket, as if it were something extraordinary. What was her name, her place of residence, her life, her past? He longed to become familiar with the furniture of her apartment, all the dresses that she had worn, the people whom she visited; and the desire of physical possession yielded to a deeper yearning, a painful curiosity that knew no bounds.

A negress, wearing a silk handkerchief tied round her head, made her appearance, holding by the hand a little girl already tall for her age. The child, whose eyes were swimming with tears, had just awakened. The lady took the little one on her knees. "Mademoiselle was not good, though she would soon be seven; her mother would not love her any more. She was too often pardoned for being naughty." And Frederick heard those things with delight, as if he had made a discovery, an acquisition.

He assumed that she must be of Andalusian descent, perhaps a Creole: had she brought this negress across with her from the West Indian Islands?

Meanwhile his attention was directed to a long shawl with violet stripes thrown behind her back over the copper support of the bench. She must have, many a time, wrapped it around her waist, as the vessel sped through the midst of the waves; drawn it over her feet, gone to sleep in it!

Frederick suddenly noticed that with the sweep of its fringes it was slipping off, and it was on the point of falling into the water when, with a bound, he secured it. She said to him:

"Thanks, Monsieur."

Their eyes met.

"Are you ready, my dear?" cried my lord Arnoux, presenting himself at the hood of the companion-ladder.

Mademoiselle Marthe ran over to him, and, clinging to his neck, she began pulling at his moustache. The strains of a harp were heard — she wanted to see the music played; and presently the performer on the instrument, led forward by the negress, entered the place reserved for saloon passengers. Arnoux recognized in him a man who had formerly been a model, and "thou'd" him, to the astonishment of the bystanders. At length the harpist, flinging back his long hair over his shoulders, stretched out his hands and began playing.

It was an Oriental ballad all about poniards, flowers, and stars. The man in rags sang it in a sharp voice; the twanging of the harp strings broke the harmony of the tune with false notes. He played more vigorously: the chords vibrated, and their metallic sounds seemed to send forth sobs, and, as it were, the plaint of a proud and vanquished love. On both sides of the river, woods extended as far as the edge of the water. A current of fresh air swept past them, and Madame Arnoux gazed vaguely into the distance. When the music stopped, she moved her eyes several times as if she were starting out of a dream.

The harpist approached them with an air of humility. While Arnoux was searching his pockets for money, Frederick stretched out towards the cap his closed hand, and then, opening it in a shamefaced manner, he deposited in it a louis d'or. It was not vanity that had prompted him to bestow this alms in her presence, but the idea of a blessing in which he thought she might share — an almost religious impulse of the heart.

Arnoux, pointing out the way, cordially invited him to go below. Frederick declared that he had just lunched; on the contrary, he was nearly dying of hunger; and he had not a single centime in his purse.

After that, it occurred to him that he had a perfect right, as well as anyone else, to remain in the cabin.

Ladies and gentlemen were seated before round tables, lunching, while an attendant went about serving out coffee. Monsieur and Madame Arnoux were in the far corner to the right. He took a seat on the long bench covered with velvet, having picked up a newspaper which he found there.

They would have to take the diligence at Montereau for Châlons. Their tour in Switzerland would last a month. Madame Arnoux blamed her husband for his weakness in dealing with his child. He whispered in her ear something agreeable, no doubt, for she smiled. Then, he got up to draw down the window curtain at her back. Under the low, white ceiling, a crude light filled the cabin. Frederick, sitting opposite to the place where she sat, could distinguish the shade of her eyelashes. She just moistened her lips with her glass and broke a little piece of crust between her fingers. The lapis-lazuli locket fastened by a little gold chain to her wrist made a ringing sound, every now and then, as it touched her plate. Those present, however, did not appear to notice it.

At intervals one could see, through the small portholes, the side of a boat taking away passengers or putting them on board. Those who sat round the tables stooped towards the openings, and called out the names of the various places they passed along the river.

Arnoux complained of the cooking. He grumbled particularly at the amount of the bill, and got it reduced. Then, he carried off the young man towards the forecastle to drink a glass of grog with him. But Frederick speedily came back again to gaze at Madame Arnoux, who had returned to the awning, beneath which she seated herself. She was reading a thin, grey-covered volume. From time to time, the corners of her mouth curled and a gleam of pleasure lighted up her forehead. He felt jealous of the inventor of those things which appeared to interest her so much. The more he contemplated her, the more he felt that there were yawning abysses between them. He was reflecting that he should very soon lose sight of her irrevocably, without having extracted a few words from her, without leaving her even a souvenir!

On the right, a plain stretched out. On the left, a strip of pasture-land rose gently to meet a hillock where one could see vineyards, groups of walnut-trees, a mill embedded in the grassy slopes, and, beyond that, little zigzag paths over the white mass of rocks that reached up towards the clouds. What bliss it would have been to ascend side by side with her, his arm around her waist, while her gown would sweep the yellow leaves, listening to her voice and gazing up into her glowing eyes! The steamboat might stop, and all they would have to do was to step out of it; and yet this thing, simple as it might be, was not less difficult than it would have been to move the sun.

A little further on, a château appeared with pointed roof and square turrets. A flower garden spread out in the foreground; and avenues ran, like dark archways, under the tall linden trees. He pictured her to himself passing along by this group of trees. At that moment a young lady and a young man showed themselves on the steps in front of the house, between the trunks of the orange trees. Then the entire scene vanished.

The little girl kept skipping playfully around the place where he had stationed himself on the deck. Frederick wished to kiss her. She hid herself behind her nurse. Her mother scolded her for not being nice to the gentleman who had rescued her own shawl. Was this an indirect overture?

"Is she going to speak to me?" he asked himself.

Time was flying. How was he to get an invitation to the Arnoux's house? And he could think of nothing better than to draw her attention to the autumnal hues, adding:

"We are close to winter — the season of balls and dinner-parties."

But Arnoux was entirely occupied with his luggage. They had arrived at the point of the river's bank facing Surville. The two bridges drew nearer. They passed a ropewalk, then a range of low-built houses, inside which there were pots of tar and splinters of wood; and brats went along the sand turning head over heels. Frederick recognised a man with a sleeved waistcoat, and called out to him:

"Make haste!"

They were at the landing-place. He looked around anxiously for Arnoux amongst the crowd of passengers, and the other came and shook hands with him, saying:

"A pleasant time, dear Monsieur!"

When he was on the quay, Frederick turned around. She was standing beside the helm. He cast a look towards her into which he tried to put his whole soul. She remained motionless, as if he had done nothing. Then, without paying the slightest attentions to the obeisances of his man-servant:

"Why didn't you bring the trap down here?"

The man made excuses.

"What a clumsy fellow you are! Give me some money."

And after that he went off to get something to eat at an inn.

A quarter of an hour later, he felt an inclination to turn into the coachyard, as if by chance. Perhaps he would see her again.

"What's the use of it?" said he to himself.

The vehicle carried him off. The two horses did not belong to his mother. She had borrowed one of M. Chambrion, the tax-collector, in order to have it yoked alongside of her own. Isidore, having set forth the day before, had taken a rest at Bray until evening, and had slept at Montereau, so that the animals, with restored vigour, were trotting briskly.

Fields on which the crops had been cut stretched out in apparently endless succession; and by degrees Villeneuve, St. Georges, Ablon, Châtillon, Corbeil, and the other places — his entire journey — came back to his recollection with such vividness that he could now recall to mind fresh details, more intimate particulars.... Under the lowest flounce of her gown, her foot showed itself encased in a dainty silk boot of maroon shade. The awning made of ticking formed a wide canopy over her head, and the little red tassels of the edging kept perpetually trembling in the breeze.

She resembled the women of whom he had read in romances. He would have added nothing to the charms of her person, and would have taken nothing from them. The universe had suddenly become enlarged. She was the luminous point towards which all things converged; and, rocked by the movement of the vehicle, with half-dosed eyelids, and his face turned towards the clouds, he abandoned himself to a dreamy, infinite joy.

At Bray, he did not wait till the horses had got their oats; he walked on along the road ahead by himself. Arnoux had, when he spoke to her, addressed her as "Marie." He now loudly repeated the name "Marie!" His voice pierced the air and was lost in the distance.

The western sky was one great mass of flaming purple. Huge stacks of wheat, rising up in the midst of the stubble fields, projected giant shadows. A dog began to bark in a farm-house in the distance. He shivered, seized with disquietude for which he could assign no cause.

When Isidore had come up with him, he jumped up into the front seat to drive. His fit of weakness was past. He had thoroughly made up his mind to effect an introduction into the house of the Arnoux, and to become intimate with them. Their house should be amusing; besides, he liked Arnoux; then, who could tell? Thereupon a wave of blood rushed up to his face; his temples throbbed; he cracked his whip, shook the reins, and set the horses going at such a pace that the old coachman repeatedly exclaimed:

"Easy! easy now, or they'll get broken-winded!"

Gradually Frederick calmed down, and he listened to what the man was saying. Monsieur's return was impatiently awaited. Mademoiselle Louise had cried in her anxiety to go in the trap to meet him.

"Who, pray, is Mademoiselle Louise?"

"Monsieur Roque's little girl, you know."

"Ah! I had forgotten," rejoined Frederick, carelessly.

Meanwhile, the two horses could keep up the pace no longer. They were both getting lame; and nine o'clock struck at St. Laurent's when he arrived at the parade in front of his mother's house.

This house of large dimensions, with a garden looking out on the open country, added to the social importance of Madame Moreau, who was the most respected lady in the district.

She came of an old family of nobles, of which the male line was now extinct. Her husband, a plebeian whom her parents forced her to marry, met his death by a sword-thrust, during her pregnancy, leaving her an estate much encumbered. She received visitors three times a week, and from time to time, gave a fashionable dinner. But the number of wax candles was calculated beforehand, and she looked forward with some impatience to the payment of her rents. These pecuniary embarrassments, concealed as if there were some guilt attached to them, imparted a certain gravity to her character. Nevertheless, she displayed no prudery, no sourness, in the practice of her peculiar virtue. Her most trifling charities seemed munificent alms. She was consulted about the selection of servants, the education of young girls, and the art of making preserves, and Monseigneur used to stay at her house on the occasion of his episcopal visitations.

Madame Moreau cherished a lofty ambition for her son. Through a sort of prudence grounded on the expectation of favours, she did not care to hear blame cast on the Government. He would need patronage at the start; then, with its aid, he might become a councillor of State, an ambassador, a minister. His triumphs at the college of Sens warranted this proud anticipation; he had carried off there the prize of honour.

When he entered the drawing-room, all present arose with a great racket; he was embraced; and the chairs, large and small, were drawn up in a big semi-circle around the fireplace. M. Gamblin immediately asked him what was his opinion about Madame Lafarge. This case, the rage of the period, did not fail to lead to a violent discussion. Madame Moreau stopped it, to the regret, however, of M. Gamblin. He deemed it serviceable to the young man in his character of a future lawyer, and, nettled at what had occurred, he left the drawing-room.

Nothing should have caused surprise on the part of a friend of Père Roque! The reference to Père Roque led them to talk of M. Dambreuse, who had just become the owner of the demesne of La Fortelle. But the tax-collector had drawn Frederick aside to know what he thought of M. Guizot's latest work. They were all anxious to get some information about his private affairs, and Madame Benoît went cleverly to work with that end in view by inquiring about his uncle. How was that worthy relative? They no longer heard from him. Had he not a distant cousin in America?

The cook announced that Monsieur's soup was served. The guests discreetly retired. Then, as soon as they were alone in the dining-room, his mother said to him in a low tone:

"Well?"

The old man had received him in a very cordial manner, but without disclosing his intentions.

Madame Moreau sighed.

"Where is she now?" was his thought.

The diligence was rolling along the road, and, wrapped up in the shawl, no doubt, she was leaning against the cloth of the coupé, her beautiful head nodding asleep.

He and his mother were just going up to their apartments when a waiter from the Swan of the Cross brought him a note.

"What is that, pray?"

"It is Deslauriers, who wants me," said he.

"Ha! your chum!" said Madame Moreau, with a contemptuous sneer. "Certainly it is a nice hour to select!"

Frederick hesitated. But friendship was stronger. He got his hat.

"At any rate, don't be long!" said his mother to him.

CHAPTER II.

Damon and Pythias.

Charles Deslauriers' father, an ex-captain in the line, who had left the service in 1818, had come back to Nogent, where he had married, and with the amount of the dowry bought up the business of a process-server, which brought him barely enough to maintain him. Embittered by a long course of unjust treatment, suffering still from the effects of old wounds, and always regretting the Emperor, he vented on those around him the fits of rage that seemed to choke him. Few children received so many whackings as his son. In spite of blows, however, the brat did not yield. His mother, when she tried to interpose, was also ill-treated. Finally, the captain planted the boy in his office, and all the day long kept him bent over his desk copying documents, with the result that his right shoulder was noticeably higher than his left.

In 1833, on the invitation of the president, the captain sold his office. His wife died of cancer. He then went to live at Dijon. After that he started in business at Troyes, where he was connected with the slave trade; and, having obtained a small scholarship for Charles, placed him at the college of Sens, where Frederick came across him. But one of the pair was twelve years old, while the other was fifteen; besides, a thousand differences of character and origin tended to keep them apart.

Frederick had in his chest of drawers all sorts of useful things — choice articles, such as a dressing-case. He liked to lie late in bed in the morning, to look at the swallows, and to read plays; and, regretting the comforts of home, he thought college life rough. To the process-server's son it seemed a pleasant life. He worked so hard that, at the end of the second year, he had got into the third form. However, owing to his poverty or to his quarrelsome disposition, he was regarded with intense dislike. But when on one occasion, in the courtyard where pupils of the middle grade took exercise, an attendant openly called him a beggar's child, he sprang at the fellow's throat, and would have killed him if three of the ushers had not intervened. Frederick, carried away by admiration, pressed him in his arms. From that day forward they became fast friends. The affection of a grandee no doubt flattered the vanity of the youth of meaner rank, and the other accepted as a piece of good fortune this devotion freely offered to him. During the holidays Charles's father allowed him to remain in the college. A translation of Plato which he opened by chance excited his enthusiasm. Then he became smitten with a love of metaphysical studies; and he made rapid progress, for he approached the subject with all the energy of youth and the self-confidence of an emancipated intellect. Jouffroy, Cousin, Laromiguière, Malebranche, and the Scotch metaphysicians — everything that could be found in the library dealing with this branch of knowledge passed through his hands. He found it necessary to steal the key in order to get the books.

Frederick's intellectual distractions were of a less serious description. He made sketches of the genealogy of Christ carved on a post in the Rue des Trois Rois, then of the gateway of a cathedral. After a course of mediæval dramas, he took up memoirs — Froissart, Comines, Pierre de l'Estoile, and Brantôme.

The impressions made on his mind by this kind of reading took such a hold of it that he felt a need within him of reproducing those pictures of bygone days. His ambition was to be, one day, the Walter Scott of France. Deslauriers dreamed of formulating a vast system of philosophy, which might have the most far-reaching applications.

They chatted over all these matters at recreation hours, in the playground, in front of the moral inscription painted under the clock. They kept whispering to each other about them in the chapel, even with St. Louis staring down at them. They dreamed about them in the dormitory, which looked out on a burial-ground. On walking-days they took up a position behind the others, and talked without stopping.

They spoke of what they would do later, when they had left college. First of all, they would set out on a long voyage with the money which Frederick would take out of his own fortune on reaching his majority. Then they would come back to Paris; they would work together, and would never part; and, as a relaxation from their labours, they would have love-affairs with princesses in boudoirs lined with satin, or dazzling orgies with famous courtesans. Their rapturous expectations were followed by doubts. After a crisis of verbose gaiety, they would often lapse into profound silence.

On summer evenings, when they had been walking for a long time over stony paths which bordered on vineyards, or on the high-road in the open country, and when they saw the wheat waving in the sunlight, while the air was filled with the fragrance of angelica, a sort of suffocating sensation took possession of them, and they stretched themselves on their backs, dizzy, intoxicated. Meanwhile the other lads, in their shirt-sleeves, were playing at base or flying kites. Then, as the usher called in the two companions from the playground, they would return, taking the path which led along by the gardens watered by brooklets; then they would pass through the boulevards overshadowed by the old city walls. The deserted streets rang under their tread. The grating flew back; they ascended the stairs; and they felt as sad as if they had had a great debauch.

The proctor maintained that they mutually cried up each other. Nevertheless, if Frederick worked his way up to the higher forms, it was through the exhortations of his friend; and, during the vacation in 1837, he brought Deslauriers to his mother's house.

Madame Moreau disliked the young man. He had a terrible appetite. He was fond of making republican speeches. To crown all, she got it into her head that he had been the means of leading her son into improper places. Their relations towards each other were watched. This only made their friendship grow stronger, and they bade one another adieu with heartfelt pangs when, in the following year, Deslauriers left the college in order to study law in Paris.

Frederick anxiously looked forward to the time when they would meet again. For two years they had not laid eyes on each other; and, when their embraces were over, they walked over the bridges to talk more at their ease.

The captain, who had now set up a billiard-room at Villenauxe, reddened with anger when his son called for an account of the expense of tutelage, and even cut down the cost of victuals to the lowest figure. But, as he intended to become a candidate at a later period for a professor's chair at the school, and as he had no money, Deslauriers accepted the post of principal clerk in an attorney's office at Troyes. By dint of sheer privation he spared four thousand francs; and, by not drawing upon the sum which came to him through his mother, he would always have enough to enable him to work freely for three years while he was waiting for a better position. It was necessary, therefore, to abandon their former project of living together in the capital, at least for the present.

Frederick hung down his head. This was the first of his dreams which had crumbled into dust.

"Be consoled," said the captain's son. "Life is long. We are young. We'll meet again. Think no more about it!"

He shook the other's hand warmly, and, to distract his attention, questioned him about his journey.

Frederick had nothing to tell. But, at the recollection of Madame Arnoux, his vexation disappeared. He did not refer to her, restrained by a feeling of bashfulness. He made up for it by expatiating on Arnoux, recalling his talk, his agreeable manner, his stories; and Deslauriers urged him strongly to cultivate this new acquaintance.

Frederick had of late written nothing. His literary opinions were changed. Passion was now above everything else in his estimation. He was equally enthusiastic about Werther, René, Franck, Lara, Lélia, and other ideal creations of less merit. Sometimes it seemed to him that music alone was capable of giving expression to his internal agitation. Then, he dreamed of symphonies; or else the surface of things seized hold of him, and he longed to paint. He had, however, composed verses. Deslauriers considered them beautiful, but did not ask him to write another poem.

As for himself, he had given up metaphysics. Social economy and the French Revolution absorbed all his attention. Just now he was a tall fellow of twenty-two, thin, with a wide mouth, and a resolute look. On this particular evening, he wore a poor-looking paletot of lasting; and his shoes were white with dust, for he had come all the way from Villenauxe on foot for the express purpose of seeing Frederick.

Isidore arrived while they were talking. Madame begged of Monsieur to return home, and, for fear of his catching cold, she had sent him his cloak.

"Wait a bit!" said Deslauriers. And they continued walking from one end to the other of the two bridges which rest on the narrow islet formed by the canal and the river.

When they were walking on the side towards Nogent, they had, exactly in front of them, a block of houses which projected a little. At the right might be seen the church, behind the mills in the wood, whose sluices had been closed up; and, at the left, the hedges covered with shrubs, along the skirts of the wood, formed a boundary for the gardens, which could scarcely be distinguished. But on the side towards Paris the high road formed a sheer descending line, and the meadows lost themselves in the distance under the vapours of the night. Silence reigned along this road, whose white track clearly showed itself through the surrounding gloom. Odours of damp leaves ascended towards them. The waterfall, where the stream had been diverted from its course a hundred paces further away, kept rumbling with that deep harmonious sound which waves make in the night time.

Deslauriers stopped, and said:

"'Tis funny to have these worthy folks sleeping so quietly!

Patience! A new '89 is in preparation. People are tired of constitutions, charters, subtleties, lies! Ah, if I had a newspaper, or a platform, how I would shake off all these things! But, in order to undertake anything whatever, money is required. What a curse it is to be a tavern-keeper's son, and to waste one's youth in quest of bread!"

He hung down his head, bit his lips, and shivered under his threadbare overcoat.

Frederick flung half his cloak over his friend's shoulder. They both wrapped themselves up in it; and, with their arms around each other's waists, they walked down the road side by side.

"How do you think I can live over there without you?" said Frederick.

The bitter tone of his friend had brought back his own sadness.

"I would have done something with a woman who loved me. What are you laughing at? Love is the feeding-ground, and, as it were, the atmosphere of genius. Extraordinary emotions produce sublime works. As for seeking after her whom I want, I give that up! Besides, if I should ever find her, she will repel me. I belong to the race of the disinherited, and I shall be extinguished with a treasure that will be of paste or of diamond — I know not which."

Somebody's shadow fell across the road, and at the same time they heard these words:

"Excuse me, gentlemen!"

The person who had uttered them was a little man attired in an ample brown frock-coat, and with a cap on his head which under its peak afforded a glimpse of a sharp nose.

"Monsieur Roque?" said Frederick.

"The very man!" returned the voice.

This resident in the locality explained his presence by stating that he had come back to inspect the wolf-traps in his garden near the water-side.

"And so you are back again in the old spot? Very good! I ascertained the fact through my little girl. Your health is good, I hope? You are not going away again?"

Then he left them, repelled, probably, by Frederick's chilling reception.

Madame Moreau, indeed, was not on visiting terms with him. Père Roque lived in peculiar relations with his servant-girl, and was held in very slight esteem, although he was the vice-president at elections, and M. Dambreuse's manager.

"The banker who resides in the Rue d'Anjou," observed Deslauriers. "Do you know what you ought to do, my fine fellow?"

Isidore once more interrupted. His orders were positive not to go back without Frederick. Madame would be getting uneasy at his absence.

"Well, well, he will go back," said Deslauriers. "He's not going to stay out all night."

And, as soon as the man-servant had disappeared:

"You ought to ask that old chap to introduce you to the Dambreses. There's nothing so useful as to be a visitor at a rich man's house. Since you have a black coat and white gloves, make use of them. You must mix in that set. You can introduce me into it later. Just think! — a man worth millions! Do all you can to make him like you, and his wife, too. Become her lover!"

Frederick uttered an exclamation by way of protest.

"Why, I can quote classical examples for you on that point, I rather think! Remember Rastignac in the Comédie Humaine. You will succeed, I have no doubt."

Frederick had so much confidence in Deslauriers that he felt his firmness giving way, and forgetting Madame Arnoux, or including her in the prediction made with regard to the other, he could not keep from smiling.

The clerk added:

"A last piece of advice: pass your examinations. It is always a good thing to have a handle to your name: and, without more ado, give up your Catholic and Satanic poets, whose philosophy is as old as the twelfth century! Your despair is silly. The very greatest men have had more difficult beginnings, as in the case of Mirabeau. Besides, our separation will not be so long. I will make that pickpocket of a father of mine disgorge. It is time for me to be going back. Farewell! Have you got a hundred sous to pay for my dinner?"

Frederick gave him ten francs, what was left of those he had got that morning from Isidore.

Meanwhile, some forty yards away from the bridges, a light shone from the garret-window of a low-built house.

Deslauriers noticed it. Then he said emphatically, as he took off his hat:

"Your pardon, Venus, Queen of Heaven, but Penury is the mother of wisdom. We have been slandered enough for that — so have mercy."

This allusion to an adventure in which they had both taken part, put them into a jovial mood. They laughed loudly as they passed through the streets.

Then, having settled his bill at the inn, Deslauriers walked back with Frederick as far as the crossway near the Hôtel-Dieu, and after a long embrace, the two friends parted.

CHAPTER III.

Sentiment and Passion.

Two months later, Frederick, having debarked one morning in the Rue Coq-Héron, immediately thought of paying his great visit.

Chance came to his aid. Père Roque had brought him a roll of papers and requested him to deliver them up himself to M. Dambreuse; and the worthy man accompanied the package with an open letter of introduction in behalf of his young fellow-countryman.

Madame Moreau appeared surprised at this proceeding. Frederick concealed the delight that it gave him.

M. Dambreuse's real name was the Count d'Ambreuse; but since 1825, gradually abandoning his title of nobility and his party, he had turned his attention to business; and with his ears open in every office, his hand in every enterprise, on the watch for every opportunity, as subtle as a Greek and as laborious as a native of Auvergne, he had amassed a fortune which might be called considerable. Furthermore, he was an officer of the Legion of Honour, a member of the General Council of the Aube, a deputy, and one of these days would be a peer of France. However, affable as he was in other respects, he wearied the Minister by his continual applications for relief, for crosses, and licences for tobacconists' shops; and in his complaints against authority he was inclined to join the Left Centre.

His wife, the pretty Madame Dambreuse, of whom mention was made in the fashion journals, presided at charitable assemblies. By wheedling the duchesses, she appeased the rancours of the aristocratic faubourg, and led the residents to believe that M. Dambreuse might yet repent and render them some services.

The young man was agitated when he called on them.

"I should have done better to take my dress-coat with me. No doubt they will give me an invitation to next week's ball. What will they say to me?"

His self-confidence returned when he reflected that M. Dambreuse was only a person of the middle class, and he sprang out of the cab briskly on the pavement of the Rue d'Anjou.

When he had pushed forward one of the two gateways he crossed the courtyard, mounted the steps in front of the house, and entered a vestibule paved with coloured marble. A straight double staircase, with red carpet, fastened with copper rods, rested against the high walls of shining stucco. At the end of the stairs there was a banana-tree, whose wide leaves fell down over the velvet of the baluster. Two bronze candelabra, with porcelain globes, hung from little chains; the atmosphere was heavy with the fumes exhaled by the vent-holes of the hot-air stoves; and all that could be heard was the ticking of a big clock fixed at the other end of the vestibule, under a suit of armour.

A bell rang; a valet made his appearance, and introduced Frederick into a little apartment, where one could observe two strong boxes, with pigeon-holes filled with pieces of pasteboard. In the centre of it, M. Dambreuse was writing at a roll-top desk.

He ran his eye over Père Roque's letter, tore open the canvas in which the papers had been wrapped, and examined them.

At some distance, he presented the appearance of being still young, owing to his slight figure. But his thin white hair, his feeble limbs, and, above all, the extraordinary pallor of his face, betrayed a shattered constitution. There was an expression of pitiless energy in his sea-green eyes, colder than eyes of glass. His cheek-bones projected, and his finger-joints were knotted.

At length, he arose and addressed to the young man a few questions with regard to persons of their acquaintance at Nogent and also with regard to his studies, and then dismissed him with a bow. Frederick went out through another lobby, and found himself at the lower end of the courtyard near the coach-house.

A blue brougham, to which a black horse was yoked, stood in front of the steps before the house. The carriage door flew open, a lady sprang in, and the vehicle, with a rumbling noise, went rolling along the gravel. Frederick had come up to the courtyard gate from the other side at the same moment. As there was not room enough to allow him to pass, he was compelled to wait. The young lady, with her head thrust forward past the carriage blind, talked to the door-keeper in a very low tone. All he could see was her back, covered with a violet mantle. However, he took a glance into the interior of the carriage, lined with blue rep, with silk lace and fringes. The lady's ample robes filled up the space within. He stole away from this little padded box with its perfume of iris, and, so to speak, its vague odour of feminine elegance. The coachman slackened the reins, the horse brushed abruptly past the starting-point, and all disappeared.

Frederick returned on foot, following the track of the boulevard.

He regretted not having been able to get a proper view of Madame Dambreuse. A little higher than the Rue Montmartre, a regular jumble of vehicles made him turn round his head, and on the opposite side, facing him, he read on a marble plate:

"JACQUES ARNOUX."

How was it that he had not thought about her sooner? It was Deslauriers' fault; and he approached the shop, which, however, he did not enter. He was waiting for her to appear.

The high, transparent plate-glass windows presented to one's gaze statuettes, drawings, engravings, catalogues and numbers of L'Art Industriel, arranged in a skilful fashion; and the amounts of the subscription were repeated on the door, which was decorated in the centre with the publisher's initials. Against the walls could be seen large pictures whose varnish had a shiny look, two chests laden with porcelain, bronze, alluring curiosities; a little staircase separated them, shut off at the top by a Wilton portière; and a lustre of old Saxe, a green carpet on the floor, with a table of marqueterie, gave to this interior the appearance rather of a drawing-room than of a shop.

Frederick pretended to be examining the drawings. After hesitating for a long time, he went in. A clerk lifted the portière, and in reply to a question, said that Monsieur would not be in the shop before five o'clock. But if the message could be conveyed — —

"No! I'll come back again," Frederick answered blandly.

The following days were spent in searching for lodgings; and he fixed upon an apartment in a second story of a furnished mansion in the Rue Hyacinthe.

With a fresh blotting-case under his arm, he set forth to attend the opening lecture of the course. Three hundred young men, bare-headed, filled an amphitheatre, where an old man in a red gown was delivering a discourse in a monotonous voice. Quill pens went scratching over the paper. In this hall he found once more the dusty odour of the school, a reading-desk of similar shape, the same wearisome monotony! For a fortnight he regularly continued his attendance at law lectures. But he left off the study of the Civil Code before getting as far as Article 3, and he gave up the Institutes at the Summa Divisio Personarum.

The pleasures that he had promised himself did not come to him; and when he had exhausted a circulating library, gone over the collections in the Louvre, and been at the theatre a great many nights in succession, he sank into the lowest depths of idleness.

His depression was increased by a thousand fresh annoyances. He found it necessary to count his linen and to bear with the door keeper, a bore with the figure of a male hospital nurse who came in the morning to make up his bed, smelling of alcohol and grunting. He did not like his apartment, which was ornamented with an alabaster time-piece. The partitions were thin; he could hear the students making punch, laughing and singing.

Tired of this solitude, he sought out one of his old schoolfellows named Baptiste Martinon; and he discovered this friend of his boyhood in a middle-class boarding-house in the Rue Saint-Jacques, cramming up legal procedure before a coal fire. A woman in a print dress sat opposite him darning his socks.

Martinon was what people call a very fine man — big, chubby, with a regular physiognomy, and blue eyes far up in his face. His father, an extensive land-owner, had destined him for the magistracy; and wishing already to present a grave exterior, he wore his beard cut like a collar round his neck.

As there was no rational foundation for Frederick's complaints, and as he could not give evidence of any misfortune, Martinon was unable in any way to understand his lamentations about existence. As for him, he went every morning to the school, after that took a walk in the Luxembourg, in the evening swallowed his half-cup of coffee; and with fifteen hundred francs a year, and the love of this workwoman, he felt perfectly happy.

"What happiness!" was Frederick's internal comment.

At the school he had formed another acquaintance, a youth of aristocratic family, who on account of his dainty manners, suggested a resemblance to a young lady.

M. de Cisy devoted himself to drawing, and loved the Gothic style. They frequently went together to admire the Sainte-Chapelle and Nôtre Dame. But the young patrician's rank and pretensions covered an intellect of the feeblest order. Everything took him by surprise. He laughed immoderately at the most trifling joke, and displayed such utter simplicity that Frederick at first took him for a wag, and finally regarded him as a booby.

The young man found it impossible, therefore, to be effusive with anyone; and he was constantly looking forward to an invitation from the Dambreuses.

On New Year's Day, he sent them visiting-cards, but received none in return.

He made his way back to the office of L'Art Industriel.

A third time he returned to it, and at last saw Arnoux carrying on an argument with five or six persons around him. He scarcely responded to the young man's bow; and Frederick was wounded by this reception. None the less he cogitated over the best means of finding his way to her side.

His first idea was to come frequently to the shop on the pretext of getting pictures at low prices. Then he conceived the notion of slipping into the letter-box of the journal a few "very strong" articles, which might lead to friendly relations. Perhaps it would be better to go straight to the mark at once, and declare his love? Acting on this impulse, he wrote a letter covering a dozen pages, full of lyric movements and apostrophes; but he tore it up, and did nothing, attempted nothing — bereft of motive power by his want of success.

Above Arnoux's shop, there were, on the first floor, three windows which were lighted up every evening. Shadows might be seen moving about behind them, especially one; this was hers; and he went very far out of his way in order to gaze at these windows and to contemplate this shadow.

A negress who crossed his path one day in the Tuileries, holding a little girl by the hand, recalled to his mind Madame Arnoux's negress. She was sure to come there, like the others; every time he passed through the Tuileries, his heart began to beat with the anticipation of meeting her. On sunny days he continued his walk as far as the end of the Champs-Élysées.

Women seated with careless ease in open carriages, and with their veils floating in the wind, filed past close to him, their horses advancing at a steady walking pace, and with an unconscious see-saw movement that made the varnished leather of the harness crackle. The vehicles became more numerous, and, slackening their motion after they had passed the circular space where the roads met, they took up the entire track. The horses' manes and the carriage lamps were close to each other. The steel stirrups, the silver curbs and the brass rings, flung, here and there, luminous points in the midst of the short breeches, the white gloves, and the furs, falling over the blazonry of the carriage doors. He felt as if he were lost in some far-off world. His eyes wandered along the rows of female heads, and certain vague resemblances brought back Madame Arnoux to his recollection. He pictured her to himself, in the midst of the others, in one of those little broughams like Madame Dambreuse's brougham.

But the sun was setting, and the cold wind raised whirling clouds of dust. The coachmen let their chins sink into their neckcloths; the wheels began to revolve more quickly; the road-metal grated; and all the equipages descended the long sloping avenue at a quick trot, touching, sweeping past one another, getting out of one another's way; then, at the Place de la Concorde, they went off in different directions. Behind the Tuileries, there was a patch of slate-coloured sky. The trees of the garden formed two enormous masses violet-hued at their summits. The gas-lamps were lighted; and the Seine, green all over, was torn into strips of silver moiré, near the piers of the bridges.

He went to get a dinner for forty-three sous in a restaurant in the Rue de la Harpe. He glanced disdainfully at the old mahogany counter, the soiled napkins, the dingy silver-plate, and the hats hanging up on the wall.

Those around him were students like himself. They talked about their professors, and about their mistresses. Much he cared about professors! Had he a mistress? To avoid being a witness of their enjoyment, he came as late as possible. The tables were all strewn with remnants of food. The two waiters, worn out with attendance on customers, lay asleep, each in a corner of his own; and an odour of cooking, of an argand lamp, and of tobacco, filled the deserted dining-room. Then he slowly toiled up the streets again. The gas lamps vibrated, casting on the mud long yellowish shafts of flickering light. Shadowy forms surmounted by umbrellas glided along the footpaths.

The pavement was slippery; the fog grew thicker, and it seemed to him that the moist gloom, wrapping him around, descended into the depths of his heart.

He was smitten with a vague remorse. He renewed his attendance at lectures. But as he was entirely ignorant of the matters which formed the subject of explanation, things of the simplest description puzzled him. He set about writing a novel entitled Sylvio, the Fisherman's Son. The scene of the story was Venice. The hero was himself, and Madame Arnoux was the heroine. She was called Antonia; and, to get possession of her, he assassinated a number of noblemen, and burned a portion of the city; after which achievements he sang a serenade under her balcony, where fluttered in the breeze the red damask curtains of the Boulevard Montmartre.

The reminiscences, far too numerous, on which he dwelt produced a disheartening effect on him; he went no further with the work, and his mental vacuity redoubled.

After this, he begged of Deslauriers to come and share his apartment. They might make arrangements to live together with the aid of his allowance of two thousand francs; anything would be better than this intolerable existence. Deslauriers could not yet leave Troyes. He urged his friend to find some means of distracting his thoughts, and, with that end in view, suggested that he should call on Sénécal.

Sénécal was a mathematical tutor, a hard-headed man with republican convictions, a future Saint-Just, according to the clerk. Frederick ascended the five flights, up which he lived, three times in succession, without getting a visit from him in return. He did not go back to the place.

He now went in for amusing himself. He attended the balls at the Opera House. These exhibitions of riotous gaiety froze him the moment he had passed the door. Besides, he was restrained by the fear of being subjected to insult on the subject of money, his notion being that a supper with a domino, entailing considerable expense, was rather a big adventure.

It seemed to him, however, that he must needs love her. Sometimes he used to wake up with his heart full of hope, dressed himself carefully as if he were going to keep an appointment, and started on interminable excursions all over Paris. Whenever a woman was walking in front of him, or coming in his direction, he would say: "Here she is!" Every time it was only a fresh disappointment. The idea of Madame Arnoux strengthened these desires. Perhaps he might find her on his way; and he conjured up dangerous complications, extraordinary perils from which he would save her, in order to get near her.

So the days slipped by with the same tiresome experiences, and enslavement to contracted habits. He turned over the pages of pamphlets under the arcades of the Odéon, went to read the Revue des Deux Mondes at the café, entered the hall of the Collège de France, and for an hour stopped to listen to a lecture on Chinese or political economy. Every week he wrote long letters to Deslauriers, dined from time to time with Martinon, and occasionally saw M. de Cisy. He hired a piano and composed German waltzes.

One evening at the theatre of the Palais-Royal, he perceived, in one of the stage-boxes, Arnoux with a woman by his side. Was it she? The screen of green taffeta, pulled over the side of the box, hid her face. At length, the curtain rose, and the screen was drawn aside. She was a tall woman of about thirty, rather faded, and, when she laughed, her thick lips uncovered a row of shining teeth. She chatted familiarly with Arnoux, giving him, from time to time, taps, with her fan, on the fingers. Then a fair-haired young girl with eyelids a little red, as if she had just been weeping, seated herself between them. Arnoux after that remained stooped over her shoulder, pouring forth a stream of talk to which she listened without replying. Frederick taxed his ingenuity to find out the social position of these women, modestly attired in gowns of sober hue with flat, turned-up collars.

At the close of the play, he made a dash for the passages. The crowd of people going out filled them up. Arnoux, just in front of him, was descending the staircase step by step, with a woman on each arm.

Suddenly a gas-burner shed its light on him. He wore a crape hat-band. She was dead, perhaps? This idea tormented Frederick's mind so much, that he hurried, next day, to the office of L'Art Industriel, and paying, without a moment's delay, for one of the engravings exposed in the window for sale, he asked the shop-assistant how was Monsieur Arnoux.

The shop-assistant replied:

"Why, quite well!"

Frederick, growing pale, added:

"And Madame?"

"Madame, also."

Frederick forgot to carry off his engraving.

The winter drew to an end. He was less melancholy in the spring time, and began to prepare for his examination. Having passed it indifferently, he started immediately afterwards for Nogent.

He refrained from going to Troyes to see his friend, in order to escape his mother's comments. Then, on his return to Paris at the end of the vacation, he left his lodgings, and took two rooms on the Quai Napoléon which he furnished. He had given up all hope of getting an invitation from the Dambreuses. His great passion for Madame Arnoux was beginning to die out.

CHAPTER IV.

The Inexpressible She!

One morning, in the month of December, while going to attend a law lecture, he thought he could observe more than ordinary animation in the Rue Saint-Jacques. The students were rushing precipitately out of the cafés, where, through the open windows, they were calling one another from one house to the other. The shop keepers in the middle of the footpath were looking about them anxiously; the window-shutters were fastened; and when he reached the Rue Soufflot, he perceived a large assemblage around the Panthéon.

Young men in groups numbering from five to a dozen walked along, arm in arm, and accosted the larger groups, which had stationed themselves here and there. At the lower end of the square, near the railings, men in blouses were holding forth, while policemen, with their three-cornered hats drawn over their ears, and their hands behind their backs, were strolling up and down beside the walls making the flags ring under the tread of their heavy boots. All wore a mysterious, wondering look; they were evidently expecting something to happen. Each held back a question which was on the edge of his lips.

Frederick found himself close to a fair-haired young man with a prepossessing face and a moustache and a tuft of beard on his chin, like a dandy of Louis XIII.'s time. He asked the stranger what was the cause of the disorder.

"I haven't the least idea," replied the other, "nor have they, for that matter! 'Tis their fashion just now! What a good joke!"

And he burst out laughing. The petitions for Reform, which had been signed at the quarters of the National Guard, together with the property-census of Humann and other events besides, had, for the past six months, led to inexplicable gatherings of riotous crowds in Paris, and so frequently had they broken out anew, that the newspapers had ceased to refer to them.

"This lacks graceful outline and colour," continued Frederick's neighbour. "I am convinced, messire, that we have degenerated. In the good epoch of Louis XI., and even in that of Benjamin Constant, there was more mutinousness amongst the students. I find them as pacific as sheep, as stupid as greenhorns, and only fit to be grocers. Gadzooks! And these are what we call the youth of the schools!"

He held his arms wide apart after the fashion of Frederick Lemaitre in Robert Macaire.

"Youth of the schools, I give you my blessing!"

After this, addressing a rag picker, who was moving a heap of oyster-shells up against the wall of a wine-merchant's house:

"Do you belong to them — the youth of the schools?"

The old man lifted up a hideous countenance in which one could trace, in the midst of a grey beard, a red nose and two dull eyes, bloodshot from drink.

"No, you appear to me rather one of those men with patibulary faces whom we see, in various groups, liberally scattering gold. Oh, scatter it, my patriarch, scatter it! Corrupt me with the treasures of Albion! Are you English? I do not reject the presents of Artaxerxes! Let us have a little chat about the union of customs!"

Frederick felt a hand laid on his shoulder. It was Martinon, looking exceedingly pale.

"Well!" said he with a big sigh, "another riot!"

He was afraid of being compromised, and uttered complaints. Men in blouses especially made him feel uneasy, suggesting a connection with secret societies.

"You mean to say there are secret societies," said the young man with the moustaches. "That is a worn-out dodge of the Government to frighten the middle-class folk!"

Martinon urged him to speak in a lower tone, for fear of the police.

"You believe still in the police, do you? As a matter of fact, how do you know, Monsieur, that I am not myself a police spy?"

And he looked at him in such a way, that Martinon, much discomposed, was, at first, unable to see the joke. The people pushed them on, and they were all three compelled to stand on the little staircase which led, by one of the passages, to the new amphitheatre.

The crowd soon broke up of its own accord. Many heads could be distinguished. They bowed towards the distinguished Professor Samuel Rondelot, who, wrapped in his big frock-coat, with his silver spectacles held up high in the air, and breathing hard from his asthma, was advancing at an easy pace, on his way to deliver his lecture. This man was one of the judicial glories of the nineteenth century, the rival of the Zachariæ and the Ruhdorffs. His new dignity of peer of France had in no way modified his external demeanour. He was known to be poor, and was treated with profound respect.

Meanwhile, at the lower end of the square, some persons cried out:

"Down with Guizot!"

"Down with Pritchard!"

"Down with the sold ones!"

"Down with Louis Philippe!"

The crowd swayed to and fro, and, pressing against the gate of the courtyard, which was shut, prevented the professor from going further. He stopped in front of the staircase. He was speedily observed on the lowest of three steps. He spoke; the loud murmurs of the throng drowned his voice. Although at another time they might love him, they hated him now, for he was the representative of authority. Every time he tried to make himself understood, the outcries recommenced. He gesticulated with great energy to induce the students to follow him. He was answered by vociferations from all sides. He shrugged his shoulders disdainfully, and plunged into the passage. Martinon profited by his situation to disappear at the same moment.

"What a coward!" said Frederick.

"He was prudent," returned the other.

There was an outburst of applause from the crowd, from whose point of view this retreat, on the part of the professor, appeared in the light of a victory. From every window, faces, lighted with curiosity, looked out. Some of those in the crowd struck up the "Marseillaise;" others proposed to go to Béranger's house.

"To Laffitte's house!"

"To Chateaubriand's house!"

"To Voltaire's house!" yelled the young man with the fair moustaches.

The policemen tried to pass around, saying in the mildest tones they could assume:

"Move on, messieurs! Move on! Take yourselves off!"

Somebody exclaimed:

"Down with the slaughterers!"

This was a form of insult usual since the troubles of the month of September. Everyone echoed it. The guardians of public order were hooted and hissed. They began to grow pale. One of them could endure it no longer, and, seeing a low-sized young man approaching too close, laughing in his teeth, pushed him back so roughly, that he tumbled over on his back some five paces away, in front of a wine-merchant's shop. All made way; but almost immediately afterwards the policeman rolled on the ground himself, felled by a blow from a species of Hercules, whose hair hung down like a bundle of tow under an oilskin cap. Having stopped for a few minutes at the corner of the Rue Saint-Jacques, he had very quickly laid down a large case, which he had been carrying, in order to make a spring at the policeman, and, holding down that functionary, punched his face unmercifully. The other policemen rushed to the rescue of their comrade. The terrible shop-assistant was so powerfully built that it took four of them at least to get the better of him. Two of them shook him, while keeping a grip on his collar; two others dragged his arms; a fifth gave him digs of the knee in the ribs; and all of them called him "brigand," "assassin," "rioter." With his breast bare, and his clothes in rags, he protested that he was innocent; he could not, in cold blood, look at a child receiving a beating.

"My name is Dussardier. I'm employed at Messieurs Valincart Brothers' lace and fancy warehouse, in the Rue de Cléry. Where's my case? I want my case!"

He kept repeating:

"Dussardier, Rue de Cléry. My case!"

However, he became quiet, and, with a stoical air, allowed himself to be led towards the guard-house in the Rue Descartes. A flood of people came rushing after him. Frederick and the young man with the moustaches walked immediately behind, full of admiration for the shopman, and indignant at the violence of power.

As they advanced, the crowd became less thick.

The policemen from time to time turned round, with threatening looks; and the rowdies, no longer having anything to do, and the spectators not having anything to look at, all drifted away by degrees. The passers-by, who met the procession, as they came along, stared at Dussardier, and in loud tones, gave vent to abusive remarks about him.

One old woman, at her own door, bawled out that he had stolen a loaf of bread from her. This unjust accusation increased the wrath of the two friends. At length, they reached the guard-house. Only about twenty persons were now left in the attenuated crowd, and the sight of the soldiers was enough to disperse them.

Frederick and his companion boldly asked to have the man who had just been imprisoned delivered up. The sentinel threatened, if they persisted, to ram them into jail too. They said they required to see the commander of the guard-house, and stated their names, and the fact that they were law-students, declaring that the prisoner was one also.

They were ushered into a room perfectly bare, in which, amid an atmosphere of smoke, four benches might be seen lining the roughly-plastered walls. At the lower end there was an open wicket. Then appeared the sturdy face of Dussardier, who, with his hair all tousled, his honest little eyes, and his broad snout, suggested to one's mind in a confused sort of way the physiognomy of a good dog.

"Don't you recognise us?" said Hussonnet.

This was the name of the young man with the moustaches.

"Why — — " stammered Dussardier.

"Don't play the fool any further," returned the other. "We know that you are, just like ourselves, a law-student."

In spite of their winks, Dussardier failed to understand. He appeared to be collecting his thoughts; then, suddenly:

"Has my case been found?"

Frederick raised his eyes, feeling much discouraged.

Hussonnet, however, said promptly:

"Ha! your case, in which you keep your notes of lectures? Yes, yes, make your mind easy about it!"

They made further pantomimic signs with redoubled energy, till Dussardier at last realised that they had come to help him; and he held his tongue, fearing that he might compromise them. Besides, he experienced a kind of shamefacedness at seeing himself raised to the social rank of student, and to an equality with those young men who had such white hands.

"Do you wish to send any message to anyone?" asked Frederick.

"No, thanks, to nobody."

"But your family?"

He lowered his head without replying; the poor fellow was a bastard. The two friends stood quite astonished at his silence.

"Have you anything to smoke?" was Frederick's next question.

He felt about, then drew forth from the depths of one of his pockets the remains of a pipe — a beautiful pipe, made of white talc with a shank of blackwood, a silver cover, and an amber mouthpiece.

For the last three years he had been engaged in completing this masterpiece. He had been careful to keep the bowl of it constantly thrust into a kind of sheath of chamois, to smoke it as slowly as possible, without ever letting it lie on any cold stone substance, and to hang it up every evening over the head of his bed. And now he shook out the fragments of it into his hand, the nails of which were covered with blood, and with his chin sunk on his chest, his pupils fixed and dilated, he contemplated this wreck of the thing that had yielded him such delight with a glance of unutterable sadness.

"Suppose we give him some cigars, eh?" said Hussonnet in a whisper, making a gesture as if he were reaching them out.

Frederick had already laid down a cigar-holder, filled, on the edge of the wicket.

"Pray take this. Good-bye! Cheer up!"

Dussardier flung himself on the two hands that were held out towards him. He pressed them frantically, his voice choked with sobs.

"What? For me! — for me!"

The two friends tore themselves away from the effusive display of gratitude which he made, and went off to lunch together at the Café Tabourey, in front of the Luxembourg.

While cutting up the beefsteak, Hussonnet informed his companion that he did work for the fashion journals, and manufactured catchwords for L'Art Industriel.

"At Jacques Arnoux's establishment?" said Frederick.

"Do you know him?"

"Yes! — no! — that is to say, I have seen him — I have met him."

He carelessly asked Hussonnet if he sometimes saw Arnoux's wife.

"From time to time," the Bohemian replied.

Frederick did not venture to follow up his enquiries. This man henceforth would fill up a large space in his life. He paid the lunch-bill without any protest on the other's part.

There was a bond of mutual sympathy between them; they gave one another their respective addresses, and Hussonnet cordially invited Frederick to accompany him to the Rue de Fleurus.

They had reached the middle of the garden, when Arnoux's clerk, holding his breath, twisted his features into a hideous grimace, and began to crow like a cock. Thereupon all the cocks in the vicinity responded with prolonged "cock-a-doodle-doo."

"It is a signal," explained Hussonnet.

They stopped close to the Théâtre Bobino, in front of a house to which they had to find their way through an alley. In the skylight of a garret, between the nasturtiums and the sweet peas, a young woman showed herself, bare-headed, in her stays, her two arms resting on the edge of the roof-gutter.

"Good-morrow, my angel! good-morrow, ducky!" said Hussonnet, sending her kisses.

He made the barrier fly open with a kick, and disappeared.

Frederick waited for him all the week. He did not venture to call at Hussonnet's residence, lest it might look as if he were in a hurry to get a lunch in return for the one he had paid for. But he sought the clerk all over the Latin Quarter. He came across him one evening, and brought him to his apartment on the Quai Napoléon.

They had a long chat, and unbosomed themselves to each other. Hussonnet yearned after the glory and the gains of the theatre. He collaborated in the writing of vaudevilles which were not accepted, "had heaps of plans," could turn a couplet; he sang out for Frederick a few of the verses he had composed. Then, noticing on one of the shelves a volume of Hugo and another of Lamartine, he broke out into sarcastic criticisms of the romantic school. These poets had neither good sense nor correctness, and, above all, were not French! He plumed himself on his knowledge of the language, and analysed the most beautiful phrases with that snarling severity, that academic taste which persons of playful disposition exhibit when they are discussing serious art.

Frederick was wounded in his predilections, and he felt a desire to cut the discussion short. Why not take the risk at once of uttering the word on which his happiness depended? He asked this literary youth whether it would be possible to get an introduction into the Arnoux's house through his agency.

The thing was declared to be quite easy, and they fixed upon the following day.

Hussonnet failed to keep the appointment, and on three subsequent occasions he did not turn up. One Saturday, about four o'clock, he made his appearance. But, taking advantage of the cab into which they had got, he drew up in front of the Théâtre Français to get a box-ticket, got down at a tailor's shop, then at a dressmaker's, and wrote notes in the door-keeper's lodge. At last they came to the Boulevard Montmartre. Frederick passed through the shop, and went up the staircase. Arnoux recognised him through the glass-partition in front of his desk, and while continuing to write he stretched out his hand and laid it on Frederick's shoulder.

Five or six persons, standing up, filled the narrow apartment, which was lighted by a single window looking out on the yard, a sofa of brown damask wool occupying the interior of an alcove between two door-curtains of similar material. Upon the chimney-piece, covered with old papers, there was a bronze Venus. Two candelabra, garnished with rose-coloured wax-tapers, supported it, one at each side. At the right near a cardboard chest of drawers, a man, seated in an armchair, was reading the newspaper, with his hat on. The walls were hidden from view beneath the array of prints and pictures, precious engravings or sketches by contemporary masters, adorned with dedications testifying the most sincere affection for Jacques Arnoux.

"You're getting on well all this time?" said he, turning round to Frederick.

And, without waiting for an answer, he asked Hussonnet in a low tone:

"What is your friend's name?" Then, raising his voice:

"Take a cigar out of the box on the cardboard stand."

The office of L'Art Industriel, situated in a central position in Paris, was a convenient place of resort, a neutral ground wherein rivalries elbowed each other familiarly. On this day might be seen there Anténor Braive, who painted portraits of kings; Jules Burrieu, who by his sketches was beginning to popularise the wars in Algeria; the caricaturist Sombary, the sculptor Vourdat, and others. And not a single one of them corresponded with the student's preconceived ideas.

Their manners were simple, their talk free and easy. The mystic Lovarias told an obscene story; and the inventor of Oriental landscape, the famous Dittmer, wore a knitted shirt under his waistcoat, and went home in the omnibus.

The first topic that came on the carpet was the case of a girl named Apollonie, formerly a model, whom Burrieu alleged that he had seen on the boulevard in a carriage. Hussonnet explained this metamorphosis through the succession of persons who had loved her.

"How well this sly dog knows the girls of Paris!" said Arnoux.

"After you, if there are any of them left, sire," replied the Bohemian, with a military salute, in imitation of the grenadier offering his flask to Napoléon.

Then they talked about some pictures in which Apollonie had sat for the female figures. They criticised their absent brethren, expressing astonishment at the sums paid for their works; and they were all complaining of not having been sufficiently remunerated themselves, when the conversation was interrupted by the entrance of a man of middle stature, who had his coat fastened by a single button, and whose eyes glittered with a rather wild expression.

"What a lot of shopkeepers you are!" said he. "God bless my soul! what does that signify? The old masters did not trouble their heads about the million — Correggio, Murillo — —"

"Add Pellerin," said Sombary.

But, without taking the slightest notice of the epigram, he went on talking with such vehemence, that Arnoux was forced to repeat twice to him:

"My wife wants you on Thursday. Don't forget!"

This remark recalled Madame Arnoux to Frederick's thoughts. No doubt, one might be able to reach her through the little room near the sofa. Arnoux had just opened the portière leading into it to get a pocket-handkerchief, and Frédéric had seen a wash-stand at the far end of the apartment.

But at this point a kind of muttering sound came from the corner of the chimney-piece; it was caused by the personage who sat in the armchair reading the newspaper. He was a man of five feet nine inches in height, with rather heavy eyelashes, a head of grey hair, and an imposing appearance; and his name was Regimbart.

"What's the matter now, citizen?" said Arnoux.

"Another fresh piece of rascality on the part of Government!"

The thing that he was referring to was the dismissal of a schoolmaster.

Pellerin again took up his parallel between Michael Angelo and Shakespeare. Dittmer was taking himself off when Arnoux pulled him back in order to put two bank notes into his hand. Thereupon Hussonnet said, considering this an opportune time:

"Couldn't you give me an advance, my dear master — — ?"

But Arnoux had resumed his seat, and was administering a severe reprimand to an old man of mean aspect, who wore a pair of blue spectacles.

"Ha! a nice fellow you are, Père Isaac! Here are three works cried down, destroyed! Everybody is laughing at me! People know what they are now! What do you want me to do with them? I'll have to send them off to California — or to the devil! Hold your tongue!"

The specialty of this old worthy consisted in attaching the signatures of the great masters at the bottom of these pictures. Arnoux refused to pay him, and dismissed him in a brutal fashion. Then, with an entire change of manner, he bowed to a gentleman of affectedly grave demeanour, who wore whiskers and displayed a white tie round his neck and the cross of the Legion of Honour over his breast.

With his elbow resting on the window-fastening, he kept talking to him for a long time in honeyed tones. At last he burst out:

"Ah! well, I am not bothered with brokers, Count."

The nobleman gave way, and Arnoux paid him down twenty-five louis. As soon as he had gone out:

"What a plague these big lords are!"

"A lot of wretches!" muttered Regimbart.

As it grew later, Arnoux was much more busily occupied. He classified articles, tore open letters, set out accounts in a row; at the sound of hammering in the warehouse he went out to look after the packing; then he went back to his ordinary work; and, while he kept his steel pen running over the paper, he indulged in sharp witticisms. He had an invitation to dine with his lawyer that evening, and was starting next day for Belgium.

The others chatted about the topics of the day — Cherubini's portrait, the hemicycle of the Fine Arts, and the next Exhibition. Pellerin railed at the Institute. Scandalous stories and serious discussions got mixed up together. The apartment with its low ceiling was so much stuffed up that one could scarcely move; and the light of the rose-coloured wax-tapers was obscured in the smoke of their cigars, like the sun's rays in a fog.

The door near the sofa flew open, and a tall, thin woman entered with abrupt movements, which made all the trinkets of her watch rattle under her black taffeta gown.

It was the woman of whom Frederick had caught a glimpse last summer at the Palais-Royal. Some of those present, addressing her by name, shook hands with her. Hussonnet had at last managed to extract from his employer the sum of fifty francs. The clock struck seven.

All rose to go.

Arnoux told Pellerin to remain, and accompanied Mademoiselle Vatnaz into the dressing-room.

Frederick could not hear what they said; they spoke in whispers. However, the woman's voice was raised:

"I have been waiting ever since the job was done, six months ago."

There was a long silence, and then Mademoiselle Vatnaz reappeared. Arnoux had again promised her something.

"Oh! oh! later, we shall see!"

"Good-bye! happy man," said she, as she was going out.

Arnoux quickly re-entered the dressing-room, rubbed some cosmetic over his moustaches, raised his braces, stretched his straps; and, while he was washing his hands:

"I would require two over the door at two hundred and fifty apiece, in Boucher's style. Is that understood?"

"Be it so," said the artist, his face reddening.

"Good! and don't forget my wife!"

Frederick accompanied Pellerin to the top of the Faubourg Poissonnière, and asked his permission to come to see him sometimes, a favour which was graciously accorded.

Pellerin read every work on æsthetics, in order to find out the true theory of the Beautiful, convinced that, when he had discovered it, he would produce masterpieces. He surrounded himself with every imaginable auxiliary — drawings, plaster-casts, models, engravings; and he kept searching about, eating his heart out. He blamed the weather, his nerves, his studio, went out into the street to find inspiration there, quivered with delight at the thought that he had caught it, then abandoned the work in which he was engaged, and dreamed of another which should be finer. Thus, tormented by the desire for glory, and wasting his days in discussions, believing in a thousand fooleries — in systems, in criticisms, in the importance of a regulation or a reform in the domain of Art — he had at fifty as yet turned out nothing save mere sketches. His robust pride prevented him from experiencing any discouragement, but he was always irritated, and in that state of exaltation, at the same time factitious and natural, which is characteristic of comedians.

On entering his studio one's attention was directed towards two large pictures, in which the first tones of colour laid on here and there made on the white canvas spots of brown, red, and blue. A network of lines in chalk stretched overhead, like stitches of thread repeated twenty times; it was impossible to understand what it meant. Pellerin explained the subject of these two compositions by pointing out with his thumb the portions that were lacking. The first was intended to represent "The Madness of Nebuchadnezzar," and the second "The Burning of Rome by Nero." Frederick admired them.

He admired academies of women with dishevelled hair, landscapes in which trunks of trees, twisted by the storm, abounded, and above all freaks of the pen, imitations from memory of Callot, Rembrandt, or Goya, of which he did not know the models. Pellerin no longer set any value on these works of his youth. He was now all in favour of the grand style; he dogmatized eloquently about Phidias and Winckelmann. The objects around him strengthened the force of his language; one saw a death's head on a prie-dieu, yataghans, a monk's habit. Frederick put it on.

When he arrived early, he surprised the artist in his wretched folding-bed, which was hidden from view by a strip of tapestry; for Pellerin went to bed late, being an assiduous frequenter of the theatres. An old woman in tatters attended on him. He dined at a cook-shop, and lived without a mistress. His acquirements, picked up in the most irregular fashion, rendered his paradoxes amusing. His hatred of the vulgar and the "bourgeois" overflowed in sarcasms, marked by a superb lyricism, and he had such religious reverence for the masters that it raised him almost to their level.

But why had he never spoken about Madame Arnoux? As for her son, at one time he called Pellerin a decent fellow, at other times a charlatan. Frederick was waiting for some disclosures on his part.

One day, while turning over one of the portfolios in the studio, he thought he could trace in the portrait of a female Bohemian some resemblance to Mademoiselle Vatnaz; and, as he felt interested in this lady, he desired to know what was her exact social position.

She had been, as far as Pellerin could ascertain, originally a schoolmistress in the provinces. She now gave lessons in Paris, and tried to write for the small journals.

According to Frederick, one would imagine from her manners with Arnoux that she was his mistress.

"Pshaw! he has others!"

Then, turning away his face, which reddened with shame as he realised the baseness of the suggestion, the young man added, with a swaggering air:

"Very likely his wife pays him back for it?"

"Not at all; she is virtuous."

Frederick again experienced a feeling of compunction, and the result was that his attendance at the office of the art journal became more marked than before.

The big letters which formed the name of Arnoux on the marble plate above the shop seemed to him quite peculiar and pregnant with significance, like some sacred writing. The wide footpath, by its descent, facilitated his approach; the door almost turned of its own accord; and the handle, smooth to the touch, gave him the sensation of friendly and, as it were, intelligent fingers clasping his. Unconsciously, he became quite as punctual as Regimbart.

Every day Regimbart seated himself in the chimney corner, in his armchair, got hold of the National, and kept possession of it, expressing his thoughts by exclamations or by shrugs of the shoulders. From time to time he would wipe his forehead with his pocket-handkerchief, rolled up in a ball, which he usually stuck in between two buttons of his green frock-coat. He had trousers with wrinkles, bluchers, and a long cravat; and his hat, with its turned-up brim, made him easily recognised, at a distance, in a crowd.

At eight o'clock in the morning he descended the heights of Montmartre, in order to imbibe white wine in the Rue Nôtre Dame des Victoires. A late breakfast, following several games of billiards, brought him on to three o'clock. He then directed his steps towards the Passage des Panoramas, where he had a glass of absinthe. After the sitting in Arnoux's shop, he entered the Bordelais smoking-divan, where he swallowed some bitters; then, in place of returning home to his wife, he preferred to dine alone in a little café in the Rue Gaillon, where he desired them to serve up to him "household dishes, natural things." Finally, he made his way to another billiard-room, and remained there till midnight, in fact, till one o'clock in the morning, up till the last moment, when, the gas being put out and the window-shutters fastened, the master of the establishment, worn out, begged of him to go.

And it was not the love of drinking that attracted Citizen Regimbart to these places, but the inveterate habit of talking politics at such resorts. With advancing age, he had lost his vivacity, and now exhibited only a silent moroseness. One would have said, judging from the gravity of his countenance, that he was turning over in his mind the affairs of the whole world. Nothing, however, came from it; and nobody, even amongst his own friends, knew him to have any occupation, although he gave himself out as being up to his eyes in business.

Arnoux appeared to have a very great esteem for him. One day he said to Frederick:

"He knows a lot, I assure you. He is an able man."

On another occasion Regimbart spread over his desk papers relating to the kaolin mines in Brittany. Arnoux referred to his own experience on the subject.

Frederick showed himself more ceremonious towards Regimbart, going so far as to invite him from time to time to take a glass of absinthe; and, although he considered him a stupid man, he often remained a full hour in his company solely because he was Jacques Arnoux's friend.

After pushing forward some contemporary masters in the early portions of their career, the picture-dealer, a man of progressive ideas, had tried, while clinging to his artistic ways, to extend his pecuniary profits. His object was to emancipate the fine arts, to get the sublime at a cheap rate. Over every industry associated with Parisian luxury he exercised an influence which proved fortunate with respect to little things, but fatal with respect to great things. With his mania for pandering to public opinion, he made clever artists swerve from their true path, corrupted the strong, exhausted the weak, and got distinction for those of mediocre talent; he set them up with the assistance of his connections and of his magazine. Tyros in painting were ambitious of seeing their works in his shop-window, and upholsterers brought specimens of furniture to his house. Frederick regarded him, at the same time, as a millionaire, as a dilettante, and as a man of action. However, he found many things that filled him with astonishment, for my lord Arnoux was rather sly in his commercial transactions.

He received from the very heart of Germany or of Italy a picture purchased in Paris for fifteen hundred francs, and, exhibiting an invoice that brought the price up to four thousand, sold it over again through complaisance for three thousand five hundred. One of his usual tricks with painters was to exact as a drink-allowance an abatement in the purchase-money of their pictures, under the pretence that he would bring out an engraving of it. He always, when selling such pictures, made a profit by the abatement; but the engraving never appeared. To those who complained that he had taken an advantage of them, he would reply by a slap on the stomach. Generous in other ways, he squandered money on cigars for his acquaintances, "thee'd" and "thou'd" persons who were unknown, displayed enthusiasm about a work or a man; and, after that, sticking to his opinion, and, regardless of consequences, spared no expense in journeys, correspondence, and advertising. He looked upon himself as very upright, and, yielding to an irresistible impulse to unbosom himself, ingenuously told his friends about certain indelicate acts of which he had been guilty. Once, in order to annoy a member of his own trade who inaugurated another art journal with a big banquet, he asked Frederick to write, under his own eyes, a little before the hour fixed for the entertainment, letters to the guests recalling the invitations.

"This impugns nobody's honour, do you understand?"

And the young man did not dare to refuse the service.

Next day, on entering with Hussonnet M. Arnoux's office, Frederick saw through the door (the one opening on the staircase) the hem of a lady's dress disappearing.

"A thousand pardons!" said Hussonnet. "If I had known that there were women — —"

"Oh! as for that one, she is my own," replied Arnoux. "She just came in to pay me a visit as she was passing."

"You don't say so!" said Frederick.

"Why, yes; she is going back home again."

The charm of the things around him was suddenly withdrawn. That which had seemed to him to be diffused vaguely through the place had now vanished — or, rather, it had never been there. He experienced an infinite amazement, and, as it were, the painful sensation of having been betrayed.

Arnoux, while rummaging about in his drawer, began to smile. Was he laughing at him? The clerk laid down a bundle of moist papers on the table.

"Ha! the placards," exclaimed the picture-dealer. "I am not ready to dine this evening."

Regimbart took up his hat.

"What, are you leaving me?"

"Seven o'clock," said Regimbart.

Frederick followed him.

At the corner of the Rue Montmartre, he turned round. He glanced towards the windows of the first floor, and he laughed internally with self-pity as he recalled to mind with what love he had so often contemplated them. Where, then, did she reside? How was he to meet her now? Once more around the object of his desire a solitude opened more immense than ever!

"Are you coming to take it?" asked Regimbart.

"To take what?"

"The absinthe."

And, yielding to his importunities, Frederick allowed himself to be led towards the Bordelais smoking-divan. Whilst his companion, leaning on his elbow, was staring at the decanter, he was turning his eyes to the right and to the left. But he caught a glimpse of Pellerin's profile on the footpath outside; the painter gave a quick tap at the window-pane, and he had scarcely sat down when Regimbart asked him why they no longer saw him at the office of L'Art Industriel.

"May I perish before ever I go back there again. The fellow is a brute, a mere tradesman, a wretch, a downright rogue!"

These insulting words harmonised with Frederick's present angry mood. Nevertheless, he was wounded, for it seemed to him that they hit at Madame Arnoux more or less.

"Why, what has he done to you?" said Regimbart.

Pellerin stamped with his foot on the ground, and his only response was an energetic puff.

He had been devoting himself to artistic work of a kind that he did not care to connect his name with, such as portraits for two crayons, or pasticcios from the great masters for amateurs of limited knowledge; and, as he felt humiliated by these inferior productions, he preferred to hold his tongue on the subject as a general rule. But "Arnoux's dirty conduct" exasperated him too much. He had to relieve his feelings.

In accordance with an order, which had been given in Frederick's very presence, he had brought Arnoux two pictures. Thereupon the dealer took the liberty of criticising them. He found fault with the composition, the colouring, and the drawing — above all the drawing; he would not, in short, take them at any price. But, driven to extremities by a bill falling due, Pellerin had to give them to the Jew Isaac; and, a fortnight later, Arnoux himself sold them to a Spaniard for two thousand francs.

"Not a sou less! What rascality! and, faith, he has done many other things just as bad. One of these mornings we'll see him in the dock!"

"How you exaggerate!" said Frederick, in a timid voice.

"Come, now, that's good; I exaggerate!" exclaimed the artist, giving the table a great blow with his fist.

This violence had the effect of completely restoring the young man's self-command. No doubt he might have acted more nicely; still, if Arnoux found these two pictures — —

"Bad! say it out! Are you a judge of them? Is this your profession? Now, you know, my youngster, I don't allow this sort of thing on the part of mere amateurs."

"Ah! well, it's not my business," said Frederick.

"Then, what interest have you in defending him?" returned Pellerin, coldly.

The young man faltered:

"But — since I am his friend — — "

"Go, and give him a hug for me. Good evening!"

And the painter rushed away in a rage, and, of course, without paying for his drink.

Frederick, whilst defending Arnoux, had convinced himself. In the heat of his eloquence, he was filled with tenderness towards this man, so intelligent and kind, whom his friends calumniated, and who had now to work all alone, abandoned by them. He could not resist a strange impulse to go at once and see him again. Ten minutes afterwards he pushed open the door of the picture-warehouse.

Arnoux was preparing, with the assistance of his clerks, some huge placards for an exhibition of pictures.

"Halloa! what brings you back again?"

This question, simple though it was, embarrassed Frederick, and, at a loss for an answer, he asked whether they had happened to find a notebook of his — a little notebook with a blue leather cover.

"The one that you put your letters to women in?" said Arnoux.

Frederick, blushing like a young girl, protested against such an assumption.

"Your verses, then?" returned the picture-dealer.

He handled the pictorial specimens that were to be exhibited, discovering their form, colouring, and frames; and Frederick felt more and more irritated by his air of abstraction, and particularly by the appearance of his hands — large hands, rather soft, with flat nails. At length, M. Arnoux arose, and saying, "That's disposed of!" he chucked the young man familiarly under the chin. Frederick was offended at this liberty, and recoiled a pace or two; then he made a dash for the shop-door, and passed out through it, as he imagined, for the last time in his life. Madame Arnoux herself had been lowered by the vulgarity of her husband.

During the same week he got a letter from Deslauriers, informing him that the clerk would be in Paris on the following Thursday. Then he flung himself back violently on this affection as one of a more solid and lofty character. A man of this sort was worth all the women in the world. He would no longer have any need of Regimbart, of Pellerin, of Hussonnet, of anyone! In order to provide his friend with as comfortable lodgings as possible, he bought an iron bedstead and a second armchair, and stripped off some of his own bed-covering to garnish this one properly. On Thursday morning he was dressing himself to go to meet Deslauriers when there was a ring at the door.

Arnoux entered.

"Just one word. Yesterday I got a lovely trout from Geneva. We expect you by-and-by — at seven o'clock sharp. The address is the Rue de Choiseul 24 bis. Don't forget!"

Frederick was obliged to sit down; his knees were tottering under him. He repeated to himself, "At last! at last!" Then he wrote to his tailor, to his hatter, and to his bootmaker; and he despatched these three notes by three different messengers.

The key turned in the lock, and the door-keeper appeared with a trunk on his shoulder.

Frederick, on seeing Deslauriers, began to tremble like an adulteress under the glance of her husband.

"What has happened to you?" said Deslauriers. "Surely you got my letter?"

Frederick had not enough energy left to lie. He opened his arms, and flung himself on his friend's breast.

Then the clerk told his story. His father thought to avoid giving an account of the expense of tutelage, fancying that the period limited for rendering such accounts was ten years; but, well up in legal procedure, Deslauriers had managed to get the share coming to him from his mother into his clutches — seven thousand francs clear — which he had there with him in an old pocket-book.

"'Tis a reserve fund, in case of misfortune. I must think over the best way of investing it, and find quarters for myself to-morrow morning. To-day I'm perfectly free, and am entirely at your service, my old friend."

"Oh! don't put yourself about," said Frederick. "If you had anything of importance to do this evening — —"

"Come, now! I would be a selfish wretch — —"

This epithet, flung out at random, touched Frederick to the quick, like a reproachful hint.

The door-keeper had placed on the table close to the fire some chops, cold meat, a large lobster, some sweets for dessert, and two bottles of Bordeaux.

Deslauriers was touched by these excellent preparations to welcome his arrival.

"Upon my word, you are treating me like a king!"

They talked about their past and about the future; and, from time to time, they grasped each other's hands across the table, gazing at each other tenderly for a moment.

But a messenger came with a new hat. Deslauriers, in a loud tone, remarked that this head-gear was very showy. Next came the tailor himself to fit on the coat, to which he had given a touch with the smoothing-iron.

"One would imagine you were going to be married," said Deslauriers.

An hour later, a third individual appeared on the scene, and drew forth from a big black bag a pair of shining patent leather boots. While Frederick was trying them on, the bootmaker slyly drew attention to the shoes of the young man from the country.

"Does Monsieur require anything?"

"Thanks," replied the clerk, pulling behind his chair his old shoes fastened with strings.

This humiliating incident annoyed Frederick. At length he exclaimed, as if an idea had suddenly taken possession of him:

"Ha! deuce take it! I was forgetting."

"What is it, pray?"

"I have to dine in the city this evening."

"At the Dambreuses'? Why did you never say anything to me about them in your letters?"

"It is not at the Dambreuses', but at the Arnoux's."

"You should have let me know beforehand," said Deslauriers. "I would have come a day later."

"Impossible," returned Frederick, abruptly. "I only got the invitation this morning, a little while ago."

And to redeem his error and distract his friend's mind from the occurrence, he proceeded to unfasten the tangled cords round the trunk, and to arrange all his belongings in the chest of drawers, expressed his willingness to give him his own bed, and offered to sleep himself in the dressing-room bedstead. Then, as soon as it was four o'clock, he began the preparations for his toilet.

"You have plenty of time," said the other.

At last he was dressed and off he went.

"That's the way with the rich," thought Deslauriers.

And he went to dine in the Rue Saint-Jacques, at a little restaurant kept by a man he knew.

Frederick stopped several times while going up the stairs, so violently did his heart beat. One of his gloves, which was too tight, burst, and, while he was fastening back the torn part under his shirt-cuff, Arnoux, who was mounting the stairs behind him, took his arm and led him in.

The anteroom, decorated in the Chinese fashion, had a painted lantern hanging from the ceiling, and bamboos in the corners. As he was passing into the drawing-room, Frederick stumbled against a tiger's skin. The place had not yet been lighted up, but two lamps were burning in the boudoir in the far corner.

Mademoiselle Marthe came to announce that her mamma was dressing. Arnoux raised her as high as his mouth in order to kiss her; then, as he wished to go to the cellar himself to select certain bottles of wine, he left Frederick with the little girl.

She had grown much larger since the trip in the steamboat. Her dark hair descended in long ringlets, which curled over her bare arms. Her dress, more puffed out than the petticoat of a danseuse, allowed her rosy calves to be seen, and her pretty childlike form had all the fresh odour of a bunch of flowers. She received the young gentleman's compliments with a coquettish air, fixed on him her large, dreamy eyes, then slipping on the carpet amid the furniture, disappeared like a cat.

After this he no longer felt ill at ease. The globes of the lamps, covered with a paper lace-work, sent forth a white light, softening the colour of the walls, hung with mauve satin. Through the fender-bars, as through the slits in a big fan, the coal could be seen in the fireplace, and close beside the clock there was a little chest with silver clasps. Here and there things lay about which gave the place a look of home — a doll in the middle of the sofa, a fichu against the back of a chair, and on the work-table a knitted woollen vest, from which two ivory needles were hanging with their points downwards. It was altogether a peaceful spot, suggesting the idea of propriety and innocent family life.

Arnoux returned, and Madame Arnoux appeared at the other doorway. As she was enveloped in shadow, the young man could at first distinguish only her head. She wore a black velvet gown, and in her hair she had fastened a long Algerian cap, in a red silk net, which coiling round her comb, fell over her left shoulder.

Arnoux introduced Frederick.

"Oh! I remember Monsieur perfectly well," she responded.

Then the guests arrived, nearly all at the same time — Dittmer, Lovarias, Burrieu, the composer Rosenwald, the poet Théophile Lorris, two art critics, colleagues of Hussonnet, a paper manufacturer, and in the rear the illustrious Pierre Paul Meinsius, the last representative of the grand school of painting, who blithely carried along with his glory his forty-five years and his big paunch.

When they were passing into the dining-room, Madame Arnoux took his arm. A chair had been left vacant for Pellerin. Arnoux, though he took advantage of him, was fond of him. Besides, he was afraid of his terrible tongue, so much so, that, in order to soften him, he had given a portrait of him in L'Art Industriel, accompanied by exaggerated eulogies; and Pellerin, more sensitive about distinction than about money, made his appearance about eight o'clock quite out of breath. Frederick fancied that they had been a long time reconciled.

He liked the company, the dishes, everything. The dining-room, which resembled a mediæval parlour, was hung with stamped leather. A Dutch whatnot faced a rack for chibouks, and around the table the Bohemian glasses, variously coloured, had, in the midst of the flowers and fruits, the effect of an illumination in a garden.

He had to make his choice between ten sorts of mustard. He partook of daspachio, of curry, of ginger, of Corsican blackbirds, and a species of Roman macaroni called lasagna; he drank extraordinary wines, lip-fraeli and tokay. Arnoux indeed prided himself on entertaining people in good style. With an eye to the procurement of eatables, he paid court to mail-coach drivers, and was in league with the cooks of great houses, who communicated to him the secrets of rare sauces.

But Frederick was particularly amused by the conversation. His taste for travelling was tickled by Dittmer, who talked about the East; he gratified his curiosity about theatrical matters by listening to Rosenwald's chat about the opera; and the atrocious existence of Bohemia assumed for him a droll aspect when seen through the gaiety of Hussonnet, who related, in a picturesque fashion, how he had spent an entire winter with no food except Dutch cheese. Then, a discussion between Lovarias and Burrieu about the Florentine School gave him new ideas with regard to masterpieces, widened his horizon, and he found difficulty in restraining his enthusiasm when Pellerin exclaimed:

"Don't bother me with your hideous reality! What does it mean — reality? Some see things black, others blue — the multitude sees them brute-fashion. There is nothing less natural than Michael Angelo; there is nothing more powerful! The anxiety about external truth is a mark of contemporary baseness; and art will become, if things go on that way, a sort of poor joke as much below religion as it is below poetry, and as much below politics as it is below business. You will never reach its end — yes, its end! — which is to cause within us an impersonal exaltation, with petty works, in spite of all your finished execution. Look, for instance, at Bassolier's pictures: they are pretty, coquettish, spruce, and by no means dull. You might put them into your pocket, bring them with you when you are travelling. Notaries buy them for twenty thousand francs, while pictures of the ideal type are sold for three sous. But, without ideality, there is no grandeur; without grandeur there is no beauty. Olympus is a mountain. The most swagger monument will always be the Pyramids. Exuberance is better than taste; the desert is better than a street-pavement, and a savage is better than a hairdresser!"

Frederick, as these words fell upon his ear, glanced towards Madame Arnoux. They sank into his soul like metals falling into a furnace, added to his passion, and supplied the material of love.

His chair was three seats below hers on the same side. From time to time, she bent forward a little, turning aside her head to address a few words to her little daughter; and as she smiled on these occasions, a dimple took shape in her cheek, giving to her face an expression of more dainty good-nature.

As soon as the time came for the gentlemen to take their wine, she disappeared. The conversation became more free and easy. M. Arnoux shone in it, and Frederick was astonished at the cynicism of men. However, their preoccupation with woman established between them and him, as it were, an equality, which raised him in his own estimation.

When they had returned to the drawing-room, he took up, to keep himself in countenance, one of the albums which lay about on the table. The great artists of the day had illustrated them with drawings, had written in them snatches of verse or prose, or their signatures simply. In the midst of famous names he found many that he had never heard of before, and original thoughts appeared only underneath a flood of nonsense. All these effusions contained a more or less direct expression of homage towards Madame Arnoux. Frederick would have been afraid to write a line beside them.

She went into her boudoir to look at the little chest with silver clasps which he had noticed on the mantel-shelf. It was a present from her husband, a work of the Renaissance. Arnoux's friends complimented him, and his wife thanked him. His tender emotions were aroused, and before all the guests he gave her a kiss.

After this they all chatted in groups here and there. The worthy Meinsius was with Madame Arnoux on an easy chair close beside the fire. She was leaning forward towards his ear; their heads were just touching, and Frederick would have been glad to become deaf, infirm, and ugly if, instead, he had an illustrious name and white hair — in short, if he only happened to possess something which would install him in such intimate association with her. He began once more to eat out his heart, furious at the idea of being so young a man.

But she came into the corner of the drawing-room in which he was sitting, asked him whether he was acquainted with any of the guests, whether he was fond of painting, how long he had been a student in Paris. Every word that came out of her mouth seemed to Frederick something entirely new, an exclusive appendage of her personality. He gazed attentively at the fringes of her head-dress, the ends of which caressed her bare shoulder, and he was unable to take away his eyes; he plunged his soul into the whiteness of that feminine flesh, and yet he did not venture to raise his eyelids to glance at her higher, face to face.

Rosenwald interrupted them, begging of Madame Arnoux to sing something. He played a prelude, she waited, her lips opened slightly, and a sound, pure, long-continued, silvery, ascended into the air.

Frederick did not understand a single one of the Italian words. The song began with a grave measure, something like church music, then in a more animated strain, with a crescendo movement, it broke into repeated bursts of sound, then suddenly subsided, and the melody came back again in a tender fashion with a wide and easy swing.

She stood beside the keyboard with her arms hanging down and a far-off look on her face. Sometimes, in order to read the music, she advanced her forehead for a moment and her eyelashes moved to and fro. Her contralto voice in the low notes took a mournful intonation which had a chilling effect on the listener, and then her beautiful head, with those great brows of hers, bent over her shoulder; her bosom swelled; her eyes were wide apart; her neck, from which roulades made their escape, fell back as if under ærial kisses. She flung out three sharp notes, came down again, cast forth one higher still, and, after a silence, finished with an organ-point.

Rosenwald did not leave the piano. He continued playing, to amuse himself. From time to time a guest stole away. At eleven o'clock, as the last of them were going off, Arnoux went out along with Pellerin, under the pretext of seeing him home. He was one of those people who say that they are ill when they do not "take a turn" after dinner. Madame Arnoux had made her way towards the anteroom. Dittmer and Hussonnet bowed to her. She stretched out her hand to them. She did the same to Frederick; and he felt, as it were, something penetrating every particle of his skin.

He quitted his friends. He wished to be alone. His heart was overflowing. Why had she offered him her hand? Was it a thoughtless act, or an encouragement? "Come now! I am mad!" Besides, what did it matter, when he could now visit her entirely at his ease, live in the very atmosphere she breathed?

The streets were deserted. Now and then a heavy wagon would roll past, shaking the pavements. The houses came one after another with their grey fronts, their closed windows; and he thought with disdain of all those human beings who lived behind those walls without having seen her, and not one of whom dreamed of her existence. He had no consciousness of his surroundings, of space, of anything, and striking the ground with his heel, rapping with his walking-stick on the shutters of the shops, he kept walking on continually at random, in a state of excitement, carried away by his emotions. Suddenly he felt himself surrounded by a circle of damp air, and found that he was on the edge of the quays.

The gas-lamps shone in two straight lines, which ran on endlessly, and long red flames flickered in the depths of the water. The waves were slate-coloured, while the sky, which was of clearer hue, seemed to be supported by vast masses of shadow that rose on each side of the river. The darkness was intensified by buildings whose outlines the eye could not distinguish. A luminous haze floated above the roofs further on. All the noises of the night had melted into a single monotonous hum.

He stopped in the middle of the Pont Neuf, and, taking off his hat and exposing his chest, he drank in the air. And now he felt as if something that was inexhaustible were rising up from the very depths of his being, an afflux of tenderness that enervated him, like the motion of the waves under his eyes. A church-clock slowly struck one, like a voice calling out to him.

Then, he was seized with one of those shuddering sensations of the soul in which one seems to be transported into a higher world. He felt, as it were, endowed with some extraordinary faculty, the aim of which he could not determine. He seriously asked himself whether he would be a great painter or a great poet; and he decided in favour of painting, for the exigencies of this profession would bring him into contact with Madame Arnoux. So, then, he had found his vocation! The object of his existence was now perfectly clear, and there could be no mistake about the future.

When he had shut his door, he heard some one snoring in the dark closet near his apartment. It was his friend. He no longer bestowed a thought on him.

His own face presented itself to his view in the glass. He thought himself handsome, and for a minute he remained gazing at himself.

CHAPTER V.

"Love Knoweth No Laws."

Before twelve o'clock next day he had bought a box of colours, paintbrushes, and an easel. Pellerin consented to give him lessons, and Frederick brought him to his lodgings to see whether anything was wanting among his painting utensils.

Deslauriers had come back, and the second armchair was occupied by a young man. The clerk said, pointing towards him:

"'Tis he! There he is! Sénécal!" Frederick disliked this young man. His forehead was heightened by the way in which he wore his hair, cut straight like a brush. There was a certain hard, cold look in his grey eyes; and his long black coat, his entire costume, savoured of the pedagogue and the ecclesiastic.

They first discussed topics of the hour, amongst others the Stabat of Rossini. Sénécal, in answer to a question, declared that he never went to the theatre.

Pellerin opened the box of colours.

"Are these all for you?" said the clerk.

"Why, certainly!"

"Well, really! What a notion!" And he leaned across the table, at which the mathematical tutor was turning over the leaves of a volume of Louis Blanc. He had brought it with him, and was reading passages from it in low tones, while Pellerin and Frederick were examining together the palette, the knife, and the bladders; then the talk came round to the dinner at Arnoux's.

"The picture-dealer, is it?" asked Sénécal. "A nice gentleman, truly!"

"Why, now?" said Pellerin. Sénécal replied:

"A man who makes money by political turpitude!"

And he went on to talk about a well-known lithograph, in which the Royal Family was all represented as being engaged in edifying occupations: Louis Philippe had a copy of the Code in his hand; the Queen had a Catholic prayer-book; the Princesses were embroidering; the Duc de Nemours was girding on a sword; M. de Joinville was showing a map to his young brothers; and at the end of the apartment could be seen a bed with two divisions. This picture, which was entitled "A Good Family," was a source of delight to commonplace middle-class people, but of grief to patriots.

Pellerin, in a tone of vexation, as if he had been the producer of this work himself, observed by way of answer that every opinion had some value. Sénécal protested: Art should aim exclusively at promoting morality amongst the masses! The only subjects that ought to be reproduced were those which impelled people to virtuous actions; all others were injurious.

"But that depends on the execution," cried Pellerin. "I might produce masterpieces."

"So much the worse for you, then; you have no right — —"

"What?"

"No, monsieur, you have no right to excite my interest in matters of which I disapprove. What need have we of laborious trifles, from which it is impossible to derive any benefit — those Venuses, for instance, with all your landscapes? I see there no instruction for the people! Show us rather their miseries! arouse enthusiasm in us for their sacrifices! Ah, my God! there is no lack of subjects — the farm, the workshop — —"

Pellerin stammered forth his indignation at this, and, imagining that he had found an argument:

"Molière, do you accept him?"

"Certainly!" said Sénécal. "I admire him as the precursor of the French Revolution."

"Ha! the Revolution! What art! Never was there a more pitiable epoch!"

"None greater, Monsieur!"

Pellerin folded his arms, and looking at him straight in the face:

"You have the appearance of a famous member of the National Guard!"

His opponent, accustomed to discussions, responded:

"I am not, and I detest it just as much as you. But with such principles we corrupt the crowd. This sort of thing, however, is profitable to the Government. It would not be so powerful but for the complicity of a lot of rogues of that sort."

The painter took up the defence of the picture-dealer, for S  n  cal's opinions exasperated him. He even went so far as to maintain that Arnoux was really a man with a heart of gold, devoted to his friends, deeply attached to his wife.

"Oho! if you offered him a good sum, he would not refuse to let her serve as a model."

Frederick turned pale.

"So then, he has done you some great injury, Monsieur?"

"Me? no! I saw him once at a caf   with a friend. That's all."

S  n  cal had spoken truly. But he had his teeth daily set on edge by the announcements in L'Art Industriel. Arnoux was for him the representative of a world which he considered fatal to democracy. An austere Republican, he suspected that there was something corrupt in every form of elegance, and the more so as he wanted nothing and was inflexible in his integrity.

They found some difficulty in resuming the conversation. The painter soon recalled to mind his appointment, the tutor his pupils; and, when they had gone, after a long silence, Deslauriers asked a number of questions about Arnoux.

"You will introduce me there later, will you not, old fellow?"

"Certainly," said Frederick. Then they thought about settling themselves. Deslauriers had without much trouble obtained the post of second clerk in a solicitor's office; he had also entered his name for the terms at the Law School, and bought the indispensable books; and the life of which they had dreamed now began.

It was delightful, owing to their youth, which made everything assume a beautiful aspect. As Deslauriers had said nothing as to any pecuniary arrangement, Frederick did not refer to the subject. He helped to defray all the expenses, kept the cupboard well stocked, and looked after all the household requirements; but if it happened to be desirable to give the door-keeper a rating, the clerk took that on his own shoulders, still playing the part, which he had assumed in their college days, of protector and senior.

Separated all day long, they met again in the evening. Each took his place at the fireside and set about his work. But ere long it would be interrupted. Then would follow endless outpourings, unaccountable bursts of merriment, and occasional disputes about the lamp flaring too much or a book being mislaid, momentary ebullitions of anger which subsided in hearty laughter.

While in bed they left open the door of the little room where Deslauriers slept, and kept chattering to each other from a distance.

In the morning they walked in their shirt-sleeves on the terrace. The sun rose; light vapours passed over the river. From the flower-market close beside them the noise of screaming reached their ears; and the smoke from their pipes whirled round in the clear air, which was refreshing to their eyes still puffed from sleep. While they inhaled it, their hearts swelled with great expectations.

When it was not raining on Sunday they went out together, and, arm in arm, they sauntered through the streets. The same reflection nearly always occurred to them at the same time, or else they would go on chatting without noticing anything around them. Deslauriers longed for riches, as a means for gaining power over men. He was anxious to possess an influence over a vast number of people, to make a great noise, to have three secretaries under his command, and to give a big political dinner once a month.

Frederick would have furnished for himself a palace in the Moorish fashion, to spend his life reclining on cashmere divans, to the murmur of a jet of water, attended by negro pages. And these things, of which he had only dreamed, became in the end so definite that they made him feel as dejected as if he had lost them.

"What is the use of talking about all these things," said he, "when we'll never have them?"

"Who knows?" returned Deslauriers.

In spite of his democratic views, he urged Frederick to get an introduction into the Dambreuses' house.

The other, by way of objection, pointed to the failure of his previous attempts.

"Bah! go back there. They'll give you an invitation!"

Towards the close of the month of March, they received amongst other bills of a rather awkward description that of the restaurant-keeper who supplied them with dinners. Frederick, not having the entire amount, borrowed a hundred crowns from Deslauriers. A fortnight afterwards, he renewed the same request, and the clerk administered a lecture to him on the extravagant habits to which he gave himself up in the Arnoux's society.

As a matter of fact, he put no restraint upon himself in this respect. A view of Venice, a view of Naples, and another of Constantinople occupying the centre of three walls respectively, equestrian subjects by Alfred de Dreux here and there, a group by Pradier over the mantelpiece, numbers of L'Art Industriel lying on the piano, and works in boards on the floor in the corners, encumbered the apartment which he occupied to such an extent that it was hard to find a place to lay a book on, or to move one's elbows about freely. Frederick maintained that he needed all this for his painting.

He pursued his art-studies under Pellerin. But when he called on the artist, the latter was often out, being accustomed to attend at every funeral and public occurrence of which an account was given in the newspapers, and so it was that Frederick spent entire hours alone in the studio. The quietude of this spacious room, which nothing disturbed save the scampering of the mice, the light falling from the ceiling, or the hissing noise of the stove, made him sink into a kind of intellectual ease. Then his eyes, wandering away from the task at which he was engaged, roamed over the shell-work on the wall, around the objects of virtù on the whatnot, along the torsos on which the dust that had collected made, as it were, shreds of velvet; and, like a traveller who has lost his way in the middle of a wood, and whom every path brings back to the same spot, continually, he found underlying every idea in his mind the recollection of Madame Arnoux.

He selected days for calling on her. When he had reached the second floor, he would pause on the threshold, hesitating as to whether he ought to ring or not. Steps drew nigh, the door opened, and the announcement "Madame is gone out," a sense of relief would come upon him, as if a weight had been lifted from his heart. He met her, however. On the first occasion there were three other ladies with her; the next time it was in the afternoon, and Mademoiselle Marthe's writing-master came on the scene. Besides, the men whom Madame Arnoux received were not very punctilious about paying visits. For the sake of prudence he deemed it better not to call again.

But he did not fail to present himself regularly at the office of L'Art Industriel every Wednesday in order to get an invitation to the Thursday dinners, and he remained there after all the others, even longer than Regimbart, up to the last moment, pretending to be looking at an engraving or to be running his eye through a newspaper. At last Arnoux would say to him, "Shall you be disengaged to-morrow evening?" and, before the sentence was finished, he would give an affirmative answer. Arnoux appeared to have taken a fancy to him. He showed him how to become a good judge of wines, how to make hot punch, and how to prepare a woodcock ragoût. Frederick followed his advice with docility, feeling an attachment to everything connected with Madame Arnoux — her furniture, her servants, her house, her street.

During these dinners he scarcely uttered a word; he kept gazing at her. She had a little mole close to her temple. Her head-bands were darker than the rest of her hair, and were always a little moist at the edges; from time to time she stroked them with only two fingers. He knew the shape of each of her nails. He took delight in listening to the rustle of her silk skirt as she swept past doors; he stealthily inhaled the perfume that came from her handkerchief; her comb, her gloves, her rings were for him things of special interest, important as works of art, almost endowed with life like individuals; all took possession of his heart and strengthened his passion.

He had not been sufficiently self-contained to conceal it from Deslauriers. When he came home from Madame Arnoux's, he would wake up his friend, as if inadvertently, in order to have an opportunity of talking about her.

Deslauriers, who slept in the little off-room, close to where they had their water-supply, would give a great yawn. Frederick seated himself on the side of the bed. At first, he spoke about the dinner; then he referred to a thousand petty details, in which he saw marks of contempt or of affection. On one occasion, for instance, she had refused his arm, in order to take Dittmer's; and Frederick gave vent to his humiliation:

"Ah! how stupid!"

Or else she had called him her "dear friend."

"Then go after her gaily!"

"But I dare not do that," said Frederick.

"Well, then, think no more about her! Good night!"

Deslauriers thereupon turned on his side, and fell asleep. He felt utterly unable to comprehend this love, which seemed to him the last weakness of adolescence; and, as his own society was apparently not enough to content Frederick, he conceived the idea of bringing together, once a week, those whom they both recognised as friends.

They came on Saturday about nine o'clock. The three Algerine curtains were carefully drawn. The lamp and four wax-lights were burning. In the middle of the table the tobacco-pot, filled with pipes, displayed itself between the beer-bottles, the tea-pot, a flagon of rum, and some fancy biscuits.

They discussed the immortality of the soul, and drew comparisons between the different professors.

One evening Hussonnet introduced a tall young man, attired in a frock-coat, too short in the wrists, and with a look of embarrassment in his face. It was the young fellow whom they had gone to release from the guard-house the year before.

As he had not been able to restore the box of lace which he had lost in the scuffle, his employer had accused him of theft, and threatened to prosecute him. He was now a clerk in a wagon-office. Hussonnet had come across him that morning at the corner of the street, and brought him along, for Dussardier, in a spirit of gratitude, had expressed a wish to see "the other."

He stretched out towards Frederick the cigar-holder, still full, which he had religiously preserved, in the hope of being able to give it back. The young men invited him to pay them a second visit; and he was not slow in doing so.

They all had sympathies in common. At first, their hatred of the Government reached the height of an unquestionable dogma. Martinon alone attempted to defend Louis Philippe. They overwhelmed him with the commonplaces scattered through the newspapers — the "Bastillization" of Paris, the September laws, Pritchard, Lord Guizot — so that Martinon held his tongue for fear of giving offence to somebody. During his seven years at college he had never incurred the penalty of an imposition, and at the Law School he knew how to make himself agreeable to the professors. He usually wore a big frock-coat of the colour of putty, with india-rubber goloshes; but one evening he presented himself arrayed like a bridegroom, in a velvet roll-collar waistcoat, a white tie, and a gold chain.

The astonishment of the other young men was greatly increased when they learned that he had just come away from M. Dambreuse's house. In fact, the banker Dambreuse had just bought a portion of an extensive wood from Martinon senior; and, when the worthy man introduced his son, the other had invited them both to dinner.

"Was there a good supply of truffles there?" asked Deslauriers. "And did you take his wife by the waist between the two doors, sicut decet?"

Hereupon the conversation turned on women. Pellerin would not admit that there were beautiful women (he preferred tigers); besides the human female was an inferior creature in the æsthetic hierarchy.

"What fascinates you is just the very thing that degrades her as an idea; I mean her breasts, her hair — —"

"Nevertheless," urged Frederick, "long black hair and large dark eyes — —"

"Oh! we know all about that," cried Hussonnet. "Enough of Andalusian beauties on the lawn. Those things are out of date; no thank you! For the fact is, honour bright! a fast woman is more amusing than the Venus of Milo. Let us be Gallic, in Heaven's name, and after the Regency style, if we can!"

'Flow, generous wines; ladies, deign to smile!'

We must pass from the dark to the fair. Is that your opinion, Father Dussardier?"

Dussardier did not reply. They all pressed him to ascertain what his tastes were.

"Well," said he, colouring, "for my part, I would like to love the same one always!"

This was said in such a way that there was a moment of silence, some of them being surprised at this candour, and others finding in his words, perhaps, the secret yearning of their souls.

Sénécal placed his glass of beer on the mantelpiece, and declared dogmatically that, as prostitution was tyrannical and marriage immoral, it was better to practice abstinence. Deslauriers regarded women as a source of amusement — nothing more. M. de Cisy looked upon them with the utmost dread.

Brought up under the eyes of a grandmother who was a devotee, he found the society of those young fellows as alluring as a place of ill-repute and as instructive as the Sorbonne. They gave him lessons without stint; and so much zeal did he exhibit that he even wanted to smoke in spite of the qualms that upset him every time he made the experiment. Frederick paid him the greatest attention. He admired the shade of this young gentleman's cravat, the fur on his overcoat, and especially his boots, as thin as gloves, and so very neat and fine that they had a look of insolent superiority. His carriage used to wait for him below in the street.

One evening, after his departure, when there was a fall of snow, S n cal began to complain about his having a coachman. He declaimed against kid-gloved exquisites and against the Jockey Club. He had more respect for a workman than for these fine gentlemen.

"For my part, anyhow, I work for my livelihood! I am a poor man!"

"That's quite evident," said Frederick, at length, losing patience.

The tutor conceived a grudge against him for this remark.

But, as Regimbart said he knew S n cal pretty well, Frederick, wishing to be civil to a friend of the Arnoux, asked him to come to the Saturday meetings; and the two patriots were glad to be brought together in this way.

However, they took opposite views of things.

S n cal — who had a skull of the angular type — fixed his attention merely on systems, whereas Regimbart, on the contrary, saw in facts nothing but facts. The thing that chiefly troubled him was the Rhine frontier. He claimed to be an authority on the subject of artillery, and got his clothes made by a tailor of the Polytechnic School.

The first day, when they asked him to take some cakes, he disdainfully shrugged his shoulders, saying that these might suit women; and on the next few occasions his manner was not much more gracious. Whenever speculative ideas had reached a certain elevation, he would mutter: "Oh! no Utopias, no dreams!" On the subject of Art (though he used to visit the studios, where he occasionally out of complaisance gave a lesson in fencing) his opinions were not remarkable for their excellence. He compared the style of M. Marast to that of Voltaire, and Mademoiselle Vatnaz to Madame de Sta l, on account of an Ode on Poland in which "there was some spirit." In short, Regimbart bored everyone, and especially Deslauriers, for the Citizen was a friend of the Arnoux family. Now the clerk was most anxious to visit those people in the hope that he might there make the acquaintance of some persons who would be an advantage to him.

"When are you going to take me there with you?" he would say. Arnoux was either overburdened with business, or else starting on a journey. Then it was not worth while, as the dinners were coming to an end.

If he had been called on to risk his life for his friend, Frederick would have done so. But, as he was desirous of making as good a figure as possible, and with this view was most careful about his language and manners, and so attentive to his costume that he always presented himself at the office of L'Art Industriel irreproachably gloved, he was afraid that Deslauriers, with his shabby black coat, his attorney-like exterior, and his swaggering kind of talk, might make himself disagreeable to Madame Arnoux, and thus compromise him and lower him in her estimation. The other results would have been bad enough, but the last one would have annoyed him a thousand times more.

The clerk saw that his friend did not wish to keep his promise, and Frederick's silence seemed to him an aggravation of the insult. He would have liked to exercise absolute control over him, to see him developing in accordance with the ideal of their youth; and his inactivity excited the clerk's indignation as a breach of duty and a want of loyalty towards himself. Moreover, Frederick, with his thoughts full of Madame Arnoux, frequently talked about her husband; and Deslauriers now began an intolerable course of boredom by repeating the name a hundred times a day, at the end of each remark, like the parrot-cry of an idiot.

When there was a knock at the door, he would answer, "Come in, Arnoux!" At the restaurant he asked for a Brie cheese "in imitation of Arnoux," and at night, pretending to wake up from a bad dream, he would rouse his comrade by howling out, "Arnoux! Arnoux!" At last Frederick, worn out, said to him one day, in a piteous voice:

"Oh! don't bother me about Arnoux!"

"Never!" replied the clerk:

"He always, everywhere, burning or icy cold, The pictured form of Arnoux — —"

"Hold your tongue, I tell you!" exclaimed Frederick, raising his fist. Then less angrily he added:

"You know well this is a painful subject to me."

"Oh! forgive me, old fellow," returned Deslauriers with a very low bow. "From this time forth we will be considerate towards Mademoiselle's nerves. Again, I say, forgive me. A thousand pardons!"

And so this little joke came to an end.

But, three weeks later, one evening, Deslauriers said to him:

"Well, I have just seen Madame Arnoux."

"Where, pray?"

"At the Palais, with Balandard, the solicitor. A dark woman, is she not, of the middle height?"

Frederick made a gesture of assent. He waited for Deslauriers to speak. At the least expression of admiration he would have been most effusive, and would have fairly hugged the other. However, Deslauriers remained silent. At last, unable to contain himself any longer, Frederick, with assumed indifference, asked him what he thought of her.

Deslauriers considered that "she was not so bad, but still nothing extraordinary."

"Ha! you think so," said Frederick.

They soon reached the month of August, the time when he was to present himself for his second examination. According to the prevailing opinion, the subjects could be made up in a fortnight. Frederick, having full confidence in his own powers, swallowed up in a trice the first four books of the Code of Procedure, the first three of the Penal Code, many bits of the system of criminal investigation, and a part of the Civil Code, with the annotations of M. Poncelet. The night before, Deslauriers made him run through the whole course, a process which did not finish till morning, and, in order to take advantage of even the last quarter of an hour, continued questioning him while they walked along the footpath together.

As several examinations were taking place at the same time, there were many persons in the precincts, and amongst others Hussonnet and Cisy: young men never failed to come and watch these ordeals when the fortunes of their comrades were at stake.

Frederick put on the traditional black gown; then, followed by the throng, with three other students, he entered a spacious apartment, into which the light penetrated through uncurtained windows, and which was garnished with benches ranged along the walls. In the centre, leather chairs were drawn round a table adorned with a green cover. This separated the candidates from the examiners in their red gowns and ermine shoulder-knots, the head examiners wearing gold-laced flat caps.

Frederick found himself the last but one in the series — an unfortunate place. In answer to the first question, as to the difference between a convention and a contract, he defined the one as if it were the other; and the professor, who was a fair sort of man, said to him, "Don't be agitated, Monsieur! Compose yourself!" Then, having asked two easy questions, which were answered in a doubtful fashion, he passed on at last to the fourth. This wretched beginning made Frederick lose his head. Deslauriers, who was facing him amongst the spectators, made a sign to him to indicate that it was not a hopeless case yet; and at the second batch of questions, dealing with the criminal law, he came out tolerably well. But, after the third, with reference to the "mystic will," the examiner having remained impassive the whole time, his mental distress redoubled; for Hussonnet brought his hands together as if to applaud, whilst Deslauriers liberally indulged in shrugs of the shoulders. Finally, the moment was reached when it was necessary to be examined on Procedure. The professor, displeased at listening to theories opposed to his own, asked him in a churlish tone:

"And so this is your view, monsieur? How do you reconcile the principle of article 1351 of the Civil Code with this application by a third party to set aside a judgment by default?"

Frederick had a great headache from not having slept the night before. A ray of sunlight, penetrating through one of the slits in a Venetian blind, fell on his face. Standing behind the seat, he kept wriggling about and tugging at his moustache.

"I am still awaiting your answer," the man with the gold-edged cap observed.

And as Frederick's movements, no doubt, irritated him:

"You won't find it in that moustache of yours!"

This sarcasm made the spectators laugh. The professor, feeling flattered, adopted a wheedling tone. He put two more questions with reference to adjournment and summary jurisdiction, then nodded his head by way of approval. The examination was over. Frederick retired into the vestibule.

While an usher was taking off his gown, to draw it over some other person immediately afterwards, his friends gathered around him, and succeeded in fairly bothering him with their conflicting opinions as to the result of his examination. Presently the announcement was made in a sonorous voice at the entrance of the hall: "The third was — put off!"

"Sent packing!" said Hussonnet. "Let us go away!"

In front of the door-keeper's lodge they met Martinon, flushed, excited, with a smile on his face and the halo of victory around his brow. He had just passed his final examination without any impediment. All he had now to do was the thesis. Before a fortnight he would be a licentiate. His family enjoyed the acquaintance of a Minister; "a beautiful career" was opening before him.

"All the same, this puts you into a mess," said Deslauriers.

There is nothing so humiliating as to see blockheads succeed in undertakings in which we fail. Frederick, filled with vexation, replied that he did not care a straw about the matter. He had higher pretensions; and as Hussonnet made a show of leaving, Frederick took him aside, and said to him:

"Not a word about this to them, mind!"

It was easy to keep it secret, since Arnoux was starting the next morning for Germany.

When he came back in the evening the clerk found his friend singularly altered: he danced about and whistled; and the other was astonished at this capricious change of mood. Frederick declared that he did not intend to go home to his mother, as he meant to spend his holidays working.

At the news of Arnoux's departure, a feeling of delight had taken possession of him. He might present himself at the house whenever he liked without any fear of having his visits broken in upon. The consciousness of absolute security would make him self-confident. At last he would not stand aloof, he would not be separated from her! Something more powerful than an iron chain attached him to Paris; a voice from the depths of his heart called out to him to remain.

There were certain obstacles in his path. These he got over by writing to his mother: he first of all admitted that he had failed to pass, owing to alterations made in the course — a mere mischance — an unfair thing; besides, all the great advocates (he referred to them by name) had been rejected at their examinations. But he calculated on presenting himself again in the month of November. Now, having no time to lose, he would not go home this year; and he asked, in addition to the quarterly allowance, for two hundred and fifty francs, to get coached in law by a private tutor, which would be of great assistance to him; and he threw around the entire epistle a garland of regrets, condolences, expressions of endearment, and protestations of filial love.

Madame Moreau, who had been expecting him the following day, was doubly grieved. She threw a veil over her son's misadventure, and in answer told him to "come all the same." Frederick would not give way, and the result was a falling out between them. However, at the end of the week, he received the amount of the quarter's allowance together with the sum required for the payment of the private tutor, which helped to pay for a pair of pearl-grey trousers, a white felt hat, and a gold-headed switch. When he had procured all these things he thought:

"Perhaps this is only a hairdresser's fancy on my part!"

And a feeling of considerable hesitation took possession of him.

In order to make sure as to whether he ought to call on Madame Arnoux, he tossed three coins into the air in succession. On each occasion luck was in his favour. So then Fate must have ordained it. He hailed a cab and drove to the Rue de Choiseul.

He quickly ascended the staircase and drew the bell-pull, but without effect. He felt as if he were about to faint.

Then, with fierce energy, he shook the heavy silk tassel. There was a resounding peal which gradually died away till no further sound was heard. Frederick got rather frightened.

He pasted his ear to the door — not a breath! He looked in through the key-hole, and only saw two reed-points on the wall-paper in the midst of designs of flowers. At last, he was on the point of going away when he changed his mind. This time, he gave a timid little ring. The door flew open, and Arnoux himself appeared on the threshold, with his hair all in disorder, his face crimson, and his features distorted by an expression of sullen embarrassment.

"Hallo! What the deuce brings you here? Come in!"

He led Frederick, not into the boudoir or into the bedroom, but into the dining-room, where on the table could be seen a bottle of champagne and two glasses; and, in an abrupt tone:

"There is something you want to ask me, my dear friend?"

"No! nothing! nothing!" stammered the young man, trying to think of some excuse for his visit. At length, he said to Arnoux that he had called to know whether they had heard from him, as Hussonnet had announced that he had gone to Germany.

"Not at all!" returned Arnoux. "What a feather-headed fellow that is to take everything in the wrong way!"

In order to conceal his agitation, Frederick kept walking from right to left in the dining-room. Happening to come into contact with a chair, he knocked down a parasol which had been laid across it, and the ivory handle got broken.

"Good heavens!" he exclaimed. "How sorry I am for having broken Madame Arnoux's parasol!"

At this remark, the picture-dealer raised his head and smiled in a very peculiar fashion. Frederick, taking advantage of the opportunity thus offered to talk about her, added shyly:

"Could I not see her?"

No. She had gone to the country to see her mother, who was ill.

He did not venture to ask any questions as to the length of time that she would be away. He merely enquired what was Madame Arnoux's native place.

"Chartres. Does this astonish you?"

"Astonish me? Oh, no! Why should it! Not in the least!"

After that, they could find absolutely nothing to talk about. Arnoux, having made a cigarette for himself, kept walking round the table, puffing. Frederick, standing near the stove, stared at the walls, the whatnot, and the floor; and delightful pictures flitted through his memory, or, rather, before his eyes. Then he left the apartment.

A piece of a newspaper, rolled up into a ball, lay on the floor in the anteroom. Arnoux snatched it up, and, raising himself on the tips of his toes, he stuck it into the bell, in order, as he said, that he might be able to go and finish his interrupted siesta. Then, as he grasped Frederick's hand:

"Kindly tell the porter that I am not in."

And he shut the door after him with a bang.

Frederick descended the staircase step by step. The ill-success of this first attempt discouraged him as to the possible results of those that might follow. Then began three months of absolute boredom. As he had nothing to do, his melancholy was aggravated by the want of occupation.

He spent whole hours gazing from the top of his balcony at the river as it flowed between the quays, with their bulwarks of grey stone, blackened here and there by the seams of the sewers, with a pontoon of washerwomen moored close to the bank, where some brats were amusing themselves by making a water-spaniel swim in the slime. His eyes, turning aside from the stone bridge of Nôtre Dame and the three suspension bridges, continually directed their glance towards the Quai-aux-Ormes, resting on a group of old trees, resembling the linden-trees of the Montereau wharf. The Saint-Jacques tower, the Hôtel de Ville, Saint-Gervais, Saint-Louis, and Saint-Paul, rose up in front of him amid a confused mass of roofs; and the genius of the July Column glittered at the eastern side like a large gold star, whilst at the other end the dome of the Tuileries showed its outlines against the sky in one great round mass of blue. Madame Arnoux's house must be on this side in the rear!

He went back to his bedchamber; then, throwing himself on the sofa, he abandoned himself to a confused succession of thoughts — plans of work, schemes for the guidance of his conduct, attempts to divine the future. At last, in order to shake off broodings all about himself, he went out into the open air.

He plunged at random into the Latin Quarter, usually so noisy, but deserted at this particular time, for the students had gone back to join their families. The huge walls of the colleges, which the silence seemed to lengthen, wore a still more melancholy aspect. All sorts of peaceful sounds could be heard — the flapping of wings in cages, the noise made by the turning of a lathe, or the strokes of a cobbler's hammer; and the old-clothes men, standing in the middle of the street, looked up at each house fruitlessly. In the interior of a solitary café the barmaid was yawning between her two full decanters. The newspapers were left undisturbed on the tables of reading-rooms. In the ironing establishments linen quivered under the puffs of tepid wind. From time to time he stopped to look at the window of a second-hand book-shop; an omnibus which grazed the footpath as it came rumbling along made him turn round; and, when he found himself before the Luxembourg, he went no further.

Occasionally he was attracted towards the boulevards by the hope of finding there something that might amuse him. After he had passed through dark alleys, from which his nostrils were greeted by fresh moist odours, he reached vast, desolate, open spaces, dazzling with light, in which monuments cast at the side of the pavement notches of black shadow. But once more the wagons and the shops appeared, and the crowd had the effect of stunning him, especially on Sunday, when, from the Bastille to the Madeleine, it kept swaying in one immense flood over the asphalt, in the midst of a cloud of dust, in an incessant clamour. He felt disgusted at the meanness of the faces, the silliness of the talk, and the idiotic self-satisfaction that oozed through these sweating foreheads. However, the consciousness of being superior to these individuals mitigated the weariness which he experienced in gazing at them.

Every day he went to the office of L'Art Industriel; and in order to ascertain when Madame Arnoux would be back, he made elaborate enquiries about her mother. Arnoux's answer never varied — "the change for the better was continuing" — his wife, with his little daughter, would be returning the following week. The longer she delayed in coming back, the more uneasiness Frederick exhibited, so that Arnoux, touched by so much affection, brought him five or six times a week to dine at a restaurant.

In the long talks which they had together on these occasions Frederick discovered that the picture-dealer was not a very intellectual type of man. Arnoux might, however, take notice of his chilling manner; and now Frederick deemed it advisable to pay back, in a small measure, his polite attentions.

So, being anxious to do things on a good scale, the young man sold all his new clothes to a second-hand clothes-dealer for the sum of eighty francs, and having increased it with a hundred more francs which he had left, he called at Arnoux's house to bring him out to dine. Regimbart happened to be there, and all three of them set forth for Les Trois Frères Provençaux.

The Citizen began by taking off his surtout, and, knowing that the two others would defer to his gastronomic tastes, drew up the menu. But in vain did he make his way to the kitchen to speak himself to the chef, go down to the cellar, with every corner of which he was familiar, and send for the master of the establishment, to whom he gave "a blowing up." He was not satisfied with the dishes, the wines, or the attendance. At each new dish, at each fresh bottle, as soon as he had swallowed the first mouthful, the first draught, he threw down his fork or pushed his glass some distance away from him; then, leaning on his elbows on the tablecloth, and stretching out his arms, he declared in a loud tone that he could no longer dine in Paris! Finally, not knowing what to put into his mouth, Regimbart ordered kidney-beans dressed with oil, "quite plain," which, though only a partial success, slightly appeased him. Then he had a talk with the waiter all about the latter's predecessors at the "Provençaux": — "What had become of Antoine? And a fellow named Eugène? And Théodore, the little fellow who always used to attend down stairs? There was much finer fare in those days, and Burgundy vintages the like of which they would never see again."

Then there was a discussion as to the value of ground in the suburbs, Arnoux having speculated in that way, and looked on it as a safe thing. In the meantime, however, he would lie out of the interest on his money. As he did not want to sell out at any price, Regimbart would find out some one to whom he could let the ground; and so these two gentlemen proceeded at the close of the dessert to make calculations with a lead pencil.

They went out to get coffee in the smoking-divan on the ground-floor in the Passage du Saumon. Frederick had to remain on his legs while interminable games of billiards were being played, drenched in innumerable glasses of beer; and he lingered on there till midnight without knowing why, through want of energy, through sheer senselessness, in the vague expectation that something might happen which would give a favourable turn to his love.

When, then, would he next see her? Frederick was in a state of despair about it. But, one evening, towards the close of November, Arnoux said to him:

"My wife, you know, came back yesterday!"

Next day, at five o'clock, he made his way to her house. He began by congratulating her on her mother's recovery from such a serious illness.

"Why, no! Who told you that?"

"Arnoux!"

She gave vent to a slight "Ah!" then added that she had grave fears at first, which, however, had now been dispelled. She was seated close beside the fire in an upholstered easy-chair. He was on the sofa, with his hat between his knees; and the conversation was difficult to carry on, as it was broken off nearly every minute, so he got no chance of giving utterance to his sentiments. But, when he began to complain of having to study legal quibbles, she answered, "Oh! I understand — business!" and she let her face fall, buried suddenly in her own reflections.

He was eager to know what they were, and even did not bestow a thought on anything else. The twilight shadows gathered around them.

She rose, having to go out about some shopping; then she reappeared in a bonnet trimmed with velvet, and a black mantle edged with minever. He plucked up courage and offered to accompany her.

It was now so dark that one could scarcely see anything. The air was cold, and had an unpleasant odour, owing to a heavy fog, which partially blotted out the fronts of the houses. Frederick inhaled it with delight; for he could feel through the wadding of his coat the form of her arm; and her hand, cased in a chamois glove with two buttons, her little hand which he would have liked to cover with kisses, leaned on his sleeve. Owing to the slipperiness of the pavement, they lost their balance a little; it seemed to him as if they were both rocked by the wind in the midst of a cloud.

The glitter of the lamps on the boulevard brought him back to the realities of existence. The opportunity was a good one, there was no time to lose. He gave himself as far as the Rue de Richeliéu to declare his love. But almost at that very moment, in front of a china-shop, she stopped abruptly and said to him:

"We are at the place. Thanks. On Thursday — is it not? — as usual."

The dinners were now renewed; and the more visits he paid at Madame Arnoux's, the more his love-sickness increased. The contemplation of this woman had an enervating effect upon him, like the use of a perfume that is too strong. It penetrated into the very depths of his nature, and became almost a kind of habitual sensation, a new mode of existence.

The prostitutes whom he brushed past under the gaslight, the female ballad-singers breaking into bursts of melody, the ladies rising on horseback at full gallop, the shopkeepers' wives on foot, the grisettes at their windows, all women brought her before his mental vision, either from the effect of their resemblance to her or the violent contrast to her which they presented. As he walked along by the shops, he gazed at the cashmeres, the laces, and the jewelled eardrops, imagining how they would look draped around her figure, sewn in her corsage, or lighting up her dark hair. In the flower-girls' baskets the bouquets blossomed for her to choose one as she passed. In the shoemakers' show-windows the little satin slippers with swan's-down edges seemed to be waiting for her foot. Every street led towards her house; the hackney-coaches stood in their places to carry her home the more quickly; Paris was associated with her person, and the great city, with all its noises, roared around her like an immense orchestra.

When he went into the Jardin des Plantes the sight of a palm-tree carried him off into distant countries. They were travelling together on the backs of dromedaries, under the awnings of elephants, in the cabin of a yacht amongst the blue archipelagoes, or side by side on mules with little bells attached to them who went stumbling through the grass against broken columns. Sometimes he stopped in the Louvre before old pictures; and, his love embracing her even in vanished centuries, he substituted her for the personages in the paintings. Wearing a hennin on her head, she was praying on bended knees before a stained-glass window. Lady Paramount of Castile or Flanders, she remained seated in a starched ruff and a body lined with whalebone with big puffs. Then he saw her descending some wide porphyry staircase in the midst of senators under a dais of ostriches' feathers in a robe of brocade. At another time he dreamed of her in yellow silk trousers on the cushions of a harem — and all that was beautiful, the scintillation of the stars, certain tunes in music, the turn of a phrase, the outlines of a face, led him to think about her in an abrupt, unconscious fashion.

As for trying to make her his mistress, he was sure that any such attempt would be futile.

One evening, Dittmer, on his arrival, kissed her on the forehead; Lovarias did the same, observing:

"You give me leave — don't you? — as it is a friend's privilege?"

Frederick stammered out:

"It seems to me that we are all friends."

"Not all old friends!" she returned.

This was repelling him beforehand indirectly.

Besides, what was he to do? To tell her that he loved her? No doubt, she would decline to listen to him or else she would feel indignant and turn him out of the house. But he preferred to submit to even the most painful ordeal rather than run the horrible risk of seeing her no more. He envied pianists for their talents and soldiers for their scars. He longed for a dangerous attack of sickness, hoping in this way to make her take an interest in him.

One thing caused astonishment to himself, that he felt in no way jealous of Arnoux; and he could not picture her in his imagination undressed, so natural did her modesty appear, and so far did her sex recede into a mysterious background.

Nevertheless, he dreamed of the happiness of living with her, of "theeing" and "thouing" her, of passing his hand lingeringly over her head-bands, or remaining in a kneeling posture on the floor, with both arms clasped round her waist, so as to drink in her soul through his eyes. To accomplish this it would be necessary to conquer Fate; and so, incapable of action, cursing God, and accusing himself of being a coward, he kept moving restlessly within the confines of his passion just as a prisoner keeps moving about in his dungeon. The pangs which he was perpetually enduring were choking him. For hours he would remain quite motionless, or else he would burst into tears; and one day when he had not the strength to restrain his emotion, Deslauriers said to him:

"Why, goodness gracious! what's the matter with you?"

Frederick's nerves were unstrung. Deslauriers did not believe a word of it. At the sight of so much mental anguish, he felt all his old affection reawakening, and he tried to cheer up his friend. A man like him to let himself be depressed, what folly! It was all very well while one was young; but, as one grows older, it is only loss of time.

"You are spoiling my Frederick for me! I want him whom I knew in bygone days. The same boy as ever! I liked him! Come, smoke a pipe, old chap! Shake yourself up a little! You drive me mad!"

"It is true," said Frederick, "I am a fool!"

The clerk replied:

"Ah! old troubadour, I know well what's troubling you! A little affair of the heart? Confess it! Bah! One lost, four found instead! We console ourselves for virtuous women with the other sort. Would you like me to introduce you to some women? You have only to come to the Alhambra."

(This was a place for public balls recently opened at the top of the Champs-Élysées, which had gone down owing to a display of licentiousness somewhat ruder than is usual in establishments of the kind.)

"That's a place where there seems to be good fun. You can take your friends, if you like. I can even pass in Regimbart for you."

Frederick did not think fit to ask the Citizen to go. Deslauriers deprived himself of the pleasure of Sénécal's society. They took only Hussonnet and Cisy along with Dussardier; and the same hackney-coach set the group of five down at the entrance of the Alhambra.

Two Moorish galleries extended on the right and on the left, parallel to one another. The wall of a house opposite occupied the entire backguard; and the fourth side (that in which the restaurant was) represented a Gothic cloister with stained-glass windows. A sort of Chinese roof screened the platform reserved for the musicians. The ground was covered all over with asphalt; the Venetian lanterns fastened to posts formed, at regular intervals, crowns of many-coloured flame above the heads of the dancers. A pedestal here and there supported a stone basin, from which rose a thin streamlet of water. In the midst of the foliage could be seen plaster statues, and Hebes and Cupid, painted in oil, and presenting a very sticky appearance; and the numerous walks, garnished with sand of a deep yellow, carefully raked, made the garden look much larger than it was in reality.

Students were walking their mistresses up and down; drapers' clerks strutted about with canes in their hands; lads fresh from college were smoking their regalias; old men had their dyed beards smoothed out with combs. There were English, Russians, men from South America, and three Orientals in tarbooshes. Lorettes, grisettes, and girls of the town had come there in the hope of finding a protector, a lover, a gold coin, or simply for the pleasure of dancing; and their dresses, with tunics of water-green, cherry-red, or violet, swept along, fluttered between the ebony-trees and the lilacs. Nearly all the men's clothes were of striped material; some of them had white trousers, in spite of the coolness of the evening. The gas was lighted.

Hussonnet was acquainted with a number of the women through his connection with the fashion-journals and the smaller theatres. He sent them kisses with the tips of his fingers, and from time to time he quitted his friends to go and chat with them.

Deslauriers felt jealous of these playful familiarities. He accosted in a cynical manner a tall, fair-haired girl, in a nankeen costume. After looking at him with a certain air of sullenness, she said:

"No! I wouldn't trust you, my good fellow!" and turned on her heel.

His next attack was on a stout brunette, who apparently was a little mad; for she gave a bounce at the very first word he spoke to her, threatening, if he went any further, to call the police. Deslauriers made an effort to laugh; then, coming across a little woman sitting by herself under a gas-lamp, he asked her to be his partner in a quadrille.

The musicians, perched on the platform in the attitude of apes, kept scraping and blowing away with desperate energy. The conductor, standing up, kept beating time automatically. The dancers were much crowded and enjoyed themselves thoroughly. The bonnet-strings, getting loose, rubbed against the cravats; the boots sank under the petticoats; and all this bouncing went on to the accompaniment of the music. Deslauriers hugged the little woman, and, seized with the delirium of the cancan, whirled about, like a big marionnette, in the midst of the dancers. Cisy and Deslauriers were still promenading up and down. The young aristocrat kept ogling the girls, and, in spite of the clerk's exhortations, did not venture to talk to them, having an idea in his head that in the resorts of these women there was always "a man hidden in the cupboard with a pistol who would come out of it and force you to sign a bill of exchange."

They came back and joined Frederick. Deslauriers had stopped dancing; and they were all asking themselves how they were to finish up the evening, when Hussonnet exclaimed:

"Look! Here's the Marquise d'Amaëgui!"

The person referred to was a pale woman with a retroussé nose, mittens up to her elbows, and big black earrings hanging down her cheeks, like two dog's ears. Hussonnet said to her:

"We ought to organise a little fête at your house — a sort of Oriental rout. Try to collect some of your friends here for these French cavaliers. Well, what is annoying you? Are you going to wait for your hidalgo?"

The Andalusian hung down her head: being well aware of the by no means lavish habits of her friend, she was afraid of having to pay for any refreshments he ordered. When, at length, she let the word "money" slip from her, Cisy offered five napoleons — all he had in his purse; and so it was settled that the thing should come off.

But Frederick was absent. He fancied that he had recognised the voice of Arnoux, and got a glimpse of a woman's hat; and accordingly he hastened towards an arbour which was not far off.

Mademoiselle Vatnaz was alone there with Arnoux.

"Excuse me! I am in the way?"

"Not in the least!" returned the picture-merchant.

Frederick, from the closing words of their conversation, understood that Arnoux had come to the Alhambra to talk over a pressing matter of business with Mademoiselle Vatnaz; and it was evident that he was not completely reassured, for he said to her, with some uneasiness in his manner:

"You are quite sure?"

"Perfectly certain! You are loved. Ah! what a man you are!"

And she assumed a pouting look, putting out her big lips, so red that they seemed tinged with blood. But she had wonderful eyes, of a tawny hue, with specks of gold in the pupils, full of vivacity, amorousness, and sensuality. They illuminated, like lamps, the rather yellow tint of her thin face. Arnoux seemed to enjoy her exhibition of pique. He stooped over her, saying:

"You are nice — give me a kiss!"

She caught hold of his two ears, and pressed her lips against his forehead.

At that moment the dancing stopped; and in the conductor's place appeared a handsome young man, rather fat, with a waxen complexion. He had long black hair, which he wore in the same fashion as Christ, and a blue velvet waistcoat embroidered with large gold palm-branches. He looked as proud as a peacock, and as stupid as a turkey-cock; and, having bowed to the audience, he began a ditty. A villager was supposed to be giving an account of his journey to the capital. The singer used the dialect of Lower Normandy, and played the part of a drunken man. The refrain — was greeted with enthusiastic stampings of feet. Delmas, "a vocalist who sang with expression," was too shrewd to let the excitement of his listeners cool. A guitar was quickly handed to him and he moaned forth a ballad entitled "The Albanian Girl's Brother."

"Ah! I laughed at you there, I laughed at you there, In that rascally city of Paris!"

The words recalled to Frederick those which had been sung by the man in rags between the paddle-boxes of the steamboat. His eyes involuntarily attached themselves to the hem of the dress spread out before him.

After each couplet there was a long pause, and the blowing of the wind through the trees resembled the sound of the waves.

Mademoiselle Vatnaz blushed the moment she saw Dussardier. She soon rose, and stretching out her hand towards him:

"You do not remember me, Monsieur Auguste?"

"How do you know her?" asked Frederick.

"We have been in the same house," he replied.

Cisy pulled him by the sleeve; they went out; and, scarcely had they disappeared, when Madame Vatnaz began to pronounce a eulogy on his character. She even went so far as to add that he possessed "the genius of the heart."

Then they chatted about Delmas, admitting that as a mimic he might be a success on the stage; and a discussion followed in which Shakespeare, the Censorship, Style, the People, the receipts of the Porte Saint-Martin, Alexandre Dumas, Victor Hugo, and Dumersan were all mixed up together.

Arnoux had known many celebrated actresses; the young men bent forward their heads to hear what he had to say about these ladies. But his words were drowned in the noise of the music; and, as soon as the quadrille or the polka was over, they all squatted round the tables, called the waiter, and laughed. Bottles of beer and of effervescent lemonade went off with detonations amid the foliage; women clucked like hens; now and then, two gentlemen tried to fight; and a thief was arrested. The dancers, in the rush of a gallop, encroached on the walks. Panting, with flushed, smiling faces, they filed off in a whirlwind which lifted up the gowns with the coat-tails. The trombones brayed more loudly; the rhythmic movement became more rapid. Behind the mediæval cloister could be heard crackling sounds; squibs went off; artificial suns began turning round; the gleam of the Bengal fires, like emeralds in colour, lighted up for the space of a minute the entire garden; and, with the last rocket, a great sigh escaped from the assembled throng.

It slowly died away. A cloud of gunpowder floated into the air. Frederick and Deslauriers were walking step by step through the midst of the crowd, when they happened to see something that made them suddenly stop: Martinon was in the act of paying some money at the place where umbrellas were left; and he was accompanying a woman of fifty, plain-looking, magnificently dressed, and of problematic social rank.

"That sly dog," said Deslauriers, "is not so simple as we imagine. But where in the world is Cisy?"

Dussardier pointed out to them the smoking-divan, where they perceived the knightly youth, with a bowl of punch before him, and a pink hat by his side, to keep him company. Hussonnet, who had been away for the past few minutes, reappeared at the same moment.

A young girl was leaning on his arm, and addressing him in a loud voice as "My little cat."

"Oh! no!" said he to her — "not in public! Call me rather 'Vicomte.' That gives you a cavalier style — Louis XIII. and dainty boots — the sort of thing I like! Yes, my good friends, one of the old régime! — nice, isn't she?" — and he chuckled her by the chin — "Salute these gentlemen! they are all the sons of peers of France. I keep company with them in order that they may get an appointment for me as an ambassador."

"How insane you are!" sighed Mademoiselle Vatnaz. She asked Dussardier to see her as far as her own door.

Arnoux watched them going off; then, turning towards Frederick:

"Did you like the Vatnaz? At any rate, you're not quite frank about these affairs. I believe you keep your amours hidden."

Frederick, turning pale, swore that he kept nothing hidden.

"Can it be possible you don't know what it is to have a mistress?" said Arnoux.

Frederick felt a longing to mention a woman's name at random. But the story might be repeated to her. So he replied that as a matter of fact he had no mistress.

The picture-dealer reproached him for this.

"This evening you had a good opportunity! Why didn't you do like the others, each of whom went off with a woman?"

"Well, and what about yourself?" said Frederick, provoked by his persistency.

"Oh! myself — that's quite a different matter, my lad! I go home to my own one!"

Then he called a cab, and disappeared.

The two friends walked towards their own destination. An east wind was blowing. They did not exchange a word. Deslauriers was regretting that he had not succeeded in making a shine before a certain newspaper-manager, and Frederick was lost once more in his melancholy broodings. At length, breaking silence, he said that this public-house ball appeared to him a stupid affair.

"Whose fault is it? If you had not left us, to join that Arnoux of yours — —"

"Bah! anything I could have done would have been utterly useless!"

But the clerk had theories of his own. All that was necessary in order to get a thing was to desire it strongly.

"Nevertheless, you yourself, a little while ago — —"

"I don't care a straw about that sort of thing!" returned Deslauriers, cutting short Frederick's allusion. "Am I going to get entangled with women?"

And he declaimed against their affectations, their silly ways — in short, he disliked them.

"Don't be acting, then!" said Frederick.

Deslauriers became silent. Then, all at once:

"Will you bet me a hundred francs that I won't do the first woman that passes?"

"Yes — it's a bet!"

The first who passed was a hideous-looking beggar-woman, and they were giving up all hope of a chance presenting itself when, in the middle of the Rue de Rivoli, they saw a tall girl with a little bandbox in her hand.

Deslauriers accosted her under the arcades. She turned up abruptly by the Tuileries, and soon diverged into the Place du Carrousel. She glanced to the right and to the left. She ran after a hackney-coach; Deslauriers overtook her. He walked by her side, talking to her with expressive gestures. At length, she accepted his arm, and they went on together along the quays. Then, when they reached the rising ground in front of the Châtelet, they kept tramping up and down for at least twenty minutes, like two sailors keeping watch. But, all of a sudden, they passed over the Pont-au-Change, through the Flower Market, and along the Quai Napoléon. Frederick came up behind them. Deslauriers gave him to understand that he would be in their way, and had only to follow his own example.

"How much have you got still?"

"Two hundred sous pieces."

"That's enough — good night to you!"

Frederick was seized with the astonishment one feels at seeing a piece of foolery coming to a successful issue.

"He has the laugh at me," was his reflection. "Suppose I went back again?"

Perhaps Deslauriers imagined that he was envious of this paltry love! "As if I had not one a hundred times more rare, more noble, more absorbing." He felt a sort of angry feeling impelling him onward. He arrived in front of Madame Arnoux's door.

None of the outer windows belonged to her apartment. Nevertheless, he remained with his eyes pasted on the front of the house — as if he fancied he could, by his contemplation, break open the walls. No doubt, she was now sunk in repose, tranquil as a sleeping flower, with her beautiful black hair resting on the lace of the pillow, her lips slightly parted, and one arm under her head. Then Arnoux's head rose before him, and he rushed away to escape from this vision.

The advice which Deslauriers had given to him came back to his memory. It only filled him with horror. Then he walked about the streets in a vagabond fashion.

When a pedestrian approached, he tried to distinguish the face. From time to time a ray of light passed between his legs, tracing a great quarter of a circle on the pavement; and in the shadow a man appeared with his dosser and his lantern. The wind, at certain points, made the sheet-iron flue of a chimney shake. Distant sounds reached his ears, mingling with the buzzing in his brain; and it seemed to him that he was listening to the indistinct flourish of quadrille music. His movements as he walked on kept up this illusion. He found himself on the Pont de la Concorde.

Then he recalled that evening in the previous winter, when, as he left her house for the first time, he was forced to stand still, so rapidly did his heart beat with the hopes that held it in their clasp. And now they had all withered!

Dark clouds were drifting across the face of the moon. He gazed at it, musing on the vastness of space, the wretchedness of life, the nothingness of everything. The day dawned; his teeth began to chatter, and, half-asleep, wet with the morning mist, and bathed in tears, he asked himself, Why should I not make an end of it? All that was necessary was a single movement. The weight of his forehead dragged him along — he beheld his own dead body floating in the water. Frederick stooped down. The parapet was rather wide, and it was through pure weariness that he did not make the attempt to leap over it.

Then a feeling of dismay swept over him. He reached the boulevards once more, and sank down upon a seat. He was aroused by some police-officers, who were convinced that he had been indulging a little too freely.

He resumed his walk. But, as he was exceedingly hungry, and as all the restaurants were closed, he went to get a "snack" at a tavern by the fish-markets; after which, thinking it too soon to go in yet, he kept sauntering about the Hôtel de Ville till a quarter past eight.

Deslauriers had long since got rid of his wench; and he was writing at the table in the middle of his room. About four o'clock, M. de Cisy came in.

Thanks to Dussardier, he had enjoyed the society of a lady the night before; and he had even accompanied her home in the carriage with her husband to the very threshold of their house, where she had given him an assignation. He parted with her without even knowing her name.

"And what do you propose that I should do in that way?" said Frederick.

Thereupon the young gentleman began to cudgel his brains to think of a suitable woman; he mentioned Mademoiselle Vatnaz, the Andalusian, and all the rest. At length, with much circumlocution, he stated the object of his visit. Relying on the discretion of his friend, he came to aid him in taking an important step, after which he might definitely regard himself as a man; and Frederick showed no reluctance. He told the story to Deslauriers without relating the facts with reference to himself personally.

The clerk was of opinion that he was now going on very well. This respect for his advice increased his good humour. He owed to that quality his success, on the very first night he met her, with Mademoiselle Clémence Daviou, embroideress in gold for military outfits, the sweetest creature that ever lived, as slender as a reed, with large blue eyes, perpetually staring with wonder. The clerk had taken advantage of her credulity to such an extent as to make her believe that he had been decorated. At their private conversations he had his frock-coat adorned with a red ribbon, but divested himself of it in public in order, as he put it, not to humiliate his master. However, he kept her at a distance, allowed himself to be fawned upon, like a pasha, and, in a laughing sort of way, called her "daughter of the people." Every time they met, she brought him little bunches of violets. Frederick would not have cared for a love affair of this sort.

Meanwhile, whenever they set forth arm-in-arm to visit Pinson's or Barillot's circulating library, he experienced a feeling of singular depression. Frederick did not realise how much pain he had made Deslauriers endure for the past year, while brushing his nails before going out to dine in the Rue de Choiseul!

One evening, when from the commanding position in which his balcony stood, he had just been watching them as they went out together, he saw Hussonnet, some distance off, on the Pont d'Arcole. The Bohemian began calling him by making signals towards him, and, when Frederick had descended the five flights of stairs:

"Here is the thing — it is next Saturday, the 24th, Madame Arnoux's feast-day."

"How is that, when her name is Marie?"

"And Angèle also — no matter! They will entertain their guests at their country-house at Saint-Cloud. I was told to give you due notice about it. You'll find a vehicle at the magazine-office at three o'clock. So that makes matters all right! Excuse me for having disturbed you! But I have such a number of calls to make!"

Frederick had scarcely turned round when his door-keeper placed a letter in his hand:

"Monsieur and Madame Dambreuse beg of Monsieur F. Moreau to do them the honour to come and dine with them on Saturday the 24th inst. — R.S.V.P."

"Too late!" he said to himself. Nevertheless, he showed the letter to Deslauriers, who exclaimed:

"Ha! at last! But you don't look as if you were satisfied. Why?"

After some little hesitation, Frederick said that he had another invitation for the same day.

"Be kind enough to let me run across to the Rue de Choiseul. I'm not joking! I'll answer this for you if it puts you about."

And the clerk wrote an acceptance of the invitation in the third person.

Having seen nothing of the world save through the fever of his desires, he pictured it to himself as an artificial creation discharging its functions by virtue of mathematical laws. A dinner in the city, an accidental meeting with a man in office, a smile from a pretty woman, might, by a series of actions deducing themselves from one another, have gigantic results. Certain Parisian drawing-rooms were like those machines which take a material in the rough and render it a hundred times more valuable. He believed in courtesans advising diplomatists, in wealthy marriages brought about by intrigues, in the cleverness of convicts, in the capacity of strong men for getting the better of fortune. In short, he considered it so useful to visit the Dambreses, and talked about it so plausibly, that Frederick was at a loss to know what was the best course to take.

The least he ought to do, as it was Madame Arnoux's feast-day, was to make her a present. He naturally thought of a parasol, in order to make reparation for his awkwardness. Now he came across a shot-silk parasol with a little carved ivory handle, which had come all the way from China. But the price of it was a hundred and seventy-five francs, and he had not a sou, having in fact to live on the credit of his next quarter's allowance. However, he wished to get it; he was determined to have it; and, in spite of his repugnance to doing so, he had recourse to Deslauriers.

Deslauriers answered Frederick's first question by saying that he had no money.

"I want some," said Frederick — "I want some very badly!"

As the other made the same excuse over again, he flew into a passion.

"You might find it to your advantage some time — —"

"What do you mean by that?"

"Oh! nothing."

The clerk understood. He took the sum required out of his reserve-fund, and when he had counted out the money, coin by coin:

"I am not asking you for a receipt, as I see you have a lot of expense!"

Frederick threw himself on his friend's neck with a thousand affectionate protestations. Deslauriers received this display of emotion frigidly. Then, next morning, noticing the parasol on the top of the piano:

"Ah! it was for that!"

"I will send it, perhaps," said Frederick, with an air of carelessness.

Good fortune was on his side, for that evening he got a note with a black border from Madame Dambreuse announcing to him that she had lost an uncle, and excusing herself for having to defer till a later period the pleasure of making his acquaintance. At two o'clock, he reached the office of the art journal. Instead of waiting for him in order to drive him in his carriage, Arnoux had left the city the night before, unable to resist his desire to get some fresh air.

Every year it was his custom, as soon as the leaves were budding forth, to start early in the morning and to remain away several days, making long journeys across the fields, drinking milk at the farm-houses, romping with the village girls, asking questions about the harvest, and carrying back home with him stalks of salad in his pocket-handkerchief. At length, in order to realise a long-cherished dream of his, he had bought a country-house.

While Frederick was talking to the picture-dealer's clerk, Mademoiselle Vatnaz suddenly made her appearance, and was disappointed at not seeing Arnoux. He would, perhaps, be remaining away two days longer. The clerk advised her "to go there" — she could not go there; to write a letter — she was afraid that the letter might get lost. Frederick offered to be the bearer of it himself. She rapidly scribbled off a letter, and implored of him to let nobody see him delivering it.

Forty minutes afterwards, he found himself at Saint-Cloud. The house, which was about a hundred paces farther away than the bridge, stood half-way up the hill. The garden-walls were hidden by two rows of linden-trees, and a wide lawn descended to the bank of the river. The railed entrance before the door was open, and Frederick went in.

Arnoux, stretched on the grass, was playing with a litter of kittens. This amusement appeared to absorb him completely. Mademoiselle Vatnaz's letter drew him out of his sleepy idleness.

"The deuce! the deuce! — this is a bore! She is right, though; I must go."

Then, having stuck the missive into his pocket, he showed the young man through the grounds with manifest delight. He pointed out everything — the stable, the cart-house, the kitchen. The drawing-room was at the right, on the side facing Paris, and looked out on a floored arbour, covered over with clematis. But presently a few harmonious notes burst forth above their heads: Madame Arnoux, fancying that there was nobody near, was singing to amuse herself. She executed quavers, trills, arpeggios. There were long notes which seemed to remain suspended in the air; others fell in a rushing shower like the spray of a waterfall; and her voice passing out through the Venetian blind, cut its way through the deep silence and rose towards the blue sky. She ceased all at once, when M. and Madame Oudry, two neighbours, presented themselves.

Then she appeared herself at the top of the steps in front of the house; and, as she descended, he caught a glimpse of her foot. She wore little open shoes of reddish-brown leather, with three straps crossing each other so as to draw just above her stockings a wirework of gold.

Those who had been invited arrived. With the exception of Maître Lefaucheur, an advocate, they were the same guests who came to the Thursday dinners. Each of them had brought some present — Dittmer a Syrian scarf, Rosenwald a scrap-book of ballads, Burieu a water-colour painting, Sombary one of his own caricatures, and Pellerin a charcoal-drawing, representing a kind of dance of death, a hideous fantasy, the execution of which was rather poor. Hussonnet dispensed with the formality of a present.

Frederick was waiting to offer his, after the others.

She thanked him very much for it. Thereupon, he said:

"Why, 'tis almost a debt. I have been so much annoyed — —"

"At what, pray?" she returned. "I don't understand."

"Come! dinner is waiting!" said Arnoux, catching hold of his arm; then in a whisper: "You are not very knowing, certainly!"

Nothing could well be prettier than the dining-room, painted in water-green. At one end, a nymph of stone was dipping her toe in a basin formed like a shell. Through the open windows the entire garden could be seen with the long lawn flanked by an old Scotch fir, three-quarters stripped bare; groups of flowers swelled it out in unequal plots; and at the other side of the river extended in a wide semi-circle the Bois de Boulogne, Neuilly, Sèvres, and Meudon. Before the railed gate in front a canoe with sail outspread was tacking about.

They chatted first about the view in front of them, then about scenery in general; and they were beginning to plunge into discussions when Arnoux, at half-past nine o'clock, ordered the horse to be put to the carriage.

"Would you like me to go back with you?" said Madame Arnoux.

"Why, certainly!" and, making her a graceful bow: "You know well, madame, that it is impossible to live without you!"

Everyone congratulated her on having so good a husband.

"Ah! it is because I am not the only one," she replied quietly, pointing towards her little daughter.

Then, the conversation having turned once more on painting, there was some talk about a Ruysdaël, for which Arnoux expected a big sum, and Pellerin asked him if it were true that the celebrated Saul Mathias from London had come over during the past month to make him an offer of twenty-three thousand francs for it.

"'Tis a positive fact!" and turning towards Frederick: "That was the very same gentleman I brought with me a few days ago to the Alhambra, much against my will, I assure you, for these English are by no means amusing companions."

Frederick, who suspected that Mademoiselle Vatnaz's letter contained some reference to an intrigue, was amazed at the facility with which my lord Arnoux found a way of passing it off as a perfectly honourable transaction; but his new lie, which was quite needless, made the young man open his eyes in speechless astonishment.

The picture-dealer added, with an air of simplicity:

"What's the name, by-the-by, of that young fellow, your friend?"

"Deslauriers," said Frederick quickly.

And, in order to repair the injustice which he felt he had done to his comrade, he praised him as one who possessed remarkable ability.

"Ah! indeed? But he doesn't look such a fine fellow as the other — the clerk in the wagon-office."

Frederick bestowed a mental imprecation on Dussardier. She would now be taking it for granted that he associated with the common herd.

Then they began to talk about the ornamentation of the capital — the new districts of the city — and the worthy Oudry happened to refer to M. Dambreuse as one of the big speculators.

Frederick, taking advantage of the opportunity to make a good figure, said he was acquainted with that gentleman. But Pellerin launched into a harangue against shopkeepers — he saw no difference between them, whether they were sellers of candles or of money. Then Rosenwald and Burieu talked about old china; Arnoux chatted with Madame Oudry about gardening; Sombary, a comical character of the old school, amused himself by chaffing her husband, referring to him sometimes as "Odry," as if he were the actor of that name, and remarking that he must be descended from Oudry, the dog-painter, seeing that the bump of the animals was visible on his forehead. He even wanted to feel M. Oudry's skull; but the latter excused himself on account of his wig; and the dessert ended with loud bursts of laughter.

When they had taken their coffee, while they smoked, under the linden-trees, and strolled about the garden for some time, they went out for a walk along the river.

The party stopped in front of a fishmonger's shop, where a man was washing eels. Mademoiselle Marthe wanted to look at them. He emptied the box in which he had them out on the grass; and the little girl threw herself on her knees in order to catch them, laughed with delight, and then began to scream with terror. They all got spoiled, and Arnoux paid for them.

He next took it into his head to go out for a sail in the cutter.

One side of the horizon was beginning to assume a pale aspect, while on the other side a wide strip of orange colour showed itself in the sky, deepening into purple at the summits of the hills, which were steeped in shadow. Madame Arnoux seated herself on a big stone with this glittering splendour at her back. The other ladies sauntered about here and there. Hussonnet, at the lower end of the river's bank, went making ducks and drakes over the water.

Arnoux presently returned, followed by a weather-beaten long boat, into which, in spite of the most prudent remonstrances, he packed his guests. The boat got upset, and they had to go ashore again.

By this time wax-tapers were burning in the drawing-room, all hung with chintz, and with branched candlesticks of crystal fixed close to the walls. Mère Oudry was sleeping comfortably in an armchair, and the others were listening to M. Lefaucheux expatiating on the glories of the Bar. Madame Arnoux was sitting by herself near the window. Frederick came over to her.

They chatted about the remarks which were being made in their vicinity. She admired oratory; he preferred the renown gained by authors. But, she ventured to suggest, it must give a man greater pleasure to move crowds directly by addressing them in person, face to face, than it does to infuse into their souls by his pen all the sentiments that animate his own. Such triumphs as these did not tempt Frederick much, as he had no ambition.

Then he broached the subject of sentimental adventures. She spoke pityingly of the havoc wrought by passion, but expressed indignation at hypocritical vileness, and this rectitude of spirit harmonised so well with the regular beauty of her face that it seemed indeed as if her physical attractions were the outcome of her moral nature.

She smiled, every now and then, letting her eyes rest on him for a minute. Then he felt her glances penetrating his soul like those great rays of sunlight which descend into the depths of the water. He loved her without mental reservation, without any hope of his love being returned, unconditionally; and in those silent transports, which were like outbursts of gratitude, he would fain have covered her forehead with a rain of kisses. However, an inspiration from within carried him beyond himself — he felt moved by a longing for self-sacrifice, an imperative impulse towards immediate self-devotion, and all the stronger from the fact that he could not gratify it.

He did not leave along with the rest. Neither did Hussonnet. They were to go back in the carriage; and the vehicle was waiting just in front of the steps when Arnoux rushed down and hurried into the garden to gather some flowers there. Then the bouquet having been tied round with a thread, as the stems fell down unevenly, he searched in his pocket, which was full of papers, took out a piece at random, wrapped them up, completed his handiwork with the aid of a strong pin, and then offered it to his wife with a certain amount of tenderness.

"Look here, my darling! Excuse me for having forgotten you!"

But she uttered a little scream: the pin, having been awkwardly fixed, had cut her, and she hastened up to her room. They waited nearly a quarter of an hour for her. At last, she reappeared, carried off Marthe, and threw herself into the carriage.

"And your bouquet?" said Arnoux.

"No! no — it is not worth while!" Frederick was running off to fetch it for her; she called out to him:

"I don't want it!"

But he speedily brought it to her, saying that he had just put it into an envelope again, as he had found the flowers lying on the floor. She thrust them behind the leathern apron of the carriage close to the seat, and off they started.

Frederick, seated by her side, noticed that she was trembling frightfully. Then, when they had passed the bridge, as Arnoux was turning to the left:

"Why, no! you are making a mistake! — that way, to the right!"

She seemed irritated; everything annoyed her. At length, Marthe having closed her eyes, Madame Arnoux drew forth the bouquet, and flung it out through the carriage-door, then caught Frederick's arm, making a sign to him with the other hand to say nothing about it.

After this, she pressed her handkerchief against her lips, and sat quite motionless.

The two others, on the dickey, kept talking about printing and about subscribers. Arnoux, who was driving recklessly, lost his way in the middle of the Bois de Boulogne. Then they plunged into narrow paths. The horse proceeded along at a walking pace; the branches of the trees grazed the hood. Frederick could see nothing of Madame Arnoux save her two eyes in the shade. Marthe lay stretched across her lap while he supported the child's head.

"She is tiring you!" said her mother.

He replied:

"No! Oh, no!"

Whirlwinds of dust rose up slowly. They passed through Auteuil. All the houses were closed up; a gas-lamp here and there lighted up the angle of a wall; then once more they were surrounded by darkness. At one time he noticed that she was shedding tears.

Was this remorse or passion? What in the world was it? This grief, of whose exact nature he was ignorant, interested him like a personal matter. There was now a new bond between them, as if, in a sense, they were accomplices; and he said to her in the most caressing voice he could assume:

"You are ill?"

"Yes, a little," she returned.

The carriage rolled on, and the honeysuckles and the syringas trailed over the garden fences, sending forth puffs of enervating odour into the night air. Her gown fell around her feet in numerous folds. It seemed to him as if he were in communication with her entire person through the medium of this child's body which lay stretched between them. He stooped over the little girl, and spreading out her pretty brown tresses, kissed her softly on the forehead.

"You are good!" said Madame Arnoux.

"Why?"

"Because you are fond of children."

"Not all!"

He said no more, but he let his left hand hang down her side wide open, fancying that she would follow his example perhaps, and that he would find her palm touching his. Then he felt ashamed and withdrew it. They soon reached the paved street. The carriage went on more quickly; the number of gas-lights vastly increased — it was Paris. Hussonnet, in front of the lumber-room, jumped down from his seat. Frederick waited till they were in the courtyard before alighting; then he lay in ambush at the corner of the Rue de Choiseul, and saw Arnoux slowly making his way back to the boulevards.

Next morning he began working as hard as ever he could.

He saw himself in an Assize Court, on a winter's evening, at the close of the advocates' speeches, when the jurymen are looking pale, and when the panting audience make the partitions of the prætorium creak; and after having being four hours speaking, he was recapitulating all his proofs, feeling with every phrase, with every word, with every gesture, the chopper of the guillotine, which was suspended behind him, rising up; then in the tribune of the Chamber, an orator who bears on his lips the safety of an entire people, drowning his opponents under his figures of rhetoric, crushing them under a repartee, with thunders and musical intonations in his voice, ironical, pathetic, fiery, sublime. She would be there somewhere in the midst of the others, hiding beneath her veil her enthusiastic tears. After that they would meet again, and he would be unaffected by discouragements, calumnies, and insults, if she would only say, "Ah, that is beautiful!" while drawing her light hand across his brow.

These images flashed, like beacon-lights, on the horizon of his life. His intellect, thereby excited, became more active and more vigorous. He buried himself in study till the month of August, and was successful at his final examination.

Deslauriers, who had found it so troublesome to coach him once more for the second examination at the close of December, and for the third in February, was astonished at his ardour. Then the great expectations of former days returned. In ten years it was probable that Frederick would be deputy; in fifteen a minister. Why not? With his patrimony, which would soon come into his hands, he might, at first, start a newspaper; this would be the opening step in his career; after that they would see what the future would bring. As for himself, he was still ambitious of obtaining a chair in the Law School; and he sustained his thesis for the degree of Doctor in such a remarkable fashion that it won for him the compliments of the professors.

Three days afterwards, Frederick took his own degree. Before leaving for his holidays, he conceived the idea of getting up a picnic to bring to a close their Saturday reunions.

He displayed the utmost gaiety on the occasion. Madame Arnoux was now with her mother at Chartres. But he would soon come across her again, and would end by being her lover.

Deslauriers, admitted the same day to the young advocates' pleading rehearsals at Orsay, had made a speech which was greatly applauded. Although he was sober, he drank a little more wine than was good for him, and said to Dussardier at dessert:

"You are an honest fellow! — and, when I'm a rich man, I'll make you my manager."

All were in a state of delight. Cisy was not going to finish his law-course. Martinon intended to remain during the period before his admission to the Bar in the provinces, where he would be nominated a deputy-magistrate. Pellerin was devoting himself to the production of a large picture representing "The Genius of the Revolution." Hussonnet was, in the following week, about to read for the Director of Public Amusements the scheme of a play, and had no doubt as to its success:

"As for the framework of the drama, they may leave that to me! As for the passions, I have knocked about enough to understand them thoroughly; and as for witticisms, they're entirely in my line!"

He gave a spring, fell on his two hands, and thus moved for some time around the table with his legs in the air. This performance, worthy of a street-urchin, did not get rid of Sénécal's frowns. He had just been dismissed from the boarding-school, in which he had been a teacher, for having given a whipping to an aristocrat's son. His straitened circumstances had got worse in consequence: he laid the blame of this on the inequalities of society, and cursed the wealthy. He poured out his grievances into the sympathetic ears of Regimbart, who had become every day more and more disillusioned, saddened, and disgusted. The Citizen had now turned his attention towards questions arising out of the Budget, and blamed the Court party for the loss of millions in Algeria.

As he could not sleep without having paid a visit to the Alexandre smoking-divan, he disappeared at eleven o'clock. The rest went away some time afterwards; and Frederick, as he was parting with Hussonnet, learned that Madame Arnoux was to have come back the night before.

He accordingly went to the coach-office to change his time for starting to the next day; and, at about six o'clock in the evening, presented himself at her house. Her return, the door keeper said, had been put off for a week. Frederick dined alone, and then lounged about the boulevards.

Rosy clouds, scarf-like in form, stretched beyond the roofs; the shop-tents were beginning to be taken away; water-carts were letting a shower of spray fall over the dusty pavement; and an unexpected coolness was mingled with emanations from cafés, as one got a glimpse through their open doors, between some silver plate and gilt ware, of flowers in sheaves, which were reflected in the large sheets of glass. The crowd moved on at a leisurely pace. Groups of men were chatting in the middle of the footpath; and women passed along with an indolent expression in their eyes and that camelia tint in their complexions which intense heat imparts to feminine flesh. Something immeasurable in its vastness seemed to pour itself out and enclose the houses. Never had Paris looked so beautiful. He saw nothing before him in the future but an interminable series of years all full of love.

He stopped in front of the theatre of the Porte Saint-Martin to look at the bill; and, for want of something to occupy him, paid for a seat and went in.

An old-fashioned dramatic version of a fairy-tale was the piece on the stage. There was a very small audience; and through the skylights of the top gallery the vault of heaven seemed cut up into little blue squares, whilst the stage lamps above the orchestra formed a single line of yellow illuminations. The scene represented a slave-market at Pekin, with hand-bells, tomtoms, sweeping robes, sharp-pointed caps, and clownish jokes. Then, as soon as the curtain fell, he wandered into the foyer all alone and gazed out with admiration at a large green landau which stood on the boulevard outside, before the front steps of the theatre, yoked to two white horses, while a coachman with short breeches held the reins.

He had just got back to his seat when, in the balcony, a lady and a gentleman entered the first box in front of the stage. The husband had a pale face with a narrow strip of grey beard round it, the rosette of a Government official, and that frigid look which is supposed to characterise diplomatists.

His wife, who was at least twenty years younger, and who was neither tall nor under-sized, neither ugly nor pretty, wore her fair hair in corkscrew curls in the English fashion, and displayed a long-bodied dress and a large black lace fan. To make people so fashionable as these come to the theatre at such a season one would imagine either that there was some accidental cause, or that they had got tired of spending the evening in one another's society. The lady kept nibbling at her fan, while the gentleman yawned. Frederick could not recall to mind where he had seen that face.

In the next interval between the acts, while passing through one of the lobbies, he came face to face with both of them. As he bowed in an undecided manner, M. Dambreuse, at once recognising him, came up and apologised for having treated him with unpardonable neglect. It was an allusion to the numerous visiting-cards he had sent in accordance with the clerk's advice. However, he confused the periods, supposing that Frederick was in the second year of his law-course. Then he said he envied the young man for the opportunity of going into the country. He sadly needed a little rest himself, but business kept him in Paris.

Madame Dambreuse, leaning on his arm, nodded her head slightly, and the agreeable sprightliness of her face contrasted with its gloomy expression a short time before.

"One finds charming diversions in it, nevertheless," she said, after her husband's last remark. "What a stupid play that was — was it not, Monsieur?" And all three of them remained there chatting about theatres and new pieces.

Frederick, accustomed to the grimaces of provincial dames, had not seen in any woman such ease of manner combined with that simplicity which is the essence of refinement, and in which ingenuous souls trace the expression of instantaneous sympathy.

They would expect to see him as soon as he returned. M.

Dambreuse told him to give his kind remembrances to Père Roque.

Frederick, when he reached his lodgings, did not fail to inform Deslauriers of their hospitable invitation.

"Grand!" was the clerk's reply; "and don't let your mamma get round you! Come back without delay!"

On the day after his arrival, as soon as they had finished breakfast, Madame Moreau brought her son out into the garden.

She said she was happy to see him in a profession, for they were not as rich as people imagined. The land brought in little; the people who farmed it paid badly. She had even been compelled to sell her carriage. Finally, she placed their situation in its true colours before him.

During the first embarrassments which followed the death of her late husband, M. Roque, a man of great cunning, had made her loans of money which had been renewed, and left long unpaid, in spite of her desire to clear them off. He had suddenly made a demand for immediate payment, and she had gone beyond the strict terms of the agreement by giving up to him, at a contemptible figure, the farm of Presles. Ten years later, her capital disappeared through the failure of a banker at Melun. Through a horror which she had of mortgages, and to keep up appearances, which might be necessary in view of her son's future, she had, when Père Roque presented himself again, listened to him once more. But now she was free from debt. In short, there was left them an income of about ten thousand francs, of which two thousand three hundred belonged to him — his entire patrimony.

"It isn't possible!" exclaimed Frederick.

She nodded her head, as if to declare that it was perfectly possible.

But his uncle would leave him something?

That was by no means certain!

And they took a turn around the garden without exchanging a word. At last she pressed him to her heart, and in a voice choked with rising tears:

"Ah! my poor boy! I have had to give up my dreams!"

He seated himself on a bench in the shadow of the large acacia.

Her advice was that he should become a clerk to M. Prouharam, solicitor, who would assign over his office to him; if he increased its value, he might sell it again and find a good practice.

Frederick was no longer listening to her. He was gazing automatically across the hedge into the other garden opposite.

A little girl of about twelve with red hair happened to be there all alone. She had made earrings for herself with the berries of the service-tree. Her bodice, made of grey linen-cloth, allowed her shoulders, slightly gilded by the sun, to be seen. Her short white petticoat was spotted with the stains made by sweets; and there was, so to speak, the grace of a young wild animal about her entire person, at the same time, nervous and thin. Apparently, the presence of a stranger astonished her, for she had stopped abruptly with her watering-pot in her hand darting glances at him with her large bright eyes, which were of a limpid greenish-blue colour.

"That is M. Roque's daughter," said Madame Moreau. "He has just married his servant and legitimised the child that he had by her."

CHAPTER VI.

Blighted Hopes.

Ruined, stripped of everything, undermined!

He remained seated on the bench, as if stunned by a shock. He cursed Fate; he would have liked to beat somebody; and, to intensify his despair, he felt a kind of outrage, a sense of disgrace, weighing down upon him; for Frederick had been under the impression that the fortune coming to him through his father would mount up one day to an income of fifteen thousand livres, and he had so informed the Arnoux' in an indirect sort of way. So then he would be looked upon as a braggart, a rogue, an obscure blackguard, who had introduced himself to them in the expectation of making some profit out of it! And as for her — Madame Arnoux — how could he ever see her again now?

Moreover, that was completely impossible when he had only a yearly income of three thousand francs. He could not always lodge on the fourth floor, have the door keeper as a servant, and make his appearance with wretched black gloves turning blue at the ends, a greasy hat, and the same frock-coat for a whole year. No, no! never! And yet without her existence was intolerable. Many people were well able to live without any fortune, Deslauriers amongst the rest; and he thought himself a coward to attach so much importance to matters of trifling consequence. Need would perhaps multiply his faculties a hundredfold. He excited himself by thinking on the great men who had worked in garrets. A soul like that of Madame Arnoux ought to be touched at such a spectacle, and she would be moved by it to sympathetic tenderness. So, after all, this catastrophe was a piece of good fortune; like those earthquakes which unveil treasures, it had revealed to him the hidden wealth of his nature. But there was only one place in the world where this could be turned to account — Paris; for to his mind, art, science, and love (those three faces of God, as Pellerin would have said) were associated exclusively with the capital. That evening, he informed his mother of his intention to go back there. Madame Moreau was surprised and indignant. She regarded it as a foolish and absurd course. It would be better to follow her advice, namely, to remain near her in an office. Frederick shrugged his shoulders, "Come now" — looking on this proposal as an insult to himself.

Thereupon, the good lady adopted another plan. In a tender voice broken by sobs she began to dwell on her solitude, her old age, and the sacrifices she had made for him. Now that she was more unhappy than ever, he was abandoning her. Then, alluding to the anticipated close of her life:

"A little patience — good heavens! you will soon be free!"

These lamentations were renewed twenty times a day for three months; and at the same time the luxuries of a home made him effeminate. He found it enjoyable to have a softer bed and napkins that were not torn, so that, weary, enervated, overcome by the terrible force of comfort, Frederick allowed himself to be brought to Maître Prouharam's office.

He displayed there neither knowledge nor aptitude. Up to this time, he had been regarded as a young man of great means who ought to be the shining light of the Department. The public would now come to the conclusion that he had imposed upon them.

At first, he said to himself:

"It is necessary to inform Madame Arnoux about it;" and for a whole week he kept formulating in his own mind dithyrambic letters and short notes in an eloquent and sublime style. The fear of avowing his actual position restrained him. Then he thought that it was far better to write to the husband. Arnoux knew life and could understand the true state of the case. At length, after a fortnight's hesitation:

"Bah! I ought not to see them any more: let them forget me! At any rate, I shall be cherished in her memory without having sunk in her estimation! She will believe that I am dead, and will regret me — perhaps."

As extravagant resolutions cost him little, he swore in his own mind that he would never return to Paris, and that he would not even make any enquiries about Madame Arnoux.

Nevertheless, he regretted the very smell of the gas and the noise of the omnibuses. He mused on the things that she might have said to him, on the tone of her voice, on the light of her eyes — and, regarding himself as a dead man, he no longer did anything at all.

He arose very late, and looked through the window at the passing teams of wagoners. The first six months especially were hateful.

On certain days, however, he was possessed by a feeling of indignation even against her. Then he would go forth and wander through the meadows, half covered in winter time by the inundations of the Seine. They were cut up by rows of poplar-trees. Here and there arose a little bridge. He tramped about till evening, rolling the yellow leaves under his feet, inhaling the fog, and jumping over the ditches. As his arteries began to throb more vigorously, he felt himself carried away by a desire to do something wild; he longed to become a trapper in America, to attend on a pasha in the East, to take ship as a sailor; and he gave vent to his melancholy in long letters to Deslauriers.

The latter was struggling to get on. The slothful conduct of his friend and his eternal jeremiads appeared to him simply stupid. Their correspondence soon became a mere form. Frederick had given up all his furniture to Deslauriers, who stayed on in the same lodgings. From time to time his mother spoke to him. At length he one day told her about the present he had made, and she was giving him a rating for it, when a letter was placed in his hands.

"What is the matter now?" she said, "you are trembling?"

"There is nothing the matter with me," replied Frederick.

Deslauriers informed him that he had taken Sénécal under his protection, and that for the past fortnight they had been living together. So now Sénécal was exhibiting himself in the midst of things that had come from the Arnoux's shop. He might sell them, criticise, make jokes about them. Frederick felt wounded in the depths of his soul. He went up to his own apartment. He felt a yearning for death.

His mother called him to consult him about a plantation in the garden.

This garden was, after the fashion of an English park, cut in the middle by a stick fence; and the half of it belonged to Père Roque, who had another for vegetables on the bank of the river. The two neighbours, having fallen out, abstained from making their appearance there at the same hour. But since Frederick's return, the old gentleman used to walk about there more frequently, and was not stinted in his courtesies towards Madame Moreau's son. He pitied the young man for having to live in a country town. One day he told him that Madame Dambreuse had been anxious to hear from him. On another occasion he expatiated on the custom of Champagne, where the stomach conferred nobility.

"At that time you would have been a lord, since your mother's name was De Fouvens. And 'tis all very well to talk — never mind! there's something in a name. After all," he added, with a sly glance at Frederick, "that depends on the Keeper of the Seals."

This pretension to aristocracy contrasted strangely with his personal appearance. As he was small, his big chestnut-coloured frock-coat exaggerated the length of his bust. When he took off his hat, a face almost like that of a woman with an extremely sharp nose could be seen; his hair, which was of a yellow colour, resembled a wig. He saluted people with a very low bow, brushing against the wall.

Up to his fiftieth year, he had been content with the services of Catherine, a native of Lorraine, of the same age as himself, who was strongly marked with small-pox. But in the year 1834, he brought back with him from Paris a handsome blonde with a sheep-like type of countenance and a "queenly carriage." Ere long, she was observed strutting about with large earrings; and everything was explained by the birth of a daughter who was introduced to the world under the name of Elisabeth Olympe Louise Roque.

Catherine, in her first ebullition of jealousy, expected that she would curse this child. On the contrary, she became fond of the little girl, and treated her with the utmost care, consideration, and tenderness, in order to supplant her mother and render her odious — an easy task, inasmuch as Madame Éléonore entirely neglected the little one, preferring to gossip at the tradesmen's shops. On the day after her marriage, she went to pay a visit at the Sub-prefecture, no longer "thee'd" and "thou'd" the servants, and took it into her head that, as a matter of good form, she ought to exhibit a certain severity towards the child. She was present while the little one was at her lessons. The teacher, an old clerk who had been employed at the Mayor's office, did not know how to go about the work of instructing the girl. The pupil rebelled, got her ears boxed, and rushed away to shed tears on the lap of Catherine, who always took her part. After this the two women wrangled, and M. Roque ordered them to hold their tongues. He had married only out of tender regard for his daughter, and did not wish to be annoyed by them.

She often wore a white dress with ribbons, and pantalettes trimmed with lace; and on great festival-days she would leave the house attired like a princess, in order to mortify a little the matrons of the town, who forbade their brats to associate with her on account of her illegitimate birth.

She passed her life nearly always by herself in the garden, went seeing on the swing, chased butterflies, then suddenly stopped to watch the floral beetles swooping down on the rose-trees. It was, no doubt, these habits which imparted to her face an expression at the same time of audacity and dreaminess. She had, moreover, a figure like Marthe, so that Frederick said to her, at their second interview:

"Will you permit me to kiss you, mademoiselle?"

The little girl lifted up her head and replied:

"I will!"

But the stick-hedge separated them from one another.

"We must climb over," said Frederick.

"No, lift me up!"

He stooped over the hedge, and raising her off the ground with his hands, kissed her on both cheeks; then he put her back on her own side by a similar process; and this performance was repeated on the next occasions when they found themselves together.

Without more reserve than a child of four, as soon as she heard her friend coming, she sprang forward to meet him, or else, hiding behind a tree, she began yelping like a dog to frighten him.

One day, when Madame Moreau had gone out, he brought her up to his own room. She opened all the scent-bottles, and pomaded her hair plentifully; then, without the slightest embarrassment, she lay down on the bed, where she remained stretched out at full length, wide awake.

"I fancy myself your wife," she said to him.

Next day he found her all in tears. She confessed that she had been "weeping for her sins;" and, when he wished to know what they were, she hung down her head, and answered:

"Ask me no more!"

The time for first communion was at hand. She had been brought to confession in the morning. The sacrament scarcely made her wiser.

Occasionally, she got into a real passion; and Frederick was sent for to appease her.

He often brought her with him in his walks. While he indulged in day-dreams as he walked along, she would gather wild poppies at the edges of the corn-fields; and, when she saw him more melancholy than usual, she tried to console him with her pretty childish prattle. His heart, bereft of love, fell back on this friendship inspired by a little girl. He gave her sketches of old fogies, told her stories, and devoted himself to reading books for her.

He began with the Annales Romantiques, a collection of prose and verse celebrated at the period. Then, forgetting her age, so much was he charmed by her intelligence, he read for her in succession, Atala, Cinq-Mars, and Les Feuilles d'Automne. But one night (she had that very evening heard Macbeth in Letourneur's simple translation) she woke up, exclaiming:

"The spot! the spot!" Her teeth chattered, she shivered, and, fixing terrified glances on her right hand, she kept rubbing it, saying:

"Always a spot!"

At last a doctor was brought, who directed that she should be kept free from violent emotions.

The townsfolk saw in this only an unfavourable prognostic for her morals. It was said that "young Moreau" wished to make an actress of her later.

Soon another event became the subject of discussion — namely, the arrival of uncle Barthélemy. Madame Moreau gave up her sleeping-apartment to him, and was so gracious as to serve up meat to him on fast-days.

The old man was not very agreeable. He was perpetually making comparisons between Havre and Nogent, the air of which he considered heavy, the bread bad, the streets ill-paved, the food indifferent, and the inhabitants very lazy. "How wretched trade is with you in this place!" He blamed his deceased brother for his extravagance, pointing out by way of contrast that he had himself accumulated an income of twenty-seven thousand livres a year. At last, he left at the end of the week, and on the footboard of the carriage gave utterance to these by no means reassuring words:

"I am always very glad to know that you are in a good position."

"You will get nothing," said Madame Moreau as they re-entered the dining-room.

He had come only at her urgent request, and for eight days she had been seeking, on her part, for an opening — only too clearly perhaps. She repented now of having done so, and remained seated in her armchair with her head bent down and her lips tightly pressed together. Frederick sat opposite, staring at her; and they were both silent, as they had been five years before on his return home by the Montereau steamboat. This coincidence, which presented itself even to her mind, recalled Madame Arnoux to his recollection.

At that moment the crack of a whip outside the window reached their ears, while a voice was heard calling out to him.

It was Père Roque, who was alone in his tilted cart. He was going to spend the whole day at La Fortelle with M. Dambreuse, and cordially offered to drive Frederick there.

"You have no need of an invitation as long as you are with me. Don't be afraid!"

Frederick felt inclined to accept this offer. But how would he explain his fixed sojourn at Nogent? He had not a proper summer suit. Finally, what would his mother say? He accordingly decided not to go.

From that time, their neighbour exhibited less friendliness. Louise was growing tall; Madame Éléonore fell dangerously ill; and the intimacy broke off, to the great delight of Madame Moreau, who feared lest her son's prospects of being settled in life might be affected by association with such people.

She was thinking of purchasing for him the registrarship of the Court of Justice. Frederick raised no particular objection to this scheme. He now accompanied her to mass; in the evening he took a hand in a game of "all fours." He became accustomed to provincial habits of life, and allowed himself to slide into them; and even his love had assumed a character of mournful sweetness, a kind of soporific charm. By dint of having poured out his grief in his letters, mixed it up with everything he read, given full vent to it during his walks through the country, he had almost exhausted it, so that Madame Arnoux was for him, as it were, a dead woman whose tomb he wondered that he did not know, so tranquil and resigned had his affection for her now become.

One day, the 12th of December, 1845, about nine o'clock in the morning, the cook brought up a letter to his room. The address, which was in big characters, was written in a hand he was not acquainted with; and Frederick, feeling sleepy, was in no great hurry to break the seal. At length, when he did so, he read:

"Justice of the Peace at Havre, 3rd Arrondissement.

"Monsieur, — Monsieur Moreau, your uncle, having died intestate

— — "

He had fallen in for the inheritance! As if a conflagration had burst out behind the wall, he jumped out of bed in his shirt, with his feet bare. He passed his hand over his face, doubting the evidence of his own eyes, believing that he was still dreaming, and in order to make his mind more clearly conscious of the reality of the event, he flung the window wide open.

There had been a fall of snow; the roofs were white, and he even recognised in the yard outside a washtub which had caused him to stumble after dark the evening before.

He read the letter over three times in succession. Could there be anything more certain? His uncle's entire fortune! A yearly income of twenty-seven thousand livres! And he was overwhelmed with frantic joy at the idea of seeing Madame Arnoux once more. With the vividness of a hallucination he saw himself beside her, at her house, bringing her some present in silver paper, while at the door stood a tilbury — no, a brougham rather! — a black brougham, with a servant in brown livery. He could hear his horse pawing the ground and the noise of the curb-chain mingling with the rippling sound of their kisses. And every day this was renewed indefinitely. He would receive them in his own house: the dining-room would be furnished in red leather; the boudoir in yellow silk; sofas everywhere! and such a variety of whatnots, china vases, and carpets! These images came in so tumultuous a fashion into his mind that he felt his head turning round. Then he thought of his mother; and he descended the stairs with the letter in his hand.

Madame Moreau made an effort to control her emotion, but could not keep herself from swooning. Frederick caught her in his arms and kissed her on the forehead.

"Dear mother, you can now buy back your carriage — laugh then!

shed no more tears! be happy!"

Laugh then! shed no more tears! be happy!

Ten minutes later the news had travelled as far as the faubourgs. Then M. Benoist, M. Gamblin, M. Chambion, and other friends hurried towards the house. Frederick got away for a minute in order to write to Deslauriers. Then other visitors turned up. The afternoon passed in congratulations. They had forgotten all about "Roque's wife," who, however, was declared to be "very low."

When they were alone, the same evening, Madame Moreau said to her son that she would advise him to set up as an advocate at Troyes.

As he was better known in his own part of the country than in any other, he might more easily find there a profitable connection.

"Ah, it is too hard!" exclaimed Frederick. He had scarcely grasped his good fortune in his hands when he longed to carry it to Madame Arnoux. He announced his express determination to live in Paris.

"And what are you going to do there?"

"Nothing!"

Madame Moreau, astonished at his manner, asked what he intended to become.

"A minister," was Frederick's reply. And he declared that he was not at all joking, that he meant to plunge at once into diplomacy, and that his studies and his instincts impelled him in that direction. He would first enter the Council of State under M. Dambreuse's patronage.

"So then, you know him?"

"Oh, yes — through M. Roque."

"That is singular," said Madame Moreau. He had awakened in her heart her former dreams of ambition. She internally abandoned herself to them, and said no more about other matters.

If he had yielded to his impatience, Frederick would have started that very instant. Next morning every seat in the diligence had been engaged; and so he kept eating out his heart till seven o'clock in the evening.

They had sat down to dinner when three prolonged tolls of the church-bell fell on their ears; and the housemaid, coming in, informed them that Madame Éléonore had just died.

This death, after all, was not a misfortune for anyone, not even for her child. The young girl would only find it all the better for herself afterwards.

As the two houses were close to one another, a great coming and going and a clatter of tongues could be heard; and the idea of this corpse being so near them threw a certain funereal gloom over their parting. Madame Moreau wiped her eyes two or three times. Frederick felt his heart oppressed.

When the meal was over, Catherine stopped him between two doors. Mademoiselle had peremptorily expressed a wish to see him. She was waiting for him in the garden. He went out there, strode over the hedge, and knocking more or less against the trees, directed his steps towards M. Roque's house. Lights were glittering through a window in the second story then a form appeared in the midst of the darkness, and a voice whispered:

"'Tis I!"

She seemed to him taller than usual, owing to her black dress, no doubt. Not knowing what to say to her, he contented himself with catching her hands, and sighing forth:

"Ah! my poor Louise!"

She did not reply. She gazed at him for a long time with a look of sad, deep earnestness.

Frederick was afraid of missing the coach; he fancied that he could hear the rolling of wheels some distance away, and, in order to put an end to the interview without any delay:

"Catherine told me that you had something — — "

"Yes — 'tis true! I wanted to tell you — — "

He was astonished to find that she addressed him in the plural; and, as she again relapsed into silence:

"Well, what?"

"I don't know. I forget! Is it true that you're going away?"

"Yes, I'm starting just now."

She repeated: "Ah! just now? — for good? — we'll never see one another again?"

She was choking with sobs.

"Good-bye! good-bye! embrace me then!"

And she threw her arms about him passionately.

CHAPTER VII.

A Change of Fortune.

Then he had taken his place behind the other passengers in the front of the diligence, and when the vehicle began to shake as the five horses started into a brisk trot all at the same time, he allowed himself to plunge into an intoxicating dream of the future. Like an architect drawing up the plan of a palace, he mapped out his life beforehand. He filled it with dainties and with splendours; it rose up to the sky; a profuse display of allurements could be seen there; and so deeply was he buried in the contemplation of these things that he lost sight of all external objects.

At the foot of the hill of Sourdun his attention was directed to the stage which they had reached in their journey. They had travelled only about five kilometres at the most. He was annoyed at this tardy rate of travelling. He pulled down the coach-window in order to get a view of the road. He asked the conductor several times at what hour they would reach their destination. However, he eventually regained his composure, and remained seated in his corner of the vehicle with eyes wide open.

The lantern, which hung from the postilion's seat, threw its light on the buttocks of the shaft-horses. In front, only the manes of the other horses could be seen undulating like white billows. Their breathing caused a kind of fog to gather at each side of the team. The little iron chains of the harness rang; the windows shook in their sashes; and the heavy coach went rolling at an even pace over the pavement. Here and there could be distinguished the wall of a barn, or else an inn standing by itself. Sometimes, as they entered a village, a baker's oven threw out gleams of light; and the gigantic silhouettes of the horses kept rushing past the walls of the opposite houses. At every change of horses, when the harness was unfastened, there was a great silence for a minute. Overhead, under the awning, some passenger might be heard tapping with his feet, while a woman sitting at the threshold of the door screened her candle with her hand. Then the conductor would jump on the footboard, and the vehicle would start on its way again.

At Mormans, the striking of the clocks announced that it was a quarter past one.

"So then we are in another day," he thought, "we have been in it for some time!"

But gradually his hopes and his recollections, Nogent, the Rue de Choiseul, Madame Arnoux, and his mother, all got mixed up together.

He was awakened by the dull sound of wheels passing over planks: they were crossing the Pont de Charenton — it was Paris. Then his two travelling companions, the first taking off his cap, and the second his silk handkerchief, put on their hats, and began to chat.

The first, a big, red-faced man in a velvet frock-coat, was a merchant; the second was coming up to the capital to consult a physician; and, fearing that he had disturbed this gentleman during the night, Frederick spontaneously apologised to him, so much had the young man's heart been softened by the feelings of happiness that possessed it. The wharf of the wet dock being flooded, no doubt, they went straight ahead; and once more they could see green fields. In the distance, tall factory-chimneys were sending forth their smoke. Then they turned into Ivry. Then drove up a street: all at once, he saw before him the dome of the Panthéon.

The plain, quite broken up, seemed a waste of ruins. The enclosing wall of the fortifications made a horizontal swelling there; and, on the footpath, on the ground at the side of the road, little branchless trees were protected by laths bristling with nails. Establishments for chemical products and timber-merchants' yards made their appearance alternately. High gates, like those seen in farm-houses, afforded glimpses, through their opening leaves, of wretched yards within, full of filth, with puddles of dirty water in the middle of them. Long wine-shops, of the colour of ox's blood, displayed in the first floor, between the windows, two billiard-cues crossing one another, with a wreath of painted flowers. Here and there might be noticed a half-built plaster hut, which had been allowed to remain unfinished. Then the double row of houses was no longer interrupted; and over their bare fronts enormous tin cigars showed themselves at some distance from each other, indicating tobacconists' shops. Midwives' signboards represented in each case a matron in a cap rocking a doll under a counterpane trimmed with lace. The corners of the walls were covered with placards, which, three-quarters torn, were quivering in the wind like rags. Workmen in blouses, brewers' drays, laundresses' and butchers' carts passed along. A thin rain was falling. It was cold. There was a pale sky; but two eyes, which to him were as precious as the sun, were shining behind the haze.

They had to wait a long time at the barrier, for vendors of poultry, wagoners, and a flock of sheep caused an obstruction there. The sentry, with his great-coat thrown back, walked to and fro in front of his box, to keep himself warm. The clerk who collected the city-dues clambered up to the roof of the diligence, and a cornet-à-piston sent forth a flourish. They went down the boulevard at a quick trot, the whipple-trees clapping and the traces hanging loose. The lash of the whip went cracking through the moist air. The conductor uttered his sonorous shout:

"Look alive! look alive! oho!" and the scavengers drew out of the way, the pedestrians sprang back, the mud gushed against the coach-windows; they crossed dung-carts, cabs, and omnibuses. At length, the iron gate of the Jardin des Plantes came into sight.

The Seine, which was of a yellowish colour, almost reached the platforms of the bridges. A cool breath of air issued from it. Frederick inhaled it with his utmost energy, drinking in this good air of Paris, which seems to contain the effluvia of love and the emanations of the intellect. He was touched with emotion at the first glimpse of a hackney-coach. He gazed with delight on the thresholds of the wine-merchants' shops garnished with straw, on the shoe-blacks with their boxes, on the lads who sold groceries as they shook their coffee-burners. Women hurried along at a jog-trot with umbrellas over their heads. He bent forward to try whether he could distinguish their faces — chance might have led Madame Arnoux to come out.

The shops displayed their wares. The crowd grew denser; the noise in the streets grew louder. After passing the Quai Saint-Bernard, the Quai de la Tournelle, and the Quai Montebello, they drove along the Quai Napoléon. He was anxious to see the windows there; but they were too far away from him. Then they once more crossed the Seine over the Pont-Neuf, and descended in the direction of the Louvre; and, having traversed the Rues Saint-Honoré, Croix des Petits-Champs, and Du Bouloi, he reached the Rue Coq-Héron, and entered the courtyard of the hotel.

To make his enjoyment last the longer, Frederick dressed himself as slowly as possible, and even walked as far as the Boulevard Montmartre. He smiled at the thought of presently beholding once more the beloved name on the marble plate. He cast a glance upwards; there was no longer a trace of the display in the windows, the pictures, or anything else.

He hastened to the Rue de Choiseul. M. and Madame Arnoux no longer resided there, and a woman next door was keeping an eye on the porter's lodge. Frederick waited to see the porter himself. After some time he made his appearance — it was no longer the same man. He did not know their address.

Frederick went into a café, and, while at breakfast, consulted the Commercial Directory. There were three hundred Arnoux in it, but no Jacques Arnoux. Where, then, were they living? Pellerin ought to know.

He made his way to the very top of the Faubourg Poissonnière, to the artist's studio. As the door had neither a bell nor a knocker, he rapped loudly on it with his knuckles, and then called out — shouted. But the only response was the echo of his voice from the empty house.

After this he thought of Hussonnet; but where could he discover a man of that sort? On one occasion he had waited on Hussonnet when the latter was paying a visit to his mistress's house in the Rue de Fleurus. Frederick had just reached the Rue de Fleurus when he became conscious of the fact that he did not even know the lady's name.

He had recourse to the Prefecture of Police. He wandered from staircase to staircase, from office to office. He found that the Intelligence Department was closed for the day, and was told to come back again next morning.

Then he called at all the picture-dealers' shops that he could discover, and enquired whether they could give him any information as to Arnoux's whereabouts. The only answer he got was that M. Arnoux was no longer in the trade.

At last, discouraged, weary, sickened, he returned to his hotel, and went to bed. Just as he was stretching himself between the sheets, an idea flashed upon him which made him leap up with delight:

"Regimbart! what an idiot I was not to think of him before!"

Next morning, at seven o'clock, he arrived in the Rue Nôtre Dame des Victoires, in front of a dram-shop, where Regimbart was in the habit of drinking white wine. It was not yet open. He walked about the neighbourhood, and at the end of about half-an-hour, presented himself at the place once more. Regimbart had left it.

Frederick rushed out into the street. He fancied that he could even notice Regimbart's hat some distance away. A hearse and some mourning coaches intercepted his progress. When they had got out of the way, the vision had disappeared.

Fortunately, he recalled to mind that the Citizen breakfasted every day at eleven o'clock sharp, at a little restaurant in the Place Gaillon. All he had to do was to wait patiently till then; and, after sauntering about from the Bourse to the Madeleine, and from the Madeleine to the Gymnase, so long that it seemed as if it would never come to an end, Frederick, just as the clocks were striking eleven, entered the restaurant in the Rue Gaillon, certain of finding Regimbart there.

"Don't know!" said the restaurant-keeper, in an unceremonious tone.

Frederick persisted: the man replied:

"I have no longer any acquaintance with him, Monsieur" — and, as he spoke, he raised his eyebrows majestically and shook his head in a mysterious fashion.

But, in their last interview, the Citizen had referred to the Alexandre smoking-divan. Frederick swallowed a cake, jumped into a cab, and asked the driver whether there happened to be anywhere on the heights of Sainte-Genève a certain Café Alexandre. The cabman drove him to the Rue des Francs Bourgeois Saint-Michel, where there was an establishment of that name, and in answer to his question:

"M. Regimbart, if you please?" the keeper of the café said with an unusually gracious smile:

"We have not seen him as yet, Monsieur," while he directed towards his wife, who sat behind the counter, a look of intelligence. And the next moment, turning towards the clock:

"But he'll be here, I hope, in ten minutes, or at most a quarter of an hour. Celestin, hurry with the newspapers! What would Monsieur like to take?"

Though he did not want to take anything, Frederick swallowed a glass of rum, then a glass of kirsch, then a glass of curaçoa, then several glasses of grog, both cold and hot. He read through that day's Siècle, and then read it over again; he examined the caricatures in the Charivari down to the very tissue of the paper. When he had finished, he knew the advertisements by heart. From time to time, the tramp of boots on the footpath outside reached his ears — it was he! and some one's form would trace its outlines on the window-panes; but it invariably passed on.

In order to get rid of the sense of weariness he experienced, Frederick shifted his seat. He took up his position at the lower end of the room; then at the right; after that at the left; and he remained in the middle of the bench with his arms stretched out. But a cat, daintily pressing down the velvet at the back of the seat, startled him by giving a sudden spring, in order to lick up the spots of syrup on the tray; and the child of the house, an insufferable brat of four, played noisily with a rattle on the bar steps. His mother, a pale-faced little woman, with decayed teeth, was smiling in a stupid sort of way. What in the world could Regimbart be doing? Frederick waited for him in an exceedingly miserable frame of mind.

The rain clattered like hail on the covering of the cab. Through the opening in the muslin curtain he could see the poor horse in the street more motionless than a horse made of wood. The stream of water, becoming enormous, trickled down between two spokes of the wheels, and the coachman was nodding drowsily with the horsecloth wrapped round him for protection, but fearing lest his fare might give him the slip, he opened the door every now and then, with the rain dripping from him as if falling from a mountain torrent; and, if things could get worn out by looking at them, the clock ought to have by this time been utterly dissolved, so frequently did Frederick rivet his eyes on it. However, it kept going. "Mine host" Alexandre walked up and down repeating, "He'll come! Cheer up! he'll come!" and, in order to divert his thoughts, talked politics, holding forth at some length. He even carried civility so far as to propose a game of dominoes.

At length when it was half-past four, Frederick, who had been there since about twelve, sprang to his feet, and declared that he would not wait any longer.

"I can't understand it at all myself," replied the café-keeper, in a tone of straightforwardness. "This is the first time that M. Ledoux has failed to come!"

"What! Monsieur Ledoux?"

"Why, yes, Monsieur!"

"I said Regimbart," exclaimed Frederick, exasperated.

"Ah! a thousand pardons! You are making a mistake! Madame Alexandre, did not Monsieur say M. Ledoux?"

And, questioning the waiter: "You heard him yourself, just as I did?"

No doubt, to pay his master off for old scores, the waiter contented himself with smiling.

Frederick drove back to the boulevards, indignant at having his time wasted, raging against the Citizen, but craving for his presence as if for that of a god, and firmly resolved to drag him forth, if necessary, from the depths of the most remote cellars. The vehicle in which he was driving only irritated him the more, and he accordingly got rid of it. His ideas were in a state of confusion. Then all the names of the cafés which he had heard pronounced by that idiot burst forth at the same time from his memory like the thousand pieces of an exhibition of fireworks — the Café Gascard, the Café Grimbert, the Café Halbout, the Bordelais smoking-divan, the Havonais, the Havrais, the Bœuf à la Mode, the Brasserie Allemande, and the Mère Morel; and he made his way to all of them in succession. But in one he was told that Regimbart had just gone out; in another, that he might perhaps call at a later hour; in a third, that they had not seen him for six months; and, in another place, that he had the day before ordered a leg of mutton for Saturday. Finally, at Vautier's dining-rooms, Frederick, on opening the door, knocked against the waiter.

"Do you know M. Regimbart?"

"What, monsieur! do I know him? 'Tis I who have the honour of attending on him. He's upstairs — he is just finishing his dinner!"

And, with a napkin under his arm, the master of the establishment himself accosted him:

"You're asking him for M. Regimbart, monsieur? He was here a moment ago."

Frederick gave vent to an oath, but the proprietor of the dining-rooms stated that he would find the gentleman as a matter of certainty at Bouttevilain's.

"I assure you, on my honour, he left a little earlier than usual, for he had a business appointment with some gentlemen. But you'll find him, I tell you again, at Bouttevilain's, in the Rue Saint-Martin, No. 92, the second row of steps at the left, at the end of the courtyard — first floor — door to the right!"

At last, he saw Regimbart, in a cloud of tobacco-smoke, by himself, at the lower end of the refreshment-room, near the billiard-table, with a glass of beer in front of him, and his chin lowered in a thoughtful attitude.

"Ah! I have been a long time searching for you!"

Without rising, Regimbart extended towards him only two fingers, and, as if he had seen Frederick the day before, he gave utterance to a number of commonplace remarks about the opening of the session.

Frederick interrupted him, saying in the most natural tone he could assume:

"Is Arnoux going on well?"

The reply was a long time coming, as Regimbart was gargling the liquor in his throat:

"Yes, not badly."

"Where is he living now?"

"Why, in the Rue Paradis Poissonnière," the Citizen returned with astonishment.

"What number?"

"Thirty-seven — confound it! what a funny fellow you are!"

Frederick rose.

"What! are you going?"

"Yes, yes! I have to make a call — some business matter I had forgotten! Good-bye!"

Frederick went from the smoking-divan to the Arnoux's residence, as if carried along by a tepid wind, with a sensation of extreme ease such as people experience in dreams.

He found himself soon on the second floor in front of a door, at the ringing of whose bell a servant appeared. A second door was flung open. Madame Arnoux was seated near the fire. Arnoux jumped up, and rushed across to embrace Frederick. She had on her lap a little boy not quite three years old. Her daughter, now as tall as herself, was standing up at the opposite side of the mantelpiece.

"Allow me to present this gentleman to you," said Arnoux, taking his son up in his arms. And he amused himself for some minutes in making the child jump up in the air very high, and then catching him with both hands as he came down.

"You'll kill him! — ah! good heavens, have done!" exclaimed Madame Arnoux.

But Arnoux, declaring that there was not the slightest danger, still kept tossing up the child, and even addressed him in words of endearment such as nurses use in the Marseillaise dialect, his natal tongue: "Ah! my fine picheoun! my ducksy of a little nightingale!"

Then, he asked Frederick why he had been so long without writing to them, what he had been doing down in the country, and what brought him back.

"As for me, I am at present, my dear friend, a dealer in faïence. But let us talk about yourself!"

Frederick gave as reasons for his absence a protracted lawsuit and the state of his mother's health.

He laid special stress on the latter subject in order to make himself interesting. He ended by saying that this time he was going to settle in Paris for good; and he said nothing about the inheritance, lest it might be prejudicial to his past.

The curtains, like the upholstering of the furniture, were of maroon damask wool. Two pillows were close beside one another on the bolster. On the coal-fire a kettle was boiling; and the shade of the lamp, which stood near the edge of the chest of drawers, darkened the apartment. Madame Arnoux wore a large blue merino dressing-gown. With her face turned towards the fire and one hand on the shoulder of the little boy, she unfastened with the other the child's bodice. The youngster in his shirt began to cry, while scratching his head, like the son of M. Alexandre.

Frederick expected that he would have felt spasms of joy; but the passions grow pale when we find ourselves in an altered situation; and, as he no longer saw Madame Arnoux in the environment wherein he had known her, she seemed to him to have lost some of her fascination; to have degenerated in some way that he could not comprehend — in fact, not to be the same. He was astonished at the serenity of his own heart. He made enquiries about some old friends, about Pellerin, amongst others.

"I don't see him often," said Arnoux. She added:

"We no longer entertain as we used to do formerly!"

Was the object of this to let him know that he would get no invitation from them? But Arnoux, continuing to exhibit the same cordiality, reproached him for not having come to dine with them uninvited; and he explained why he had changed his business.

"What are you to do in an age of decadence like ours? Great painting is gone out of fashion! Besides, we may import art into everything. You know that, for my part, I am a lover of the beautiful. I must bring you one of these days to see my earthenware works."

And he wanted to show Frederick immediately some of his productions in the store which he had between the ground-floor and the first floor.

Dishes, soup-tureens, and washhand-basins encumbered the floor. Against the walls were laid out large squares of pavement for bathrooms and dressing-rooms, with mythological subjects in the Renaissance style; whilst in the centre, a pair of whatnots, rising up to the ceiling, supported ice-urns, flower-pots, candelabra, little flower-stands, and large statuettes of many colours, representing a negro or a shepherdess in the Pompadour fashion. Frederick, who was cold and hungry, was bored with Arnoux's display of his wares. He hurried off to the Café Anglais, where he ordered a sumptuous supper, and while eating, said to himself:

"I was well off enough below there with all my troubles! She scarcely took any notice of me! How like a shopkeeper's wife!"

And in an abrupt expansion of healthfulness, he formed egoistic resolutions. He felt his heart as hard as the table on which his elbows rested. So then he could by this time plunge fearlessly into the vortex of society. The thought of the Dambreuses recurred to his mind. He would make use of them. Then he recalled Deslauriers to mind. "Ah! faith, so much the worse!" Nevertheless, he sent him a note by a messenger, making an appointment with him for the following day, in order that they might breakfast together.

Fortune had not been so kind to the other.

He had presented himself at the examination for a fellowship with a thesis on the law of wills, in which he maintained that the powers of testators ought to be restricted as much as possible; and, as his adversary provoked him in such a way as to make him say foolish things, he gave utterance to many of these absurdities without in any way inducing the examiners to falter in deciding that he was wrong. Then chance so willed it that he should choose by lot, as a subject for a lecture, Prescription. Thereupon, Deslauriers gave vent to some lamentable theories: the questions in dispute in former times ought to be brought forward as well as those which had recently arisen; why should the proprietor be deprived of his estate because he could furnish his title-deeds only after the lapse of thirty-one years? This was giving the security of the honest man to the inheritor of the enriched thief. Every injustice was consecrated by extending this law, which was a form of tyranny, the abuse of force! He had even exclaimed: "Abolish it; and the Franks will no longer oppress the Gauls, the English oppress the Irish, the Yankee oppress the Redskins, the Turks oppress the Arabs, the whites oppress the blacks, Poland — — "

The President interrupted him: "Well! well! Monsieur, we have nothing to do with your political opinions — you will have them represented in your behalf by-and-by!"

Deslauriers did not wish to have his opinions represented; but this unfortunate Title XX. of the Third Book of the Civil Code had become a sort of mountain over which he stumbled. He was elaborating a great work on "Prescription considered as the Basis of the Civil Law and of the Law of Nature amongst Peoples"; and he got lost in Dunod, Rogerius, Balbus, Merlin, Vazeille, Savigny, Traplong, and other weighty authorities on the subject. In order to have more leisure for the purpose of devoting himself to this task, he had resigned his post of head-clerk. He lived by giving private tuitions and preparing theses; and at the meetings of newly-fledged barristers to rehearse legal arguments he frightened by his display of virulence those who held conservative views, all the young doctrinaires who acknowledged M. Guizot as their master — so that in a certain set he had gained a sort of celebrity, mingled, in a slight degree, with lack of confidence in him as an individual.

He came to keep the appointment in a big paletot, lined with red flannel, like the one Sénécal used to wear in former days.

Human respect on account of the passers-by prevented them from straining one another long in an embrace of friendship; and they made their way to Véfour's arm-in-arm, laughing pleasantly, though with tear-drops lingering in the depths of their eyes. Then, as soon as they were free from observation, Deslauriers exclaimed:

"Ah! damn it! we'll have a jolly time of it now!"

Frederick was not quite pleased to find Deslauriers all at once associating himself in this way with his own newly-acquired inheritance. His friend exhibited too much pleasure on account of them both, and not enough on his account alone.

After this, Deslauriers gave details about the reverse he had met with, and gradually told Frederick all about his occupations and his daily existence, speaking of himself in a stoical fashion, and of others in tones of intense bitterness. He found fault with everything; there was not a man in office who was not an idiot or a rascal. He flew into a passion against the waiter for having a glass badly rinsed, and, when Frederick uttered a reproach with a view to mitigating his wrath: "As if I were going to annoy myself with such numbskulls, who, you must know, can earn as much as six and even eight thousand francs a year, who are electors, perhaps eligible as candidates. Ah! no, no!"

Then, with a sprightly air, "But I've forgotten that I'm talking to a capitalist, to a Mondor, for you are a Mondor now!"

And, coming back to the question of the inheritance, he gave expression to this view — that collateral successorship (a thing unjust in itself, though in the present case he was glad it was possible) would be abolished one of these days at the approaching revolution.

"Do you believe in that?" said Frederick.

"Be sure of it!" he replied. "This sort of thing cannot last. There is too much suffering. When I see into the wretchedness of men like Sénécal — —"

"Always Sénécal!" thought Frederick.

"But, at all events, tell me the news? Are you still in love with Madame Arnoux? Is it all over — eh?"

Frederick, not knowing what answer to give him, closed his eyes and hung down his head.

With regard to Arnoux, Deslauriers told him that the journal was now the property of Hussonnet, who had transformed it. It was called "L'Art, a literary institution — a company with shares of one hundred francs each; capital of the firm, forty thousand francs," each shareholder having the right to put into it his own contributions; for "the company has for its object to publish the works of beginners, to spare talent, perchance genius, the sad crises which drench," etc.

"You see the dodge!" There was, however, something to be effected by the change — the tone of the journal could be raised; then, without any delay, while retaining the same writers, and promising a continuation of the feuilleton, to supply the subscribers with a political organ: the amount to be advanced would not be very great.

"What do you think of it? Come! would you like to have a hand in it?"

Frederick did not reject the proposal; but he pointed out that it was necessary for him to attend to the regulation of his affairs.

"After that, if you require anything — —"

"Thanks, my boy!" said Deslauriers.

Then, they smoked puros, leaning with their elbows on the shelf covered with velvet beside the window. The sun was shining; the air was balmy. Flocks of birds, fluttering about, swooped down into the garden. The statues of bronze and marble, washed by the rain, were glistening. Nursery-maids wearing aprons, were seated on chairs, chatting together; and the laughter of children could be heard mingling with the continuous plash that came from the sheaf-jets of the fountain.

Frederick was troubled by Deslauriers' irritability; but under the influence of the wine which circulated through his veins, half-asleep, in a state of torpor, with the sun shining full on his face, he was no longer conscious of anything save a profound sense of comfort, a kind of voluptuous feeling that stupefied him, as a plant is saturated with heat and moisture. Deslauriers, with half-closed eyelids, was staring vacantly into the distance. His breast swelled, and he broke out in the following strain:

"Ah! those were better days when Camille Desmoulins, standing below there on a table, drove the people on to the Bastille. Men really lived in those times; they could assert themselves, and prove their strength! Simple advocates commanded generals. Kings were beaten by beggars; whilst now — —"

He stopped, then added all of a sudden:

"Pooh! the future is big with great things!"

And, drumming a battle-march on the window-panes, he declaimed some verses of Barthélemy, which ran thus:

"That dread Assembly shall again appear, Which, after forty years, fills you with fear, Marching with giant stride and dauntless soul'

— I don't know the rest of it! But 'tis late; suppose we go?"

And he went on setting forth his theories in the street.

Frederick, without listening to him, was looking at certain materials and articles of furniture in the shop-windows which would be suitable for his new residence in Paris; and it was, perhaps, the thought of Madame Arnoux that made him stop before a second-hand dealer's window, where three plates made of fine ware were exposed to view. They were decorated with yellow arabesques with metallic reflections, and were worth a hundred crowns apiece. He got them put by.

"For my part, if I were in your place," said Deslauriers, "I would rather buy silver plate," revealing by this love of substantial things the man of mean extraction.

As soon as he was alone, Frederick repaired to the establishment of the celebrated Pomadère, where he ordered three pairs of trousers, two coats, a pelisse trimmed with fur, and five waistcoats. Then he called at a bootmaker's, a shirtmaker's, and a hatter's, giving them directions in each shop to make the greatest possible haste. Three days later, on the evening of his return from Havre, he found his complete wardrobe awaiting him in his Parisian abode; and impatient to make use of it, he resolved to pay an immediate visit to the Dambreuses. But it was too early yet — scarcely eight o'clock.

"Suppose I went to see the others?" said he to himself.

He came upon Arnoux, all alone, in the act of shaving in front of his glass. The latter proposed to drive him to a place where they could amuse themselves, and when M. Dambreuse was referred to, "Ah, that's just lucky! You'll see some of his friends there. Come on, then! It will be good fun!"

Frederick asked to be excused. Madame Arnoux recognised his voice, and wished him good-day, through the partition, for her daughter was indisposed, and she was also rather unwell herself. The noise of a soup-ladle against a glass could be heard from within, and all those quivering sounds made by things being lightly moved about, which are usual in a sick-room. Then Arnoux left his dressing-room to say good-bye to his wife. He brought forward a heap of reasons for going out:

"You know well that it is a serious matter! I must go there; 'tis a case of necessity. They'll be waiting for me!"

"Go, go, my dear! Amuse yourself!"

Arnoux hailed a hackney-coach:

"Palais Royal, No. 7 Montpensier Gallery." And, as he let himself sink back in the cushions:

"Ah! how tired I am, my dear fellow! It will be the death of me! However, I can tell it to you — to you!"

He bent towards Frederick's ear in a mysterious fashion:

"I am trying to discover again the red of Chinese copper!"

And he explained the nature of the glaze and the little fire.

On their arrival at Chevet's shop, a large hamper was brought to him, which he stowed away in the hackney-coach. Then he bought for his "poor wife" pine-apples and various dainties, and directed that they should be sent early next morning.

After this, they called at a costumer's establishment; it was to a ball they were going.

Arnoux selected blue velvet breeches, a vest of the same material, and a red wig; Frederick a domino; and they went down the Rue de Laval towards a house the second floor of which was illuminated by coloured lanterns.

At the foot of the stairs they heard violins playing above.

"Where the deuce are you bringing me to?" said Frederick.

"To see a nice girl! don't be afraid!"

The door was opened for them by a groom; and they entered the anteroom, where paletots, mantles, and shawls were thrown together in a heap on some chairs. A young woman in the costume of a dragoon of Louis XIV.'s reign was passing at that moment. It was Mademoiselle Rosanette Bron, the mistress of the place.

"Well?" said Arnoux.

"'Tis done!" she replied.

"Ah! thanks, my angel!"

And he wanted to kiss her.

"Take care, now, you foolish man! You'll spoil the paint on my face!"

Arnoux introduced Frederick.

"Step in there, Monsieur; you are quite welcome!"

She drew aside a door-curtain, and cried out with a certain emphasis:

"Here's my lord Arnoux, girl, and a princely friend of his!"

Frederick was at first dazzled by the lights. He could see nothing save some silk and velvet dresses, naked shoulders, a mass of colours swaying to and fro to the accompaniment of an orchestra hidden behind green foliage, between walls hung with yellow silk, with pastel portraits here and there and crystal chandeliers in the style of Louis XVI.'s period. High lamps, whose globes of roughened glass resembled snowballs, looked down on baskets of flowers placed on brackets in the corners; and at the opposite side, at the rear of a second room, smaller in size, one could distinguish, in a third, a bed with twisted posts, and at its head a Venetian mirror.

The dancing stopped, and there were bursts of applause, a hubbub of delight, as Arnoux was seen advancing with his hamper on his head; the eatables contained in it made a lump in the centre.

"Make way for the lustre!"

Frederick raised his eyes: it was the lustre of old Saxe that had adorned the shop attached to the office of L'Art Industriel. The memory of former days was brought back to his mind. But a foot-soldier of the line in undress, with that silly expression of countenance ascribed by tradition to conscripts, planted himself right in front of him, spreading out his two arms in order to emphasise his astonishment, and, in spite of the hideous black moustaches, unusually pointed, which disfigured his face, Frederick recognised his old friend Hussonnet. In a half-Alsatian, half-negro kind of gibberish, the Bohemian loaded him with congratulations, calling him his colonel. Frederick, put out of countenance by the crowd of personages assembled around him, was at a loss for an answer. At a tap on the desk from a fiddlestick, the partners in the dance fell into their places.

They were about sixty in number, the women being for the most part dressed either as village-girls or marchionesses, and the men, who were nearly all of mature age, being got up as wagoners, 'longshoremen, or sailors.

Frederick having taken up his position close to the wall, stared at those who were going through the quadrille in front of him.

An old beau, dressed like a Venetian Doge in a long gown or purple silk, was dancing with Mademoiselle Rosanette, who wore a green coat, laced breeches, and boots of soft leather with gold spurs. The pair in front of them consisted of an Albanian laden with yataghans and a Swiss girl with blue eyes and skin white as milk, who looked as plump as a quail with her chemise-sleeves and red corset exposed to view. In order to turn to account her hair, which fell down to her hips, a tall blonde, a walking lady in the opera, had assumed the part of a female savage; and over her brown swaddling-cloth she displayed nothing save leathern breeches, glass bracelets, and a tinsel diadem, from which rose a large sheaf of peacock's feathers. In front of her, a gentleman who had intended to represent Pritchard, muffled up in a grotesquely big black coat, was beating time with his elbows on his snuff-box. A little Watteau shepherd in blue-and-silver, like moonlight, dashed his crook against the thyrsus of a Bacchante crowned with grapes, who wore a leopard's skin over her left side, and buskins with gold ribbons. On the other side, a Polish lady, in a spencer of nacarat-coloured velvet, made her gauze petticoat flutter over her pearl-gray stockings, which rose above her fashionable pink boots bordered with white fur. She was smiling on a big-paunched man of forty, disguised as a choir-boy, who was skipping very high, lifting up his surplice with one hand, and with the other his red clerical cap. But the queen, the star, was Mademoiselle Loulou, a celebrated dancer at public halls. As she had now become wealthy, she wore a large lace collar over her vest of smooth black velvet; and her wide trousers of poppy-coloured silk, clinging closely to her figure, and drawn tight round her waist by a cashmere scarf, had all over their seams little natural white camellias. Her pale face, a little puffed, and with the nose somewhat retroussé, looked all the more pert from the disordered appearance of her wig, over which she had with a touch of her hand clapped a man's grey felt hat, so that it covered her right ear; and, with every bounce she made, her pumps, adorned with diamond buckles, nearly reached the nose of her neighbour, a big mediæval baron, who was quite entangled in his steel armour. There was also an angel, with a gold sword in her hand, and two swan's wings over her back, who kept rushing up and down, every minute losing her partner who appeared as Louis XIV., displaying an utter ignorance of the figures and confusing the quadrille.

Frederick, as he gazed at these people, experienced a sense of forlornness, a feeling of uneasiness. He was still thinking of Madame Arnoux and it seemed to him as if he were taking part in some plot that was being hatched against her.

When the quadrille was over, Mademoiselle Rosanette accosted him. She was slightly out of breath, and her gorget, polished like a mirror, swelled up softly under her chin.

"And you, Monsieur," said she, "don't you dance?"

Frederick excused himself; he did not know how to dance.

"Really! but with me? Are you quite sure?" And, poising herself on one hip, with her other knee a little drawn back, while she stroked with her left hand the mother-of-pearl pommel of her sword, she kept staring at him for a minute with a half-beseeching, half-teasing air. At last she said "Good night! then," made a pirouette, and disappeared.

Frederick, dissatisfied with himself, and not well knowing what to do, began to wander through the ball-room.

He entered the boudoir padded with pale blue silk, with bouquets of flowers from the fields, whilst on the ceiling, in a circle of gilt wood, Cupids, emerging out of an azure sky, played over the clouds, resembling down in appearance. This display of luxuries, which would to-day be only trifles to persons like Rosanette, dazzled him, and he admired everything — the artificial convolvuli which adorned the surface of the mirror, the curtains on the mantelpiece, the Turkish divan, and a sort of tent in a recess in the wall, with pink silk hangings and a covering of white muslin overhead. Furniture made of dark wood with inlaid work of copper filled the sleeping apartment, where, on a platform covered with swan's-down, stood the large canopied bedstead trimmed with ostrich-feathers. Pins, with heads made of precious stones, stuck into pincushions, rings trailing over trays, lockets with hoops of gold, and little silver chests, could be distinguished in the shade under the light shed by a Bohemian urn suspended from three chainlets. Through a little door, which was slightly ajar, could be seen a hot-house occupying the entire breadth of a terrace, with an aviary at the other end.

Here were surroundings specially calculated to charm him. In a sudden revolt of his youthful blood he swore that he would enjoy such things; he grew bold; then, coming back to the place opening into the drawing-room, where there was now a larger gathering — it kept moving about in a kind of luminous pulverulence — he stood to watch the quadrilles, blinking his eyes to see better, and inhaling the soft perfumes of the women, which floated through the atmosphere like an immense kiss.

But, close to him, on the other side of the door, was Pellerin — Pellerin, in full dress, his left arm over his breast and with his hat and a torn white glove in his right.

"Halloa! 'Tis a long time since we saw you! Where the deuce have you been? Gone to travel in Italy? 'Tis a commonplace country enough — Italy, eh? not so unique as people say it is? No matter! Will you bring me your sketches one of these days?"

And, without giving him time to answer, the artist began talking about himself. He had made considerable progress, having definitely satisfied himself as to the stupidity of the line. We ought not to look so much for beauty and unity in a work as for character and diversity of subject.

"For everything exists in nature; therefore, everything is legitimate; everything is plastic. It is only a question of catching the note, mind you! I have discovered the secret." And giving him a nudge, he repeated several times, "I have discovered the secret, you see! just look at that little woman with the head-dress of a sphinx who is dancing with a Russian postilion — that's neat, dry, fixed, all in flats and in stiff tones — indigo under the eyes, a patch of vermilion on the cheek, and bistre on the temples — pif! paf!" And with his thumb he drew, as it were, pencil-strokes in the air. "Whilst the big one over there," he went on, pointing towards a fishwife in a cherry gown with a gold cross hanging from her neck, and a lawn fichu fastened round her shoulders, "is nothing but curves. The nostrils are spread out just like the borders of her cap; the corners of the mouth are rising up; the chin sinks: all is fleshy, melting, abundant, tranquil, and sunshiny — a true Rubens! Nevertheless, they are both perfect! Where, then, is the type?" He grew warm with the subject. "What is this but a beautiful woman?"

What is it but the beautiful? Ah! the beautiful — tell me what that is — — "

Frederick interrupted him to enquire who was the merry-andrew with the face of a he-goat, who was in the very act of blessing all the dancers in the middle of a pastourelle.

"Oh! he's not much! — a widower, the father of three boys. He leaves them without breeches, spends his whole day at the club, and lives with the servant!"

"And who is that dressed like a bailiff talking in the recess of the window to a Marquise de Pompadour?"

"The Marquise is Mademoiselle Vandael, formerly an actress at the Gymnase, the mistress of the Doge, the Comte de Palazot. They have now been twenty years living together — nobody can tell why. Had she fine eyes at one time, this woman? As for the citizen by her side, his name is Captain d'Herbigny, an old man of the hurdy-gurdy sort that you can play on, with nothing in the world except his Cross of the Legion of Honour and his pension. He passes for the uncle of the grisettes at festival times, arranges duels, and dines in the city."

"A rascal?" said Frederick.

"No! an honest man!"

"Ha!"

The artist was going on to mention the names of many others, when, perceiving a gentleman who, like Molière's physician, wore a big black serge gown opening very wide as it descended in order to display all his trinkets:

"The person who presents himself there before you is Dr. Des Rogis, who, full of rage at not having made a name for himself, has written a book of medical pornography, and willingly blacks people's boots in society, while he is at the same time discreet. These ladies adore him. He and his wife (that lean châtelaine in the grey dress) trip about together at every public place — aye, and at other places too. In spite of domestic embarrassments, they have a day — artistic teas, at which verses are recited. Attention!"

In fact, the doctor came up to them at that moment; and soon they formed all three, at the entrance to the drawing-room, a group of talkers, which was presently augmented by Hussonnet, then by the lover of the female savage, a young poet who displayed, under a court cloak of Francis I.'s reign, the most pitiful of anatomies, and finally a sprightly youth disguised as a Turk of the barrier. But his vest with its yellow galloon had taken so many voyages on the backs of strolling dentists, his wide trousers full of creases, were of so faded a red, his turban, rolled about like an eel in the Tartar fashion, was so poor in appearance — in short, his entire costume was so wretched and made-up, that the women did not attempt to hide their disgust. The doctor consoled him by pronouncing eulogies on his mistress, the lady in the dress of a 'longshorewoman. This Turk was a banker's son.

Between two quadrilles, Rosanette advanced towards the mantelpiece, where an obese little old man, in a maroon coat with gold buttons, had seated himself in an armchair. In spite of his withered cheeks, which fell over his white cravat, his hair, still fair, and curling naturally like that of a poodle, gave him a certain frivolity of aspect.

She was listening to him with her face bent close to his. Presently, she accommodated him with a little glass of syrup; and nothing could be more dainty than her hands under their laced sleeves, which passed over the facings of her green coat. When the old man had swallowed it, he kissed them.

"Why, that's M. Oudry, a neighbor of Arnoux!"

"He has lost her!" said Pellerin, smiling.

A Longjumeau postilion caught her by the waist. A waltz was beginning. Then all the women, seated round the drawing-room on benches, rose up quickly at the same time; and their petticoats, their scarfs, and their head-dresses went whirling round.

They whirled so close to him that Frederick could notice the beads of perspiration on their foreheads; and this gyral movement, more and more lively, regular, provocative of dizzy sensations, communicated to his mind a sort of intoxication, which made other images surge up within it, while every woman passed with the same dazzling effect, and each of them with a special kind of exciting influence, according to her style of beauty.

The Polish lady, surrendering herself in a languorous fashion, inspired him with a longing to clasp her to his heart while they were both spinning forward on a sledge along a plain covered with snow. Horizons of tranquil voluptuousness in a châlet at the side of a lake opened out under the footsteps of the Swiss girl, who waltzed with her bust erect and her eyelashes drooping. Then, suddenly, the Bacchante, bending back her head with its dark locks, made him dream of devouring caresses in a wood of oleanders, in the midst of a storm, to the confused accompaniment of tabours. The fishwife, who was panting from the rapidity of the music, which was far too great for her, gave vent to bursts of laughter; and he would have liked, while drinking with her in some tavern in the "Porcherons," to rumple her fichu with both hands, as in the good old times. But the 'longshorewoman, whose light toes barely skimmed the floor, seemed to conceal under the suppleness of her limbs and the seriousness of her face all the refinements of modern love, which possesses the exactitude of a science and the mobility of a bird. Rosanette was whirling with arms akimbo; her wig, in an awkward position, bobbing over her collar, flung iris-powder around her; and, at every turn, she was near catching hold of Frederick with the ends of her gold spurs.

During the closing bar of the waltz, Mademoiselle Vatnaz made her appearance. She had an Algerian handkerchief on her head, a number of piastres on her forehead, antimony at the edges of her eyes, with a kind of paletot made of black cashmere falling over a petticoat of sparkling colour, with stripes of silver; and in her hand she held a tambourine.

Behind her back came a tall fellow in the classical costume of Dante, who happened to be — she now made no concealment any longer about it — the ex-singer of the Alhambra, and who, though his name was Auguste Delamare, had first called himself Anténor Delamarre, then Delmas, then Belmar, and at last Delmar, thus modifying and perfecting his name, as his celebrity increased, for he had forsaken the public-house concert for the theatre, and had even just made his début in a noisy fashion at the Ambigu in Gaspardo le Pécheur.

Hussonnet, on seeing him, knitted his brows. Since his play had been rejected, he hated actors. It was impossible to conceive the vanity of individuals of this sort, and above all of this fellow. "What a prig! Just look at him!"

After a light bow towards Rosanette, Delmar leaned back against the mantelpiece; and he remained motionless with one hand over his heart, his left foot thrust forward, his eyes raised towards heaven, with his wreath of gilt laurels above his cowl, while he strove to put into the expression of his face a considerable amount of poetry in order to fascinate the ladies. They made, at some distance, a great circle around him.

But the Vatnaz, having given Rosanette a prolonged embrace, came to beg of Hussonnet to revise, with a view to the improvement of the style, an educational work which she intended to publish, under the title of "The Young Ladies' Garland," a collection of literature and moral philosophy.

The man of letters promised to assist her in the preparation of the work. Then she asked him whether he could not in one of the prints to which he had access give her friend a slight puff, and even assign to him, later, some part. Hussonnet had forgotten to take a glass of punch on account of her.

It was Arnoux who had brewed the beverage; and, followed by the Comte's groom carrying an empty tray, he offered it to the ladies with a self-satisfied air.

When he came to pass in front of M. Oudry, Rosanette stopped him.

"Well — and this little business?"

He coloured slightly; finally, addressing the old man:

"Our fair friend tells me that you would have the kindness — —"

"What of that, neighbour? I am quite at your service!"

And M. Dambreuse's name was pronounced. As they were talking to one another in low tones, Frederick could only hear indistinctly; and he made his way to the other side of the mantelpiece, where Rosanette and Delmar were chatting together.

The mummer had a vulgar countenance, made, like the scenery of the stage, to be viewed from a distance — coarse hands, big feet, and a heavy jaw; and he disparaged the most distinguished actors, spoke of poets with patronising contempt, made use of the expressions "my organ," "my physique," "my powers," enamelling his conversation with words that were scarcely intelligible even to himself, and for which he had quite an affection, such as "morbidezza," "analogue," and "homogeneity."

Rosanette listened to him with little nods of approbation. One could see her enthusiasm bursting out under the paint on her cheeks, and a touch of moisture passed like a veil over her bright eyes of an indefinable colour. How could such a man as this fascinate her? Frederick internally excited himself to greater contempt for him, in order to banish, perhaps, the species of envy which he felt with regard to him.

Mademoiselle Vatnaz was now with Arnoux, and, while laughing from time to time very loudly, she cast glances towards Rosanette, of whom M. Oudry did not lose sight.

Then Arnoux and the Vatnaz disappeared. The old man began talking in a subdued voice to Rosanette.

"Well, yes, 'tis settled then! Leave me alone!"

And she asked Frederick to go and give a look into the kitchen to see whether Arnoux happened to be there.

A battalion of glasses half-full covered the floor; and the saucepans, the pots, the turbot-kettle, and the frying-stove were all in a state of commotion. Arnoux was giving directions to the servants, whom he "thee'd" and "thou'd," beating up the mustard, tasting the sauces, and larking with the housemaid.

"All right," he said; "tell them 'tis ready! I'm going to have it served up."

The dancing had ceased. The women came and sat down; the men were walking about. In the centre of the drawing-room, one of the curtains stretched over a window was swelling in the wind; and the Sphinx, in spite of the observations of everyone, exposed her sweating arms to the current of air.

Where could Rosanette be? Frederick went on further to find her, even into her boudoir and her bedroom. Some, in order to be alone, or to be in pairs, had retreated into the corners. Whisperings intermingled with the shade. There were little laughs stifled under handkerchiefs, and at the sides of women's corsages one could catch glimpses of fans quivering with slow, gentle movements, like the beating of a wounded bird's wings.

As he entered the hot-house, he saw under the large leaves of a caladium near the jet d'eau, Delmar lying on his face on the sofa covered with linen cloth. Rosanette, seated beside him, had passed her fingers through his hair; and they were gazing into each other's faces. At the same moment, Arnoux came in at the opposite side — that which was near the aviary. Delmar sprang to his feet; then he went out at a rapid pace, without turning round; and even paused close to the door to gather a hibiscus flower, with which he adorned his button-hole. Rosanette hung down her head; Frederick, who caught a sight of her profile, saw that she was in tears.

"I say! What's the matter with you?" exclaimed Arnoux.

She shrugged her shoulders without replying.

"Is it on account of him?" he went on.

She threw her arms round his neck, and kissing him on the forehead, slowly:

"You know well that I will always love you, my big fellow! Think no more about it! Let us go to supper!"

A copper chandelier with forty wax tapers lighted up the dining-room, the walls of which were hidden from view under some fine old earthenware that was hung up there; and this crude light, falling perpendicularly, rendered still whiter, amid the side-dishes and the fruits, a huge turbot which occupied the centre of the tablecloth, with plates all round filled with crayfish soup. With a rustle of garments, the women, having arranged their skirts, their sleeves, and their scarfs, took their seats beside one another; the men, standing up, posted themselves at the corners. Pellerin and M. Oudry were placed near Rosanette. Arnoux was facing her. Palazot and his female companion had just gone out.

"Good-bye to them!" said she. "Now let us begin the attack!"

And the choir-boy, a facetious man with a big sign of the cross, said grace.

The ladies were scandalised, and especially the fishwife, the mother of a young girl of whom she wished to make an honest woman. Neither did Arnoux like "that sort of thing," as he considered that religion ought to be respected.

A German clock with a cock attached to it happening to chime out the hour of two, gave rise to a number of jokes about the cuckoo. All kinds of talk followed — puns, anecdotes, bragging remarks, bets, lies taken for truth, improbable assertions, a tumult of words, which soon became dispersed in the form of chats between particular individuals. The wines went round; the dishes succeeded each other; the doctor carved. An orange or a cork would every now and then be flung from a distance. People would quit their seats to go and talk to some one at another end of the table. Rosanette turned round towards Delmar, who sat motionless behind her; Pellerin kept babbling; M. Oudry smiled. Mademoiselle Vatnaz ate, almost alone, a group of crayfish, and the shells crackled under her long teeth. The angel, poised on the piano-stool — the only place on which her wings permitted her to sit down — was placidly masticating without ever stopping.

"What an appetite!" the choir-boy kept repeating in amazement, "what an appetite!"

And the Sphinx drank brandy, screamed out with her throat full, and wriggled like a demon. Suddenly her jaws swelled, and no longer being able to keep down the blood which rushed to her head and nearly choked her, she pressed her napkin against her lips, and threw herself under the table.

Frederick had seen her falling: "'Tis nothing!" And at his entreaties to be allowed to go and look after her, she replied slowly:

"Pooh! what's the good? That's just as pleasant as anything else. Life is not so amusing!"

Then, he shivered, a feeling of icy sadness taking possession of him, as if he had caught a glimpse of whole worlds of wretchedness and despair — a chafing-dish of charcoal beside a folding-bed, the corpses of the Morgue in leathern aprons, with the tap of cold water that flows over their heads.

Meanwhile, Hussonnet, squatted at the feet of the female savage, was howling in a hoarse voice in imitation of the actor Grassot:

"Be not cruel, O Celuta! this little family fête is charming! Intoxicate me with delight, my loves! Let us be gay! let us be gay!"

And he began kissing the women on the shoulders. They quivered under the tickling of his moustaches. Then he conceived the idea of breaking a plate against his head by rapping it there with a little energy. Others followed his example. The broken earthenware flew about in bits like slates in a storm; and the 'longshorewoman exclaimed:

"Don't bother yourselves about it; these cost nothing. We get a present of them from the merchant who makes them!"

Every eye was riveted on Arnoux. He replied:

"Ha! about the invoice — allow me!" desiring, no doubt, to pass for not being, or for no longer being, Rosanette's lover.

But two angry voices here made themselves heard:

"Idiot!"

"Rascal!"

"I am at your command!"

"So am I at yours!"

It was the mediæval knight and the Russian postilion who were disputing, the latter having maintained that armour dispensed with bravery, while the other regarded this view as an insult. He desired to fight; all interposed to prevent him, and in the midst of the uproar the captain tried to make himself heard.

"Listen to me, messieurs! One word! I have some experience, messieurs!"

Rosanette, by tapping with her knife on a glass, succeeded eventually in restoring silence, and, addressing the knight, who had kept his helmet on, and then the postilion, whose head was covered with a hairy cap:

"Take off that saucepan of yours! and you, there, your wolf's head! Are you going to obey me, damn you? Pray show respect to my epaulets! I am your commanding officer!"

They complied, and everyone present applauded, exclaiming, "Long live the Maréchale! long live the Maréchale!" Then she took a bottle of champagne off the stove, and poured out its contents into the cups which they successively stretched forth to her. As the table was very large, the guests, especially the women, came over to her side, and stood erect on tiptoe on the slats of the chairs, so as to form, for the space of a minute, a pyramidal group of head-dresses, naked shoulders, extended arms, and stooping bodies; and over all these objects a spray of wine played for some time, for the merry-andrew and Arnoux, at opposite corners of the dining-room, each letting fly the cork of a bottle, splashed the faces of those around them.

The little birds of the aviary, the door of which had been left open, broke into the apartment, quite scared, flying round the chandelier, knocking against the window-panes and against the furniture, and some of them, alighting on the heads of the guests, presented the appearance there of large flowers.

The musicians had gone. The piano had been drawn out of the anteroom. The Vatnaz seated herself before it, and, accompanied by the choir-boy, who thumped his tambourine, she made a wild dash into a quadrille, striking the keys like a horse pawing the ground, and wriggling her waist about, the better to mark the time. The Maréchale dragged out Frederick; Hussonnet took the windmill; the 'longshorewoman put out her joints like a circus-clown; the merry-andrew exhibited the manœuvres of an orang-outang; the female savage, with outspread arms, imitated the swaying motion of a boat. At last, unable to go on any further, they all stopped; and a window was flung open.

The broad daylight penetrated the apartment with the cool breath of morning. There was an exclamation of astonishment, and then came silence. The yellow flames flickered, making the sockets of the candlesticks crack from time to time. The floor was strewn with ribbons, flowers, and pearls. The pier-tables were sticky with the stains of punch and syrup. The hangings were soiled, the dresses rumpled and dusty. The plaits of the women's hair hung loose over their shoulders, and the paint, trickling down with the perspiration, revealed pallid faces and red, blinking eyelids.

The Maréchale, fresh as if she had come out of a bath, had rosy cheeks and sparkling eyes. She flung her wig some distance away, and her hair fell around her like a fleece, allowing none of her uniform to be seen except her breeches, the effect thus produced being at the same time comical and pretty.

The Sphinx, whose teeth chattered as if she had the ague, wanted a shawl.

Rosanette rushed up to her own room to look for one, and, as the other came after her, she quickly shut the door in her face.

The Turk remarked, in a loud tone, that M. Oudry had not been seen going out. Nobody noticed the maliciousness of this observation, so worn out were they all.

Then, while waiting for vehicles, they managed to get on their broad-brimmed hats and cloaks. It struck seven. The angel was still in the dining-room, seated at the table with a plate of sardines and fruit stewed in melted butter in front of her, and close beside her was the fishwife, smoking cigarettes, while giving her advice as to the right way to live.

At last, the cabs having arrived, the guests took their departure.

Hussonnet, who had an engagement as correspondent for the provinces, had to read through fifty-three newspapers before his breakfast. The female savage had a rehearsal at the theatre; Pellerin had to see a model; and the choir-boy had three appointments. But the angel, attacked by the preliminary symptoms of indigestion, was unable to rise. The mediæval baron carried her to the cab.

"Take care of her wings!" cried the 'longshorewoman through the window.

At the top of the stairs, Mademoiselle Vatnaz said to Rosanette: "Good-bye, darling! That was a very nice evening party of yours." Then, bending close to her ear: "Take care of him!"

"Till better times come," returned the Maréchale, in drawling tones, as she turned her back.

Arnoux and Frederick returned together, just as they had come. The dealer in faïence looked so gloomy that his companion wished to know if he were ill.

"I? Not at all!"

He bit his moustache, knitted his brows; and Frederick asked him, was it his business that annoyed him.

"By no means!"

Then all of a sudden:

"You know him — Père Oudry — don't you?"

And, with a spiteful expression on his countenance:

"He's rich, the old scoundrel!"

After this, Arnoux spoke about an important piece of ware-making, which had to be finished that day at his works. He wanted to see it; the train was starting in an hour.

"Meantime, I must go and embrace my wife."

"Ha! his wife!" thought Frederick. Then he made his way home to go to bed, with his head aching terribly; and, to appease his thirst, he swallowed a whole carafe of water.

Another thirst had come to him — the thirst for women, for licentious pleasure, and all that Parisian life permitted him to enjoy. He felt somewhat stunned, like a man coming out of a ship, and in the visions that haunted his first sleep, he saw the shoulders of the fishwife, the loins of the 'longshorewoman, the calves of the Polish lady, and the head-dress of the female savage flying past him and coming back again continually. Then, two large black eyes, which had not been at the ball, appeared before him; and, light as butterflies, burning as torches, they came and went, ascended to the cornice and descended to his very mouth.

Frederick made desperate efforts to recognise those eyes, without succeeding in doing so. But already the dream had taken hold of him. It seemed to him that he was yoked beside Arnoux to the pole of a hackney-coach, and that the Maréchale, astride of him, was disembowelling him with her gold spurs.

CHAPTER VIII.

Frederick Entertains

Frederick found a little mansion at the corner of the Rue Rumfort, and he bought it along with the brougham, the horse, the furniture, and two flower-stands which were taken from the Arnoux's house to be placed on each side of his drawing-room door. In the rear of this apartment were a bedroom and a closet. The idea occurred to his mind to put up Deslauriers there. But how could he receive her — her, his future mistress? The presence of a friend would be an obstacle. He knocked down the partition-wall in order to enlarge the drawing-room, and converted the closet into a smoking-room.

He bought the works of the poets whom he loved, books of travel, atlases, and dictionaries, for he had innumerable plans of study. He hurried on the workmen, rushed about to the different shops, and in his impatience to enjoy, carried off everything without even holding out for a bargain beforehand.

From the tradesmen's bills, Frederick ascertained that he would have to expend very soon forty thousand francs, not including the succession duties, which would exceed thirty-seven thousand. As his fortune was in landed property, he wrote to the notary at Havre to sell a portion of it in order to pay off his debts, and to have some money at his disposal. Then, anxious to become acquainted at last with that vague entity, glittering and indefinable, which is known as "society," he sent a note to the Dambreuses to know whether he might be at liberty to call upon them. Madame, in reply, said she would expect a visit from him the following day.

This happened to be their reception-day. Carriages were standing in the courtyard. Two footmen rushed forward under the marquée, and a third at the head of the stairs began walking in front of him.

He was conducted through an anteroom, a second room, and then a drawing-room with high windows and a monumental mantel-shelf supporting a time-piece in the form of a sphere, and two enormous porcelain vases, in each of which bristled, like a golden bush, a cluster of sconces. Pictures in the manner of Espagnolet hung on the walls.

The heavy tapestry portières fell majestically, and the armchairs, the brackets, the tables, the entire furniture, which was in the style of the Second Empire, had a certain imposing and diplomatic air.

Frederick smiled with pleasure in spite of himself.

At last he reached an oval apartment wainscoted in cypress-wood, stuffed with dainty furniture, and letting in the light through a single sheet of plate-glass, which looked out on a garden. Madame Dambreuse was seated at the fireside, with a dozen persons gathered round her in a circle. With a polite greeting, she made a sign to him to take a seat, without, however, exhibiting any surprise at not having seen him for so long a time.

Just at the moment when he was entering the room, they had been praising the eloquence of the Abbé Cœur. Then they deplored the immorality of servants, a topic suggested by a theft which a valet-de-chambre had committed, and they began to indulge in tittle-tattle. Old Madame de Sommery had a cold; Mademoiselle de Turvisot had got married; the Montcharrons would not return before the end of January; neither would the Bretancourts, now that people remained in the country till a late period of the year. And the triviality of the conversation was, so to speak, intensified by the luxuriousness of the surroundings; but what they said was less stupid than their way of talking, which was aimless, disconnected, and utterly devoid of animation. And yet there were present men versed in life — an ex-minister, the curé of a large parish, two or three Government officials of high rank. They adhered to the most hackneyed commonplaces. Some of them resembled weary dowagers; others had the appearance of horse-jockeys; and old men accompanied their wives, of whom they were old enough to be the grandfathers.

Madame Dambreuse received all of them graciously. When it was mentioned that anyone was ill, she knitted her brows with a painful expression on her face, and when balls or evening parties were discussed, assumed a joyous air. She would ere long be compelled to deprive herself of these pleasures, for she was going to take away from a boarding-school a niece of her husband, an orphan. The guests extolled her devotedness: this was behaving like a true mother of a family.

Frederick gazed at her attentively. The dull skin of her face looked as if it had been stretched out, and had a bloom in which there was no brilliancy; like that of preserved fruit. But her hair, which was in corkscrew curls, after the English fashion, was finer than silk; her eyes of a sparkling blue; and all her movements were dainty. Seated at the lower end of the apartment, on a small sofa, she kept brushing off the red flock from a Japanese screen, no doubt in order to let her hands be seen to greater advantage — long narrow hands, a little thin, with fingers tilting up at the points. She wore a grey moiré gown with a high-necked body, like a Puritan lady.

Frederick asked her whether she intended to go to La Fortelle this year. Madame Dambreuse was unable to say. He was sure, however, of one thing, that one would be bored to death in Nogent.

Then the visitors thronged in more quickly. There was an incessant rustling of robes on the carpet. Ladies, seated on the edges of chairs, gave vent to little sneering laughs, articulated two or three words, and at the end of five minutes left along with their young daughters. It soon became impossible to follow the conversation, and Frederick withdrew when Madame Dambreuse said to him:

"Every Wednesday, is it not, Monsieur Moreau?" making up for her previous display of indifference by these simple words.

He was satisfied. Nevertheless, he took a deep breath when he got out into the open air; and, needing a less artificial environment, Frederick recalled to mind that he owed the Maréchale a visit.

The door of the anteroom was open. Two Havanese lapdogs rushed forward. A voice exclaimed:

"Delphine! Delphine! Is that you, Felix?"

He stood there without advancing a step. The two little dogs kept yelping continually. At length Rosanette appeared, wrapped up in a sort of dressing-gown of white muslin trimmed with lace, and with her stockingless feet in Turkish slippers.

"Ah! excuse me, Monsieur! I thought it was the hairdresser. One minute; I am coming back!"

And he was left alone in the dining-room. The Venetian blinds were closed. Frederick, as he cast a glance round, was beginning to recall the hubbub of the other night, when he noticed on the table, in the middle of the room, a man's hat, an old felt hat, bruised, greasy, dirty. To whom did this hat belong? Impudently displaying its torn lining, it seemed to say:

"I have the laugh, after all! I am the master!"

The Maréchale suddenly reappeared on the scene. She took up the hat, opened the conservatory, flung it in there, shut the door again (other doors flew open and closed again at the same moment), and, having brought Frederick through the kitchen, she introduced him into her dressing-room.

It could at once be seen that this was the most frequented room in the house, and, so to speak, its true moral centre. The walls, the armchairs, and a big divan with a spring were adorned with a chintz pattern on which was traced a great deal of foliage. On a white marble table stood two large washhand-basins of fine blue earthenware. Crystal shelves, forming a whatnot overhead, were laden with phials, brushes, combs, sticks of cosmetic, and powder-boxes. The fire was reflected in a high cheval-glass. A sheet was hanging outside a bath, and odours of almond-paste and of benzoin were exhaled.

"You'll excuse the disorder. I'm dining in the city this evening."

And as she turned on her heel, she was near crushing one of the little dogs. Frederick declared that they were charming. She lifted up the pair of them, and raising their black snouts up to her face:

"Come! do a laugh — kiss the gentleman!"

A man dressed in a dirty overcoat with a fur collar here entered abruptly.

"Felix, my worthy fellow," said she, "you'll have that business of yours disposed of next Sunday without fail."

The man proceeded to dress her hair. Frederick told her he had heard news of her friends, Madame de Rochegune, Madame de Saint-Florentin, and Madame Lombard, every woman being noble, as if it were at the mansion of the Dambreuses. Then he talked about the theatres. An extraordinary performance was to be given that evening at the Ambigu.

"Shall you go?"

"Faith, no! I'm staying at home."

Delphine appeared. Her mistress gave her a scolding for having gone out without permission.

The other vowed that she was just "returning from market."

"Well, bring me your book. You have no objection, isn't that so?"

And, reading the pass-book in a low tone, Rosanette made remarks on every item. The different sums were not added up correctly.

"Hand me over four sous!"

Delphine handed the amount over to her, and, when she had sent the maid away:

"Ah! Holy Virgin! could I be more unfortunate than I am with these creatures?"

Frederick was shocked at this complaint about servants. It recalled the others too vividly to his mind, and established between the two houses a kind of vexatious equality.

When Delphine came back again, she drew close to the Maréchale's side in order to whisper something in her ear.

"Ah, no! I don't want her!"

Delphine presented herself once more.

"Madame, she insists."

"Ah, what a plague! Throw her out!"

At the same moment, an old lady, dressed in black, pushed forward the door. Frederick heard nothing, saw nothing. Rosanette rushed into her apartment to meet her.

When she reappeared her cheeks were flushed, and she sat down in one of the armchairs without saying a word. A tear fell down her face; then, turning towards the young man, softly:

"What is your Christian name?"

"Frederick."

"Ha! Federico! It doesn't annoy you when I address you in that way?"

And she gazed at him in a coaxing sort of way that was almost amorous.

All of a sudden she uttered an exclamation of delight at the sight of Mademoiselle Vatnaz.

The lady-artist had no time to lose before presiding at her table d'hôte at six o'clock sharp; and she was panting for breath, being completely exhausted. She first took out of her pocket a gold chain in a paper, then various objects that she had bought.

"You should know that there are in the Rue Joubert splendid Suède gloves at thirty-six sous. Your dyer wants eight days more. As for the guipure, I told you that they would dye it again. Bugneaux has got the instalment you paid. That's all, I think. You owe me a hundred and eighty-five francs."

Rosanette went to a drawer to get ten napoleons. Neither of the pair had any money. Frederick offered some.

"I'll pay you back," said the Vatnaz, as she stuffed the fifteen francs into her handbag. "But you are a naughty boy! I don't love you any longer — you didn't get me to dance with you even once the other evening! Ah! my dear, I came across a case of stuffed humming-birds which are perfect loves at a shop in the Quai Voltaire. If I were in your place, I would make myself a present of them. Look here! What do you think of it?"

And she exhibited an old remnant of pink silk which she had purchased at the Temple to make a mediæval doublet for Delmar.

"He came to-day, didn't he?"

"No."

"That's singular."

And, after a minute's silence:

"Where are you going this evening?"

"To Alphonsine's," said Rosanette, this being the third version given by her as to the way in which she was going to pass the evening.

Mademoiselle Vatnaz went on: "And what news about the old man of the mountain?"

But, with an abrupt wink, the Maréchale bade her hold her tongue; and she accompanied Frederick out as far as the anteroom to ascertain from him whether he would soon see Arnoux.

"Pray ask him to come — not before his wife, mind!"

At the top of the stairs an umbrella was placed against the wall near a pair of goloshes.

"Vatnaz's goloshes," said Rosanette. "What a foot, eh? My little friend is rather strongly built!"

And, in a melodramatic tone, making the final letter of the word roll:

"Don't tru-us-st her!"

Frederick, emboldened by a confidence of this sort, tried to kiss her on the neck.

"Oh, do it! It costs nothing!"

He felt rather light-hearted as he left her, having no doubt that ere long the Maréchale would be his mistress. This desire awakened another in him; and, in spite of the species of grudge that he owed her, he felt a longing to see Madame Arnoux.

Besides, he would have to call at her house in order to execute the commission with which he had been entrusted by Rosanette.

"But now," thought he (it had just struck six), "Arnoux is probably at home."

So he put off his visit till the following day.

She was seated in the same attitude as on the former day, and was sewing a little boy's shirt.

The child, at her feet, was playing with a wooden toy menagerie. Marthe, a short distance away, was writing.

He began by complimenting her on her children. She replied without any exaggeration of maternal silliness.

The room had a tranquil aspect. A glow of sunshine stole in through the window-panes, lighting up the angles of the different articles of furniture, and, as Madame Arnoux sat close beside the window, a large ray, falling on the curls over the nape of her neck, penetrated with liquid gold her skin, which assumed the colour of amber.

Then he said:

"This young lady here has grown very tall during the past three years! Do you remember, Mademoiselle, when you slept on my knees in the carriage?"

Marthe did not remember.

"One evening, returning from Saint-Cloud?"

There was a look of peculiar sadness in Madame

Arnoux's face. Was it in order to prevent any allusion on his part to the memories they possessed in common?

Her beautiful black eyes, whose sclerotics were glistening, moved gently under their somewhat drooping lids, and her pupils revealed in their depths an inexpressible kindness of heart. He was seized with a love stronger than ever, a passion that knew no bounds. It enervated him to contemplate the object of his attachment; however, he shook off this feeling. How was he to make the most of himself? by what means? And, having turned the matter over thoroughly in his mind, Frederick could think of none that seemed more effectual than money.

He began talking about the weather, which was less cold than it had been at Havre.

"You have been there?"

"Yes; about a family matter — an inheritance."

"Ah! I am very glad," she said, with an air of such genuine pleasure that he felt quite touched, just as if she had rendered him a great service.

She asked him what he intended to do, as it was necessary for a man to occupy himself with something.

He recalled to mind his false position, and said that he hoped to reach the Council of State with the help of M. Dambreuse, the secretary.

"You are acquainted with him, perhaps?"

"Merely by name."

Then, in a low tone:

"He brought you to the ball the other night, did he not?"

Frederick remained silent.

"That was what I wanted to know; thanks!"

After that she put two or three discreet questions to him about his family and the part of the country in which he lived. It was very kind of him not to have forgotten them after having lived so long away from Paris.

"But could I do so?" he rejoined. "Have you any doubt about it?"

Madame Arnoux arose: "I believe that you entertain towards us a true and solid affection. Au revoir!"

And she extended her hand towards him in a sincere and virile fashion.

Was this not an engagement, a promise? Frederick felt a sense of delight at merely living; he had to restrain himself to keep from singing. He wanted to burst out, to do generous deeds, and to give alms. He looked around him to see if there were anyone near whom he could relieve. No wretch happened to be passing by; and his desire for self-devotion evaporated, for he was not a man to go out of his way to find opportunities for benevolence.

Then he remembered his friends. The first of whom he thought was Hussonnet, the second, Pellerin. The lowly position of Dussardier naturally called for consideration. As for Cisy, he was glad to let that young aristocrat get a slight glimpse as to the extent of his fortune. He wrote accordingly to all four to come to a housewarming the following Sunday at eleven o'clock sharp; and he told Deslauriers to bring Sénécal.

The tutor had been dismissed from the third boarding-school in which he had been employed for not having given his consent to the distribution of prizes — a custom which he looked upon as dangerous to equality. He was now with an engine-builder, and for the past six months had been no longer living with Deslauriers. There had been nothing painful about their parting.

Sénécal had been visited by men in blouses — all patriots, all workmen, all honest fellows, but at the same time men whose society seemed distasteful to the advocate. Besides, he disliked certain ideas of his friend, excellent though they might be as weapons of warfare. He held his tongue on the subject through motives of ambition, deeming it prudent to pay deference to him in order to exercise control over him, for he looked forward impatiently to a revolutionary movement, in which he calculated on making an opening for himself and occupying a prominent position.

Sénécal's convictions were more disinterested. Every evening, when his work was finished, he returned to his garret and sought in books for something that might justify his dreams. He had annotated the Contrat Social; he had crammed himself with the Revue Indépendante; he was acquainted with Mably, Morelly, Fourier, Saint-Simon, Comte, Cabet, Louis Blanc — the heavy cartload of Socialistic writers — those who claim for humanity the dead level of barracks, those who would like to amuse it in a brothel or to bend it over a counter; and from a medley of all these things he constructed an ideal of virtuous democracy, with the double aspect of a farm in which the landlord was to receive a share of the produce, and a spinning-mill, a sort of American Lacedæmon, in which the individual would only exist for the benefit of society, which was to be more omnipotent, absolute, infallible, and divine than the Grand Lamas and the Nebuchadnezzars. He had no doubt as to the approaching realisation of this ideal; and Sénécal raged against everything that he considered hostile to it with the reasoning of a geometrician and the zeal of an Inquisitor. Titles of nobility, crosses, plumes, liveries above all, and even reputations that were too loud-sounding scandalised him, his studies as well as his sufferings intensifying every day his essential hatred of every kind of distinction and every form of social superiority.

"What do I owe to this gentleman that I should be polite to him? If he wants me, he can come to me."

Deslauriers, however, forced him to go to Frederick's reunion.

They found their friend in his bedroom. Spring-roller blinds and double curtains, Venetian mirrors — nothing was wanting there. Frederick, in a velvet vest, was lying back on an easy-chair, smoking cigarettes of Turkish tobacco.

Sénécal wore the gloomy look of a bigot arriving in the midst of a pleasure-party.

Deslauriers gave him a single comprehensive glance; then, with a very low bow:

"Monseigneur, allow me to pay my respects to you!"

Dussardier leaped on his neck. "So you are a rich man now. Ah! upon my soul, so much the better!"

Cisy made his appearance with crape on his hat. Since the death of his grandmother, he was in the enjoyment of a considerable fortune, and was less bent on amusing himself than on being distinguished from others — not being the same as everyone else — in short, on "having the proper stamp." This was his favourite phrase.

However, it was now midday, and they were all yawning.

Frederick was waiting for some one.

At the mention of Arnoux's name, Pellerin made a wry face. He looked on him as a renegade since he had abandoned the fine arts.

"Suppose we pass over him — what do you say to that?"

They all approved of this suggestion.

The door was opened by a man-servant in long gaiters; and the dining-room could be seen with its lofty oak plinths relieved with gold, and its two sideboards laden with plate.

The bottles of wine were heating on the stove; the blades of new knives were glittering beside oysters. In the milky tint of the enamelled glasses there was a kind of alluring sweetness; and the table disappeared from view under its load of game, fruit, and meats of the rarest quality.

These attentions were lost on Sénécal. He began by asking for household bread (the hardest that could be got), and in connection with this subject, spoke of the murders of Buzançais and the crisis arising from lack of the means of subsistence.

Nothing of this sort could have happened if agriculture had been better protected, if everything had not been given up to competition, to anarchy, and to the deplorable maxim of "Let things alone! let things go their own way!" It was in this way that the feudalism of money was established — the worst form of feudalism. But let them take care! The people in the end will get tired of it, and may make the capitalist pay for their sufferings either by bloody proscriptions or by the plunder of their houses.

Frederick saw, as if by a lightning-flash, a flood of men with bare arms invading Madame Dambreuse's drawing-room, and smashing the mirrors with blows of pikes.

Sénecal went on to say that the workman, owing to the insufficiency of wages, was more unfortunate than the helot, the negro, and the pariah, especially if he has children.

"Ought he to get rid of them by asphyxia, as some English doctor, whose name I don't remember — a disciple of Malthus — advises him?"

And, turning towards Cisy: "Are we to be obliged to follow the advice of the infamous Malthus?"

Cisy, who was ignorant of the infamy and even of the existence of Malthus, said by way of reply, that after all, much human misery was relieved, and that the higher classes — —

"Ha! the higher classes!" said the Socialist, with a sneer. "In the first place, there are no higher classes. 'Tis the heart alone that makes anyone higher than another. We want no alms, understand! but equality, the fair division of products."

What he required was that the workman might become a capitalist, just as the soldier might become a colonel. The trade-wardenships, at least, in limiting the number of apprentices, prevented workmen from growing inconveniently numerous, and the sentiment of fraternity was kept up by means of the fêtes and the banners.

Hussonnet, as a poet, regretted the banners; so did Pellerin, too — a predilection which had taken possession of him at the Café Dagneaux, while listening to the Phalansterians talking. He expressed the opinion that Fourier was a great man.

"Come now!" said Deslauriers. "An old fool who sees in the overthrow of governments the effects of Divine vengeance. He is just like my lord Saint-Simon and his church, with his hatred of the French Revolution — a set of buffoons who would fain re-establish Catholicism."

M. de Cisy, no doubt in order to get information or to make a good impression, broke in with this remark, which he uttered in a mild tone:

"These two men of science are not, then, of the same way of thinking as Voltaire?"

"That fellow! I make you a present of him!"

"How is that? Why, I thought — —"

"Oh! no, he did not love the people!"

Then the conversation came down to contemporary events: the Spanish marriages, the dilapidations of Rochefort, the new chapter-house of Saint-Denis, which had led to the taxes being doubled. Nevertheless, according to Sénécal, they were not high enough!

"And why are they paid? My God! to erect the palace for apes at the Museum, to make showy staff-officers parade along our squares, or to maintain a Gothic etiquette amongst the flunkeys of the Château!"

"I have read in the Mode," said Cisy, "that at the Tuileries ball on the feast of Saint-Ferdinand, everyone was disguised as a miser."

"How pitiable!" said the Socialist, with a shrug of his shoulders, as if to indicate his disgust.

"And the Museum of Versailles!" exclaimed Pellerin. "Let us talk about it! These idiots have foreshortened a Delacroix and lengthened a Gros! At the Louvre they have so well restored, scratched, and made a jumble of all the canvases, that in ten years probably not one will be left. As for the errors in the catalogue, a German has written a whole volume on the subject. Upon my word, the foreigners are laughing at us."

"Yes, we are the laughing-stock of Europe," said Sénécal.

"'Tis because Art is conveyed in fee-simple to the Crown."

"As long as you haven't universal suffrage — —"

"Allow me!" — for the artist, having been rejected at every salon for the last twenty years, was filled with rage against Power.

"Ah! let them not bother us! As for me, I ask for nothing. Only the Chambers ought to pass enactments in the interests of Art. A chair of æsthetics should be established with a professor who, being a practical man as well as a philosopher, would succeed, I hope, in grouping the multitude. You would do well, Hussonnet, to touch on this matter with a word or two in your newspaper?"

"Are the newspapers free? are we ourselves free?" said Deslauriers in an angry tone. "When one reflects that there might be as many as twenty-eight different formalities to set up a boat on the river, it makes me feel a longing to go and live amongst the cannibals! The Government is eating us up. Everything belongs to it — philosophy, law, the arts, the very air of heaven; and France, bereft of all energy, lies under the boot of the gendarme and the cassock of the devil-dodger with the death-rattle in her throat!"

The future Mirabeau thus poured out his bile in abundance. Finally he took his glass in his right hand, raised it, and with his other arm akimbo, and his eyes flashing:

"I drink to the utter destruction of the existing order of things — that is to say, of everything included in the words Privilege, Monopoly, Regulation, Hierarchy, Authority, State!" — and in a louder voice — "which I would like to smash as I do this!" dashing on the table the beautiful wine-glass, which broke into a thousand pieces.

They all applauded, and especially Dussardier.

The spectacle of injustices made his heart leap up with indignation. Everything that wore a beard claimed his sympathy. He was one of those persons who fling themselves under vehicles to relieve the horses who have fallen. His erudition was limited to two works, one entitled Crimes of Kings, and the other Mysteries of the Vatican. He had listened to the advocate with open-mouthed delight. At length, unable to stand it any longer:

"For my part, the thing I blame Louis Philippe for is abandoning the Poles!"

"One moment!" said Hussonnet. "In the first place, Poland has no existence; 'tis an invention of Lafayette! The Poles, as a general rule, all belong to the Faubourg Saint-Marceau, the real ones having been drowned with Poniatowski." In short, "he no longer gave into it;" he had "got over all that sort of thing; it was just like the sea-serpent, the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and that antiquated hum-bug about the Saint-Bartholomew massacre!"

Sénécal, while he did not defend the Poles, extolled the latest remarks made by the men of letters. The Popes had been calumniated, inasmuch as they, at any rate, defended the people, and he called the League "the aurora of Democracy, a great movement in the direction of equality as opposed to the individualism of Protestants."

Frederick was a little surprised at these views. They probably bored Cisy, for he changed the conversation to the tableaux vivants at the Gymnase, which at that time attracted a great number of people.

Sénécal regarded them with disfavour. Such exhibitions corrupted the daughters of the proletariat. Then, it was noticeable that they went in for a display of shameless luxury. Therefore, he approved of the conduct of the Bavarian students who insulted Lola Montès. In imitation of Rousseau, he showed more esteem for the wife of a coal-porter than for the mistress of a king.

"You don't appreciate dainties," retorted Hussonnet in a majestic tone. And he took up the championship of ladies of this class in order to praise Rosanette. Then, as he happened to make an allusion to the ball at her house and to Arnoux's costume, Pellerin remarked:

"People maintain that he is becoming shaky?"

The picture-dealer had just been engaged in a lawsuit with reference to his grounds at Belleville, and he was actually in a kaolin company in Lower Brittany with other rogues of the same sort.

Dussardier knew more about him, for his own master, M. Moussinot, having made enquiries about Arnoux from the banker, Oscar Lefébvre, the latter had said in reply that he considered him by no means solvent, as he knew about bills of his that had been renewed.

The dessert was over; they passed into the drawing-room, which was hung, like that of the Maréchale, in yellow damask in the style of Louis XVI.

Pellerin found fault with Frederick for not having chosen in preference the Neo-Greek style; Sénécal rubbed matches against the hangings; Deslauriers did not make any remark.

There was a bookcase set up there, which he called "a little girl's library." The principal contemporary writers were to be found there. It was impossible to speak about their works, for Hussonnet immediately began relating anecdotes with reference to their personal characteristics, criticising their faces, their habits, their dress, glorifying fifth-rate intellects and disparaging those of the first; and all the while making it clear that he deplored modern decadence.

He instanced some village ditty as containing in itself alone more poetry than all the lyrics of the nineteenth century. He went on to say that Balzac was overrated, that Byron was effaced, and that Hugo knew nothing about the stage.

"Why, then," said Sénécal, "have you not got the volumes of the working-men poets?"

And M. de Cisy, who devoted his attention to literature, was astonished at not seeing on Frederick's table some of those new physiological studies — the physiology of the smoker, of the angler, of the man employed at the barrier.

They went on irritating him to such an extent that he felt a longing to shove them out by the shoulders.

"But they are making me quite stupid!" And then he drew Dussardier aside, and wished to know whether he could do him any service.

The honest fellow was moved. He answered that his post of cashier entirely sufficed for his wants.

After that, Frederick led Deslauriers into his own apartment, and, taking out of his escritoire two thousand francs:

"Look here, old boy, put this money in your pocket. 'Tis the balance of my old debts to you."

"But — what about the journal?" said the advocate. "You are, of course, aware that I spoke about it to Hussonnet."

And, when Frederick replied that he was "a little short of cash just now," the other smiled in a sinister fashion.

After the liqueurs they drank beer, and after the beer, grog; and then they lighted their pipes once more. At last they left, at five o'clock in the evening, and they were walking along at each others' side without speaking, when Dussardier broke the silence by saying that Frederick had entertained them in excellent style. They all agreed with him on that point.

Then Hussonnet remarked that his luncheon was too heavy. Sénécal found fault with the trivial character of his household arrangements. Cisy took the same view. It was absolutely devoid of the "proper stamp."

"For my part, I think," said Pellerin, "he might have had the grace to give me an order for a picture."

Deslauriers held his tongue, as he had the bank-notes that had been given to him in his breeches' pocket.

Frederick was left by himself. He was thinking about his friends, and it seemed to him as if a huge ditch surrounded with shade separated him from them. He had nevertheless held out his hand to them, and they had not responded to the sincerity of his heart.

He recalled to mind what Pellerin and Dussardier had said about Arnoux. Undoubtedly it must be an invention, a calumny? But why? And he had a vision of Madame Arnoux, ruined, weeping, selling her furniture. This idea tormented him all night long. Next day he presented himself at her house.

At a loss to find any way of communicating to her what he had heard, he asked her, as if in casual conversation, whether Arnoux still held possession of his building grounds at Belleville.

"Yes, he has them still."

"He is now, I believe, a shareholder in a kaolin company in Brittany."

"That's true."

"His earthenware-works are going on very well, are they not?"

"Well — I suppose so — —"

And, as he hesitated:

"What is the matter with you? You frighten me!"

He told her the story about the renewals. She hung down her head, and said:

"I thought so!"

In fact, Arnoux, in order to make a good speculation, had refused to sell his grounds, had borrowed money extensively on them, and finding no purchasers, had thought of rehabilitating himself by establishing the earthenware manufactory. The expense of this had exceeded his calculations. She knew nothing more about it. He evaded all her questions, and declared repeatedly that it was going on very well.

Frederick tried to reassure her. These in all probability were mere temporary embarrassments. However, if he got any information, he would impart it to her.

"Oh! yes, will you not?" said she, clasping her two hands with an air of charming supplication.

So then, he had it in his power to be useful to her. He was now entering into her existence — finding a place in her heart.

Arnoux appeared.

"Ha! how nice of you to come to take me out to dine!"

Frederick was silent on hearing these words.

Arnoux spoke about general topics, then informed his wife that he would be returning home very late, as he had an appointment with M. Oudry.

"At his house?"

"Why, certainly, at his house."

As they went down the stairs, he confessed that, as the Maréchale had no engagement at home, they were going on a secret pleasure-party to the Moulin Rouge; and, as he always needed somebody to be the recipient of his outpourings, he got Frederick to drive him to the door.

In place of entering, he walked about on the footpath, looking up at the windows on the second floor. Suddenly the curtains parted.

"Ha! bravo! Père Oudry is no longer there! Good evening!"

Frederick did not know what to think now.

From this day forth, Arnoux was still more cordial than before; he invited the young man to dine with his mistress; and ere long Frederick frequented both houses at the same time.

Rosanette's abode furnished him with amusement. He used to call there of an evening on his way back from the club or the play. He would take a cup of tea there, or play a game of loto. On Sundays they played charades; Rosanette, more noisy than the rest, made herself conspicuous by funny tricks, such as running on all-fours or muffling her head in a cotton cap. In order to watch the passers-by through the window, she had a hat of waxed leather; she smoked chibouks; she sang Tyrolese airs. In the afternoon, to kill time, she cut out flowers in a piece of chintz and pasted them against the window-panes, smeared her two little dogs with varnish, burned pastilles, or drew cards to tell her fortune. Incapable of resisting a desire, she became infatuated about some trinket which she happened to see, and could not sleep till she had gone and bought it, then bartered it for another, sold costly dresses for little or nothing, lost her jewellery, squandered money, and would have sold her chemise for a stage-box at the theatre. Often she asked Frederick to explain to her some word she came across when reading a book, but did not pay any attention to his answer, for she jumped quickly to another idea, while heaping questions on top of each other. After spasms of gaiety came childish outbursts of rage, or else she sat on the ground dreaming before the fire with her head down and her hands clasping her knees, more inert than a torpid adder. Without minding it, she made her toilet in his presence, drew on her silk stockings, then washed her face with great splashes of water, throwing back her figure as if she were a shivering naiad; and her laughing white teeth, her sparkling eyes, her beauty, her gaiety, dazzled Frederick, and made his nerves tingle under the lash of desire.

Nearly always he found Madame Arnoux teaching her little boy how to read, or standing behind Marthe's chair while she played her scales on the piano. When she was doing a piece of sewing, it was a great source of delight to him to pick up her scissors now and then. In all her movements there was a tranquil majesty. Her little hands seemed made to scatter alms and to wipe away tears, and her voice, naturally rather hollow, had caressing intonations and a sort of breezy lightness.

She did not display much enthusiasm about literature; but her intelligence exercised a charm by the use of a few simple and penetrating words. She loved travelling, the sound of the wind in the woods, and a walk with uncovered head under the rain.

Frederick listened to these confidences with rapture, fancying that he saw in them the beginning of a certain self-abandonment on her part.

His association with these two women made, as it were, two different strains of music in his life, the one playful, passionate, diverting, the other grave and almost religious, and vibrating both at the same time, they always increased in volume and gradually blended with one another; for if Madame Arnoux happened merely to touch him with her finger, the image of the other immediately presented itself to him as an object of desire, because from that quarter a better opportunity was thrown in his way, and, when his heart happened to be touched while in Rosanette's company, he was immediately reminded of the woman for whom he felt such a consuming passion.

This confusion was, in some measure, due to a similarity which existed between the interiors of the two houses. One of the trunks which was formerly to be seen in the Boulevard Montmartre now adorned Rosanette's dining-room. The same courses were served up for dinner in both places, and even the same velvet cap was to be found trailing over the easy-chairs; then, a heap of little presents — screens, boxes, fans — went to the mistress's house from the wife's and returned again, for Arnoux, without the slightest embarrassment, often took back from the one what he had given to her in order to make a present of it to the other.

The Maréchale laughed with Frederick at the utter disregard for propriety which his habits exhibited. One Sunday, after dinner, she led him behind the door, and showed him in the pocket of Arnoux's overcoat a bag of cakes which he had just pilfered from the table, in order, no doubt, to regale his little family with it at home. M. Arnoux gave himself up to some rogueries which bordered on vileness. It seemed to him a duty to practise fraud with regard to the city dues; he never paid when he went to the theatre, or if he took a ticket for the second seats always tried to make his way into the first; and he used to relate as an excellent joke that it was a custom of his at the cold baths to put into the waiters' collection-box a breeches' button instead of a ten-sous piece — and this did not prevent the Maréchale from loving him.

One day, however, she said, while talking about him:

"Ah! he's making himself a nuisance to me, at last! I've had enough of him! Faith, so much the better — I'll find another instead!"

Frederick believed that the other had already been found, and that his name was M. Oudry.

"Well," said Rosanette, "what does that signify?"

Then, in a voice choked with rising tears:

"I ask very little from him, however, and he won't give me that."

He had even promised a fourth of his profits in the famous kaolin mines. No profit made its appearance any more than the cashmere with which he had been luring her on for the last six months.

Frederick immediately thought of making her a present. Arnoux might regard it as a lesson for himself, and be annoyed at it.

For all that, he was good-natured, his wife herself said so, but so foolish! Instead of bringing people to dine every day at his house, he now entertained his acquaintances at a restaurant. He bought things that were utterly useless, such as gold chains, timepieces, and household articles. Madame Arnoux even pointed out to Frederick in the lobby an enormous supply of tea-kettles, foot-warmers, and samovars. Finally, she one day confessed that a certain matter caused her much anxiety. Arnoux had made her sign a promissory note payable to M. Dambreuse.

Meanwhile Frederick still cherished his literary projects as if it were a point of honour with himself to do so. He wished to write a history of æsthetics, a result of his conversations with Pellerin; next, to write dramas dealing with different epochs of the French Revolution, and to compose a great comedy, an idea traceable to the indirect influence of Deslauriers and Hussonnet. In the midst of his work her face or that of the other passed before his mental vision. He struggled against the longing to see her, but was not long ere he yielded to it; and he felt sadder as he came back from Madame Arnoux's house.

One morning, while he was brooding over his melancholy thoughts by the fireside, Deslauriers came in. The incendiary speeches of Sénécal had filled his master with uneasiness, and once more he found himself without resources.

"What do you want me to do?" said Frederick.

"Nothing! I know you have no money. But it will not be much trouble for you to get him a post either through M. Dambreuse or else through Arnoux. The latter ought to have need of engineers in his establishment."

Frederick had an inspiration. Sénécal would be able to let him know when the husband was away, carry letters for him and assist him on a thousand occasions when opportunities presented themselves. Services of this sort are always rendered between man and man. Besides, he would find means of employing him without arousing any suspicion on his part. Chance offered him an auxiliary; it was a circumstance that omened well for the future, and he hastened to take advantage of it; and, with an affectation of indifference, he replied that the thing was feasible perhaps, and that he would devote attention to it.

And he did so at once. Arnoux took a great deal of pains with his earthenware works. He was endeavouring to discover the copper-red of the Chinese, but his colours evaporated in the process of baking. In order to avoid cracks in his ware, he mixed lime with his potter's clay; but the articles got broken for the most part; the enamel of his paintings on the raw material boiled away; his large plates became bulged; and, attributing these mischances to the inferior plant of his manufactory, he was anxious to start other grinding-mills and other drying-rooms. Frederick recalled some of these things to mind, and, when he met Arnoux, said that he had discovered a very able man, who would be capable of finding his famous red. Arnoux gave a jump; then, having listened to what the young man had to tell him, replied that he wanted assistance from nobody.

Frederick spoke in a very laudatory style about S n cal's prodigious attainments, pointing out that he was at the same time an engineer, a chemist, and an accountant, being a mathematician of the first rank.

The earthenware-dealer consented to see him.

But they squabbled over the emoluments. Frederick interposed, and, at the end of a week, succeeded in getting them to come to an agreement.

But as the works were situated at Creil, S n cal could not assist him in any way. This thought alone was enough to make his courage flag, as if he had met with some misfortune. His notion was that the more Arnoux would be kept apart from his wife the better would be his own chance with her. Then he proceeded to make repeated apologies for Rosanette. He referred to all the wrongs she had sustained at the other's hands, referred to the vague threats which she had uttered a few days before, and even spoke about the cashmere without concealing the fact that she had accused Arnoux of avarice.

Arnoux, nettled at the word (and, furthermore, feeling some uneasiness), brought Rosanette the cashmere, but scolded her for having made any complaint to Frederick. When she told him that she had reminded him a hundred times of his promise, he pretended that, owing to pressure of business, he had forgotten all about it.

The next day Frederick presented himself at her abode, and found the Maréchale still in bed, though it was two o'clock, with Delmar beside her finishing a pâté de foie gras at a little round table. Before he had advanced many paces, she broke out into a cry of delight, saying: "I have him! I have him!" Then she seized him by the ears, kissed him on the forehead, thanked him effusively, "thee'd" and "thou'd" him, and even wanted to make him sit down on the bed. Her fine eyes, full of tender emotion, were sparkling with pleasure. There was a smile on her humid mouth. Her two round arms emerged through the sleeveless opening of her night-dress, and, from time to time, he could feel through the cambric the well-rounded outlines of her form.

Copyright 1888 by M. Walter Dwyer

HERRMAN
RASTERMAN—1888

Then she seized him by the ears and kissed him.

All this time Delmar kept rolling his eyeballs about.

"But really, my dear, my own pet..."

It was the same way on the occasion when he saw her next. As soon as Frederick entered, she sat up on a cushion in order to embrace him with more ease, called him a darling, a "dearie," put a flower in his button-hole, and settled his cravat. These delicate attentions were redoubled when Delmar happened to be there. Were they advances on her part? So it seemed to Frederick.

As for deceiving a friend, Arnoux, in his place, would not have had many scruples on that score, and he had every right not to adhere to rigidly virtuous principles with regard to this man's mistress, seeing that his relations with the wife had been strictly honourable, for so he thought — or rather he would have liked Arnoux to think so, in any event, as a sort of justification of his own prodigious cowardice. Nevertheless he felt somewhat bewildered; and presently he made up his mind to lay siege boldly to the Maréchale.

So, one afternoon, just as she was stooping down in front of her chest of drawers, he came across to her, and repeated his overtures without a pause.

Thereupon, she began to cry, saying that she was very unfortunate, but that people should not despise her on that account.

He only made fresh advances. She now adopted a different plan, namely, to laugh at his attempts without stopping. He thought it a clever thing to answer her sarcasms with repartees in the same strain, in which there was even a touch of exaggeration. But he made too great a display of gaiety to convince her that he was in earnest; and their comradeship was an impediment to any outpouring of serious feeling. At last, when she said one day, in reply to his amorous whispers, that she would not take another woman's leavings, he answered.

"What other woman?"

"Ah! yes, go and meet Madame Arnoux again!"

For Frederick used to talk about her often. Arnoux, on his side, had the same mania. At last she lost patience at always hearing this woman's praises sung, and her insinuation was a kind of revenge.

Frederick resented it. However, Rosanette was beginning to excite his love to an unusual degree. Sometimes, assuming the attitude of a woman of experience, she spoke ill of love with a sceptical smile that made him feel inclined to box her ears. A quarter of an hour afterwards, it was the only thing of any consequence in the world, and, with her arms crossed over her breast, as if she were clasping some one close to her: "Oh, yes, 'tis good! 'tis good!" and her eyelids would quiver in a kind of rapturous swoon. It was impossible to understand her, to know, for instance, whether she loved Arnoux, for she made fun of him, and yet seemed jealous of him. So likewise with the Vatnaz, whom she would sometimes call a wretch, and at other times her best friend. In short, there was about her entire person, even to the very arrangement of her chignon over her head, an inexpressible something, which seemed like a challenge; and he desired her for the satisfaction, above all, of conquering her and being her master.

How was he to accomplish this? for she often sent him away unceremoniously, appearing only for a moment between two doors in order to say in a subdued voice, "I'm engaged — for the evening;" or else he found her surrounded by a dozen persons; and when they were alone, so many impediments presented themselves one after the other, that one would have sworn there was a bet to keep matters from going any further. He invited her to dinner; as a rule, she declined the invitation. On one occasion, she accepted it, but did not come.

A Machiavellian idea arose in his brain.

Having heard from Dussardier about Pellerin's complaints against himself, he thought of giving the artist an order to paint the Maréchale's portrait, a life-sized portrait, which would necessitate a good number of sittings. He would not fail to be present at all of them. The habitual incorrectness of the painter would facilitate their private conversations. So then he would urge Rosanette to get the picture executed in order to make a present of her face to her dear Arnoux. She consented, for she saw herself in the midst of the Grand Salon in the most prominent position with a crowd of people staring at her picture, and the newspapers would all talk about it, which at once would set her afloat.

As for Pellerin, he eagerly snatched at the offer. This portrait ought to place him in the position of a great man; it ought to be a masterpiece. He passed in review in his memory all the portraits by great masters with which he was acquainted, and decided finally in favour of a Titian, which would be set off with ornaments in the style of Veronese. Therefore, he would carry out his design without artificial backgrounds in a bold light, which would illuminate the flesh-tints with a single tone, and which would make the accessories glitter.

"Suppose I were to put on her," he thought, "a pink silk dress with an Oriental bournous? Oh, no! the bournous is only a rascally thing! Or suppose, rather, I were to make her wear blue velvet with a grey background, richly coloured? We might likewise give her a white guipure collar with a black fan and a scarlet curtain behind." And thus, seeking for ideas, he enlarged his conception, and regarded it with admiration.

He felt his heart beating when Rosanette, accompanied by Frederick, called at his house for the first sitting. He placed her standing up on a sort of platform in the midst of the apartment, and, finding fault with the light and expressing regret at the loss of his former studio, he first made her lean on her elbow against a pedestal, then sit down in an armchair, and, drawing away from her and coming near her again by turns in order to adjust with a fillip the folds of her dress, he watched her with eyelids half-closed, and appealed to Frederick's taste with a passing word.

"Well, no," he exclaimed; "I return to my own idea. I will set you up in the Venetian style."

She would have a poppy-coloured velvet gown with a jewelled girdle; and her wide sleeve lined with ermine would afford a glimpse of her bare arm, which was to touch the balustrade of a staircase rising behind her. At her left, a large column would mount as far as the top of the canvas to meet certain structures so as to form an arch. Underneath one would vaguely distinguish groups of orange-trees almost black, through which the blue sky, with its streaks of white cloud, would seem cut into fragments. On the baluster, covered with a carpet, there would be, on a silver dish, a bouquet of flowers, a chaplet of amber, a poniard, and a little chest of antique ivory, rather yellow with age, which would appear to be disgorging gold sequins. Some of them, falling on the ground here and there, would form brilliant splashes, as it were, in such a way as to direct one's glance towards the tip of her foot, for she would be standing on the last step but one in a natural position, as if in the act of moving under the glow of the broad sunlight.

He went to look for a picture-case, which he laid on the platform to represent the step. Then he arranged as accessories, on a stool by way of balustrade, his pea-jacket, a buckler, a sardine-box, a bundle of pens, and a knife; and when he had flung in front of Rosanette a dozen big sous, he made her assume the attitude he required.

"Just try to imagine that these things are riches, magnificent presents. The head a little on one side! Perfect! and don't stir! This majestic posture exactly suits your style of beauty."

She wore a plaid dress and carried a big muff, and only kept from laughing outright by an effort of self-control.

"As regards the head-dress, we will mingle with it a circle of pearls. It always produces a striking effect with red hair."

The Maréchale burst out into an exclamation, remarking that she had not red hair.

"Nonsense! The red of painters is not that of ordinary people."

He began to sketch the position of the masses; and he was so much preoccupied with the great artists of the Renaissance that he kept talking about them persistently. For a whole hour he went on musing aloud on those splendid lives, full of genius, glory, and sumptuous displays, with triumphal entries into the cities, and galas by torchlight among half-naked women, beautiful as goddesses.

"You were made to live in those days. A creature of your calibre would have deserved a monseigneur."

Rosanette thought the compliments he paid her very pretty. The day was fixed for the next sitting. Frederick took it on himself to bring the accessories.

As the heat of the stove had stupefied her a little, they went home on foot through the Rue du Bac, and reached the Pont Royal.

It was fine weather, piercingly bright and warm. Some windows of houses in the city shone in the distance, like plates of gold, whilst behind them at the right the turrets of Nôtre Dame showed their outlines in black against the blue sky, softly bathed at the horizon in grey vapours.

The wind began to swell; and Rosanette, having declared that she felt hungry, they entered the "Pâtisserie Anglaise."

Young women with their children stood eating in front of the marble buffet, where plates of little cakes had glass covers pressed down on them. Rosanette swallowed two cream-tarts. The powdered sugar formed moustaches at the sides of her mouth. From time to time, in order to wipe it, she drew out her handkerchief from her muff, and her face, under her green silk hood, resembled a full-blown rose in the midst of its leaves.

They resumed their walk. In the Rue de la Paix she stood before a goldsmith's shop to look at a bracelet. Frederick wished to make her a present of it.

"No!" said she; "keep your money!"

He was hurt by these words.

"What's the matter now with the ducky? We are melancholy?"

And, the conversation having been renewed, he began making the same protestations of love to her as usual.

"You know well 'tis impossible!"

"Why?"

"Ah! because — — "

They went on side by side, she leaning on his arm, and the flounces of her gown kept flapping against his legs. Then, he recalled to mind one winter twilight when on the same footpath Madame Arnoux walked thus by his side, and he became so much absorbed in this recollection that he no longer saw Rosanette, and did not bestow a thought upon her.

She kept looking straight before her in a careless fashion, lagging a little, like a lazy child. It was the hour when people had just come back from their promenade, and equipages were making their way at a quick trot over the hard pavement.

Pellerin's flatteries having probably recurred to her mind, she heaved a sigh.

"Ah! there are some lucky women in the world. Decidedly, I was made for a rich man!"

He replied, with a certain brutality in his tone:

"You have one, in the meantime!" for M. Oudry was looked upon as a man that could count a million three times over.

She asked for nothing better than to get free from him.

"What prevents you from doing so?" And he gave utterance to bitter jests about this old bewigged citizen, pointing out to her that such an intrigue was unworthy of her, and that she ought to break it off.

"Yes," replied the Maréchale, as if talking to herself. "'Tis what I shall end by doing, no doubt!"

Frederick was charmed by this disinterestedness. She slackened her pace, and he fancied that she was fatigued. She obstinately refused to let him take a cab, and she parted with him at her door, sending him a kiss with her finger-tips.

"Ah! what a pity! and to think that imbeciles take me for a man of wealth!"

He reached home in a gloomy frame of mind.

Hussonnet and Deslauriers were awaiting him. The Bohemian, seated before the table, made sketches of Turks' heads; and the advocate, in dirty boots, lay asleep on the sofa.

"Ha! at last," he exclaimed. "But how sullen you look! Will you listen to me?"

His vogue as a tutor had fallen off, for he crammed his pupils with theories unfavourable for their examinations. He had appeared in two or three cases in which he had been unsuccessful, and each new disappointment flung him back with greater force on the dream of his earlier days — a journal in which he could show himself off, avenge himself, and spit forth his bile and his opinions. Fortune and reputation, moreover, would follow as a necessary consequence. It was in this hope that he had got round the Bohemian, Hussonnet happening to be the possessor of a press.

At present, he printed it on pink paper. He invented hoaxes, composed rebuses, tried to engage in polemics, and even intended, in spite of the situation of the premises, to get up concerts. A year's subscription was to give a right to a place in the orchestra in one of the principal theatres of Paris. Besides, the board of management took on itself to furnish foreigners with all necessary information, artistic and otherwise. But the printer gave vent to threats; there were three quarters' rent due to the landlord. All sorts of embarrassments arose; and Hussonnet would have allowed L'Art to perish, were it not for the exhortations of the advocate, who kept every day exciting his mind. He had brought the other with him, in order to give more weight to the application he was now making.

"We've come about the journal," said he.

"What! are you still thinking about that?" said Frederick, in an absent tone.

"Certainly, I am thinking about it!"

And he explained his plan anew. By means of the Bourse returns, they would get into communication with financiers, and would thus obtain the hundred thousand francs indispensable as security. But, in order that the print might be transformed into a political journal, it was necessary beforehand to have a large clientèle, and for that purpose to make up their minds to go to some expense — so much for the cost of paper and printing, and for outlay at the office; in short, a sum of about fifteen thousand francs.

"I have no funds," said Frederick.

"And what are we to do, then?" said Deslauriers, with folded arms.

Frederick, hurt by the attitude which Deslauriers was assuming, replied:

"Is that my fault?"

"Ah! very fine. A man has wood in his fire, truffles on his table, a good bed, a library, a carriage, every kind of comfort. But let another man shiver under the slates, dine at twenty sous, work like a convict, and sprawl through want in the mire — is it the rich man's fault?"

And he repeated, "Is it the rich man's fault?" with a Ciceronian irony which smacked of the law-courts.

Frederick tried to speak.

"However, I understand one has certain wants — aristocratic wants; for, no doubt, some woman — — "

"Well, even if that were so? Am I not free — — ?"

"Oh! quite free!"

And, after a minute's silence:

"Promises are so convenient!"

"Good God! I don't deny that I gave them!" said Frederick.

The advocate went on:

"At college we take oaths; we are going to set up a phalanx; we are going to imitate Balzac's Thirteen. Then, on meeting a friend after a separation: 'Good night, old fellow! Go about your business!' For he who might help the other carefully keeps everything for himself alone."

"How is that?"

"Yes, you have not even introduced me to the Dambreuses."

Frederick cast a scrutinising glance at him. With his shabby frock-coat, his spectacles of rough glass, and his sallow face, that advocate seemed to him such a typical specimen of the penniless pedant that he could not prevent his lips from curling with a disdainful smile.

Deslauriers perceived this, and reddened.

He had already taken his hat to leave. Hussonnet, filled with uneasiness, tried to mollify him with appealing looks, and, as

Frederick was turning his back on him:

"Look here, my boy, become my Mæcenās! Protect the arts!"

Frederick, with an abrupt movement of resignation, took a sheet of paper, and, having scrawled some lines on it, handed it to him. The Bohemian's face lighted up.

Then, passing across the sheet of paper to Deslauriers:

"Apologise, my fine fellow!"

Their friend begged his notary to send him fifteen thousand francs as quickly as possible.

"Ah! I recognise you in that," said Deslauriers.

"On the faith of a gentleman," added the Bohemian, "you are a noble fellow, you'll be placed in the gallery of useful men!"

The advocate remarked:

"You'll lose nothing by it, 'tis an excellent speculation."

"Faith," exclaimed Hussonnet, "I'd stake my head at the scaffold on its success!"

And he said so many foolish things, and promised so many wonderful things, in which perhaps he believed, that Frederick did not know whether he did this in order to laugh at others or at himself.

The same evening he received a letter from his mother. She expressed astonishment at not seeing him yet a minister, while indulging in a little banter at his expense. Then she spoke of her health, and informed him that M. Roque had now become one of her visitors.

"Since he is a widower, I thought there would be no objection to inviting him to the house. Louise is greatly changed for the better." And in a postscript: "You have told me nothing about your fine acquaintance, M. Dambreuse; if I were you, I would make use of him."

Why not? His intellectual ambitions had left him, and his fortune (he saw it clearly) was insufficient, for when his debts had been paid, and the sum agreed on remitted to the others, his income would be diminished by four thousand at least! Moreover, he felt the need of giving up this sort of life, and attaching himself to some pursuit. So, next day, when dining at Madame Arnoux's, he said that his mother was tormenting him in order to make him take up a profession.

"But I was under the impression," she said, "that M. Dambreuse was going to get you into the Council of State? That would suit you very well."

So, then, she wished him to take this course. He regarded her wish as a command.

The banker, as on the first occasion, was seated at his desk, and, with a gesture, intimated that he desired Frederick to wait a few minutes; for a gentleman who was standing at the door with his back turned had been discussing some serious topic with him.

The subject of their conversation was the proposed amalgamation of the different coal-mining companies.

On each side of the glass hung portraits of General Foy and Louis Philippe. Cardboard shelves rose along the panels up to the ceiling, and there were six straw chairs, M. Dambreuse not requiring a more fashionably-furnished apartment for the transaction of business. It resembled those gloomy kitchens in which great banquets are prepared.

Frederick noticed particularly two chests of prodigious size which stood in the corners. He asked himself how many millions they might contain. The banker unlocked one of them, and as the iron plate revolved, it disclosed to view nothing inside but blue paper books full of entries.

At last, the person who had been talking to M. Dambreuse passed in front of Frederick. It was Père Oudry. The two saluted one another, their faces colouring — a circumstance which surprised M. Dambreuse. However, he exhibited the utmost affability, observing that nothing would be easier than to recommend the young man to the Keeper of the Seals. They would be too happy to have him, he added, concluding his polite attentions by inviting him to an evening party which he would be giving in a few days.

Frederick was stepping into a brougham on his way to this party when a note from the Maréchale reached him. By the light of the carriage-lamps he read:

"Darling, I have followed your advice: I have just expelled my savage. After to-morrow evening, liberty! Say whether I am not brave!"

Nothing more. But it was clearly an invitation to him to take the vacant place. He uttered an exclamation, squeezed the note into his pocket, and set forth.

Two municipal guards on horseback were stationed in the street. A row of lamps burned on the two front gates, and some servants were calling out in the courtyard to have the carriages brought up to the end of the steps before the house under the marquée.

Then suddenly the noise in the vestibule ceased.

Large trees filled up the space in front of the staircase. The porcelain globes shed a light which waved like white moiré satin on the walls.

Frederick rushed up the steps in a joyous frame of mind. An usher announced his name. M. Dambreuse extended his hand. Almost at the very same moment, Madame Dambreuse appeared. She wore a mauve dress trimmed with lace. The ringlets of her hair were more abundant than usual, and not a single jewel did she display.

She complained of his coming to visit them so rarely, and seized the opportunity to exchange a few confidential words with him.

The guests began to arrive. In their mode of bowing they twisted their bodies on one side or bent in two, or merely lowered their heads a little. Then, a married pair, a family passed in, and all scattered themselves about the drawing-room, which was already filled. Under the chandelier in the centre, an enormous ottoman-seat supported a stand, the flowers of which, bending forward, like plumes of feathers, hung over the heads of the ladies seated all around in a ring, while others occupied the easy-chairs, which formed two straight lines symmetrically interrupted by the large velvet curtains of the windows and the lofty bays of the doors with their gilded lintels.

The crowd of men who remained standing on the floor with their hats in their hands seemed, at some distance, like one black mass, into which the ribbons in the button-holes introduced red points here and there, and rendered all the more dull the monotonous whiteness of their cravats. With the exception of the very young men with the down on their faces, all appeared to be bored. Some dandies, with an expression of sullenness on their countenances, were swinging on their heels. There were numbers of men with grey hair or wigs. Here and there glistened a bald pate; and the visages of many of these men, either purple or exceedingly pale, showed in their worn aspect the traces of immense fatigues: for they were persons who devoted themselves either to political or commercial pursuits. M. Dambreuse had also invited a number of scholars and magistrates, two or three celebrated doctors, and he deprecated with an air of humility the eulogies which they pronounced on his entertainment and the allusions to his wealth.

An immense number of men-servants, with fine gold-laced livery, kept moving about on every side. The large branched candlesticks, like bouquets of flame, threw a glow over the hangings. They were reflected in the mirrors; and at the bottom of the dining-room, which was adorned with a jessamine treillage, the side-board resembled the high altar of a cathedral or an exhibition of jewellery, there were so many dishes, bells, knives and forks, silver and silver-gilt spoons in the midst of crystal ware glittering with iridescence.

The three other reception-rooms overflowed with artistic objects — landscapes by great masters on the walls, ivory and porcelain at the sides of the tables, and Chinese ornaments on the brackets. Lacquered screens were displayed in front of the windows, clusters of camelias rose above the mantel-shelves, and a light music vibrated in the distance, like the humming of bees.

The quadrilles were not numerous, and the dancers, judged by the indifferent fashion in which they dragged their pumps after them, seemed to be going through the performance of a duty.

Frederick heard some phrases, such as the following:

"Were you at the last charity fête at the Hôtel Lambert, Mademoiselle?" "No, Monsieur." "It will soon be intolerably warm here." "Oh! yes, indeed; quite suffocating!" "Whose polka, pray, is this?" "Good heavens, Madame, I don't know!"

And, behind him, three greybeards, who had posted themselves in the recess of a window, were whispering some risqué remarks. A sportsman told a hunting story, while a Legitimist carried on an argument with an Orléanist. And, wandering about from one group to another, he reached the card-room, where, in the midst of grave-looking men gathered in a circle, he recognised Martinon, now attached to the Bar of the capital.

His big face, with its waxen complexion, filled up the space encircled by his collar-like beard, which was a marvel with its even surface of black hair; and, observing the golden mean between the elegance which his age might yearn for and the dignity which his profession exacted from him, he kept his thumbs stuck under his armpits, according to the custom of beaux, and then put his hands into his waistcoat pockets after the manner of learned personages. Though his boots were polished to excess, he kept his temples shaved in order to have the forehead of a thinker.

After he had addressed a few chilling words to Frederick, he turned once more towards those who were chatting around him. A land-owner was saying: "This is a class of men that dreams of upsetting society."

"They are calling for the organisation of labour," said another: "Can this be conceived?"

"What could you expect," said a third, "when we see M. de Genoude giving his assistance to the Siècle?"

"And even Conservatives style themselves Progressives. To lead us to what? To the Republic! as if such a thing were possible in France!"

Everyone declared that the Republic was impossible in France.

"No matter!" remarked one gentleman in a loud tone. "People take too much interest in the Revolution. A heap of histories, of different kinds of works, are published concerning it!"

"Without taking into account," said Martinon, "that there are probably subjects of far more importance which might be studied."

A gentleman occupying a ministerial office laid the blame on the scandals associated with the stage:

"Thus, for instance, this new drama of La Reine Margot really goes beyond the proper limits. What need was there for telling us about the Valois? All this exhibits loyalty in an unfavourable light. 'Tis just like your press! There is no use in talking, the September laws are altogether too mild. For my part, I would like to have court-martials, to gag the journalists! At the slightest display of insolence, drag them before a council of war, and then make an end of the business!"

"Oh, take care, Monsieur! take care!" said a professor. "Don't attack the precious boons we gained in 1830! Respect our liberties!" It would be better, he contended, to adopt a policy of decentralisation, and to distribute the surplus populations of the towns through the country districts.

"But they are gangrened!" exclaimed a Catholic. "Let religion be more firmly established!"

Martinon hastened to observe:

"As a matter of fact, it is a restraining force."

All the evil lay in this modern longing to rise above one's class and to possess luxuries.

"However," urged a manufacturer, "luxury aids commerce. Therefore, I approve of the Duc de Nemours' action in insisting on having short breeches at his evening parties."

"M. Thiers came to one of them in a pair of trousers. You know his joke on the subject?"

"Yes; charming! But he turned round to the demagogues, and his speech on the question of incompatibilities was not without its influence in bringing about the attempt of the twelfth of May."

"Oh, pooh!"

"Ay, ay!"

The circle had to make a little opening to give a passage to a man-servant carrying a tray, who was trying to make his way into the card-room.

Under the green shades of the wax-lights the tables were covered with two rows of cards and gold coins. Frederick stopped beside one corner of the table, lost the fifteen napoleons which he had in his pocket, whirled lightly about, and found himself on the threshold of the boudoir in which Madame Dambreuse happened to be at that moment.

It was filled with women sitting close to one another in little groups on seats without backs. Their long skirts, swelling round them, seemed like waves, from which their waists emerged; and their breasts were clearly outlined by the slope of their corsages. Nearly every one of them had a bouquet of violets in her hand. The dull shade of their gloves showed off the whiteness of their arms, which formed a contrast with its human flesh tints. Over the shoulders of some of them hung fringe or mourning-weeds, and, every now and then, as they quivered with emotion, it seemed as if their bodices were about to fall down.

But the decorum of their countenances tempered the exciting effect of their costumes. Several of them had a placidity almost like that of animals; and this resemblance to the brute creation on the part of half-nude women made him think of the interior of a harem — indeed, a grosser comparison suggested itself to the young man's mind.

Every variety of beauty was to be found there — some English ladies, with the profile familiar in "keepsakes"; an Italian, whose black eyes shot forth lava-like flashes, like a Vesuvius; three sisters, dressed in blue; three Normans, fresh as April apples; a tall red-haired girl, with a set of amethysts. And the bright scintillation of diamonds, which trembled in aigrettes worn over their hair, the luminous spots of precious stones laid over their breasts, and the delightful radiance of pearls which adorned their foreheads mingled with the glitter of gold rings, as well as with the lace, powder, the feathers, the vermillion of dainty mouths, and the mother-of-pearl hue of teeth. The ceiling, rounded like a cupola, gave to the boudoir the form of a flower-basket, and a current of perfumed air circulated under the flapping of their fans.

Frederick, planting himself behind them, put up his eyeglass and scanned their shoulders, not all of which did he consider irreproachable. He thought about the Maréchale, and this dispelled the temptations that beset him or consoled him for not yielding to them.

He gazed, however, at Madame Dambreuse, and he considered her charming, in spite of her mouth being rather large and her nostrils too dilated. But she was remarkably graceful in appearance. There was, as it were, an expression of passionate languor in the ringlets of her hair, and her forehead, which was like agate, seemed to cover a great deal, and indicated a masterful intelligence.

She had placed beside her her husband's niece, a rather plain-looking young person. From time to time she left her seat to receive those who had just come in; and the murmur of feminine voices, made, as it were, a cackling like that of birds.

They were talking about the Tunisian ambassadors and their costumes. One lady had been present at the last reception of the Academy. Another referred to the Don Juan of Molière, which had recently been performed at the Théâtre Français.

But with a significant glance towards her niece, Madame Dambreuse laid a finger on her lips, while the smile which escaped from her contradicted this display of austerity.

Suddenly, Martinon appeared at the door directly in front of her. She arose at once. He offered her his arm. Frederick, in order to watch the progress of these gallantries on Martinon's part, walked past the card-table, and came up with them in the large drawing-room.

Madame Dambreuse very soon quitted her cavalier, and began chatting with Frederick himself in a very familiar tone.

She understood that he did not play cards, and did not dance.

"Young people have a tendency to be melancholy!" Then, with a single comprehensive glance around:

"Besides, this sort of thing is not amusing — at least for certain natures!"

And she drew up in front of the row of armchairs, uttering a few polite remarks here and there, while some old men with double eyeglasses came to pay court to her. She introduced Frederick to some of them. M. Dambreuse touched him lightly on the elbow, and led him out on the terrace.

He had seen the Minister. The thing was not easy to manage. Before he could be qualified for the post of auditor to the Council of State, he should pass an examination. Frederick, seized with an unaccountable self-confidence, replied that he had a knowledge of the subjects prescribed for it.

The financier was not surprised at this, after all the eulogies M. Roque had pronounced on his abilities.

At the mention of this name, a vision of little Louise, her house and her room, passed through his mind, and he remembered how he had on nights like this stood at her window listening to the wagoners driving past. This recollection of his griefs brought back the thought of Madame Arnoux, and he relapsed into silence as he continued to pace up and down the terrace. The windows shone amid the darkness like slabs of flame. The buzz of the ball gradually grew fainter; the carriages were beginning to leave.

"Why in the world," M. Dambreuse went on, "are you so anxious to be attached to the Council of State?"

And he declared, in the tone of a man of broad views, that the public functions led to nothing — he could speak with some authority on that point — business was much better.

Frederick urged as an objection the difficulty of grappling with all the details of business.

"Pooh! I could post you up well in them in a very short time."

Would he like to be a partner in any of his own undertakings?

The young man saw, as by a lightning-flash, an enormous fortune coming into his hands.

"Let us go in again," said the banker. "You are staying for supper with us, are you not?"

It was three o'clock. They left the terrace.

In the dining-room, a table at which supper was served up awaited the guests.

M. Dambreuse perceived Martinon, and, drawing near his wife, in a low tone:

"Is it you who invited him?"

She answered dryly:

"Yes, of course."

The niece was not present.

The guests drank a great deal of wine, and laughed very loudly; and risky jokes did not give any offence, all present experiencing that sense of relief which follows a somewhat prolonged period of constraint.

Martinon alone displayed anything like gravity. He refused to drink champagne, as he thought this good form, and, moreover, he assumed an air of tact and politeness, for when M. Dambreuse, who had a contracted chest, complained of an oppression, he made repeated enquiries about that gentleman's health, and then let his blue eyes wander in the direction of Madame Dambreuse.

She questioned Frederick in order to find out which of the young ladies he liked best. He had noticed none of them in particular, and besides, he preferred the women of thirty.

"There, perhaps, you show your sense," she returned.

Then, as they were putting on their pelisses and paletots, M. Dambreuse said to him:

"Come and see me one of these mornings and we'll have a chat."

Martinon, at the foot of the stairs, was lighting a cigar, and, as he puffed it, he presented such a heavy profile that his companion allowed this remark to escape from him:

"Upon my word, you have a fine head!"

"It has turned a few other heads," replied the young magistrate, with an air of mingled self-complacency and annoyance.

As soon as Frederick was in bed, he summed up the main features of the evening party. In the first place, his own toilet (he had looked at himself several times in the mirrors), from the cut of his coat to the knot of his pumps left nothing to find fault with. He had spoken to influential men, and seen wealthy ladies at close quarters. M. Dambreuse had shown himself to be an admirable type of man, and Madame Dambreuse an almost bewitching type of woman. He weighed one by one her slightest words, her looks, a thousand things incapable of being analysed. It would be a right good thing to have such a mistress. And, after all, why should he not? He would have as good a chance with her as any other man. Perhaps she was not so hard to win? Then Martinon came back to his recollection; and, as he fell asleep, he smiled with pity for this worthy fellow.

He woke up with the thought of the Maréchale in his mind. Those words of her note, "After to-morrow evening," were in fact an appointment for the very same day.

He waited until nine o'clock, and then hurried to her house.

Some one who had been going up the stairs before him shut the door. He rang the bell; Delphine came out and told him that "Madame" was not there.

Frederick persisted, begging of her to admit him. He had something of a very serious nature to communicate to her; only a word would suffice. At length, the hundred-sous-piece argument proved successful, and the maid let him into the anteroom.

Rosanette appeared. She was in a negligée, with her hair loose, and, shaking her head, she waved her arms when she was some paces away from him to indicate that she could not receive him now.

Frederick descended the stairs slowly. This caprice was worse than any of the others she had indulged in. He could not understand it at all.

In front of the porter's lodge Mademoiselle Vatnaz stopped him.

"Has she received you?"

"No."

"You've been put out?"

"How do you know that?"

"'Tis quite plain. But come on; let us go away. I am suffocating!"

She made him accompany her along the street; she panted for breath; he could feel her thin arm trembling on his own. Suddenly, she broke out:

"Ah! the wretch!"

"Who, pray?"

"Why, he — he — Delmar!"

This revelation humiliated Frederick. He next asked:

"Are you quite sure of it?"

"Why, when I tell you I followed him!" exclaimed the Vatnaz. "I saw him going in! Now do you understand? I ought to have expected it for that matter — 'twas I, in my stupidity, that introduced him to her. And if you only knew all; my God! Why, I picked him up, supported him, clothed him! And then all the paragraphs I got into the newspapers about him! I loved him like a mother!"

Then, with a sneer:

"Ha! Monsieur wants velvet robes! You may be sure 'tis a speculation on his part. And as for her! — to think that I knew her to earn her living as a seamstress! If it were not for me, she would have fallen into the mire twenty times over! But I will plunge her into it yet! I'll see her dying in a hospital — and everything about her will be known!"

And, like a torrent of dirty water from a vessel full of refuse, her rage poured out in a tumultuous fashion into Frederick's ear the recital of her rival's disgraceful acts.

"She lived with Jumillac, with Flacourt, with little Allard, with Bertinaux, with Saint-Valéry, the pock-marked fellow! No, 'twas the other! They are two brothers — it makes no difference. And when she was in difficulties, I settled everything. She is so avaricious! And then, you will agree with me, 'twas nice and kind of me to go to see her, for we are not persons of the same grade! Am I a fast woman — I? Do I sell myself? Without taking into account that she is as stupid as a head of cabbage. She writes 'category' with a 'th.' After all, they are well met. They make a precious couple, though he styles himself an artist and thinks himself a man of genius. But, my God! if he had only intelligence, he would not have done such an infamous thing! Men don't, as a rule, leave a superior woman for a hussy! What do I care about him after all? He is becoming ugly. I hate him! If I met him, mind you, I'd spit in his face." She spat out as she uttered the words.

"Yes, this is what I think about him now. And Arnoux, eh? Isn't it abominable? He has forgiven her so often! You can't conceive the sacrifices he has made for her. She ought to kiss his feet! He is so generous, so good!"

Frederick was delighted at hearing Delmar disparaged. He had taken sides with Arnoux. This perfidy on Rosanette's part seemed to him an abnormal and inexcusable thing; and, infected with this elderly spinster's emotion, he felt a sort of tenderness towards her. Suddenly he found himself in front of Arnoux's door. Mademoiselle Vatnaz, without his attention having been drawn to it, had led him down towards the Rue Poissonnière.

"Here we are!" said she. "As for me, I can't go up; but you, surely there is nothing to prevent you?"

"From doing what?"

"From telling him everything, faith!"

Frederick, as if waking up with a start, saw the baseness towards which she was urging him.

"Well?" she said after a pause.

He raised his eyes towards the second floor. Madame Arnoux's lamp was burning. In fact there was nothing to prevent him from going up.

"I am going to wait for you here. Go on, then!"

This direction had the effect of chilling him, and he said:

"I shall be a long time up there; you would do better to return home. I will call on you to-morrow."

"No, no!" replied the Vatnaz, stamping with her foot. "Take him with you! Bring him there! Let him catch them together!"

"But Delmar will no longer be there."

She hung down her head.

"Yes; that's true, perhaps."

And she remained without speaking in the middle of the street, with vehicles all around her; then, fixing on him her wild-cat's eyes:

"I may rely on you, may I not? There is now a sacred bond between us. Do what you say, then; we'll talk about it to-morrow."

Frederick, in passing through the lobby, heard two voices responding to one another.

Madame Arnoux's voice was saying:

"Don't lie! don't lie, pray!"

He went in. The voices suddenly ceased.

Arnoux was walking from one end of the apartment to the other, and Madame was seated on the little chair near the fire, extremely pale and staring straight before her. Frederick stepped back, and was about to retire, when Arnoux grasped his hand, glad that some one had come to his rescue.

"But I am afraid — — " said Frederick.

"Stay here, I beg of you!" he whispered in his ear.

Madame remarked:

"You must make some allowance for this scene, Monsieur Moreau. Such things sometimes unfortunately occur in households."

"They do when we introduce them there ourselves," said Arnoux in a jolly tone. "Women have crotchets, I assure you. This, for instance, is not a bad one — see! No; quite the contrary. Well, she has been amusing herself for the last hour by teasing me with a heap of idle stories."

"They are true," retorted Madame Arnoux, losing patience; "for, in fact, you bought it yourself."

"I?"

"Yes, you yourself, at the Persian House."

"The cashmere," thought Frederick.

He was filled with a consciousness of guilt, and got quite alarmed.

She quickly added:

"It was on Saturday, the fourteenth."

"The fourteenth," said Arnoux, looking up, as if he were searching in his mind for a date.

"And, furthermore, the clerk who sold it to you was a fair-haired young man."

"How could I remember what sort of man the clerk was?"

"And yet it was at your dictation he wrote the address, 18 Rue de Laval."

"How do you know?" said Arnoux in amazement.

She shrugged her shoulders.

"Oh! 'tis very simple: I went to get my cashmere altered, and the superintendent of the millinery department told me that they had just sent another of the same sort to Madame Arnoux."

"Is it my fault if there is a Madame Arnoux in the same street?"

"Yes; but not Jacques Arnoux," she returned.

Thereupon, he began to talk in an incoherent fashion, protesting that he was innocent. It was some misapprehension, some accident, one of those things that happen in some way that is utterly unaccountable. Men should not be condemned on mere suspicion, vague probabilities; and he referred to the case of the unfortunate Lesurques.

"In short, I say you are mistaken. Do you want me to take my oath on it?"

"'Tis not worth while."

"Why?"

She looked him straight in the face without saying a word, then stretched out her hand, took down the little silver chest from the mantelpiece, and handed him a bill which was spread open.

Arnoux coloured up to his ears, and his swollen and distorted features betrayed his confusion.

"But," he said in faltering tones, "what does this prove?"

"Ah!" she said, with a peculiar ring in her voice, in which sorrow and irony were blended. "Ah!"

Arnoux held the bill in his hands, and turned it round without removing his eyes from it, as if he were going to find in it the solution of a great problem.

"Ah! yes, yes; I remember," said he at length. "'Twas a commission. You ought to know about that matter, Frederick." Frederick remained silent. "A commission that Père Oudry entrusted to me."

"And for whom?"

"For his mistress."

"For your own!" exclaimed Madame Arnoux, springing to her feet and standing erect before him.

"I swear to you!"

"Don't begin over again. I know everything."

"Ha! quite right. So you're spying on me!"

She returned coldly:

"Perhaps that wounds your delicacy?"

"Since you are in a passion," said Arnoux, looking for his hat, "and can't be reasoned with — —"

Then, with a big sigh:

"Don't marry, my poor friend, don't, if you take my advice!"

And he took himself off, finding it absolutely necessary to get into the open air.

Then there was a deep silence, and it seemed as if everything in the room had become more motionless than before. A luminous circle above the lamp whitened the ceiling, while at the corners stretched out bits of shade resembling pieces of black gauze placed on top of one another. The ticking of the clock and the crackling of the fire were the only sounds that disturbed the stillness.

Madame Arnoux had just seated herself in the armchair at the opposite side of the chimney-piece. She bit her lip and shivered. She drew her hands up to her face; a sob broke from her, and she began to weep.

He sat down on the little couch, and in the soothing tone in which one addresses a sick person:

"You don't suspect me of having anything to do with — — ?"

She made no reply. But, continuing presently to give utterance to her own thoughts:

"I leave him perfectly free! There was no necessity for lying on his part!"

"That is quite true," said Frederick. "No doubt," he added, "it was the result of Arnoux's habits; he had acted thoughtlessly, but perhaps in matters of a graver character — —"

"What do you see, then, that can be graver?"

"Oh, nothing!"

Frederick bent his head with a smile of acquiescence. Nevertheless, he urged, Arnoux possessed certain good qualities; he was fond of his children.

"Ay, and he does all he can to ruin them!"

Frederick urged that this was due to an excessively easy-going disposition, for indeed he was a good fellow.

She exclaimed:

"But what is the meaning of that — a good fellow?"

And he proceeded to defend Arnoux in the vaguest kind of language he could think of, and, while expressing his sympathy with her, he rejoiced, he was delighted, at the bottom of his heart. Through retaliation or need of affection she would fly to him for refuge. His love was intensified by the hope which had now grown immeasurably stronger in his breast.

Never had she appeared to him so captivating, so perfectly beautiful. From time to time a deep breath made her bosom swell. Her two eyes, gazing fixedly into space, seemed dilated by a vision in the depths of her consciousness, and her lips were slightly parted, as if to let her soul escape through them. Sometimes she pressed her handkerchief over them tightly. He would have liked to be this dainty little piece of cambric moistened with her tears. In spite of himself, he cast a look at the bed at the end of the alcove, picturing to himself her head lying on the pillow, and so vividly did this present itself to his imagination that he had to restrain himself to keep from clasping her in his arms. She closed her eyelids, and now she appeared quiescent and languid. Then he drew closer to her, and, bending over her, he eagerly scanned her face. At that moment, he heard the noise of boots in the lobby outside — it was the other. They heard him shutting the door of his own room. Frederick made a sign to Madame Arnoux to ascertain from her whether he ought to go there.

She replied "Yes," in the same voiceless fashion; and this mute exchange of thoughts between them was, as it were, an assent — the preliminary step in adultery.

Arnoux was just taking off his coat to go to bed.

"Well, how is she going on?"

"Oh! better," said Frederick; "this will pass off."

But Arnoux was in an anxious state of mind.

"You don't know her; she has got hysterical now! Idiot of a clerk! This is what comes of being too good. If I had not given that cursed shawl to Rosanette!"

"Don't regret having done so a bit. Nobody could be more grateful to you than she is."

"Do you really think so?"

Frederick had not a doubt of it. The best proof of it was her dismissal of Père Oudry.

"Ah! poor little thing!"

And in the excess of his emotion, Arnoux wanted to rush off to her forthwith.

"'Tisn't worth while. I am calling to see her. She is unwell."

"All the more reason for my going."

He quickly put on his coat again, and took up his candlestick. Frederick cursed his own stupidity, and pointed out to him that for decency's sake he ought to remain this night with his wife. He could not leave her; it would be very nasty.

"I tell you candidly you would be doing wrong. There is no hurry over there. You will go to-morrow. Come; do this for my sake."

Arnoux put down his candlestick, and, embracing him, said:

"You are a right good fellow!"

CHAPTER IX.

The Friend of the Family.

Then began for Frederick an existence of misery. He became the parasite of the house.

If anyone were indisposed, he called three times a day to know how the patient was, went to the piano-tuner's, contrived to do a thousand acts of kindness; and he endured with an air of contentment Mademoiselle Marthe's poutings and the caresses of little Eugène, who was always drawing his dirty hands over the young man's face. He was present at dinners at which Monsieur and Madame, facing each other, did not exchange a word, unless it happened that Arnoux provoked his wife with the absurd remarks he made. When the meal was over, he would play about the room with his son, conceal himself behind the furniture, or carry the little boy on his back, walking about on all fours, like the Bearnais. At last, he would go out, and she would at once plunge into the eternal subject of complaint — Arnoux.

It was not his misconduct that excited her indignation, but her pride appeared to be wounded, and she did not hide her repugnance towards this man, who showed an absence of delicacy, dignity, and honour.

"Or rather, he is mad!" she said.

Frederick artfully appealed to her to confide in him. Ere long he knew all the details of her life. Her parents were people in a humble rank in life at Chartres. One day, Arnoux, while sketching on the bank of the river (at this period he believed himself to be a painter), saw her leaving the church, and made her an offer of marriage. On account of his wealth, he was unhesitatingly accepted. Besides, he was desperately in love with her. She added:

"Good heavens! he loves me still, after his fashion!"

They spent the few months immediately after their marriage in travelling through Italy.

Arnoux, in spite of his enthusiasm at the sight of the scenery and the masterpieces, did nothing but groan over the wine, and, to find some kind of amusement, organised picnics along with some English people. The profit which he had made by reselling some pictures tempted him to take up the fine arts as a commercial speculation. Then, he became infatuated about pottery. Just now other branches of commerce attracted him; and, as he had become more and more vulgarised, he contracted coarse and extravagant habits. It was not so much for his vices she had to reproach him as for his entire conduct. No change could be expected in him, and her unhappiness was irreparable.

Frederick declared that his own life in the same way was a failure.

He was still a young man, however. Why should he despair? And she gave him good advice: "Work! and marry!" He answered her with bitter smiles; for in place of giving utterance to the real cause of his grief, he pretended that it was of a different character, a sublime feeling, and he assumed the part of an Antony to some extent, the man accursed by fate — language which did not, however, change very materially the complexion of his thoughts.

For certain men action becomes more difficult as desire becomes stronger. They are embarrassed by self-distrust, and terrified by the fear of making themselves disliked. Besides, deep attachments resemble virtuous women: they are afraid of being discovered, and pass through life with downcast eyes.

Though he was now better acquainted with Madame Arnoux (for that very reason perhaps), he was still more faint-hearted than before. Each morning he swore in his own mind that he would take a bold course. He was prevented from doing so by an unconquerable feeling of bashfulness; and he had no example to guide him, inasmuch as she was different from other women. From the force of his dreams, he had placed her outside the ordinary pale of humanity. At her side he felt himself of less importance in the world than the sprigs of silk that escaped from her scissors.

Then he thought of some monstrous and absurd devices, such as surprises at night, with narcotics and false keys — anything appearing easier to him than to face her disdain.

Besides, the children, the two servant-maids, and the relative position of the rooms caused insurmountable obstacles. So then he made up his mind to possess her himself alone, and to bring her to live with him far away in the depths of some solitude. He even asked himself what lake would be blue enough, what seashore would be delightful enough for her, whether it would be in Spain, Switzerland, or the East; and expressly fixing on days when she seemed more irritated than usual, he told her that it would be necessary for her to leave the house, to find out some ground to justify such a step, and that he saw no way out of it but a separation. However, for the sake of the children whom she loved, she would never resort to such an extreme course. So much virtue served to increase his respect for her.

He spent each afternoon in recalling the visit he had paid the night before, and in longing for the evening to come in order that he might call again. When he did not dine with them, he posted himself about nine o'clock at the corner of the street, and, as soon as Arnoux had slammed the hall-door behind him, Frederick quickly ascended the two flights of stairs, and asked the servant-girl in an ingenuous fashion:

"Is Monsieur in?"

Then he would exhibit surprise at finding that Arnoux was gone out.

The latter frequently came back unexpectedly. Then Frederick had to accompany him to the little café in the Rue Sainte-Anne, which Regimbart now frequented.

The Citizen began by giving vent to some fresh grievance which he had against the Crown. Then they would chat, pouring out friendly abuse on one another, for the earthenware manufacturer took Regimbart for a thinker of a high order, and, vexed at seeing him neglecting so many chances of winning distinction, teased the Citizen about his laziness. It seemed to Regimbart that Arnoux was a man full of heart and imagination, but decidedly of lax morals, and therefore he was quite unceremonious towards a personage he respected so little, refusing even to dine at his house on the ground that "such formality was a bore."

Sometimes, at the moment of parting, Arnoux would be seized with hunger. He found it necessary to order an omelet or some roasted apples; and, as there was never anything to eat in the establishment, he sent out for something. They waited. Regimbart did not leave, and ended by consenting in a grumbling fashion to have something himself. He was nevertheless gloomy, for he remained for hours seated before a half-filled glass. As Providence did not regulate things in harmony with his ideas, he was becoming a hypochondriac, no longer cared even to read the newspapers, and at the mere mention of England's name began to bellow with rage. On one occasion, referring to a waiter who attended on him carelessly, he exclaimed:

"Have we not enough of insults from the foreigner?"

Except at these critical periods he remained taciturn, contemplating "an infallible stroke of business that would burst up the whole shop."

Whilst he was lost in these reflections, Arnoux in a monotonous voice and with a slight look of intoxication, related incredible anecdotes in which he always shone himself, owing to his assurance; and Frederick (this was, no doubt, due to some deep-rooted resemblances) felt more or less attracted towards him. He reproached himself for this weakness, believing that on the contrary he ought to hate this man.

Arnoux, in Frederick's presence, complained of his wife's ill-temper, her obstinacy, her unjust accusations. She had not been like this in former days.

"If I were you," said Frederick, "I would make her an allowance and live alone."

Arnoux made no reply; and the next moment he began to sound her praises. She was good, devoted, intelligent, and virtuous; and, passing to her personal beauty, he made some revelations on the subject with the thoughtlessness of people who display their treasures at taverns.

His equilibrium was disturbed by a catastrophe.

He had been appointed one of the Board of Superintendence in a kaolin company. But placing reliance on everything that he was told, he had signed inaccurate reports and approved, without verification, of the annual inventories fraudulently prepared by the manager. The company had now failed, and Arnoux, being legally responsible, was, along with the others who were liable under the guaranty, condemned to pay damages, which meant a loss to him of thirty thousand francs, not to speak of the costs of the judgment.

Frederick read the report of the case in a newspaper, and at once hurried off to the Rue de Paradis.

He was ushered into Madame's apartment. It was breakfast-time. A round table close to the fire was covered with bowls of café au lait. Slippers trailed over the carpet, and clothes over the armchairs. Arnoux was attired in trousers and a knitted vest, with his eyes bloodshot and his hair in disorder. Little Eugène was crying at the pain caused by an attack of mumps, while nibbling at a slice of bread and butter. His sister was eating quietly. Madame Arnoux, a little paler than usual, was attending on all three of them.

"Well," said Arnoux, heaving a deep sigh, "you know all about it?"

And, as Frederick gave him a pitying look: "There, you see, I have been the victim of my own trustfulness!"

Then he relapsed into silence, and so great was his prostration, that he pushed his breakfast away from him. Madame Arnoux raised her eyes with a shrug of the shoulders. He passed his hand across his forehead.

"After all, I am not guilty. I have nothing to reproach myself with. 'Tis a misfortune. It will be got over — ay, and so much the worse, faith!"

He took a bite of a cake, however, in obedience to his wife's entreaties.

That evening, he wished that she should go and dine with him alone in a private room at the Maison d'Or. Madame Arnoux did not at all understand this emotional impulse, taking offence, in fact, at being treated as if she were a light woman. Arnoux, on the contrary, meant it as a proof of affection. Then, as he was beginning to feel dull, he went to pay the Maréchale a visit in order to amuse himself.

Up to the present, he had been pardoned for many things owing to his reputation for good-fellowship. His lawsuit placed him amongst men of bad character. No one visited his house.

Frederick, however, considered that he was bound in honour to go there more frequently than ever. He hired a box at the Italian opera, and brought them there with him every week. Meanwhile, the pair had reached that period in unsuitable unions when an invincible lassitude springs from concessions which people get into the habit of making, and which render existence intolerable. Madame Arnoux restrained her pent-up feelings from breaking out; Arnoux became gloomy; and Frederick grew sad at witnessing the unhappiness of these two ill-fated beings.

She had imposed on him the obligation, since she had given him her confidence, of making enquiries as to the state of her husband's affairs. But shame prevented him from doing so. It was painful to him to reflect that he coveted the wife of this man, at whose dinner-table he constantly sat. Nevertheless, he continued his visits, excusing himself on the ground that he was bound to protect her, and that an occasion might present itself for being of service to her.

Eight days after the ball, he had paid a visit to M. Dambreuse. The financier had offered him twenty shares in a coal-mining speculation; Frederick did not go back there again. Deslauriers had written letters to him, which he left unanswered. Pellerin had invited him to go and see the portrait; he always put it off. He gave way, however, to Cisy's persistent appeals to be introduced to Rosanette.

She received him very nicely, but without springing on his neck as she used to do formerly. His comrade was delighted at being received by a woman of easy virtue, and above all at having a chat with an actor. Delmar was there when he called. A drama in which he appeared as a peasant lecturing Louis XIV. and prophesying the events of '89 had made him so conspicuous, that the same part was continually assigned to him; and now his function consisted of attacks on the monarchs of all nations. As an English brewer, he inveighed against Charles I.; as a student at Salamanca, he cursed Philip II.; or, as a sensitive father, he expressed indignation against the Pompadour — this was the most beautiful bit of acting! The brats of the street used to wait at the door leading to the side-scenes in order to see him; and his biography, sold between the acts, described him as taking care of his aged mother, reading the Bible, assisting the poor, in fact, under the aspect of a Saint Vincent de Paul together with a dash of Brutus and Mirabeau. People spoke of him as "Our Delmar." He had a mission; he became another Christ.

All this had fascinated Rosanette; and she had got rid of Père Oudry, without caring one jot about consequences, as she was not of a covetous disposition.

Arnoux, who knew her, had taken advantage of the state of affairs for some time past to spend very little money on her. M. Roque had appeared on the scene, and all three of them carefully avoided anything like a candid explanation. Then, fancying that she had got rid of the other solely on his account, Arnoux increased her allowance, for she was living at a very expensive rate. She had even sold her cashmere in her anxiety to pay off her old debts, as she said; and he was continually giving her money, while she bewitched him and imposed upon him pitilessly. Therefore, bills and stamped paper rained all over the house. Frederick felt that a crisis was approaching.

One day he called to see Madame Arnoux. She had gone out. Monsieur was at work below stairs in the shop. In fact, Arnoux, in the midst of his Japanese vases, was trying to take in a newly-married pair who happened to be well-to-do people from the provinces. He talked about wheel-moulding and fine-moulding, about spotted porcelain and glazed porcelain; the others, not wishing to appear utterly ignorant of the subject, listened with nods of approbation, and made purchases.

When the customers had gone out, he told Frederick that he had that very morning been engaged in a little altercation with his wife. In order to obviate any remarks about expense, he had declared that the Maréchale was no longer his mistress. "I even told her that she was yours."

Frederick was annoyed at this; but to utter reproaches might only betray him. He faltered: "Ah! you were in the wrong — greatly in the wrong!"

"What does that signify?" said Arnoux. "Where is the disgrace of passing for her lover? I am really so myself. Would you not be flattered at being in that position?"

Had she spoken? Was this a hint? Frederick hastened to reply:

"No! not at all! on the contrary!"

"Well, what then?"

"Yes, 'tis true; it makes no difference so far as that's concerned."

Arnoux next asked: "And why don't you call there oftener?"

Frederick promised that he would make it his business to go there again.

"Ah! I forgot! you ought, when talking about Rosanette, to let out in some way to my wife that you are her lover. I can't suggest how you can best do it, but you'll find out that. I ask this of you as a special favour — eh?"

The young man's only answer was an equivocal grimace. This calumny had undone him. He even called on her that evening, and swore that Arnoux's accusation was false.

"Is that really so?"

He appeared to be speaking sincerely, and, when she had taken a long breath of relief, she said to him:

"I believe you," with a beautiful smile. Then she hung down her head, and, without looking at him:

"Besides, nobody has any claim on you!"

So then she had divined nothing; and she despised him, seeing that she did not think he could love her well enough to remain faithful to her! Frederick, forgetting his overtures while with the other, looked on the permission accorded to him as an insult to himself.

After this she suggested that he ought now and then to pay Rosanette a visit, to get a little glimpse of what she was like.

Arnoux presently made his appearance, and, five minutes later, wished to carry him off to Rosanette's abode.

The situation was becoming intolerable.

His attention was diverted by a letter from a notary, who was going to send him fifteen thousand francs the following day; and, in order to make up for his neglect of Deslauriers, he went forthwith to tell him this good news.

The advocate was lodging in the Rue des Trois-Maries, on the fifth floor, over a courtyard. His study, a little tiled apartment, chilly, and with a grey paper on the walls, had as its principal decoration a gold medal, the prize awarded him on the occasion of taking out his degree as a Doctor of Laws, which was fixed in an ebony frame near the mirror. A mahogany bookcase enclosed under its glass front a hundred volumes, more or less. The writing-desk, covered with sheep-leather, occupied the centre of the apartment. Four old armchairs upholstered in green velvet were placed in the corners; and a heap of shavings made a blaze in the fireplace, where there was always a bundle of sticks ready to be lighted as soon as he rang the bell. It was his consultation-hour, and the advocate had on a white cravat.

The announcement as to the fifteen thousand francs (he had, no doubt, given up all hope of getting the amount) made him chuckle with delight.

"That's right, old fellow, that's right — that's quite right!"

He threw some wood into the fire, sat down again, and immediately began talking about the journal. The first thing to do was to get rid of Hussonnet.

"I'm quite tired of that idiot! As for officially professing opinions, my own notion is that the most equitable and forcible position is to have no opinions at all."

Frederick appeared astonished.

"Why, the thing is perfectly plain. It is time that politics should be dealt with scientifically. The old men of the eighteenth century began it when Rousseau and the men of letters introduced into the political sphere philanthropy, poetry, and other fudge, to the great delight of the Catholics — a natural alliance, however, since the modern reformers (I can prove it) all believe in Revelation. But, if you sing high masses for Poland, if, in place of the God of the Dominicans, who was an executioner, you take the God of the Romanticists, who is an upholsterer, if, in fact, you have not a wider conception of the Absolute than your ancestors, Monarchy will penetrate underneath your Republican forms, and your red cap will never be more than the headpiece of a priest. The only difference will be that the cell system will take the place of torture, the outrageous treatment of Religion that of sacrilege, and the European Concert that of the Holy Alliance; and in this beautiful order which we admire, composed of the wreckage of the followers of Louis XIV., the last remains of the Voltaireans, with some Imperial white-wash on top, and some fragments of the British Constitution, you will see the municipal councils trying to give annoyance to the Mayor, the general councils to their Prefect, the Chambers to the King, the Press to Power, and the Administration to everybody. But simple-minded people get enraptured about the Civil Code, a work fabricated — let them say what they like — in a mean and tyrannical spirit, for the legislator, in place of doing his duty to the State, which simply means to observe customs in a regular fashion, claims to model society like another Lycurgus. Why does the law impede fathers of families with regard to the making of wills? Why does it place shackles on the compulsory sale of real estate? Why does it punish as a misdemeanour vagrancy, which ought not even to be regarded as a technical contravention of the Code. And there are other things! I know all about them! and so I am going to write a little novel, entitled 'The History of the Idea of Justice,' which will be amusing. But I am infernally thirsty! And you?"

He leaned out through the window, and called to the porter to go and fetch them two glasses of grog from the public-house over the way.

"To sum up, I see three parties — no! three groups — in none of which do I take the slightest interest: those who have, those who have nothing, and those who are trying to have. But all agree in their idiotic worship of Authority! For example, Mably recommends that the philosophers should be prevented from publishing their doctrines; M. Wronsky, the geometrician, describes the censorship as the 'critical expression of speculative spontaneity'; Père Enfantin gives his blessing to the Hapsburgs for having passed a hand across the Alps in order to keep Italy down; Pierre Leroux wishes people to be compelled to listen to an orator; and Louis Blanc inclines towards a State religion — so much rage for government have these vassals whom we call the people! Nevertheless, there is not a single legitimate government, in spite of their sempiternal principles. But 'principle' signifies 'origin.' It is always necessary to go back to a revolution, to an act of violence, to a transitory fact. Thus, our principle is the national sovereignty embodied in the Parliamentary form, though the Parliament does not assent to this! But in what way could the sovereignty of the people be more sacred than the Divine Right? They are both fictions. Enough of metaphysics; no more phantoms! There is no need of dogmas in order to get the streets swept! It will be said that I am turning society upside down. Well, after all, where would be the harm of that? It is, indeed, a nice thing — this society of yours."

Frederick could have given many answers. But, seeing that his theories were far less advanced than those of Sénécal, he was full of indulgence towards Deslauriers. He contented himself with arguing that such a system would make them generally hated.

"On the contrary, as we should have given to each party a pledge of hatred against his neighbour, all will reckon on us. You are about to enter into it yourself, and to furnish us with some transcendent criticism!"

It was necessary to attack accepted ideas — the Academy, the Normal School, the Conservatoire, the Comédie Française, everything that resembled an institution. It was in that way that they would give uniformity to the doctrines taught in their review. Then, as soon as it had been thoroughly well-established, the journal would suddenly be converted into a daily publication. Thereupon they could find fault with individuals.

"And they will respect us, you may be sure!"

Deslauriers touched upon that old dream of his — the position of editor-in-chief, so that he might have the unutterable happiness of directing others, of entirely cutting down their articles, of ordering them to be written or declining them. His eyes twinkled under his goggles; he got into a state of excitement, and drank a few glasses of brandy, one after the other, in an automatic fashion.

"You'll have to stand me a dinner once a week. That's indispensable, even though you should have to squander half your income on it. People would feel pleasure in going to it; it would be a centre for the others, a lever for yourself; and by manipulating public opinion at its two ends — literature and politics — you will see how, before six months have passed, we shall occupy the first rank in Paris."

Frederick, as he listened to Deslauriers, experienced a sensation of rejuvenescence, like a man who, after having been confined in a room for a long time, is suddenly transported into the open air. The enthusiasm of his friend had a contagious effect upon him.

"Yes, I have been an idler, an imbecile — you are right!"

"All in good time," said Deslauriers. "I have found my Frederick again!"

And, holding up his jaw with closed fingers:

"Ah! you have made me suffer! Never mind, I am fond of you all the same."

They stood there gazing into each other's faces, both deeply affected, and were on the point of embracing each other.

A woman's cap appeared on the threshold of the anteroom.

"What brings you here?" said Deslauriers.

It was Mademoiselle Clémence, his mistress.

She replied that, as she happened to be passing, she could not resist the desire to go in to see him, and in order that they might have a little repast together, she had brought some cakes, which she laid on the table.

"Take care of my papers!" said the advocate, sharply. "Besides, this is the third time that I have forbidden you to come at my consultation-hours."

She wished to embrace him.

"All right! Go away! Cut your stick!"

He repelled her; she heaved a great sigh.

"Ah! you are plaguing me again!"

"'Tis because I love you!"

"I don't ask you to love me, but to oblige me!"

This harsh remark stopped Clémence's tears. She took up her station before the window, and remained there motionless, with her forehead against the pane.

Her attitude and her silence had an irritating effect on Deslauriers.

"When you have finished, you will order your carriage, will you not?"

She turned round with a start.

"You are sending me away?"

"Exactly."

She fixed on him her large blue eyes, no doubt as a last appeal, then drew the two ends of her tartan across each other, lingered for a minute or two, and went away.

"You ought to call her back," said Frederick.

"Come, now!"

And, as he wished to go out, Deslauriers went into the kitchen, which also served as his dressing-room. On the stone floor, beside a pair of boots, were to be seen the remains of a meagre breakfast, and a mattress with a coverlid was rolled up on the floor in a corner.

"This will show you," said he, "that I receive few marchionesses. 'Tis easy to get enough of them, ay, faith! and some others, too! Those who cost nothing take up your time — 'tis money under another form. Now, I'm not rich! And then they are all so silly, so silly! Can you chat with a woman yourself?"

As they parted, at the corner of the Pont Neuf, Deslauriers said: "It's agreed, then; you'll bring the thing to me to-morrow as soon as you have it!"

"Agreed!" said Frederick.

When he awoke next morning, he received through the post a cheque on the bank for fifteen thousand francs.

This scrap of paper represented to him fifteen big bags of money; and he said to himself that, with such a sum he could, first of all, keep his carriage for three years instead of selling it, as he would soon be forced to do, or buy for himself two beautiful damaskeened pieces of armour, which he had seen on the Quai Voltaire, then a quantity of other things, pictures, books and what a quantity of bouquets of flowers, presents for Madame Arnoux! anything, in short, would have been preferable to risking losing everything in that journal! Deslauriers seemed to him presumptuous, his insensibility on the night before having chilled Frederick's affection for him; and the young man was indulging in these feelings of regret, when he was quite surprised by the sudden appearance of Arnoux, who sat down heavily on the side of the bed, like a man overwhelmed with trouble.

"What is the matter now?"

"I am ruined!"

He had to deposit that very day at the office of Maître Beaumont, notary, in the Rue Saint-Anne, eighteen thousand francs lent him by one Vanneroy.

"Tis an unaccountable disaster. I have, however, given him a mortgage, which ought to keep him quiet. But he threatens me with a writ if it is not paid this afternoon promptly."

"And what next?"

"Oh! the next step is simple enough; he will take possession of my real estate. Once the thing is publicly announced, it means ruin to me — that's all! Ah! if I could find anyone to advance me this cursed sum, he might take Vanneroy's place, and I should be saved! You don't chance to have it yourself?"

The cheque had remained on the night-table near a book. Frederick took up a volume, and placed it on the cheque, while he replied:

"Good heavens, my dear friend, no!"

But it was painful to him to say "no" to Arnoux.

"What, don't you know anyone who would — — ?"

"Nobody! and to think that in eight days I should be getting in money! There is owing to me probably fifty thousand francs at the end of the month!"

"Couldn't you ask some of the persons that owe you money to make you an advance?"

"Ah! well, so I did!"

"But have you any bills or promissory notes?"

"Not one!"

"What is to be done?" said Frederick.

"That's what I'm asking myself," said Arnoux. "'Tisn't for myself, my God! but for my children and my poor wife!"

Then, letting each phrase fall from his lips in a broken fashion:

"In fact — I could rough it — I could pack off all I have — and go and seek my fortune — I don't know where!"

"Impossible!" exclaimed Frederick.

Arnoux replied with an air of calmness:

"How do you think I could live in Paris now?"

There was a long silence. Frederick broke it by saying:

"When could you pay back this money?"

Not that he had it; quite the contrary! But there was nothing to prevent him from seeing some friends, and making an application to them.

And he rang for his servant to get himself dressed.

Arnoux thanked him.

"The amount you want is eighteen thousand francs — isn't it?"

"Oh! I could manage easily with sixteen thousand! For I could make two thousand five hundred out of it, or get three thousand on my silver plate, if Vanneroy meanwhile would give me till to-morrow; and, I repeat to you, you may inform the lender, give him a solemn undertaking, that in eight days, perhaps even in five or six, the money will be reimbursed. Besides, the mortgage will be security for it. So there is no risk, you understand?"

Frederick assured him that he thoroughly understood the state of affairs, and added that he was going out immediately.

He would be sure on his return to bestow hearty maledictions on Deslauriers, for he wished to keep his word, and in the meantime, to oblige Arnoux.

"Suppose I applied to M. Dambreuse? But on what pretext could I ask for money? 'Tis I, on the contrary, that should give him some for the shares I took in his coal-mining company. Ah! let him go hang himself — his shares! I am really not liable for them!"

And Frederick applauded himself for his own independence, as if he had refused to do some service for M. Dambreuse.

"Ah, well," said he to himself afterwards, "since I'm going to meet with a loss in this way — for with fifteen thousand francs I might gain a hundred thousand! such things sometimes happen on the Bourse — well, then, since I am breaking my promise to one of them, am I not free? Besides, when Deslauriers might wait? No, no; that's wrong; let us go there."

He looked at his watch.

"Ah! there's no hurry. The bank does not close till five o'clock."

And, at half-past four, when he had cashed the cheque:

"'Tis useless now; I should not find him in. I'll go this evening."

Thus giving himself the opportunity of changing his mind, for there always remain in the conscience some of those sophistries which we pour into it ourselves. It preserves the after-taste of them, like some unwholesome liquor.

He walked along the boulevards, and dined alone at the restaurant. Then he listened to one act of a play at the Vaudeville, in order to divert his thoughts. But his bank-notes caused him as much embarrassment as if he had stolen them. He would not have been very sorry if he had lost them.

When he reached home again he found a letter containing these words:

"What news? My wife joins me, dear friend, in the hope, etc. — Yours."

And then there was a flourish after his signature.

"His wife! She appeals to me!"

At the same moment Arnoux appeared, to have an answer as to whether he had been able to obtain the sum so sorely needed.

"Wait a moment; here it is," said Frederick.

And, twenty-four hours later, he gave this reply to Deslauriers:

"I have no money."

The advocate came back three days, one after the other, and urged Frederick to write to the notary. He even offered to take a trip to Havre in connection with the matter.

At the end of the week, Frederick timidly asked the worthy Arnoux for his fifteen thousand francs. Arnoux put it off till the following day, and then till the day after. Frederick ventured out late at night, fearing lest Deslauriers might come on him by surprise.

One evening, somebody knocked against him at the corner of the Madeleine. It was he.

And Deslauriers accompanied Frederick as far as the door of a house in the Faubourg Poissonnière.

"Wait for me!"

He waited. At last, after three quarters of an hour, Frederick came out, accompanied by Arnoux, and made signs to him to have patience a little longer. The earthenware merchant and his companion went up the Rue de Hauteville arm-in-arm, and then turned down the Rue de Chabrol.

The night was dark, with gusts of tepid wind. Arnoux walked on slowly, talking about the Galleries of Commerce — a succession of covered passages which would have led from the Boulevard Saint-Denis to the Châtelet, a marvellous speculation, into which he was very anxious to enter; and he stopped from time to time in order to have a look at the grisettes' faces in front of the shop-windows, and then, raising his head again, resumed the thread of his discourse.

Frederick heard Deslauriers' steps behind him like reproaches, like blows falling on his conscience. But he did not venture to claim his money, through a feeling of bashfulness, and also through a fear that it would be fruitless. The other was drawing nearer. He made up his mind to ask.

Arnoux, in a very flippant tone, said that, as he had not got in his outstanding debts, he was really unable to pay back the fifteen thousand francs.

"You have no need of money, I fancy?"

At that moment Deslauriers came up to Frederick, and, taking him aside:

"Be honest. Have you got the amount? Yes or no?"

"Well, then, no," said Frederick; "I've lost it."

"Ah! and in what way?"

"At play."

Deslauriers, without saying a single word in reply, made a very low bow, and went away. Arnoux had taken advantage of the opportunity to light a cigar in a tobacconist's shop. When he came back, he wanted to know from Frederick "who was that young man?"

"Oh! nobody — a friend."

Then, three minutes later, in front of Rosanette's door:

"Come on up," said Arnoux; "she'll be glad to see you. What a savage you are just now!"

A gas-lamp, which was directly opposite, threw its light on him; and, with his cigar between his white teeth and his air of contentment, there was something intolerable about him.

"Ha! now that I think of it, my notary has been at your place this morning about that mortgage-registry business. 'Tis my wife reminded me about it."

"A wife with brains!" returned Frederick automatically.

"I believe you."

And once more Arnoux began to sing his wife's praises. There was no one like her for spirit, tenderness, and thrift; he added in a low tone, rolling his eyes about: "And a woman with so many charms, too!"

"Good-bye!" said Frederick.

Arnoux made a step closer to him.

"Hold on! Why are you going?" And, with his hand half-stretched out towards Frederick, he stared at the young man, quite abashed by the look of anger in his face.

Frederick repeated in a dry tone, "Good-bye!"

He hurried down the Rue de Bréda like a stone rolling headlong, raging against Arnoux, swearing in his own mind that he would never see the man again, nor her either, so broken-hearted and desolate did he feel. In place of the rupture which he had anticipated, here was the other, on the contrary, exhibiting towards her a most perfect attachment from the ends of her hair to the inmost depths of her soul. Frederick was exasperated by the vulgarity of this man. Everything, then, belonged to him! He would meet Arnoux again at his mistress's door; and the mortification of a rupture would be added to rage at his own powerlessness. Besides, he felt humiliated by the other's display of integrity in offering him guaranties for his money. He would have liked to strangle him, and over the pangs of disappointment floated in his conscience, like a fog, the sense of his baseness towards his friend. Rising tears nearly suffocated him.

Deslauriers descended the Rue des Martyrs, swearing aloud with indignation; for his project, like an obelisk that has fallen, now assumed extraordinary proportions. He considered himself robbed, as if he had suffered a great loss. His friendship for Frederick was dead, and he experienced a feeling of joy at it — it was a sort of compensation to him! A hatred of all rich people took possession of him. He leaned towards S  n  cal's opinions, and resolved to make every effort to propagate them.

All this time, Arnoux was comfortably seated in an easy-chair near the fire, sipping his cup of tea, with the Mar  chale on his knees.

Frederick did not go back there; and, in order to distract his attention from his disastrous passion, he determined to write a "History of the Renaissance." He piled up confusedly on his table the humanists, the philosophers, and the poets, and he went to inspect some engravings of Mark Antony, and tried to understand Machiavelli. Gradually, the serenity of intellectual work had a soothing effect upon him. While his mind was steeped in the personality of others, he lost sight of his own — which is the only way, perhaps, of getting rid of suffering.

One day, while he was quietly taking notes, the door opened, and the man-servant announced Madame Arnoux.

It was she, indeed! and alone? Why, no! for she was holding little Eug  ne by the hand, followed by a nurse in a white apron. She sat down, and after a preliminary cough:

"It is a long time since you came to see us."

As Frederick could think of no excuse at the moment, she added:

"It was delicacy on your part!"

He asked in return:

"Delicacy about what?"

"About what you have done for Arnoux!" said she.

Frederick made a significant gesture. "What do I care about him, indeed? It was for your sake I did it!"

She sent off the child to play with his nurse in the drawing-room. Two or three words passed between them as to their state of health; then the conversation hung fire.

She wore a brown silk gown, which had the colour of Spanish wine, with a paletot of black velvet bordered with sable. This fur made him yearn to pass his hand over it; and her head-bands, so long and so exquisitely smooth, seemed to draw his lips towards them. But he was agitated by emotion, and, turning his eyes towards the door:

"'Tis rather warm here!"

Frederick understood what her discreet glance meant.

"Ah! excuse me! the two leaves of the door are merely drawn together."

"Yes, that's true!"

And she smiled, as much as to say:

"I'm not a bit afraid!"

He asked her presently what was the object of her visit.

"My husband," she replied with an effort, "has urged me to call on you, not venturing to take this step himself!"

"And why?"

"You know M. Dambreuse, don't you?"

"Yes, slightly."

"Ah! slightly."

She relapsed into silence.

"No matter! finish what you were going to say."

Thereupon she told him that, two days before, Arnoux had found himself unable to meet four bills of a thousand francs, made payable at the banker's order and with his signature attached to them. She felt sorry for having compromised her children's fortune. But anything was preferable to dishonour; and, if M. Dambreuse stopped the proceedings, they would certainly pay him soon, for she was going to sell a little house which she had at Chartres.

"Poor woman!" murmured Frederick. "I will go. Rely on me!"

"Thanks!"

And she arose to go.

"Oh! there is nothing to hurry you yet."

She remained standing, examining the trophy of Mongolian arrows suspended from the ceiling, the bookcase, the bindings, all the utensils for writing. She lifted up the bronze bowl which held his pens. Her feet rested on different portions of the carpet. She had visited Frederick several times before, but always accompanied by Arnoux. They were now alone together — alone in his own house. It was an extraordinary event — almost a successful issue of his love.

She wished to see his little garden. He offered her his arm to show her his property — thirty feet of ground enclosed by some houses, adorned with shrubs at the corners and flower-borders in the middle. The early days of April had arrived. The leaves of the lilacs were already showing their borders of green. A breath of pure air was diffused around, and the little birds chirped, their song alternating with the distant sound that came from a coachmaker's forge.

Frederick went to look for a fire-shovel; and, while they walked on side by side, the child kept making sand-pies in the walk.

Madame Arnoux did not believe that, as he grew older, he would have a great imagination; but he had a winning disposition. His sister, on the other hand, possessed a caustic humour that sometimes wounded her.

"That will change," said Frederick. "We must never despair."

She returned:

"We must never despair!"

This automatic repetition of the phrase he had used appeared to him a sort of encouragement; he plucked a rose, the only one in the garden.

"Do you remember a certain bouquet of roses one evening, in a carriage?"

She coloured a little; and, with an air of bantering pity:

"Ah, I was very young then!"

"And this one," went on Frederick, in a low tone, "will it be the same way with it?"

She replied, while turning about the stem between her fingers, like the thread of a spindle:

"No, I will preserve it."

She called over the nurse, who took the child in her arms; then, on the threshold of the door in the street, Madame Arnoux inhaled the odour of the flower, leaning her head on her shoulder with a look as sweet as a kiss.

When he had gone up to his study, he gazed at the armchair in which she had sat, and every object which she had touched. Some portion of her was diffused around him. The caress of her presence lingered there still.

"So, then, she came here," said he to himself.

And his soul was bathed in the waves of infinite tenderness.

Next morning, at eleven o'clock, he presented himself at M. Dambreuse's house. He was received in the dining-room. The banker was seated opposite his wife at breakfast. Beside her sat his niece, and at the other side of the table appeared the governess, an English woman, strongly pitted with small-pox.

M. Dambreuse invited his young friend to take his place among them, and when he declined:

"What can I do for you? I am listening to whatever you have to say to me."

Frederick confessed, while affecting indifference, that he had come to make a request in behalf of one Arnoux.

"Ha! ha! the ex-picture-dealer," said the banker, with a noiseless laugh which exposed his gums. "Oudry formerly gave security for him; he has given a lot of trouble."

And he proceeded to read the letters and newspapers which lay close beside him on the table.

Two servants attended without making the least noise on the floor; and the loftiness of the apartment, which had three portières of richest tapestry, and two white marble fountains, the polish of the chafing-dish, the arrangement of the side-dishes, and even the rigid folds of the napkins, all this sumptuous comfort impressed Frederick's mind with the contrast between it and another breakfast at the Arnoux's house. He did not take the liberty of interrupting M. Dambreuse.

Madame noticed his embarrassment.

"Do you occasionally see our friend Martinon?"

"He will be here this evening," said the young girl in a lively tone.

"Ha! so you know him?" said her aunt, fixing on her a freezing look.

At that moment one of the men-servants, bending forward, whispered in her ear.

"Your dressmaker, Mademoiselle — Miss John!"

And the governess, in obedience to this summons, left the room along with her pupil.

M. Dambreuse, annoyed at the disarrangement of the chairs by this movement, asked what was the matter.

"'Tis Madame Regimbart."

"Wait a moment! Regimbart! I know that name. I have come across his signature."

Frederick at length broached the question. Arnoux deserved some consideration; he was even going, for the sole purpose of fulfilling his engagements, to sell a house belonging to his wife.

"She is considered very pretty," said Madame Dambreuse.

The banker added, with a display of good-nature:

"Are you on friendly terms with them — on intimate terms?"

Frederick, without giving an explicit reply, said that he would be very much obliged to him if he considered the matter.

"Well, since it pleases you, be it so; we will wait. I have some time to spare yet; suppose we go down to my office. Would you mind?"

They had finished breakfast. Madame Dambreuse bowed slightly towards Frederick, smiling in a singular fashion, with a mixture of politeness and irony. Frederick had no time to reflect about it, for M. Dambreuse, as soon as they were alone:

"You did not come to get your shares?"

And, without permitting him to make any excuses:

"Well! well! 'tis right that you should know a little more about the business."

He offered Frederick a cigarette, and began his statement.

The General Union of French Coal Mines had been constituted. All that they were waiting for was the order for its incorporation. The mere fact of the amalgamation had diminished the cost of superintendence, and of manual labour, and increased the profits. Besides, the company had conceived a new idea, which was to interest the workmen in its undertaking. It would erect houses for them, healthful dwellings; finally, it would constitute itself the purveyor of its employés, and would have everything supplied to them at net prices.

"And they will be the gainers by it, Monsieur: there's true progress! that's the way to reply effectively to certain Republican brawlings. We have on our Board" — he showed the prospectus — "a peer of France, a scholar who is a member of the Institute, a retired field-officer of genius. Such elements reassure the timid capitalists, and appeal to intelligent capitalists!"

The company would have in its favour the sanction of the State, then the railways, the steam service, the metallurgical establishments, the gas companies, and ordinary households.

"Thus we heat, we light, we penetrate to the very hearth of the humblest home. But how, you will say to me, can we be sure of selling? By the aid of protective laws, dear Monsieur, and we shall get them! — that is a matter that concerns us! For my part, however, I am a downright prohibitionist! The country before anything!"

He had been appointed a director; but he had no time to occupy himself with certain details, amongst other things with the editing of their publications.

"I find myself rather muddled with my authors. I have forgotten my Greek. I should want some one who could put my ideas into shape."

And suddenly: "Will you be the man to perform those duties, with the title of general secretary?"

Frederick did not know what reply to make.

"Well, what is there to prevent you?"

His functions would be confined to writing a report every year for the shareholders. He would find himself day after day in communication with the most notable men in Paris. Representing the company with the workmen, he would ere long be worshipped by them as a natural consequence, and by this means he would be able, later, to push him into the General Council, and into the position of a deputy.

Frederick's ears tingled. Whence came this goodwill? He got confused in returning thanks. But it was not necessary, the banker said, that he should be dependent on anyone. The best course was to take some shares, "a splendid investment besides, for your capital guarantees your position, as your position does your capital."

"About how much should it amount to?" said Frederick.

"Oh, well! whatever you please — from forty to sixty thousand francs, I suppose."

This sum was so trifling in M. Dambreuse's eyes, and his authority was so great, that the young man resolved immediately to sell a farm.

He accepted the offer. M. Dambreuse was to select one of his disengaged days for an appointment in order to finish their arrangements.

"So I can say to Jacques Arnoux — — ?"

"Anything you like — the poor chap — anything you like!"

Frederick wrote to the Arnoux's to make their minds easy, and he despatched the letter by a man-servant, who brought back the letter: "All right!" His action in the matter deserved better recognition. He expected a visit, or, at least, a letter. He did not receive a visit, and no letter arrived.

Was it forgetfulness on their part, or was it intentional? Since

Madame Arnoux had come once, what was to prevent her from coming again? The species of confidence, of avowal, of which she had made him the recipient on the occasion, was nothing better, then, than a manœuvre which she had executed through interested motives.

"Are they playing on me? and is she an accomplice of her husband?" A sort of shame, in spite of his desire, prevented him from returning to their house.

One morning (three weeks after their interview), M. Dambreuse wrote to him, saying that he expected him the same day in an hour's time.

On the way, the thought of Arnoux oppressed him once more, and, not having been able to discover any reason for his conduct, he was seized with a feeling of wretchedness, a melancholy presentiment. In order to shake it off, he hailed a cab, and drove to the Rue de Paradis.

Arnoux was away travelling.

"And Madame?"

"In the country, at the works."

"When is Monsieur coming back?"

"To-morrow, without fail."

He would find her alone; this was the opportune moment. Something imperious seemed to cry out in the depths of his consciousness: "Go, then, and meet her!"

But M. Dambreuse? "Ah! well, so much the worse. I'll say that I was ill."

He rushed to the railway-station, and, as soon as he was in the carriage:

"Perhaps I have done wrong. Pshaw! what does it matter?"

Green plains stretched out to the right and to the left. The train rolled on. The little station-houses glistened like stage-scenery, and the smoke of the locomotive kept constantly sending forth on the same side its big fleecy masses, which danced for a little while on the grass, and were then dispersed.

Frederick, who sat alone in his compartment, gazed at these objects through sheer weariness, lost in that languor which is produced by the very excess of impatience. But cranes and warehouses presently appeared. They had reached Creil.

The town, built on the slopes of two low-lying hills (the first of which was bare, and the second crowned by a wood), with its church-tower, its houses of unequal size, and its stone bridge, seemed to him to present an aspect of mingled gaiety, reserve, and propriety. A long flat barge descended to the edge of the water, which leaped up under the lash of the wind.

Fowl perched on the straw at the foot of the crucifix erected on the spot; a woman passed with some wet linen on her head.

After crossing the bridge, he found himself in an isle, where he beheld on his right the ruins of an abbey. A mill with its wheels revolving barred up the entire width of the second arm of the Oise, over which the manufactory projected. Frederick was greatly surprised by the imposing character of this structure. He felt more respect for Arnoux on account of it. Three paces further on, he turned up an alley, which had a grating at its lower end.

He went in. The door-keeper called him back, exclaiming:

"Have you a permit?"

"For what purpose?"

"For the purpose of visiting the establishment."

Frederick said in a rather curt tone that he had come to see M. Arnoux.

"Who is M. Arnoux?"

"Why, the chief, the master, the proprietor, in fact!"

"No, monsieur! These are MM. Lebœuf and Milliet's works!"

The good woman was surely joking! Some workmen arrived; he came up and spoke to two or three of them. They gave the same response.

Frederick left the premises, staggering like a drunken man; and he had such a look of perplexity, that on the Pont de la Boucherie an inhabitant of the town, who was smoking his pipe, asked whether he wanted to find out anything. This man knew where Arnoux's manufactory was. It was situated at Montataire.

Frederick asked whether a vehicle was to be got. He was told that the only place where he could find one was at the station. He went back there. A shaky-looking calash, to which was yoked an old horse, with torn harness hanging over the shafts, stood all alone in front of the luggage office. An urchin who was looking on offered to go and find Père Pilon. In ten minutes' time he came back, and announced that Père Pilon was at his breakfast. Frederick, unable to stand this any longer, walked away. But the gates of the thoroughfare across the line were closed. He would have to wait till two trains had passed. At last, he made a dash into the open country.

The monotonous greenery made it look like the cover of an immense billiard-table. The scoriæ of iron were ranged on both sides of the track, like heaps of stones. A little further on, some factory chimneys were smoking close beside each other. In front of him, on a round hillock, stood a little turreted château, with the quadrangular belfry of a church. At a lower level, long walls formed irregular lines past the trees; and, further down again, the houses of the village spread out.

They had only a single story, with staircases consisting of three steps made of uncemented blocks. Every now and then the bell in front of a grocery-shop could be heard tinkling. Heavy steps sank into the black mire, and a light shower was falling, which cut the pale sky with a thousand hatchings.

Frederick pursued his way along the middle of the street. Then, he saw on his left, at the opening of a pathway, a large wooden arch, whereon was traced, in letters of gold, the word "Faïences."

It was not without an object that Jacques Arnoux had selected the vicinity of Creil. By placing his works as close as possible to the other works (which had long enjoyed a high reputation), he had created a certain confusion in the public mind, with a favourable result so far as his own interests were concerned.

The main body of the building rested on the same bank of a river which flows through the meadowlands. The master's house, surrounded by a garden, could be distinguished by the steps in front of it, adorned with four vases, in which cactuses were bristling.

Heaps of white clay were drying under sheds. There were others in the open air; and in the midst of the yard stood Sénécal with his everlasting blue paletot lined with red.

The ex-tutor extended towards Frederick his cold hand.

"You've come to see the master? He's not there."

Frederick, nonplussed, replied in a stupefied fashion:

"I knew it." But the next moment, correcting himself:

"'Tis about a matter that concerns Madame Arnoux. Can she receive me?"

"Ha! I have not seen her for the last three days," said Sénécal.

And he broke into a long string of complaints. When he accepted the post of manager, he understood that he would have been allowed to reside in Paris, and not be forced to bury himself in this country district, far from his friends, deprived of newspapers. No matter! he had overlooked all that. But Arnoux appeared to pay no heed to his merits. He was, moreover, shallow and retrograde — no one could be more ignorant. In place of seeking for artistic improvements, it would have been better to introduce firewood instead of coal and gas. The shop-keeping spirit thrust itself in — Sénécal laid stress on the last words. In short, he disliked his present occupation, and he all but appealed to Frederick to say a word in his behalf in order that he might get an increase of salary.

"Make your mind easy," said the other.

He met nobody on the staircase. On the first floor, he pushed his way head-foremost into an empty room. It was the drawing-room. He called out at the top of his voice. There was no reply. No doubt, the cook had gone out, and so had the housemaid. At length, having reached the second floor, he pushed a door open. Madame Arnoux was alone in this room, in front of a press with a mirror attached. The belt of her dressing-gown hung down her hips; one entire half of her hair fell in a dark wave over her right shoulder; and she had raised both arms in order to hold up her chignon with one hand and to put a pin through it with the other. She broke into an exclamation and disappeared.

Then, she came back again properly dressed. Her waist, her eyes, the rustle of her dress, her entire appearance, charmed him. Frederick felt it hard to keep from covering her with kisses.

"I beg your pardon," said she, "but I could not — —"

He had the boldness to interrupt her with these words:

"Nevertheless — you looked very nice — just now."

She probably thought this compliment a little coarse, for her cheeks reddened. He was afraid that he might have offended her. She went on:

"What lucky chance has brought you here?"

He did not know what reply to make; and, after a slight chuckle, which gave him time for reflection:

"If I told you, would you believe me?"

"Why not?"

Frederick informed her that he had had a frightful dream a few nights before.

"I dreamt that you were seriously ill — near dying."

"Oh! my husband and I are never ill."

"I have dreamt only of you," said he.

She gazed at him calmly: "Dreams are not always realised."

Frederick stammered, sought to find appropriate words to express himself in, and then plunged into a flowing period about the affinity of souls. There existed a force which could, through the intervening bounds of space, bring two persons into communication with each other, make known to each the other's feelings, and enable them to reunite.

She listened to him with downcast face, while she smiled with that beautiful smile of hers. He watched her out of the corner of his eye with delight, and poured out his love all the more freely through the easy channel of a commonplace remark.

She offered to show him the works; and, as she persisted, he made no objection.

In order to divert his attention with something of an amusing nature, she showed him the species of museum that decorated the staircase. The specimens, hung up against the wall or laid on shelves, bore witness to the efforts and the successive fads of Arnoux. After seeking vainly for the red of Chinese copper, he had wished to manufacture majolicas, faiënce, Etruscan and Oriental ware, and had, in fact, attempted all the improvements which were realised at a later period.

So it was that one could observe in the series big vases covered with figures of mandarins, porringers of shot reddish-brown, pots adorned with Arabian inscriptions, drinking-vessels in the style of the Renaissance, and large plates on which two personages were outlined as it were on bloodstone, in a delicate, aërial fashion. He now made letters for signboards and wine-labels; but his intelligence was not high enough to attain to art, nor commonplace enough to look merely to profit, so that, without satisfying anyone, he had ruined himself.

They were both taking a view of these things when Mademoiselle

Marthe passed.

"So, then, you did not recognise him?" said her mother to her.

"Yes, indeed," she replied, bowing to him, while her clear and sceptical glance — the glance of a virgin — seemed to say in a whisper: "What are you coming here for?" and she rushed up the steps with her head slightly bent over her shoulder.

Madame Arnoux led Frederick into the yard attached to the works, and then explained to him in a grave tone how different clays were ground, cleaned, and sifted.

"The most important thing is the preparation of pastes."

And she introduced him into a hall filled with vats, in which a vertical axis with horizontal arms kept turning. Frederick felt some regret that he had not flatly declined her offer a little while before.

"These things are merely the slobberings," said she.

He thought the word grotesque, and, in a measure, unbecoming on her lips.

Wide straps ran from one end of the ceiling to the other, so as to roll themselves round the drums, and everything kept moving continuously with a provoking mathematical regularity.

They left the spot, and passed close to a ruined hut, which had formerly been used as a repository for gardening implements.

"It is no longer of any use," said Madame Arnoux.

He replied in a tremulous voice:

"Happiness may have been associated with it!"

The clacking of the fire-pump drowned his words, and they entered the workshop where rough drafts were made.

Some men, seated at a narrow table, placed each in front of himself on a revolving disc a piece of paste. Then each man with his left hand scooped out the insides of his own piece while smoothing its surface with the right; and vases could be seen bursting into shape like blossoming flowers.

Madame Arnoux had the moulds for more difficult works shown to him.

In another portion of the building, the threads, the necks, and the projecting lines were being formed. On the floor above, they removed the seams, and stopped up with plaster the little holes that had been left by the preceding operations.

At every opening in the walls, in corners, in the middle of the corridor, everywhere, earthenware vessels had been placed side by side.

Frederick began to feel bored.

"Perhaps these things are tiresome to you?" said she.

Fearing lest it might be necessary to terminate his visit there and then, he affected, on the contrary, a tone of great enthusiasm. He even expressed regret at not having devoted himself to this branch of industry.

She appeared surprised.

"Certainly! I would have been able to live near you."

And as he tried to catch her eye, Madame Arnoux, in order to avoid him, took off a bracket little balls of paste, which had come from abortive readjustments, flattened them out into a thin cake, and pressed her hand over them.

"Might I carry these away with me?" said Frederick.

"Good heavens! are you so childish?"

He was about to reply when in came Sénécal.

The sub-manager, on the threshold, had noticed a breach of the rules. The workshops should be swept every week. This was Saturday, and, as the workmen had not done what was required, Sénécal announced that they would have to remain an hour longer.

"So much the worse for you!"

They stooped over the work assigned to them unmurmuringly, but their rage could be divined by the hoarse sounds which came from their chests. They were, moreover, very easy to manage, having all been dismissed from the big manufactory. The Republican had shown himself a hard taskmaster to them. A mere theorist, he regarded the people only in the mass, and exhibited an utter absence of pity for individuals.

Frederick, annoyed by his presence, asked Madame Arnoux in a low tone whether they could have an opportunity of seeing the kilns. They descended to the ground-floor; and she was just explaining the use of caskets, when Sénécal, who had followed close behind, placed himself between them.

He continued the explanation of his own motion, expatiated on the various kinds of combustibles, the process of placing in the kiln, the pyrosopes, the cylindrical furnaces; the instruments for rounding, the lustres, and the metals, making a prodigious display of chemical terms, such as "chloride," "sulphuret," "borax," and "carbonate." Frederick did not understand a single one of them, and kept turning round every minute towards Madame Arnoux.

"You are not listening," said she. "M. Sénécals, however, is very clear. He knows all these things much better than I."

The mathematician, flattered by this eulogy, proposed to show the way in which colours were laid on. Frederick gave Madame Arnoux an anxious, questioning look. She remained impassive, not caring to be alone with him, very probably, and yet unwilling to leave him.

He offered her his arm.

"No — many thanks! the staircase is too narrow!"

And, when they had reached the top, Sénécals opened the door of an apartment filled with women.

They were handling brushes, phials, shells, and plates of glass. Along the cornice, close to the wall, extended boards with figures engraved on them; scraps of thin paper floated about, and a melting-stove sent forth fumes that made the temperature oppressive, while there mingled with it the odour of turpentine.

The workwomen had nearly all sordid costumes. It was noticeable, however, that one of them wore a Madras handkerchief, and long earrings. Of slight frame, and, at the same time, plump, she had large black eyes and the fleshy lips of a negress. Her ample bosom projected from under her chemise, which was fastened round her waist by the string of her petticoat; and, with one elbow on the board of the work-table and the other arm hanging down, she gazed vaguely at the open country, a long distance away. Beside her were a bottle of wine and some pork chops.

The regulations prohibited eating in the workshops, a rule intended to secure cleanliness at work and to keep the hands in a healthy condition.

Sénécals, through a sense of duty or a longing to exercise despotic authority, shouted out to her ere he had come near her, while pointing towards a framed placard:

"I say, you girl from Bordeaux over there! read out for me Article 9!"

"Well, what then?"

"What then, mademoiselle? You'll have to pay a fine of three francs."

She looked him straight in the face in an impudent fashion.

"What does that signify to me? The master will take off your fine when he comes back! I laugh at you, my good man!"

Sénécal, who was walking with his hands behind his back, like an usher in the study-room, contented himself with smiling.

"Article 13, insubordination, ten francs!"

The girl from Bordeaux resumed her work. Madame Arnoux, through a sense of propriety, said nothing; but her brows contracted. Frederick murmured:

"Ha! you are very severe for a democrat!"

The other replied in a magisterial tone:

"Democracy is not the unbounded license of individualism. It is the equality of all belonging to the same community before the law, the distribution of work, order."

"You are forgetting humanity!" said Frederick.

Madame Arnoux took his arm. Sénécal, perhaps, offended by this mark of silent approbation, went away.

Frederick experienced an immense relief. Since morning he had been looking out for the opportunity to declare itself; now it had arrived. Besides, Madame Arnoux's spontaneous movements seemed to him to contain promises; and he asked her, as if on the pretext of warming their feet, to come up to her room. But, when he was seated close beside her, he began once more to feel embarrassed. He was at a loss for a starting-point. Sénécal, luckily, suggested an idea to his mind.

"Nothing could be more stupid," said he, "than this punishment!"

Madame Arnoux replied: "There are certain severe measures which are indispensable!"

"What! you who are so good! Oh! I am mistaken, for you sometimes take pleasure in making other people suffer!"

"I don't understand riddles, my friend!"

And her austere look, still more than the words she used, checked him. Frederick was determined to go on. A volume of De Musset chanced to be on the chest of drawers; he turned over some pages, then began to talk about love, about his hopes and his transports.

All this, according to Madame Arnoux, was criminal or factitious. The young man felt wounded by this negative attitude with regard to his passion, and, in order to combat it, he cited, by way of proof, the suicides which they read about every day in the newspapers, extolled the great literary types, Phèdre, Dido, Romeo, Desgrieux. He talked as if he meant to do away with himself.

The fire was no longer burning on the hearth; the rain lashed against the window-panes. Madame Arnoux, without stirring, remained with her hands resting on the sides of her armchair. The flaps of her cap fell like the fillets of a sphinx. Her pure profile traced out its clear-cut outlines in the midst of the shadow.

He was anxious to cast himself at her feet. There was a creaking sound in the lobby, and he did not venture to carry out his intention.

He was, moreover, restrained by a kind of religious awe. That robe, mingling with the surrounding shadows, appeared to him boundless, infinite, incapable of being touched; and for this very reason his desire became intensified. But the fear of doing too much, and, again, of not doing enough, deprived him of all judgment.

"If she dislikes me," he thought, "let her drive me away; if she cares for me, let her encourage me."

He said, with a sigh:

"So, then, you don't admit that a man may love — a woman?"

Madame Arnoux replied:

"Assuming that she is at liberty to marry, he may marry her; when she belongs to another, he should keep away from her."

"So happiness is impossible?"

"No! But it is never to be found in falsehood, mental anxiety, and remorse."

"What does it matter, if one is compensated by the enjoyment of supreme bliss?"

"The experience is too costly."

Then he sought to assail her with irony.

"Would not virtue in that case be merely cowardice?"

"Say rather, clear-sightedness. Even for those women who might forget duty or religion, simple good sense is sufficient. A solid foundation for wisdom may be found in self-love."

"Ah, what shop-keeping maxims these are of yours!"

"But I don't boast of being a fine lady."

At that moment the little boy rushed in.

"Mamma, are you coming to dinner?"

"Yes, in a moment."

Frederick arose. At the same instant, Marthe made her appearance.

He could not make up his mind to go away, and, with a look of entreaty:

"These women you speak of are very unfeeling, then?"

"No, but deaf when it is necessary to be so."

And she remained standing on the threshold of her room with her two children beside her. He bowed without saying a word. She mutely returned his salutation.

What he first experienced was an unspeakable astonishment. He felt crushed by this mode of impressing on him the emptiness of his hopes. It seemed to him as if he were lost, like a man who has fallen to the bottom of an abyss and knows that no help will come to him, and that he must die. He walked on, however, but at random, without looking before him. He knocked against stones; he mistook his way. A clatter of wooden shoes sounded close to his ear; it was caused by some of the working-girls who were leaving the foundry. Then he realised where he was.

The railway lamps traced on the horizon a line of flames. He arrived just as the train was starting, let himself be pushed into a carriage, and fell asleep.

An hour later on the boulevards, the gaiety of Paris by night made his journey all at once recede into an already far-distant past. He resolved to be strong, and relieved his heart by vilifying Madame Arnoux with insulting epithets.

"She is an idiot, a goose, a mere brute; let us not bestow another thought on her!"

When he got home, he found in his study a letter of eight pages on blue glazed paper, with the initials "R. A."

It began with friendly reproaches.

"What has become of you, my dear? I am getting quite bored."

But the handwriting was so abominable, that Frederick was about to fling away the entire bundle of sheets, when he noticed in the postscript the following words:

"I count on you to come to-morrow and drive me to the races."

What was the meaning of this invitation? Was it another trick of the Maréchale? But a woman does not make a fool of the same man twice without some object; and, seized with curiosity, he read the letter over again attentively.

Frederick was able to distinguish "Misunderstanding — to have taken a wrong path — disillusion — poor children that we are! — like two rivers that join each other!" etc.

He kept the sheets for a long time between his fingers. They had the odour of orris; and there was in the form of the characters and the irregular spaces between the lines something suggestive, as it were, of a disorderly toilet, that fired his blood.

"Why should I not go?" said he to himself at length. "But if Madame Arnoux were to know about it? Ah! let her know! So much the better! and let her feel jealous over it! In that way I shall be avenged!"

CHAPTER X.

At the Races.

The Maréchale was prepared for his visit, and had been awaiting him.

"This is nice of you!" she said, fixing a glance of her fine eyes on his face, with an expression at the same time tender and mirthful.

When she had fastened her bonnet-strings, she sat down on the divan, and remained silent.

"Shall we go?" said Frederick. She looked at the clock on the mantelpiece.

"Oh, no! not before half-past one!" as if she had imposed this limit to her indecision.

At last, when the hour had struck:

"Ah! well, andiamo, caro mio!" And she gave a final touch to her head-bands, and left directions for Delphine.

"Is Madame coming home to dinner?"

"Why should we, indeed? We shall dine together somewhere — at the Café Anglais, wherever you wish."

"Be it so!"

Her little dogs began yelping around her.

"We can bring them with us, can't we?"

Frederick carried them himself to the vehicle. It was a hired berlin with two post-horses and a postilion. He had put his man-servant in the back seat. The Maréchale appeared satisfied with his attentions. Then, as soon as she had seated herself, she asked him whether he had been lately at the Arnouxs'.

"Not for the past month," said Frederick.

"As for me, I met him the day before yesterday. He would have even come to-day, but he has all sorts of troubles — another lawsuit — I don't know what. What a queer man!"

Frederick added with an air of indifference:

"Now that I think of it, do you still see — what's that his name is? — that ex-vocalist — Delmar?"

She replied dryly:

"No; that's all over."

So it was clear that there had been a rupture between them. Frederick derived some hope from this circumstance.

They descended the Quartier Bréda at an easy pace. As it happened to be Sunday, the streets were deserted, and some citizens' faces presented themselves at the windows. The carriage went on more rapidly. The noise of wheels made the passers-by turn round; the leather of the hood, which had slid down, was glittering. The man-servant doubled himself up, and the two Havanese, beside one another, seemed like two ermine muffs laid on the cushions. Frederick let himself jog up and down with the rocking of the carriage-straps. The Maréchale turned her head to the right and to the left with a smile on her face.

Her straw hat of mother-of-pearl colour was trimmed with black lace. The hood of her bournous floated in the wind, and she sheltered herself from the rays of the sun under a parasol of lilac satin pointed at the top like a pagoda.

"What loves of little fingers!" said Frederick, softly taking her other hand, her left being adorned with a gold bracelet in the form of a curb-chain.

"I say! that's pretty! Where did it come from?"

"Oh! I've had it a long time," said the Maréchale.

The young man did not challenge this hypocritical answer in any way. He preferred to profit by the circumstance. And, still keeping hold of the wrist, he pressed his lips on it between the glove and the cuff.

"Stop! People will see us!"

"Pooh! What does it signify?"

After passing by the Place de la Concorde, they drove along the Quai de la Conférence and the Quai de Billy, where might be noticed a cedar in a garden. Rosanette believed that Lebanon was situated in China; she laughed herself at her own ignorance, and asked Frederick to give her lessons in geography. Then, leaving the Trocadéro at the right, they crossed the Pont de Jéna, and drew up at length in the middle of the Champ de Mars, near some other vehicles already drawn up in the Hippodrome.

The grass hillocks were covered with common people. Some spectators might be seen on the balcony of the Military School; and the two pavilions outside the weighing-room, the two galleries contained within its enclosure, and a third in front of that of the king, were filled with a fashionably dressed crowd whose deportment showed their regard for this as yet novel form of amusement.

The public around the course, more select at this period, had a less vulgar aspect. It was the era of trouser-straps, velvet collars, and white gloves. The ladies, attired in showy colours, displayed gowns with long waists; and seated on the tiers of the stands, they formed, so to speak, immense groups of flowers, spotted here and there with black by the men's costumes. But every glance was directed towards the celebrated Algerian Bou-Maza, who sat, impassive, between two staff officers in one of the private galleries. That of the Jockey Club contained none but grave-looking gentlemen.

The more enthusiastic portion of the throng were seated underneath, close to the track, protected by two lines of sticks which supported ropes. In the immense oval described by this passage, cocoanut-sellers were shaking their rattles, others were selling programmes of the races, others were hawking cigars, with loud cries. On every side there was a great murmur. The municipal guards passed to and fro. A bell, hung from a post covered with figures, began ringing. Five horses appeared, and the spectators in the galleries resumed their seats.

Meanwhile, big clouds touched with their winding outlines the tops of the elms opposite. Rosanette was afraid that it was going to rain.

"I have umbrellas," said Frederick, "and everything that we need to afford ourselves diversion," he added, lifting up the chest, in which there was a stock of provisions in a basket.

"Bravo! we understand each other!"

"And we'll understand each other still better, shall we not?"

"That may be," she said, colouring.

The jockeys, in silk jackets, were trying to draw up their horses in order, and were holding them back with both hands. Somebody lowered a red flag. Then the entire five bent over the bristling manes, and off they started. At first they remained pressed close to each other in a single mass; this presently stretched out and became cut up. The jockey in the yellow jacket was near falling in the middle of the first round; for a long time it was uncertain whether Filly or Tibi should take the lead; then Tom Pouce appeared in front. But Clubstick, who had been in the rear since the start, came up with the others and outstripped them, so that he was the first to reach the winning-post, beating Sir Charles by two lengths. It was a surprise. There was a shout of applause; the planks shook with the stamping of feet.

"We are amusing ourselves," said the Maréchale. "I love you, darling!"

Frederick no longer doubted that his happiness was secure. Rosanette's last words were a confirmation of it.

A hundred paces away from him, in a four-wheeled cabriolet, a lady could be seen. She stretched her head out of the carriage-door, and then quickly drew it in again. This movement was repeated several times. Frederick could not distinguish her face. He had a strong suspicion, however, that it was Madame Arnoux. And yet this seemed impossible! Why should she have come there?

He stepped out of his own vehicle on the pretence of strolling into the weighing-room.

"You are not very gallant!" said Rosanette.

He paid no heed to her, and went on. The four-wheeled cabriolet, turning back, broke into a trot.

Frederick at the same moment, found himself button-holed by Cisy.

"Good-morrow, my dear boy! how are you going on? Hussonnet is over there! Are you listening to me?"

Frederick tried to shake him off in order to get up with the four-wheeled cabriolet. The Maréchale beckoned to him to come round to her. Cisy perceived her, and obstinately persisted in bidding her good-day.

Since the termination of the regular period of mourning for his grandmother, he had realised his ideal, and succeeded in "getting the proper stamp." A Scotch plaid waistcoat, a short coat, large bows over the pumps, and an entrance-card stuck in the ribbon of his hat; nothing, in fact, was wanting to produce what he described himself as his chic — a chic characterised by Anglomania and the swagger of the musketeer. He began by finding fault with the Champ de Mars, which he referred to as an "execrable turf," then spoke of the Chantilly races, and the droll things that had occurred there, swore that he could drink a dozen glasses of champagne while the clock was striking the midnight hour, offered to make a bet with the Maréchale, softly caressed her two lapdogs; and, leaning against the carriage-door on one elbow, he kept talking nonsense, with the handle of his walking-stick in his mouth, his legs wide apart, and his back stretched out. Frederick, standing beside him, was smoking, while endeavouring to make out what had become of the cabriolet.

The bell having rung, Cisy took himself off, to the great delight of Rosanette, who said he had been boring her to death.

The second race had nothing special about it; neither had the third, save that a man was thrown over the shaft of a cart while it was taking place. The fourth, in which eight horses contested the City Stakes, was more interesting.

The spectators in the gallery had clambered to the top of their seats. The others, standing up in the vehicles, followed with opera-glasses in their hands the movements of the jockeys. They could be seen starting out like red, yellow, white, or blue spots across the entire space occupied by the crowd that had gathered around the ring of the hippodrome. At a distance, their speed did not appear to be very great; at the opposite side of the Champ de Mars, they seemed even to be slackening their pace, and to be merely slipping along in such a way that the horses' bellies touched the ground without their outstretched legs bending at all. But, coming back at a more rapid stride, they looked bigger; they cut the air in their wild gallop. The sun's rays quivered; pebbles went flying about under their hoofs. The wind, blowing out the jockeys' jackets, made them flutter like veils. Each of them lashed the animal he rode with great blows of his whip in order to reach the winning-post — that was the goal they aimed at. One swept away the figures, another was hoisted off his saddle, and, in the midst of a burst of applause, the victorious horse dragged his feet to the weighing-room, all covered with sweat, his knees stiffened, his neck and shoulders bent down, while his rider, looking as if he were expiring in his saddle, clung to the animal's flanks.

The final start was retarded by a dispute which had arisen. The crowd, getting tired, began to scatter. Groups of men were chatting at the lower end of each gallery. The talk was of a free-and-easy description. Some fashionable ladies left, scandalised by seeing fast women in their immediate vicinity.

There were also some specimens of the ladies who appeared at public balls, some light-comedy actresses of the boulevards, and it was not the best-looking portion of them that got the most appreciation. The elderly Georgine Aubert, she whom a writer of vaudevilles called the Louis XI. of her profession, horribly painted, and giving vent every now and then to a laugh resembling a grunt, remained reclining at full length in her big calash, covered with a sable fur-tippet, as if it were midwinter. Madame de Remoussat, who had become fashionable by means of a notorious trial in which she figured, sat enthroned on the seat of a brake in company with some Americans; and Thérèse Bachelu, with her look of a Gothic virgin, filled with her dozen furbelows the interior of a trap which had, in place of an apron, a flower-stand filled with roses. The Maréchale was jealous of these magnificent displays. In order to attract attention, she began to make vehement gestures and to speak in a very loud voice.

Gentlemen recognised her, and bowed to her. She returned their salutations while telling Frederick their names. They were all counts, viscounts, dukes, and marquises, and carried a high head, for in all eyes he could read a certain respect for his good fortune.

Cisy had a no less happy air in the midst of the circle of mature men that surrounded them. Their faces wore cynical smiles above their cravats, as if they were laughing at him. At length he gave a tap in the hand of the oldest of them, and made his way towards the Maréchale.

She was eating, with an affectation of gluttony, a slice of pâté de foie gras. Frederick, in order to make himself agreeable to her, followed her example, with a bottle of wine on his knees.

The four-wheeled cabriolet reappeared. It was Madame Arnoux! Her face was startlingly pale.

"Give me some champagne," said Rosanette.

And, lifting up her glass, full to the brim as high as possible, she exclaimed:

"Look over there! Look at my protector's wife, one of the virtuous women!"

There was a great burst of laughter all round her; and the cabriolet disappeared from view. Frederick tugged impatiently at her dress, and was on the point of flying into a passion. But Cisy was there, in the same attitude as before, and, with increased assurance, he invited

Rosanette to dine with him that very evening.

"Impossible!" she replied; "we're going together to the Café Anglais."

Frederick, as if he had heard nothing, remained silent; and Cisy quitted the Maréchale with a look of disappointment on his face.

While he had been talking to her at the right-hand door of the carriage, Hussonnet presented himself at the opposite side, and, catching the words "Café Anglais":

"It's a nice establishment; suppose we had a pick there, eh?"

"Just as you like," said Frederick, who, sunk down in the corner of the berlin, was gazing at the horizon as the four-wheeled cabriolet vanished from his sight, feeling that an irreparable thing had happened, and that there was an end of his great love. And the other woman was there beside him, the gay and easy love! But, worn out, full of conflicting desires, and no longer even knowing what he wanted, he was possessed by a feeling of infinite sadness, a longing to die.

A great noise of footsteps and of voices made him raise his head. The little ragamuffins assembled round the track sprang over the ropes and came to stare at the galleries. Thereupon their occupants rose to go. A few drops of rain began to fall. The crush of vehicles increased, and Hussonnet got lost in it.

"Well! so much the better!" said Frederick.

"We like to be alone better — don't we?" said the Maréchale, as she placed her hand in his.

Then there swept past him with a glitter of copper and steel a magnificent landau to which were yoked four horses driven in the Daumont style by two jockeys in velvet vests with gold fringes. Madame Dambreuse was by her husband's side, and Martinon was on the other seat facing them. All three of them gazed at Frederick in astonishment.

"They have recognised me!" said he to himself.

Rosanette wished to stop in order to get a better view of the people driving away from the course. Madame Arnoux might again make her appearance! He called out to the postilion:

"Go on! go on! forward!" And the berlin dashed towards the Champs-Élysées in the midst of the other vehicles — calashes, britzkas, wurths, tandems, tilburies, dog-carts, tilted carts with leather curtains, in which workmen in a jovial mood were singing, or one-horse chaises driven by fathers of families. In victorias crammed with people some young fellows seated on the others' feet let their legs both hang down. Large broughams, which had their seats lined with cloth, carried dowagers fast asleep, or else a splendid machine passed with a seat as simple and coquettish as a dandy's black coat.

The shower grew heavier. Umbrellas, parasols, and mackintoshes were put into requisition. People cried out at some distance away: "Good-day!" "Are you quite well?" "Yes!" "No!" "Bye-bye!" — and the faces succeeded each other with the rapidity of Chinese shadows.

Frederick and Rosanette did not say a word to each other, feeling a sort of dizziness at seeing all these wheels continually revolving close to them.

At times, the rows of carriages, too closely pressed together, stopped all at the same time in several lines. Then they remained side by side, and their occupants scanned one another. Over the sides of panels adorned with coats-of-arms indifferent glances were cast on the crowd. Eyes full of envy gleamed from the interiors of hackney-coaches. Depreciatory smiles responded to the haughty manner in which some people carried their heads. Mouths gaping wide expressed idiotic admiration; and, here and there, some loungeur, in the middle of the road, fell back with a bound, in order to avoid a rider who had been galloping through the midst of the vehicles, and had succeeded in getting away from them. Then, everything set itself in motion once more; the coachmen let go the reins, and lowered their long whips; the horses, excited, shook their curb-chains, and flung foam around them; and the cruppers and the harness getting moist, were smoking with the watery evaporation, through which struggled the rays of the sinking sun. Passing under the Arc de Triomphe, there stretched out at the height of a man, a reddish light, which shed a glittering lustre on the naves of the wheels, the handles of the carriage-doors, the ends of the shafts, and the rings of the carriage-beds; and on the two sides of the great avenue — like a river in which manes, garments, and human heads were undulating — the trees, all glittering with rain, rose up like two green walls. The blue of the sky overhead, reappearing in certain places, had the soft hue of satin.

Then, Frederick recalled the days, already far away, when he yearned for the inexpressible happiness of finding himself in one of these carriages by the side of one of these women. He had attained to this bliss, and yet he was not thereby one jot the happier.

The rain had ceased falling. The pedestrians, who had sought shelter between the columns of the Public Storerooms, took their departure. Persons who had been walking along the Rue Royale, went up again towards the boulevard. In front of the residence of the Minister of Foreign Affairs a group of boobies had taken up their posts on the steps.

When it had got up as high as the Chinese Baths, as there were holes in the pavement, the berlin slackened its pace. A man in a hazel-coloured paletot was walking on the edge of the footpath. A splash, spurting out from under the springs, showed itself on his back. The man turned round in a rage. Frederick grew pale; he had recognised Deslauriers.

At the door of the Café Anglais he sent away the carriage. Rosanette had gone in before him while he was paying the postilion.

He found her subsequently on the stairs chatting with a gentleman. Frederick took her arm; but in the lobby a second gentleman stopped her.

"Go on," said she; "I am at your service."

And he entered the private room alone. Through the two open windows people could be seen at the casements of the other houses opposite. Large watery masses were quivering on the pavement as it began to dry, and a magnolia, placed on the side of a balcony, shed a perfume through the apartment. This fragrance and freshness had a relaxing effect on his nerves. He sank down on the red divan underneath the glass.

The Maréchale here entered the room, and, kissing him on the forehead:

"Poor pet! there's something annoying you!"

"Perhaps so," was his reply.

"You are not alone; take heart!" — which was as much as to say: "Let us each forget our own concerns in a bliss which we shall enjoy in common."

Then she placed the petal of a flower between her lips and extended it towards him so that he might peck at it. This movement, full of grace and of almost voluptuous gentleness, had a softening influence on Frederick.

"Why do you give me pain?" said he, thinking of Madame Arnoux.

"I give you pain?"

And, standing before him, she looked at him with her lashes drawn close together and her two hands resting on his shoulders.

All his virtue, all his rancour gave way before the utter weakness of his will.

He continued:

"Because you won't love me," and he took her on his knees.

She gave way to him. He pressed his two hands round her waist. The crackling sound of her silk dress inflamed him.

"Where are they?" said Hussonnet's voice in the lobby outside.

The Maréchale arose abruptly, and went across to the other side of the room, where she sat down with her back to the door.

She ordered oysters, and they seated themselves at table.

Hussonnet was not amusing. By dint of writing every day on all sorts of subjects, reading many newspapers, listening to a great number of discussions, and uttering paradoxes for the purpose of dazzling people, he had in the end lost the exact idea of things, blinding himself with his own feeble fireworks. The embarrassments of a life which had formerly been frivolous, but which was now full of difficulty, kept him in a state of perpetual agitation; and his impotency, which he did not wish to avow, rendered him snappish and sarcastic. Referring to a new ballet entitled Ozai, he gave a thorough blowing-up to the dancing, and then, when the opera was in question, he attacked the Italians, now replaced by a company of Spanish actors, "as if people had not quite enough of Castilles already!" Frederick was shocked at this, owing to his romantic attachment to Spain, and, with a view to diverting the conversation into a new channel, he enquired about the Collège of France, where Edgar Quinet and Mickiewicz had attended. But Hussonnet, an admirer of M. de Maistre, declared himself on the side of Authority and Spiritualism. Nevertheless, he had doubts about the most well-established facts, contradicted history, and disputed about things whose certainty could not be questioned; so that at mention of the word "geometry," he exclaimed: "What fudge this geometry is!" All this he intermingled with imitations of actors.

Sainville was specially his model.

Frederick was quite bored by these quibbles. In an outburst of impatience he pushed his foot under the table, and pressed it on one of the little dogs.

Thereupon both animals began barking in a horrible fashion.

"You ought to get them sent home!" said he, abruptly.

Rosanette did not know anyone to whom she could intrust them.

Then, he turned round to the Bohemian:

"Look here, Hussonnet; sacrifice yourself!"

"Oh! yes, my boy! That would be a very obliging act!"

Hussonnet set off, without even requiring to have an appeal made to him.

In what way could they repay him for his kindness? Frederick did not bestow a thought on it. He was even beginning to rejoice at finding himself alone with her, when a waiter entered.

"Madame, somebody is asking for you!"

"What! again?"

"However, I must see who it is," said Rosanette.

He was thirsting for her; he wanted her. This disappearance seemed to him an act of prevarication, almost a piece of rudeness. What, then, did she mean? Was it not enough to have insulted Madame Arnoux? So much for the latter, all the same! Now he hated all women; and he felt the tears choking him, for his love had been misunderstood and his desire eluded.

The Maréchale returned, and presented Cisy to him.

"I have invited Monsieur. I have done right, have I not?"

"How is that! Oh! certainly."

Frederick, with the smile of a criminal about to be executed, beckoned to the gentleman to take a seat.

The Maréchale began to run her eye through the bill of fare, stopping at every fantastic name.

"Suppose we eat a turban of rabbits à la Richeliéu and a pudding à la d'Orléans?"

"Oh! not Orléans, pray!" exclaimed Cisy, who was a Legitimist, and thought of making a pun.

"Would you prefer a turbot à la Chambord?" she next asked.

Frederick was disgusted with this display of politeness.

The Maréchale made up her mind to order a simple fillet of beef cut up into steaks, some crayfishes, truffles, a pine-apple salad, and vanilla ices.

"We'll see what next. Go on for the present! Ah! I was forgetting! Bring me a sausage! — not with garlic!"

And she called the waiter "young man," struck her glass with her knife, and flung up the crumbs of her bread to the ceiling. She wished to drink some Burgundy immediately.

"It is not taken in the beginning," said Frederick.

This was sometimes done, according to the Vicomte.

"Oh! no. Never!"

"Yes, indeed; I assure you!"

"Ha! you see!"

The look with which she accompanied these words meant: "This is a rich man — pay attention to what he says!"

Meantime, the door was opening every moment; the waiters kept shouting; and on an infernal piano in the adjoining room some one was strumming a waltz. Then the races led to a discussion about horsemanship and the two rival systems. Cisy was upholding Baucher and Frederick the Comte d'Aure when Rosanette shrugged her shoulders:

"Enough — my God! — he is a better judge of these things than you are — come now!"

She kept nibbling at a pomegranate, with her elbow resting on the table. The wax-candles of the candelabrum in front of her were flickering in the wind. This white light penetrated her skin with mother-of-pearl tones, gave a pink hue to her lids, and made her eyeballs glitter. The red colour of the fruit blended with the purple of her lips; her thin nostrils heaved; and there was about her entire person an air of insolence, intoxication, and recklessness that exasperated Frederick, and yet filled his heart with wild desires.

Then, she asked, in a calm voice, who owned that big landau with chestnut-coloured livery.

Cisy replied that it was "the Comtesse Dambreuse"

"They're very rich — aren't they?"

"Oh! very rich! although Madame Dambreuse, who was merely a Mademoiselle Boutron and the daughter of a prefect, had a very modest fortune."

Her husband, on the other hand, must have inherited several estates — Cisy enumerated them: as he visited the Dambreuses, he knew their family history.

Frederick, in order to make himself disagreeable to the other, took a pleasure in contradicting him. He maintained that Madame Dambreuse's maiden name was De Boutron, which proved that she was of a noble family.

"No matter! I'd like to have her equipage!" said the Maréchale, throwing herself back on the armchair.

And the sleeve of her dress, slipping up a little, showed on her left wrist a bracelet adorned with three opals.

Frederick noticed it.

"Look here! why — — "

All three looked into one another's faces, and reddened.

The door was cautiously half-opened; the brim of a hat could be seen, and then Hussonnet's profile exhibited itself.

"Pray excuse me if I disturb the lovers!"

But he stopped, astonished at seeing Cisy, and that Cisy had taken his own seat.

Another cover was brought; and, as he was very hungry, he snatched up at random from what remained of the dinner some meat which was in a dish, fruit out of a basket, and drank with one hand while he helped himself with the other, all the time telling them the result of his mission. The two bow-wows had been taken home. Nothing fresh at the house. He had found the cook in the company of a soldier — a fictitious story which he had especially invented for the sake of effect.

The Maréchale took down her cloak from the window-screw. Frederick made a rush towards the bell, calling out to the waiter, who was some distance away:

"A carriage!"

"I have one of my own," said the Vicomte.

"But, Monsieur!"

"Nevertheless, Monsieur!"

And they stared into each other's eyes, both pale and their hands trembling.

At last, the Maréchale took Cisy's arm, and pointing towards the Bohemian seated at the table:

"Pray mind him! He's choking himself. I wouldn't care to let his devotion to my pugs be the cause of his death."

The door closed behind him.

"Well?" said Hussonnet.

"Well, what?"

"I thought — — "

"What did you think?"

"Were you not — — ?"

He completed the sentence with a gesture.

"Oh! no — never in all my life!"

Hussonnet did not press the matter further.

He had an object in inviting himself to dinner. His journal, — which was no longer called L'Art, but Le Flambart, with this epigraph, "Gunnners, to your cannons!" — not being at all in a flourishing condition, he had a mind to change it into a weekly review, conducted by himself, without any assistance from Deslauriers. He again referred to the old project and explained his latest plan.

Frederick, probably not understanding what he was talking about, replied with some vague words. Hussonnet snatched up several cigars from the tables, said "Good-bye, old chap," and disappeared.

Frederick called for the bill. It had a long list of items; and the waiter, with his napkin under his arm, was expecting to be paid by Frederick, when another, a sallow-faced individual, who resembled Martinon, came and said to him:

"Beg pardon; they forgot at the bar to add in the charge for the cab."

"What cab?"

"The cab the gentleman took a short time ago for the little dogs."

And the waiter put on a look of gravity, as if he pitied the poor young man. Frederick felt inclined to box the fellow's ears. He gave the waiter the twenty francs' change as a pour-boire.

"Thanks, Monseigneur," said the man with the napkin, bowing low.

CHAPTER XI.

A Dinner and a Duel.

Frederick passed the whole of the next day in brooding over his anger and humiliation. He reproached himself for not having given a slap in the face to Cisy. As for the Maréchale, he swore not to see her again. Others as good-looking could be easily found; and, as money would be required in order to possess these women, he would speculate on the Bourse with the purchase-money of his farm. He would get rich; he would crush the Maréchale and everyone else with his luxury. When the evening had come, he was surprised at not having thought of Madame Arnoux.

"So much the better. What's the good of it?"

Two days after, at eight o'clock, Pellerin came to pay him a visit. He began by expressing his admiration of the furniture and talking in a wheedling tone. Then, abruptly:

"You were at the races on Sunday?"

"Yes, alas!"

Thereupon the painter decried the anatomy of English horses, and praised the horses of Gericourt and the horses of the Parthenon.

"Rosanette was with you?"

And he artfully proceeded to speak in flattering terms about her.

Frederick's freezing manner put him a little out of countenance.

He did not know how to bring about the question of her portrait. His first idea had been to do a portrait in the style of Titian. But gradually the varied colouring of his model had bewitched him; he had gone on boldly with the work, heaping up paste on paste and light on light. Rosanette, in the beginning, was enchanted. Her appointments with Delmar had interrupted the sittings, and left Pellerin all the time to get bedazzled. Then, as his admiration began to subside, he asked himself whether the picture might not be on a larger scale. He had gone to have another look at the Titians, realised how the great artist had filled in his portraits with such finish, and saw wherein his own shortcomings lay; and then he began to go over the outlines again in the most simple fashion. After that, he sought, by scraping them off, to lose there, to mingle there, all the tones of the head and those of the background; and the face had assumed consistency and the shades vigour — the whole work had a look of greater firmness. At length the Maréchale came back again. She even indulged in some hostile criticisms. The painter naturally persevered in his own course. After getting into a violent passion at her silliness, he said to himself that, after all, perhaps she was right. Then began the era of doubts, twinges of reflection which brought about cramps in the stomach, insomnia, feverishness and disgust with himself. He had the courage to make some retouchings, but without much heart, and with a feeling that his work was bad.

He complained merely of having been refused a place in the Salon; then he reproached Frederick for not having come to see the Maréchale's portrait.

"What do I care about the Maréchale?"

Such an expression of unconcern emboldened the artist.

"Would you believe that this brute has no interest in the thing any longer?"

What he did not mention was that he had asked her for a thousand crowns. Now the Maréchale did not give herself much bother about ascertaining who was going to pay, and, preferring to screw money out of Arnoux for things of a more urgent character, had not even spoken to him on the subject.

"Well, and Arnoux?"

She had thrown it over on him. The ex-picture-dealer wished to have nothing to do with the portrait.

"He maintains that it belongs to Rosanette."

"In fact, it is hers."

"How is that? 'Tis she that sent me to you," was Pellerin's answer.

If he had been thinking of the excellence of his work, he would not have dreamed perhaps of making capital out of it. But a sum — and a big sum — would be an effective reply to the critics, and would strengthen his own position. Finally, to get rid of his importunities, Frederick courteously enquired his terms.

The extravagant figure named by Pellerin quite took away his breath, and he replied:

"Oh! no — no!"

"You, however, are her lover — 'tis you gave me the order!"

"Excuse me, I was only an intermediate agent."

"But I can't remain with this on my hands!"

The artist lost his temper.

"Ha! I didn't imagine you were so covetous!"

"Nor I that you were so stingy! I wish you good morning!"

He had just gone out when Sénécal made his appearance.

Frederick was moving about restlessly, in a state of great agitation.

"What's the matter?"

Sénécal told his story.

"On Saturday, at nine o'clock, Madame Arnoux got a letter which summoned her back to Paris. As there happened to be nobody in the place at the time to go to Creil for a vehicle, she asked me to go there myself. I refused, for this was no part of my duties. She left, and came back on Sunday evening. Yesterday morning, Arnoux came down to the works. The girl from Bordeaux made a complaint to him. I don't know what passed between them; but he took off before everyone the fine I had imposed on her. Some sharp words passed between us. In short, he closed accounts with me, and here I am!"

Then, with a pause between every word:

"Furthermore, I am not sorry. I have done my duty. No matter — you were the cause of it."

"How?" exclaimed Frederick, alarmed lest Sénécal might have guessed his secret.

Sénécal had not, however, guessed anything about it, for he replied:

"That is to say, but for you I might have done better."

Frederick was seized with a kind of remorse.

"In what way can I be of service to you now?"

Sénécal wanted some employment, a situation.

"That is an easy thing for you to manage. You know many people of good position, Monsieur Dambreuse amongst others; at least, so Deslauriers told me."

This allusion to Deslauriers was by no means agreeable to his friend. He scarcely cared to call on the Dambreses again after his undesirable meeting with them in the Champ de Mars.

"I am not on sufficiently intimate terms with them to recommend anyone."

The democrat endured this refusal stoically, and after a minute's silence:

"All this, I am sure, is due to the girl from Bordeaux, and to your Madame Arnoux."

This "your" had the effect of wiping out of Frederick's heart the slight modicum of regard he entertained for Sénécal. Nevertheless, he stretched out his hand towards the key of his escritoire through delicacy.

Sénécal anticipated him:

"Thanks!"

Then, forgetting his own troubles, he talked about the affairs of the nation, the crosses of the Legion of Honour wasted at the Royal Fête, the question of a change of ministry, the Drouillard case and the Bénier case — scandals of the day — declaimed against the middle class, and predicted a revolution.

His eyes were attracted by a Japanese dagger hanging on the wall. He took hold of it; then he flung it on the sofa with an air of disgust.

"Come, then! good-bye! I must go to Nôtre Dame de Lorette."

"Hold on! Why?"

"The anniversary service for Godefroy Cavaignac is taking place there to-day. He died at work — that man! But all is not over. Who knows?"

And Sénécal, with a show of fortitude, put out his hand:

"Perhaps we shall never see each other again! good-bye!"

This "good-bye," repeated several times, his knitted brows as he gazed at the dagger, his resignation, and the solemnity of his manner, above all, plunged Frederick into a thoughtful mood, but very soon he ceased to think about Sénécal.

During the same week, his notary at Havre sent him the sum realised by the sale of his farm — one hundred and seventy-four thousand francs. He divided it into two portions, invested the first half in the Funds, and brought the second half to a stock-broker to take his chance of making money by it on the Bourse.

He dined at fashionable taverns, went to the theatres, and was trying to amuse himself as best he could, when Hussonnet addressed a letter to him announcing in a gay fashion that the Maréchale had got rid of Cisy the very day after the races. Frederick was delighted at this intelligence, without taking the trouble to ascertain what the Bohemian's motive was in giving him the information.

It so happened that he met Cisy, three days later. That aristocratic young gentleman kept his countenance, and even invited Frederick to dine on the following Wednesday.

On the morning of that day, the latter received a notification from a process-server, in which M. Charles Jean Baptiste Oudry apprised him that by the terms of a legal judgment he had become the purchaser of a property situated at Belleville, belonging to M. Jacques Arnoux, and that he was ready to pay the two hundred and twenty-three thousand for which it had been sold. But, as it appeared by the same decree that the amount of the mortgages with which the estate was encumbered exceeded the purchase-money, Frederick's claim would in consequence be completely forfeited.

The entire mischief arose from not having renewed the registration of the mortgage within the proper time. Arnoux had undertaken to attend to this matter formally himself, and had then forgotten all about it. Frederick got into a rage with him for this, and when the young man's anger had passed off:

"Well, afterwards — — what?"

"If this can save him, so much the better. It won't kill me! Let us think no more about it!"

But, while moving about his papers on the table, he came across Hussonnet's letter, and noticed the postscript, which had not at first attracted his attention. The Bohemian wanted just five thousand francs to give the journal a start.

"Ah! this fellow is worrying me to death!"

And he sent a curt answer, unceremoniously refusing the application. After that, he dressed himself to go to the Maison d'Or.

Cisy introduced his guests, beginning with the most respectable of them, a big, white-haired gentleman.

"The Marquis Gilbert des Aulnays, my godfather. Monsieur Anselme de Forchambeaux," he said next — (a thin, fair-haired young man, already bald); then, pointing towards a simple-mannered man of forty: "Joseph Boffreu, my cousin; and here is my old tutor, Monsieur Vezou" — a person who seemed a mixture of a ploughman and a seminarist, with large whiskers and a long frock-coat fastened at the end by a single button, so that it fell over his chest like a shawl.

Cisy was expecting some one else — the Baron de Comaing, who "might perhaps come, but it was not certain." He left the room every minute, and appeared to be in a restless frame of mind. Finally, at eight o'clock, they proceeded towards an apartment splendidly lighted up and much more spacious than the number of guests required. Cisy had selected it for the special purpose of display.

A vermilion épergne laden with flowers and fruit occupied the centre of the table, which was covered with silver dishes, after the old French fashion; glass bowls full of salt meats and spices formed a border all around it. Jars of iced red wine stood at regular distances from each other. Five glasses of different sizes were ranged before each plate, with things of which the use could not be divined — a thousand dinner utensils of an ingenious description. For the first course alone, there was a sturgeon's jowl moistened with champagne, a Yorkshire ham with tokay, thrushes with sauce, roast quail, a béchamel vol-au-vent, a stew of red-legged partridges, and at the two ends of all this, fringes of potatoes which were mingled with truffles. The apartment was illuminated by a lustre and some girandoles, and it was hung with red damask curtains.

Four men-servants in black coats stood behind the armchairs, which were upholstered in morocco. At this sight the guests uttered an exclamation — the tutor more emphatically than the rest.

"Upon my word, our host has indulged in a foolishly lavish display of luxury. It is too beautiful!"

"Is that so?" said the Vicomte de Cisy; "Come on, then!"

And, as they were swallowing the first spoonful:

"Well, my dear old friend Aulnays, have you been to the Palais-Royal to see Père et Portier?"

"You know well that I have no time to go!" replied the Marquis.

His mornings were taken up with a course of arboriculture, his evenings were spent at the Agricultural Club, and all his afternoons were occupied by a study of the implements of husbandry in manufactories. As he resided at Saintonge for three fourths of the year, he took advantage of his visits to the capital to get fresh information; and his large-brimmed hat, which lay on a side-table, was crammed with pamphlets.

But Cisy, observing that M. de Forchambeaux refused to take wine: "Go on, damn it, drink! You're not in good form for your last bachelor's meal!"

At this remark all bowed and congratulated him.

"And the young lady," said the tutor, "is charming, I'm sure?"

"Faith, she is!" exclaimed Cisy. "No matter, he is making a mistake; marriage is such a stupid thing!"

"You talk in a thoughtless fashion, my friend!" returned M. des Aulnays, while tears began to gather in his eyes at the recollection of his own dead wife.

And Forchambeaux repeated several times in succession:

"It will be your own case — it will be your own case!"

Cisy protested. He preferred to enjoy himself — to "live in the free-and-easy style of the Regency days." He wanted to learn the shoe-trick, in order to visit the thieves' taverns of the city, like Rodolphe in the Mysteries of Paris; drew out of his pocket a dirty clay pipe, abused the servants, and drank a great quantity; then, in order to create a good impression about himself, he disparaged all the dishes. He even sent away the truffles; and the tutor, who was exceedingly fond of them, said through servility;

"These are not as good as your grandmother's snow-white eggs."

Then he began to chat with the person sitting next to him, the agriculturist, who found many advantages from his sojourn in the country, if it were only to be able to bring up his daughters with simple tastes. The tutor approved of his ideas and toadied to him, supposing that this gentleman possessed influence over his former pupil, whose man of business he was anxious to become.

Frederick had come there filled with hostility to Cisy; but the young aristocrat's idiocy had disarmed him. However, as the other's gestures, face, and entire person brought back to his recollection the dinner at the Café Anglais, he got more and more irritated; and he lent his ears to the complimentary remarks made in a low tone by Joseph, the cousin, a fine young fellow without any money, who was a lover of the chase and a University prizeman. Cisy, for the sake of a laugh, called him a "catcher"[\[A\]](#) several times; then suddenly:

"Ha! here comes the Baron!"

At that moment, there entered a jovial blade of thirty, with somewhat rough-looking features and active limbs, wearing his hat over his ear and displaying a flower in his button-hole. He was the Vicomte's ideal. The young aristocrat was delighted at having him there; and stimulated by his presence, he even attempted a pun; for he said, as they passed a heath-cock:

"There's the best of La Bruyère's characters!"[B]

After that, he put a heap of questions to M. de Comaing about persons unknown to society; then, as if an idea had suddenly seized him:

"Tell me, pray! have you thought about me?"

The other shrugged his shoulders:

"You are not old enough, my little man. It is impossible!"

Cisy had begged of the Baron to get him admitted into his club. But the other having, no doubt, taken pity on his vanity:

"Ha! I was forgetting! A thousand congratulations on having won your bet, my dear fellow!"

"What bet?"

"The bet you made at the races to effect an entrance the same evening into that lady's house."

Frederick felt as if he had got a lash with a whip. He was speedily appeased by the look of utter confusion in Cisy's face.

In fact, the Maréchale, next morning, was filled with regret when Arnoux, her first lover, her good friend, had presented himself that very day. They both gave the Vicomte to understand that he was in the way, and kicked him out without much ceremony.

He pretended not to have heard what was said.

The Baron went on:

"What has become of her, this fine Rose? Is she as pretty as ever?" showing by his manner that he had been on terms of intimacy with her.

Frederick was chagrined by the discovery.

"There's nothing to blush at," said the Baron, pursuing the topic, "'tis a good thing!"

Cisy smacked his tongue.

"Whew! not so good!"

"Ha!"

"Oh dear, yes! In the first place, I found her nothing extraordinary, and then, you pick up the like of her as often as you please, for, in fact, she is for sale!"

"Not for everyone!" remarked Frederick, with some bitterness.

"He imagines that he is different from the others," was Cisy's comment. "What a good joke!"

And a laugh ran round the table.

Frederick felt as if the palpitations of his heart would suffocate him. He swallowed two glasses of water one after the other.

But the Baron had preserved a lively recollection of Rosanette.

"Is she still interested in a fellow named Arnoux?"

"I haven't the faintest idea," said Cisy, "I don't know that gentleman!"

Nevertheless, he suggested that he believed Arnoux was a sort of swindler.

"A moment!" exclaimed Frederick.

"However, there is no doubt about it! Legal proceedings have been taken against him."

"That is not true!"

Frederick began to defend Arnoux, vouched for his honesty, ended by convincing himself of it, and concocted figures and proofs. The Vicomte, full of spite, and tipsy in addition, persisted in his assertions, so that Frederick said to him gravely:

"Is the object of this to give offence to me, Monsieur?"

And he looked Cisy full in the face, with eyeballs as red as his cigar.

"Oh! not at all. I grant you that he possesses something very nice — his wife."

"Do you know her?"

"Faith, I do! Sophie Arnoux; everyone knows her."

"You mean to tell me that?"

Cisy, who had staggered to his feet, hiccoughed:

"Everyone — knows — her."

"Hold your tongue. It is not with women of her sort you keep company!"

"I — flatter myself — it is."

Frederick flung a plate at his face. It passed like a flash of lightning over the table, knocked down two bottles, demolished a fruit-dish, and breaking into three pieces, by knocking against the épergne, hit the Vicomte in the stomach.

All the other guests arose to hold him back. He struggled and shrieked, possessed by a kind of frenzy.

M. des Aulnays kept repeating:

"Come, be calm, my dear boy!"

"Why, this is frightful!" shouted the tutor.

Forchambeaux, livid as a plum, was trembling. Joseph indulged in repeated outbursts of laughter. The attendants sponged out the traces of the wine, and gathered up the remains of the dinner from the floor; and the Baron went and shut the window, for the uproar, in spite of the noise of carriage-wheels, could be heard on the boulevard.

As all present at the moment the plate had been flung had been talking at the same time, it was impossible to discover the cause of the attack — whether it was on account of Arnoux, Madame Arnoux, Rosanette, or somebody else. One thing only they were certain of, that Frederick had acted with indescribable brutality. On his part, he refused positively to testify the slightest regret for what he had done.

M. des Aulnays tried to soften him. Cousin Joseph, the tutor, and Forchambeaux himself joined in the effort. The Baron, all this time, was cheering up Cisy, who, yielding to nervous weakness, began to shed tears.

Frederick, on the contrary, was getting more and more angry, and they would have remained there till daybreak if the Baron had not said, in order to bring matters to a close:

"The Vicomte, Monsieur, will send his seconds to call on you to-morrow."

"Your hour?"

"Twelve, if it suits you."

"Perfectly, Monsieur."

Frederick, as soon as he was in the open air, drew a deep breath. He had been keeping his feelings too long under restraint; he had satisfied them at last. He felt, so to speak, the pride of virility, a superabundance of energy within him which intoxicated him. He required two seconds. The first person he thought of for the purpose was Regimbart, and he immediately directed his steps towards the Rue Saint-Denis. The shop-front was closed, but some light shone through a pane of glass over the door. It opened and he went in, stooping very low as he passed under the penthouse.

A candle at the side of the bar lighted up the deserted smoking-room. All the stools, with their feet in the air, were piled on the table. The master and mistress, with their waiter, were at supper in a corner near the kitchen; and Regimbart, with his hat on his head, was sharing their meal, and even disturbed the waiter, who was compelled every moment to turn aside a little. Frederick, having briefly explained the matter to him, asked Regimbart to assist him. The Citizen at first made no reply. He rolled his eyes about, looked as if he were plunged in reflection, took several strides around the room, and at last said:

"Yes, by all means!" and a homicidal smile smoothed his brow when he learned that the adversary was a nobleman.

"Make your mind easy; we'll rout him with flying colours! In the first place, with the sword — — "

"But perhaps," broke in Frederick, "I have not the right."

"I tell you 'tis necessary to take the sword," the Citizen replied roughly. "Do you know how to make passes?"

"A little."

"Oh! a little. This is the way with all of them; and yet they have a mania for committing assaults. What does the fencing-school teach? Listen to me: keep a good distance off, always confining yourself in circles, and parry — parry as you retire; that is permitted. Tire him out. Then boldly make a lunge on him! and, above all, no malice, no strokes of the La Fougère kind.[C] No! a simple one-two, and some disengagements. Look here! do you see? while you turn your wrist as if opening a lock. Père Vauthier, give me your cane. Ha! that will do."

He grasped the rod which was used for lighting the gas, rounded his left arm, bent his right, and began to make some thrusts against the partition. He stamped with his foot, got animated, and pretended to be encountering difficulties, while he exclaimed: "Are you there? Is that it? Are you there?" and his enormous silhouette projected itself on the wall with his hat apparently touching the ceiling. The owner of the café shouted from time to time: "Bravo! very good!" His wife, though a little unnerved, was likewise filled with admiration; and Théodore, who had been in the army, remained riveted to the spot with amazement, the fact being, however, that he regarded M. Regimbart with a species of hero-worship.

Next morning, at an early hour, Frederick hurried to the establishment in which Dussardier was employed. After having passed through a succession of departments all full of clothing-materials, either adorning shelves or lying on tables, while here and there shawls were fixed on wooden racks shaped like toadstools, he saw the young man, in a sort of railed cage, surrounded by account-books, and standing in front of a desk at which he was writing. The honest fellow left his work.

The seconds arrived before twelve o'clock.

Frederick, as a matter of good taste, thought he ought not to be present at the conference.

The Baron and M. Joseph declared that they would be satisfied with the simplest excuses. But Regimbart's principle being never to yield, and his contention being that Arnoux's honour should be vindicated (Frederick had not spoken to him about anything else), he asked that the Vicomte should apologise. M. de Comaing was indignant at this presumption. The Citizen would not abate an inch. As all conciliation proved impracticable, there was nothing for it but to fight.

Other difficulties arose, for the choice of weapons lay with Cisy, as the person to whom the insult had been offered. But Regimbart maintained that by sending the challenge he had constituted himself the offending party. His seconds loudly protested that a buffet was the most cruel of offences. The Citizen carped at the words, pointing out that a buffet was not a blow. Finally, they decided to refer the matter to a military man; and the four seconds went off to consult the officers in some of the barracks.

They drew up at the barracks on the Quai d'Orsay. M. de Comaing, having accosted two captains, explained to them the question in dispute.

The captains did not understand a word of what he was saying, owing to the confusion caused by the Citizen's incidental remarks. In short, they advised the gentlemen who consulted them to draw up a minute of the proceedings; after which they would give their decision. Thereupon, they repaired to a café; and they even, in order to do things with more circumspection, referred to Cisy as H, and Frederick as K.

Then they returned to the barracks. The officers had gone out. They reappeared, and declared that the choice of arms manifestly belonged to H.

They all returned to Cisy's abode. Regimbart and Dussardier remained on the footpath outside.

The Vicomte, when he was informed of the solution of the case, was seized with such extreme agitation that they had to repeat for him several times the decision of the officers; and, when M. de Comaing came to deal with Regimbart's contention, he murmured

"Nevertheless," not being very reluctant himself to yield to it. Then he let himself sink into an armchair, and declared that he would not fight.

"Eh? What?" said the Baron. Then Cisy indulged in a confused flood of mouthings. He wished to fight with firearms — to discharge a single pistol at close quarters.

"Or else we will put arsenic into a glass, and draw lots to see who must drink it. That's sometimes done. I've read of it!"

The Baron, naturally rather impatient, addressed him in a harsh tone:

"These gentlemen are waiting for your answer. This is indecent, to put it shortly. What weapons are you going to take? Come! is it the sword?"

The Vicomte gave an affirmative reply by merely nodding his head; and it was arranged that the meeting should take place next morning at seven o'clock sharp at the Maillot gate.

Dussardier, being compelled to go back to his business, Regimbart went to inform Frederick about the arrangement. He had been left all day without any news, and his impatience was becoming intolerable.

"So much the better!" he exclaimed.

The Citizen was satisfied with his deportment.

"Would you believe it? They wanted an apology from us. It was nothing — a mere word! But I knocked them off their beam-ends nicely. The right thing to do, wasn't it?"

"Undoubtedly," said Frederick, thinking that it would have been better to choose another second.

Then, when he was alone, he repeated several times in a very loud tone:

"I am going to fight! Hold on, I am going to fight! 'Tis funny!"

And, as he walked up and down his room, while passing in front of the mirror, he noticed that he was pale.

"Have I any reason to be afraid?"

He was seized with a feeling of intolerable misery at the prospect of exhibiting fear on the ground.

"And yet, suppose I happen to be killed? My father met his death the same way. Yes, I shall be killed!"

And, suddenly, his mother rose up before him in a black dress; incoherent images floated before his mind. His own cowardice exasperated him. A paroxysm of courage, a thirst for human blood, took possession of him. A battalion could not have made him retreat. When this feverish excitement had cooled down, he was overjoyed to feel that his nerves were perfectly steady. In order to divert his thoughts, he went to the opera, where a ballet was being performed. He listened to the music, looked at the danseuses through his opera-glass, and drank a glass of punch between the acts. But when he got home again, the sight of his study, of his furniture, in the midst of which he found himself for the last time, made him feel ready to swoon.

He went down to the garden. The stars were shining; he gazed up at them. The idea of fighting about a woman gave him a greater importance in his own eyes, and surrounded him with a halo of nobility. Then he went to bed in a tranquil frame of mind.

It was not so with Cisy. After the Baron's departure, Joseph had tried to revive his drooping spirits, and, as the Vicomte remained in the same dull mood:

"However, old boy, if you prefer to remain at home, I'll go and say so."

Cisy durst not answer "Certainly;" but he would have liked his cousin to do him this service without speaking about it.

He wished that Frederick would die during the night of an attack of apoplexy, or that a riot would break out so that next morning there would be enough of barricades to shut up all the approaches to the Bois de Boulogne, or that some emergency might prevent one of the seconds from being present; for in the absence of seconds the duel would fall through. He felt a longing to save himself by taking an express train — no matter where. He regretted that he did not understand medicine so as to be able to take something which, without endangering his life, would cause it to be believed that he was dead.

He finally wished to be ill in earnest.

In order to get advice and assistance from someone, he sent for M. des Aulnays. That worthy man had gone back to Saintonge on receiving a letter informing him of the illness of one of his daughters. This appeared an ominous circumstance to Cisy. Luckily, M. Vezou, his tutor, came to see him. Then he unbosomed himself.

"What am I to do? my God! what am I do?"

"If I were in your place, Monsieur, I should pay some strapping fellow from the market-place to go and give him a drubbing."

"He would still know who brought it about," replied Cisy.

And from time to time he uttered a groan; then:

"But is a man bound to fight a duel?"

"'Tis a relic of barbarism! What are you to do?"

Out of complaisance the pedagogue invited himself to dinner. His pupil did not eat anything, but, after the meal, felt the necessity of taking a short walk.

As they were passing a church, he said:

"Suppose we go in for a little while — to look?"

M. Vezou asked nothing better, and even offered him holy water.

It was the month of May. The altar was covered with flowers; voices were chanting; the organ was resounding through the church. But he found it impossible to pray, as the pomps of religion inspired him merely with thoughts of funerals. He fancied that he could hear the murmurs of the De Profundis.

"Let us go away. I don't feel well."

They spent the whole night playing cards. The Vicomte made an effort to lose in order to exorcise ill-luck, a thing which M. Vezou turned to his own advantage. At last, at the first streak of dawn, Cisy, who could stand it no longer, sank down on the green cloth, and was soon plunged in sleep, which was disturbed by unpleasant dreams.

If courage, however, consists in wishing to get the better of one's own weakness, the Vicomte was courageous, for in the presence of his seconds, who came to seek him, he stiffened himself up with all the strength he could command, vanity making him realise that to attempt to draw back now would destroy him. M. de Comaing congratulated him on his good appearance.

But, on the way, the jolting of the cab and the heat of the morning sun made him languish. His energy gave way again. He could not even distinguish any longer where they were. The Baron amused himself by increasing his terror, talking about the "corpse," and of the way they meant to get back clandestinely to the city. Joseph gave the rejoinder; both, considering the affair ridiculous, were certain that it would be settled.

Cisy kept his head on his breast; he lifted it up slowly, and drew attention to the fact that they had not taken a doctor with them.

"'Tis needless," said the Baron.

"Then there's no danger?"

Joseph answered in a grave tone:

"Let us hope so!"

And nobody in the carriage made any further remark.

At ten minutes past seven they arrived in front of the Maillot gate. Frederick and his seconds were there, the entire group being dressed all in black. Regimbart, instead of a cravat, wore a stiff horsehair collar, like a trooper; and he carried a long violin-case adapted for adventures of this kind. They exchanged frigid bows. Then they all plunged into the Bois de Boulogne, taking the Madrid road, in order to find a suitable place.

Regimbart said to Frederick, who was walking between him and Dussardier:

"Well, and this scare — what do we care about it? If you want anything, don't annoy yourself about it; I know what to do. Fear is natural to man!"

Then, in a low tone:

"Don't smoke any more; in this case it has a weakening effect."

Frederick threw away his cigar, which had only a disturbing effect on his brain, and went on with a firm step. The Vicomte advanced behind, leaning on the arms of his two seconds. Occasional wayfarers crossed their path. The sky was blue, and from time to time they heard rabbits skipping about. At the turn of a path, a woman in a Madras neckerchief was chatting with a man in a blouse; and in the large avenue under the chestnut-trees some grooms in vests of linen-cloth were walking horses up and down.

Cisy recalled the happy days when, mounted on his own chestnut horse, and with his glass stuck in his eye, he rode up to carriage-doors.

These recollections intensified his wretchedness. An intolerable thirst parched his throat. The buzzing of flies mingled with the throbbing of his arteries. His feet sank into the sand. It seemed to him as if he had been walking during a period which had neither beginning nor end.

The seconds, without stopping, examined with keen glances each side of the path they were traversing. They hesitated as to whether they would go to the Catelan Cross or under the walls of the Bagatelle. At last they took a turn to the right; and they drew up in a kind of quincunx in the midst of the pine-trees.

The spot was chosen in such a way that the level ground was cut equally into two divisions. The two places at which the principals in the duel were to take their stand were marked out. Then Regimbart opened his case. It was lined with red sheep's-leather, and contained four charming swords hollowed in the centre, with handles which were adorned with filigree. A ray of light, passing through the leaves, fell on them, and they appeared to Cisy to glitter like silver vipers on a sea of blood.

The Citizen showed that they were of equal length. He took one himself, in order to separate the combatants in case of necessity. M. de Comaing held a walking-stick. There was an interval of silence. They looked at each other. All the faces had in them something fierce or cruel.

Frederick had taken off his coat and his waistcoat. Joseph aided Cisy to do the same. When his cravat was removed a blessed medal could be seen on his neck. This made Regimbart smile contemptuously.

Then M. de Comaing (in order to allow Frederick another moment for reflection) tried to raise some quibbles. He demanded the right to put on a glove, and to catch hold of his adversary's sword with the left hand. Regimbart, who was in a hurry, made no objection to this. At last the Baron, addressing Frederick:

"Everything depends on you, Monsieur! There is never any dishonour in acknowledging one's faults."

Dussardier made a gesture of approval. The Citizen gave vent to his indignation:

"Do you think we came here as a mere sham, damn it! Be on your guard, each of you!"

The combatants were facing one another, with their seconds by their sides.

He uttered the single word:

"Come!"

Cisy became dreadfully pale. The end of his blade was quivering like a horsewhip. His head fell back, his hands dropped down helplessly, and he sank unconscious on the ground. Joseph raised him up and while holding a scent-bottle to his nose, gave him a good shaking.

The Vicomte reopened his eyes, then suddenly grasped at his sword like a madman. Frederick had held his in readiness, and now awaited him with steady eye and uplifted hand.

"Stop! stop!" cried a voice, which came from the road simultaneously with the sound of a horse at full gallop, and the hood of a cab broke the branches. A man bending out his head waved a handkerchief, still exclaiming:

"Stop! stop!"

M. de Comaing, believing that this meant the intervention of the police, lifted up his walking-stick.

"Make an end of it. The Vicomte is bleeding!"

"I?" said Cisy.

In fact, he had in his fall taken off the skin of his left thumb.

"But this was by falling," observed the Citizen.

The Baron pretended not to understand.

Arnoux had jumped out of the cab.

"I have arrived too late? No! Thanks be to God!"

He threw his arms around Frederick, felt him, and covered his face with kisses.

"I am the cause of it. You wanted to defend your old friend! That's right — that's right! Never shall I forget it! How good you are! Ah! my own dear boy!"

He gazed at Frederick and shed tears, while he chuckled with delight. The Baron turned towards Joseph:

"I believe we are in the way at this little family party. It is over, messieurs, is it not? Vicomte, put your arm into a sling. Hold on! here is my silk handkerchief."

Then, with an imperious gesture: "Come! no spite! This is as it should be!"

The two adversaries shook hands in a very lukewarm fashion. The Vicomte, M. de Comaing, and Joseph disappeared in one direction, and Frederick left with his friends in the opposite direction.

As the Madrid Restaurant was not far off, Arnoux proposed that they should go and drink a glass of beer there.

"We might even have breakfast."

But, as Dussardier had no time to lose, they confined themselves to taking some refreshment in the garden.

They all experienced that sense of satisfaction which follows happy dénouements. The Citizen, nevertheless, was annoyed at the duel having been interrupted at the most critical stage.

Arnoux had been apprised of it by a person named Compain, a friend of Regimbart; and with an irrepressible outburst of emotion he had rushed to the spot to prevent it, under the impression, however, that he was the occasion of it. He begged of Frederick to furnish him with some details about it. Frederick, touched by these proofs of affection, felt some scruples at the idea of increasing his misapprehension of the facts.

"For mercy's sake, don't say any more about it!"

Arnoux thought that this reserve showed great delicacy. Then, with his habitual levity, he passed on to some fresh subject.

"What news, Citizen?"

And they began talking about banking transactions, and the number of bills that were falling due. In order to be more undisturbed, they went to another table, where they exchanged whispered confidences.

Frederick could overhear the following words: "You are going to back me up with your signature." "Yes, but you, mind!" "I have negotiated it at last for three hundred!" "A nice commission, faith!"

In short, it was clear that Arnoux was mixed up in a great many shady transactions with the Citizen.

Frederick thought of reminding him about the fifteen thousand francs. But his last step forbade the utterance of any reproachful words even of the mildest description. Besides, he felt tired himself, and this was not a convenient place for talking about such a thing. He put it off till some future day.

Arnoux, seated in the shade of an evergreen, was smoking, with a look of joviality in his face. He raised his eyes towards the doors of private rooms looking out on the garden, and said he had often paid visits to the house in former days.

"Probably not by yourself?" returned the Citizen.

"Faith, you're right there!"

"What blackguardism you do carry on! you, a married man!"

"Well, and what about yourself?" retorted Arnoux; and, with an indulgent smile: "I am even sure that this rascal here has a room of his own somewhere into which he takes his friends."

The Citizen confessed that this was true by simply shrugging his shoulders. Then these two gentlemen entered into their respective tastes with regard to the sex: Arnoux now preferred youth, work-girls; Regimbart hated affected women, and went in for the genuine article before anything else. The conclusion which the earthenware-dealer laid down at the close of this discussion was that women were not to be taken seriously.

"Nevertheless, he is fond of his own wife," thought Frederick, as he made his way home; and he looked on Arnoux as a coarse-grained man. He had a grudge against him on account of the duel, as if it had been for the sake of this individual that he risked his life a little while before.

But he felt grateful to Dussardier for his devotedness. Ere long the book-keeper came at his invitation to pay him a visit every day.

Frederick lent him books — Thiers, Dulaure, Barante, and Lamartine's Girondins.

The honest fellow listened to everything the other said with a thoughtful air, and accepted his opinions as those of a master.

One evening he arrived looking quite scared.

That morning, on the boulevard, a man who was running so quickly that he had got out of breath, had jostled against him, and having recognised in him a friend of Sénécal, had said to him:

"He has just been taken! I am making my escape!"

There was no doubt about it. Dussardier had spent the day making enquiries. Sénécal was in jail charged with an attempted crime of a political nature.

The son of an overseer, he was born at Lyons, and having had as his teacher a former disciple of Chaliar, he had, on his arrival in Paris, obtained admission into the "Society of Families." His ways were known, and the police kept a watch on him. He was one of those who fought in the outbreak of May, 1839, and since then he had remained in the shade; but, his self-importance increasing more and more, he became a fanatical follower of Alibaud, mixing up his own grievances against society with those of the people against monarchy, and waking up every morning in the hope of a revolution which in a fortnight or a month would turn the world upside down. At last, disgusted at the inactivity of his brethren, enraged at the obstacles that retarded the realisation of his dreams, and despairing of the country, he entered in his capacity of chemist into the conspiracy for the use of incendiary bombs; and he had been caught carrying gunpowder, of which he was going to make a trial at Montmartre — a supreme effort to establish the Republic.

Dussardier was no less attached to the Republican idea, for, from his point of view, it meant enfranchisement and universal happiness. One day — at the age of fifteen — in the Rue Transnonain, in front of a grocer's shop, he had seen soldiers' bayonets reddened with blood and exhibiting human hairs pasted to the butt-ends of their guns. Since that time, the Government had filled him with feelings of rage as the very incarnation of injustice. He frequently confused the assassins with the gendarmes; and in his eyes a police-spy was just as bad as a parricide. All the evil scattered over the earth he ingenuously attributed to Power; and he hated it with a deep-rooted, undying hatred that held possession of his heart and made his sensibility all the more acute. He had been dazzled by Sénecal's declamations. It was of little consequence whether he happened to be guilty or not, or whether the attempt with which he was charged could be characterised as an odious proceeding! Since he was the victim of Authority, it was only right to help him.

"The Peers will condemn him, certainly! Then he will be conveyed in a prison-van, like a convict, and will be shut up in Mont Saint-Michel, where the Government lets people die! Austen had gone mad! Steuben had killed himself! In order to transfer Barbès into a dungeon, they had dragged him by the legs and by the hair. They trampled on his body, and his head rebounded along the staircase at every step they took. What abominable treatment! The wretches!"

He was choking with angry sobs, and he walked about the apartment in a very excited frame of mind.

"In the meantime, something must be done! Come, for my part, I don't know what to do! Suppose we tried to rescue him, eh? While they are bringing him to the Luxembourg, we could throw ourselves on the escort in the passage! A dozen resolute men — that sometimes is enough to accomplish it!"

There was so much fire in his eyes that Frederick was a little startled by his look. He recalled to mind Sénécals sufferings and his austere life. Without feeling the same enthusiasm about him as Dussardier, he experienced nevertheless that admiration which is inspired by every man who sacrifices himself for an idea. He said to himself that, if he had helped this man, he would not be in his present position; and the two friends anxiously sought to devise some contrivance whereby they could set him free.

It was impossible for them to get access to him.

Frederick examined the newspapers to try to find out what had become of him, and for three weeks he was a constant visitor at the reading-rooms.

One day several numbers of the Flambard fell into his hands. The leading article was invariably devoted to cutting up some distinguished man. After that came some society gossip and some scandals. Then there were some chaffing observations about the Odéon Carpentras, pisciculture, and prisoners under sentence of death, when there happened to be any. The disappearance of a packet-boat furnished materials for a whole year's jokes. In the third column a picture-cavasser, under the form of anecdotes or advice, gave some tailors' announcements, together with accounts of evening parties, advertisements as to auctions, and analysis of artistic productions, writing in the same strain about a volume of verse and a pair of boots. The only serious portion of it was the criticism of the small theatres, in which fierce attacks were made on two or three managers; and the interests of art were invoked on the subjects of the decorations of the Rope-dancers' Gymnasium and of the actress who played the part of the heroine at the Délassements.

Frederick was passing over all these items when his eyes alighted on an article entitled "A Lass between three Lads." It was the story of his duel related in a lively Gallic style. He had no difficulty in recognising himself, for he was indicated by this little joke, which frequently recurred: "A young man from the College of Sens who has no sense." He was even represented as a poor devil from the provinces, an obscure booby trying to rub against persons of high rank. As for the Vicomte, he was made to play a fascinating part, first by having forced his way into the supper-room, then by having carried off the lady, and, finally, by having behaved all through like a perfect gentleman.

Frederick's courage was not denied exactly, but it was pointed out that an intermediary — the protector himself — had come on the scene just in the nick of time. The entire article concluded with this phrase, pregnant perhaps with sinister meaning:

"What is the cause of their affection? A problem! and, as Bazile says, who the deuce is it that is deceived here?"

This was, beyond all doubt, Hussonnet's revenge against Frederick for having refused him five thousand francs.

What was he to do? If he demanded an explanation from him, the Bohemian would protest that he was innocent, and nothing would be gained by doing this. The best course was to swallow the affront in silence. Nobody, after all, read the Flambard.

As he left the reading-room, he saw some people standing in front of a picture-dealer's shop. They were staring at the portrait of a woman, with this fine traced underneath in black letters:

"Mademoiselle Rosanette Bron, belonging to M. Frederick Moreau of Nogent."

It was indeed she — or, at least, like her — her full face displayed, her bosom uncovered, with her hair hanging loose, and with a purse of red velvet in her hands, while behind her a peacock leaned his beak over her shoulder, covering the wall with his immense plumage in the shape of a fan.

Pellerin had got up this exhibition in order to compel Frederick to pay, persuaded that he was a celebrity, and that all Paris, roused to take his part, would be interested in this wretched piece of work.

Was this a conspiracy? Had the painter and the journalist prepared their attack on him at the same time?

His duel had not put a stop to anything. He had become an object of ridicule, and everyone had been laughing at him.

Three days afterwards, at the end of June, the Northern shares having had a rise of fifteen francs, as he had bought two thousand of them within the past month, he found that he had made thirty thousand francs by them. This caress of fortune gave him renewed self-confidence. He said to himself that he wanted nobody's help, and that all his embarrassments were the result of his timidity and indecision. He ought to have begun his intrigue with the Maréchale with brutal directness and refused Hussonnet the very first day. He should not have compromised himself with Pellerin. And, in order to show that he was not a bit embarrassed, he presented himself at one of Madame Dambreuse's ordinary evening parties.

In the middle of the anteroom, Martinon, who had arrived at the same time as he had, turned round:

"What! so you are visiting here?" with a look of surprise, and as if displeased at seeing him.

"Why not?"

And, while asking himself what could be the cause of such a display of hostility on Martinon's part, Frederick made his way into the drawing-room.

The light was dim, in spite of the lamps placed in the corners, for the three windows, which were wide open, made three large squares of black shadow stand parallel with each other. Under the pictures, flower-stands occupied, at a man's height, the spaces on the walls, and a silver teapot with a samovar cast their reflections in a mirror on the background. There arose a murmur of hushed voices. Pumps could be heard creaking on the carpet. He could distinguish a number of black coats, then a round table lighted up by a large shaded lamp, seven or eight ladies in summer toilets, and at some little distance Madame Dambreuse in a rocking armchair. Her dress of lilac taffeta had slashed sleeves, from which fell muslin puffs, the charming tint of the material harmonising with the shade of her hair; and she sat slightly thrown back with the tip of her foot on a cushion, with the repose of an exquisitely delicate work of art, a flower of high culture.

M. Dambreuse and an old gentleman with a white head were walking from one end of the drawing-room to the other. Some of the guests chatted here and there, sitting on the edges of little sofas, while the others, standing up, formed a circle in the centre of the apartment.

They were talking about votes, amendments, counter-amendments, M. Grandin's speech, and M. Benoist's reply. The third party had decidedly gone too far. The Left Centre ought to have had a better recollection of its origin. Serious attacks had been made on the ministry. It must be reassuring, however, to see that it had no successor. In short, the situation was completely analogous to that of 1834.

As these things bored Frederick, he drew near the ladies. Martinon was beside them, standing up, with his hat under his arm, showing himself in three-quarter profile, and looking so neat that he resembled a piece of Sèvres porcelain. He took up a copy of the Revue des Deux Mondes which was lying on the table between an Imitation and an Almanach de Gotha, and spoke of a distinguished poet in a contemptuous tone, said he was going to the "conferences of Saint-Francis," complained of his larynx, swallowed from time to time a pellet of gummatum, and in the meantime kept talking about music, and played the part of the elegant trifler. Mademoiselle Cécile, M. Dambreuse's niece, who happened to be embroidering a pair of ruffles, gazed at him with her pale blue eyes; and Miss John, the governess, who had a flat nose, laid aside her tapestry on his account. Both of them appeared to be exclaiming internally:

"How handsome he is!"

Madame Dambreuse turned round towards him.

"Please give me my fan which is on that pier-table over there. You are taking the wrong one! 'tis the other!"

She arose, and when he came across to her, they met in the middle of the drawing-room face to face. She addressed a few sharp words to him, no doubt of a reproachful character, judging by the haughty expression of her face. Martinon tried to smile; then he went to join the circle in which grave men were holding discussions. Madame Dambreuse resumed her seat, and, bending over the arm of her chair, said to Frederick:

"I saw somebody the day before yesterday who was speaking to me about you — Monsieur de Cisy. You know him, don't you?"

"Yes, slightly."

Suddenly Madame Dambreuse uttered an exclamation:

"Oh! Duchesse, what a pleasure to see you!"

And she advanced towards the door to meet a little old lady in a Carmelite taffeta gown and a cap of guipure with long borders. The daughter of a companion in exile of the Comte d'Artois, and the widow of a marshal of the Empire; who had been created a peer of France in 1830, she adhered to the court of a former generation as well as to the new court, and possessed sufficient influence to procure many things. Those who stood talking stepped aside, and then resumed their conversation.

It had now turned on pauperism, of which, according to these gentlemen, all the descriptions that had been given were grossly exaggerated.

"However," urged Martinon, "let us confess that there is such a thing as want! But the remedy depends neither on science nor on power. It is purely an individual question. When the lower classes are willing to get rid of their vices, they will free themselves from their necessities. Let the people be more moral, and they will be less poor!"

According to M. Dambreuse, no good could be attained without a superabundance of capital. Therefore, the only practicable method was to intrust, "as the Saint-Simonians, however, proposed (good heavens! there was some merit in their views — let us be just to everybody) — to intrust, I say, the cause of progress to those who can increase the public wealth." Imperceptibly they began to touch on great industrial undertakings — the railways, the coal-mines. And M. Dambreuse, addressing Frederick, said to him in a low whisper:

"You have not called about that business of ours?"

Frederick pleaded illness; but, feeling that this excuse was too absurd:

"Besides, I need my ready money."

"Is it to buy a carriage?" asked Madame Dambreuse, who was brushing past him with a cup of tea in her hand, and for a minute she watched his face with her head bent slightly over her shoulder.

She believed that he was Rosanette's lover — the allusion was obvious. It seemed even to Frederick that all the ladies were staring at him from a distance and whispering to one another.

In order to get a better idea as to what they were thinking about, he once more approached them. On the opposite side of the table, Martinon, seated near Mademoiselle Cécile, was turning over the leaves of an album. It contained lithographs representing Spanish costumes. He read the descriptive titles aloud: "A Lady of Seville," "A Valencia Gardener," "An Andalusian Picador"; and once, when he had reached the bottom of the page, he continued all in one breath:

"Jacques Arnoux, publisher. One of your friends, eh?"

"That is true," said Frederick, hurt by the tone he had assumed.

Madame Dambreuse again interposed:

"In fact, you came here one morning — about a house, I believe — a house belonging to his wife." (This meant: "She is your mistress.")

He reddened up to his ears; and M. Dambreuse, who joined them at the same moment, made this additional remark:

"You appear even to be deeply interested in them."

These last words had the effect of putting Frederick out of countenance. His confusion, which, he could not help feeling, was evident to them, was on the point of confirming their suspicions, when M. Dambreuse drew close to him, and, in a tone of great seriousness, said:

"I suppose you don't do business together?"

He protested by repeated shakes of the head, without realising the exact meaning of the capitalist, who wished to give him advice.

He felt a desire to leave. The fear of appearing faint-hearted restrained him. A servant carried away the teacups. Madame Dambreuse was talking to a diplomatist in a blue coat. Two young girls, drawing their foreheads close together, showed each other their jewellery. The others, seated in a semicircle on armchairs, kept gently moving their white faces crowned with black or fair hair. Nobody, in fact, minded them. Frederick turned on his heels; and, by a succession of long zigzags, he had almost reached the door, when, passing close to a bracket, he remarked, on the top of it, between a china vase and the wainscoting, a journal folded up in two. He drew it out a little, and read these words — The Flambar.

Who had brought it there? Cisy. Manifestly no one else. What did it matter, however? They would believe — already, perhaps, everyone believed — in the article. What was the cause of this rancour? He wrapped himself up in ironical silence. He felt like one lost in a desert. But suddenly he heard Martinon's voice:

"Talking of Arnoux, I saw in the newspapers, amongst the names of those accused of preparing incendiary bombs, that of one of his employés, Sénécal. Is that our Sénécal?"

"The very same!"

Martinon repeated several times in a very loud tone:

"What? our Sénécal! our Sénécal!"

Then questions were asked him about the conspiracy. It was assumed that his connection with the prosecutor's office ought to furnish him with some information on the subject.

He declared that he had none. However, he knew very little about this individual, having seen him only two or three times. He positively regarded him as a very ill-conditioned fellow. Frederick exclaimed indignantly:

"Not at all! he is a very honest fellow."

"All the same, Monsieur," said a landowner, "no conspirator can be an honest man."

Most of the men assembled there had served at least four governments; and they would have sold France or the human race in order to preserve their own incomes, to save themselves from any discomfort or embarrassment, or even through sheer baseness, through worship of force. They all maintained that political crimes were inexcusable. It would be more desirable to pardon those which were provoked by want. And they did not fail to put forward the eternal illustration of the father of a family stealing the eternal loaf of bread from the eternal baker.

A gentleman occupying an administrative office even went so far as to exclaim:

"For my part, Monsieur, if I were told that my brother were a conspirator I would denounce him!"

Frederick invoked the right of resistance, and recalling to mind some phrases that Deslauriers had used in their conversations, he referred to Delosmes, Blackstone, the English Bill of Rights, and Article 2 of the Constitution of '91. It was even by virtue of this law that the fall of Napoléon had been proclaimed. It had been recognised in 1830, and inscribed at the head of the Charter. Besides, when the sovereign fails to fulfil the contract, justice requires that he should be overthrown.

"Why, this is abominable!" exclaimed a prefect's wife.

All the rest remained silent, filled with vague terror, as if they had heard the noise of bullets. Madame Dambreuse rocked herself in her chair, and smiled as she listened to him.

A manufacturer, who had formerly been a member of the Carbonari, tried to show that the Orléans family possessed good qualities. No doubt there were some abuses.

"Well, what then?"

"But we should not talk about them, my dear Monsieur! If you knew how all these clamourings of the Opposition injure business!"

"What do I care about business?" said Frederick.

He was exasperated by the rottenness of these old men; and, carried away by the recklessness which sometimes takes possession of even the most timid, he attacked the financiers, the deputies, the government, the king, took up the defence of the Arabs, and gave vent to a great deal of abusive language. A few of those around him encouraged him in a spirit of irony:

"Go on, pray! continue!" whilst others muttered: "The deuce! what enthusiasm!" At last he thought the right thing to do was to retire; and, as he was going away, M. Dambreuse said to him, alluding to the post of secretary:

"No definite arrangement has been yet arrived at; but make haste!"

And Madame Dambreuse:

"You'll call again soon, will you not?"

Frederick considered their parting salutation a last mockery. He had resolved never to come back to this house, or to visit any of these people again. He imagined that he had offended them, not realising what vast funds of indifference society possesses. These women especially excited his indignation. Not a single one of them had backed him up even with a look of sympathy. He felt angry with them for not having been moved by his words. As for Madame Dambreuse, he found in her something at the same time languid and cold, which prevented him from defining her character by a formula. Had she a lover? and, if so, who was her lover? Was it the diplomatist or some other? Perhaps it was Martinon? Impossible! Nevertheless, he experienced a sort of jealousy against Martinon, and an unaccountable ill-will against her.

Dussardier, having called this evening as usual, was awaiting him.

Frederick's heart was swelling with bitterness; he unburdened it, and his grievances, though vague and hard to understand, saddened the honest shop-assistant. He even complained of his isolation. Dussardier, after a little hesitation, suggested that they ought to call on Deslauriers.

Frederick, at the mention of the advocate's name, was seized with a longing to see him once more. He was now living in the midst of profound intellectual solitude, and found Dussardier's company quite insufficient. In reply to the latter's question, Frederick told him to arrange matters any way he liked.

Deslauriers had likewise, since their quarrel, felt a void in his life. He yielded without much reluctance to the cordial advances which were made to him. The pair embraced each other, then began chatting about matters of no consequence.

Frederick's heart was touched by Deslauriers' display of reserve, and in order to make him a sort of reparation, he told the other next day how he had lost the fifteen thousand francs without mentioning that these fifteen thousand francs had been originally intended for him. The advocate, nevertheless, had a shrewd suspicion of the truth; and this misadventure, which justified, in his own mind, his prejudices against Arnoux, entirely disarmed his rancour; and he did not again refer to the promise made by his friend on a former occasion.

Frederick, misled by his silence, thought he had forgotten all about it. A few days afterwards, he asked Deslauriers whether there was any way in which he could get back his money.

They might raise the point that the prior mortgage was fraudulent, and might take proceedings against the wife personally.

"No! no! not against her!" exclaimed Frederick, and, yielding to the ex-law-clerk's questions, he confessed the truth. Deslauriers was convinced that Frederick had not told him the entire truth, no doubt through a feeling of delicacy. He was hurt by this want of confidence.

They were, however, on the same intimate terms as before, and they even found so much pleasure in each other's society that Dussardier's presence was an obstacle to their free intercourse. Under the pretence that they had appointments, they managed gradually to get rid of him.

There are some men whose only mission amongst their fellow-men is to serve as go-betweens; people use them in the same way as if they were bridges, by stepping over them and going on further.

Frederick concealed nothing from his old friend. He told him about the coal-mine speculation and M. Dambreuse's proposal. The advocate grew thoughtful.

"That's queer! For such a post a man with a good knowledge of law would be required!"

"But you could assist me," returned Frederick.

"Yes! — hold on! faith, yes! certainly."

During the same week Frederick showed Dussardier a letter from his mother.

Madame Moreau accused herself of having misjudged M. Roque, who had given a satisfactory explanation of his conduct. Then she spoke of his means, and of the possibility, later, of a marriage with Louise.

"That would not be a bad match," said Deslauriers.

Frederick said it was entirely out of the question. Besides, Père Roque was an old trickster. That in no way affected the matter, in the advocate's opinion.

At the end of July, an unaccountable diminution in value made the Northern shares fall. Frederick had not sold his. He lost sixty thousand francs in one day. His income was considerably reduced. He would have to curtail his expenditure, or take up some calling, or make a brilliant catch in the matrimonial market.

Then Deslauriers spoke to him about Mademoiselle Roque. There was nothing to prevent him from going to get some idea of things by seeing for himself. Frederick was rather tired of city life. Provincial existence and the maternal roof would be a sort of recreation for him.

The aspect of the streets of Nogent, as he passed through them in the moonlight, brought back old memories to his mind; and he experienced a kind of pang, like persons who have just returned home after a long period of travel.

At his mother's house, all the country visitors had assembled as in former days — MM. Gamblin, Heudras, and Chambrion, the Lebrun family, "those young ladies, the Augers," and, in addition, Père Roque, and, sitting opposite to Madame Moreau at a card-table, Mademoiselle Louise. She was now a woman. She sprang to her feet with a cry of delight. They were all in a flutter of excitement. She remained standing motionless, and the paleness of her face was intensified by the light issuing from four silver candlesticks.

When she resumed play, her hand was trembling. This emotion was exceedingly flattering to Frederick, whose pride had been sorely wounded of late. He said to himself: "You, at any rate, will love me!" and, as if he were thus taking his revenge for the humiliations he had endured in the capital, he began to affect the Parisian lion, retailed all the theatrical gossip, told anecdotes as to the doings of society, which he had borrowed from the columns of the cheap newspapers, and, in short, dazzled his fellow-townpeople.

Next morning, Madame Moreau expatiated on Louise's fine qualities; then she enumerated the woods and farms of which she would be the owner. Père Roque's wealth was considerable.

He had acquired it while making investments for M. Dambreuse; for he had lent money to persons who were able to give good security in the shape of mortgages, whereby he was enabled to demand additional sums or commissions. The capital, owing to his energetic vigilance, was in no danger of being lost. Besides, Père Roque never had any hesitation in making a seizure. Then he bought up the mortgaged property at a low price, and M. Dambreuse, having got back his money, found his affairs in very good order.

But this manipulation of business matters in a way which was not strictly legal compromised him with his agent. He could refuse Père Roque nothing, and it was owing to the latter's solicitations that M. Dambreuse had received Frederick so cordially.

The truth was that in the depths of his soul Père Roque cherished a deep-rooted ambition. He wished his daughter to be a countess; and for the purpose of gaining this object, without imperilling the happiness of his child, he knew no other young man so well adapted as Frederick.

Through the influence of M. Dambreuse, he could obtain the title of his maternal grandfather, Madame Moreau being the daughter of a Comte de Fouvens, and besides being connected with the oldest families in Champagne, the Lavernades and the D'Etrignys. As for the Moreaus, a Gothic inscription near the mills of Villeneuve-l'Archevêque referred to one Jacob Moreau, who had rebuilt them in 1596; and the tomb of his own son, Pierre Moreau, first esquire of the king under Louis XIV., was to be seen in the chapel of Saint-Nicholas.

So much family distinction fascinated M. Roque, the son of an old servant. If the coronet of a count did not come, he would console himself with something else; for Frederick might get a deputyship when M. Dambreuse had been raised to the peerage, and might then be able to assist him in his commercial pursuits, and to obtain for him supplies and grants. He liked the young man personally. In short, he desired to have Frederick for a son-in-law, because for a long time past he had been smitten with this notion, which only grew all the stronger day by day. Now he went to religious services, and he had won Madame Moreau over to his views, especially by holding before her the prospect of a title.

So it was that, eight days later, without any formal engagement, Frederick was regarded as Mademoiselle Roque's "intended," and Père Roque, who was not troubled with many scruples, often left them together.

CHAPTER XII.

Little Louise Grows Up.

Deslauriers had carried away from Frederick's house the copy of the deed of subrogation, with a power of attorney in proper form, giving him full authority to act; but, when he had reascended his own five flights of stairs and found himself alone in the midst of his dismal room, in his armchair upholstered in sheep-leather, the sight of the stamped paper disgusted him.

He was tired of these things, and of restaurants at thirty-two sous, of travelling in omnibuses, of enduring want and making futile efforts. He took up the papers again; there were others near them. They were prospectuses of the coal-mining company, with a list of the mines and the particulars as to their contents, Frederick having left all these matters in his hands in order to have his opinion about them.

An idea occurred to him — that of presenting himself at M. Dambreuse's house and applying for the post of secretary. This post, it was perfectly certain, could not be obtained without purchasing a certain number of shares. He recognised the folly of his project, and said to himself:

"Oh! no, that would be a wrong step."

Then he ransacked his brains to think of the best way in which he could set about recovering the fifteen thousand francs. Such a sum was a mere trifle to Frederick. But, if he had it, what a lever it would be in his hands! And the ex-law-clerk was indignant at the other being so well off.

"He makes a pitiful use of it. He is a selfish fellow. Ah! what do I care for his fifteen thousand francs!"

Why had he lent the money? For the sake of Madame Arnoux's bright eyes. She was his mistress! Deslauriers had no doubt about it. "There was another way in which money was useful!"

And he was assailed by malignant thoughts.

Then he allowed his thoughts to dwell even on Frederick's personal appearance. It had always exercised over him an almost feminine charm; and he soon came to admire it for a success which he realised that he was himself incapable of achieving.

"Nevertheless, was not the will the main element in every enterprise? and, since by its means we may triumph over everything — —"

"Ha! that would be funny!"

But he felt ashamed of such treachery, and the next moment:

"Pooh! I am afraid?"

Madame Arnoux — from having heard her spoken about so often — had come to be depicted in his imagination as something extraordinary. The persistency of this passion had irritated him like a problem. Her austerity, which seemed a little theatrical, now annoyed him. Besides, the woman of the world — or, rather, his own conception of her — dazzled the advocate as a symbol and the epitome of a thousand pleasures. Poor though he was, he hankered after luxury in its more glittering form.

"After all, even though he should get angry, so much the worse! He has behaved too badly to me to call for any anxiety about him on my part! I have no assurance that she is his mistress! He has denied it. So then I am free to act as I please!"

He could no longer abandon the desire of taking this step. He wished to make a trial of his own strength, so that one day, all of a sudden, he polished his boots himself, bought white gloves, and set forth on his way, substituting himself for Frederick, and almost imagining that he was the other by a singular intellectual evolution, in which there was, at the same time, vengeance and sympathy, imitation and audacity.

He announced himself as "Doctor Deslauriers."

Madame Arnoux was surprised, as she had not sent for any physician.

"Ha! a thousand apologies! — 'tis a doctor of law! I have come in Monsieur Moreau's interest."

This name appeared to produce a disquieting effect on her mind.

"So much the better!" thought the ex-law-clerk.

"Since she has a liking for him, she will like me, too!" buoying up his courage with the accepted idea that it is easier to supplant a lover than a husband.

He referred to the fact that he had the pleasure of meeting her on one occasion at the law-courts; he even mentioned the date. This remarkable power of memory astonished Madame Arnoux. He went on in a tone of mild affectation:

"You have already found your affairs a little embarrassing?"

She made no reply.

"Then it must be true."

He began to chat about one thing or another, about her house, about the works; then, noticing some medallions at the sides of the mirror:

"Ha! family portraits, no doubt?"

He remarked that of an old lady, Madame Arnoux's mother.

"She has the appearance of an excellent woman, a southern type."

And, on being met with the objection that she was from Chartres:

"Chartres! pretty town!"

He praised its cathedral and public buildings, and coming back to the portrait, traced resemblances between it and Madame Arnoux, and cast flatteries at her indirectly. She did not appear to be offended at this. He took confidence, and said that he had known Arnoux a long time.

"He is a fine fellow, but one who compromises himself. Take this mortgage, for example — one can't imagine such a reckless act — —"

"Yes, I know," said she, shrugging her shoulders.

This involuntary evidence of contempt induced Deslauriers to continue. "That kaolin business of his was near turning out very badly, a thing you may not be aware of, and even his reputation — —"

A contraction of the brows made him pause.

Then, falling back on generalities, he expressed his pity for the "poor women whose husbands frittered away their means."

"But in this case, monsieur, the means belong to him. As for me, I have nothing!"

No matter, one never knows. A woman of experience might be useful. He made offers of devotion, exalted his own merits; and he looked into her face through his shining spectacles.

She was seized with a vague torpor; but suddenly said:

"Let us look into the matter, I beg of you."

He exhibited the bundle of papers.

"This is Frederick's letter of attorney. With such a document in the hands of a process-server, who would make out an order, nothing could be easier; in twenty-four hours — — " (She remained impassive; he changed his manoeuvre.)

"As for me, however, I don't understand what impels him to demand this sum, for, in fact, he doesn't want it."

"How is that? Monsieur Moreau has shown himself so kind."

"Oh! granted!"

And Deslauriers began by eulogising him, then in a mild fashion disparaged him, giving it out that he was a forgetful individual, and over-fond of money.

"I thought he was your friend, monsieur?"

"That does not prevent me from seeing his defects. Thus, he showed very little recognition of — how shall I put it? — the sympathy — — "

Madame Arnoux was turning over the leaves of a large manuscript book.

She interrupted him in order to get him to explain a certain word.

He bent over her shoulder, and his face came so close to hers that he grazed her cheek. She blushed. This heightened colour inflamed Deslauriers, he hungrily kissed her head.

"What are you doing, Monsieur?" And, standing up against the wall, she compelled him to remain perfectly quiet under the glance of her large blue eyes glowing with anger.

"Listen to me! I love you!"

She broke into a laugh, a shrill, discouraging laugh. Deslauriers felt himself suffocating with anger. He restrained his feelings, and, with the look of a vanquished person imploring mercy:

"Ha! you are wrong! As for me, I would not go like him."

"Of whom, pray, are you talking?"

"Of Frederick."

"Ah! Monsieur Moreau troubles me little. I told you that!"

"Oh! forgive me! forgive me!" Then, drawling his words, in a sarcastic tone:

"I even imagined that you were sufficiently interested in him personally to learn with pleasure — — "

She became quite pale. The ex-law-clerk added:

"He is going to be married."

"He!"

"In a month at latest, to Mademoiselle Roque, the daughter of M. Dambreuse's agent. He has even gone down to Nogent for no other purpose but that."

She placed her hand over her heart, as if at the shock of a great blow; but immediately she rang the bell. Deslauriers did not wait to be ordered to leave. When she turned round he had disappeared.

Madame Arnoux was gasping a little with the strain of her emotions. She drew near the window to get a breath of air.

On the other side of the street, on the footpath, a packer in his shirt-sleeves was nailing down a trunk. Hackney-coaches passed. She closed the window-blinds and then came and sat down. As the high houses in the vicinity intercepted the sun's rays, the light of day stole coldly into the apartment. Her children had gone out; there was not a stir around her. It seemed as if she were utterly deserted.

"He is going to be married! Is it possible?"

And she was seized with a fit of nervous trembling.

"Why is this? Does it mean that I love him?"

Then all of a sudden:

"Why, yes; I love him — I love him!"

It seemed to her as if she were sinking into endless depths. The clock struck three. She listened to the vibrations of the sounds as they died away. And she remained on the edge of the armchair, with her eyeballs fixed and an unchanging smile on her face.

The same afternoon, at the same moment, Frederick and Mademoiselle Louise were walking in the garden belonging to M. Roque at the end of the island.

Old Catherine was watching them, some distance away. They were walking side by side and Frederick said:

"You remember when I brought you into the country?"

"How good you were to me!" she replied. "You assisted me in making sand-pies, in filling my watering-pot, and in rocking me in the swing!"

"All your dolls, who had the names of queens and marchionesses — what has become of them?"

"Really, I don't know!"

"And your pug Moricaud?"

"He's drowned, poor darling!"

"And the Don Quixote of which we coloured the engravings together?"

"I have it still!"

He recalled to her mind the day of her first communion, and how pretty she had been at vespers, with her white veil and her large wax-taper, whilst the girls were all taking their places in a row around the choir, and the bell was tinkling.

These memories, no doubt, had little charm for Mademoiselle Roque. She had not a word to say; and, a minute later:

"Naughty fellow! never to have written a line to me, even once!"

Frederick urged by way of excuse his numerous occupations.

"What, then, are you doing?"

He was embarrassed by the question; then he told her that he was studying politics.

"Ha!"

And without questioning him further:

"That gives you occupation; while as for me — — !"

Then she spoke to him about the barrenness of her existence, as there was nobody she could go to see, and nothing to amuse her or distract her thoughts. She wished to go on horseback.

"The vicar maintains that this is improper for a young lady! How stupid these proprieties are! Long ago they allowed me to do whatever I pleased; now, they won't let me do anything!"

"Your father, however, is fond of you!"

"Yes; but — — "

She heaved a sigh, which meant: "That is not enough to make me happy."

Then there was silence. They heard only the noise made by their boots in the sand, together with the murmur of falling water; for the Seine, above Nogent, is cut into two arms. That which turns the mills discharges in this place the superabundance of its waves in order to unite further down with the natural course of the stream; and a person coming from the bridge could see at the right, on the other bank of the river, a grassy slope on which a white house looked down. At the left, in the meadow, a row of poplar-trees extended, and the horizon in front was bounded by a curve of the river. It was flat, like a mirror.

Large insects hovered over the noiseless water. Tufts of reeds and rushes bordered it unevenly; all kinds of plants which happened to spring up there bloomed out in buttercups, caused yellow clusters to hang down, raised trees in distaff-shape with amaranth-blossoms, and made green rockets spring up at random. In an inlet of the river white water-lilies displayed themselves; and a row of ancient willows, in which wolf-traps were hidden, formed, on that side of the island, the sole protection of the garden.

In the interior, on this side, four walls with a slate coping enclosed the kitchen-garden, in which the square patches, recently dug up, looked like brown plates. The bell-glasses of the melons shone in a row on the narrow hotbed. The artichokes, the kidney-beans, the spinach, the carrots and the tomatoes succeeded each other till one reached a background where asparagus grew in such a fashion that it resembled a little wood of feathers.

All this piece of land had been under the Directory what is called "a folly." The trees had, since then, grown enormously. Clematis obstructed the hornbeams, the walks were covered with moss, brambles abounded on every side. Fragments of statues let their plaster crumble in the grass. The feet of anyone walking through the place got entangled in iron-wire work. There now remained of the pavilion only two apartments on the ground floor, with some blue paper hanging in shreds. Before the façade extended an arbour in the Italian style, in which a vine-tree was supported on columns of brick by a rail-work of sticks.

Soon they arrived at this spot; and, as the light fell through the irregular gaps on the green herbage, Frederick, turning his head on one side to speak to Louise, noticed the shadow of the leaves on her face.

She had in her red hair, stuck in her chignon, a needle, terminated by a glass bell in imitation of emerald, and, in spite of her mourning, she wore (so artless was her bad taste) straw slippers trimmed with pink satin — a vulgar curiosity probably bought at some fair.

He remarked this, and ironically congratulated her.

"Don't be laughing at me!" she replied.

Then surveying him altogether, from his grey felt hat to his silk stockings:

"What an exquisite you are!"

After this, she asked him to mention some works which she could read. He gave her the names of several; and she said:

"Oh! how learned you are!"

While yet very small, she had been smitten with one of those childish passions which have, at the same time, the purity of a religion and the violence of a natural instinct. He had been her comrade, her brother, her master, had diverted her mind, made her heart beat more quickly, and, without any desire for such a result, had poured out into the very depths of her being a latent and continuous intoxication. Then he had parted with her at the moment of a tragic crisis in her existence, when her mother had only just died, and these two separations had been mingled together. Absence had idealised him in her memory. He had come back with a sort of halo round his head; and she gave herself up ingenuously to the feelings of bliss she experienced at seeing him once more.

For the first time in his life Frederick felt himself beloved; and this new pleasure, which did not transcend the ordinary run of agreeable sensations, made his breast swell with so much emotion that he spread out his two arms while he flung back his head.

A large cloud passed across the sky.

"It is going towards Paris," said Louise. "You'd like to follow it — wouldn't you?"

"I! Why?"

"Who knows?"

And surveying him with a sharp look:

"Perhaps you have there" (she searched her mind for the appropriate phrase) "something to engage your affections."

"Oh! I have nothing to engage my affections there."

"Are you perfectly certain?"

"Why, yes, Mademoiselle, perfectly certain!"

In less than a year there had taken place in the young girl an extraordinary transformation, which astonished Frederick. After a minute's silence he added:

"We ought to 'thee' and 'thou' each other, as we used to do long ago — shall we do so?"

"No."

"Why?"

"Because — — "

He persisted. She answered, with downcast face:

"I dare not!"

They had reached the end of the garden, which was close to the shell-bank. Frederick, in a spirit of boyish fun, began to send pebbles skimming over the water. She bade him sit down. He obeyed; then, looking at the waterfall:

"'Tis like Niagara!" He began talking about distant countries and long voyages. The idea of making some herself exercised a fascination over her mind. She would not have been afraid either of tempests or of lions.

Seated close beside each other, they collected in front of them handfuls of sand, then, while they were chatting, they let it slip through their fingers, and the hot wind, which rose from the plains, carried to them in puffs odours of lavender, together with the smell of tar escaping from a boat behind the lock. The sun's rays fell on the cascade. The greenish blocks of stone in the little wall over which the water slipped looked as if they were covered with a silver gauze that was perpetually rolling itself out. A long strip of foam gushed forth at the foot with a harmonious murmur. Then it bubbled up, forming whirlpools and a thousand opposing currents, which ended by intermingling in a single limpid stream of water.

Louise said in a musing tone that she envied the existence of fishes:

"It must be so delightful to tumble about down there at your ease, and to feel yourself caressed on every side."

She shivered with sensuously enticing movements; but a voice exclaimed:

"Where are you?"

"Your maid is calling you," said Frederick.

"All right! all right!" Louise did not disturb herself.

"She will be angry," he suggested.

"It is all the same to me! and besides — — " Mademoiselle Roque gave him to understand by a gesture that the girl was entirely subject to her will.

She arose, however, and then complained of a headache. And, as they were passing in front of a large cart-shed containing some faggots:

"Suppose we sat down there, under shelter?"

He pretended not to understand this dialectic expression, and even teased her about her accent. Gradually the corners of her mouth were compressed, she bit her lips; she stepped aside in order to sulk.

Frederick came over to her, swore he did not mean to annoy her, and that he was very fond of her.

"Is that true?" she exclaimed, looking at him with a smile which lighted up her entire face, smeared over a little with patches of bran.

He could not resist the sentiment of gallantry which was aroused in him by her fresh youthfulness, and he replied:

"Why should I tell you a lie? Have you any doubt about it, eh?" and, as he spoke, he passed his left hand round her waist.

A cry, soft as the cooing of a dove, leaped up from her throat. Her head fell back, she was going to faint, when he held her up. And his virtuous scruples were futile. At the sight of this maiden offering herself to him he was seized with fear. He assisted her to take a few steps slowly. He had ceased to address her in soothing words, and no longer caring to talk of anything save the most trifling subjects, he spoke to her about some of the principal figures in the society of Nogent.

Suddenly she repelled him, and in a bitter tone:

"You would not have the courage to run away with me!"

He remained motionless, with a look of utter amazement in his face. She burst into sobs, and hiding her face in his breast:

"Can I live without you?"

He tried to calm her emotion. She laid her two hands on his shoulders in order to get a better view of his face, and fixing her green eyes on his with an almost fierce tearfulness:

"Will you be my husband?"

"But," Frederick began, casting about in his inner consciousness for a reply. "Of course, I ask for nothing better."

At that moment M. Roque's cap appeared behind a lilac-tree.

He brought his young friend on a trip through the district in order to show off his property; and when Frederick returned, after two days' absence, he found three letters awaiting him at his mother's house.

The first was a note from M. Dambreuse, containing an invitation to dinner for the previous Tuesday. What was the occasion of this politeness? So, then, they had forgiven his prank.

The second was from Rosanette. She thanked him for having risked his life on her behalf. Frederick did not at first understand what she meant; finally, after a considerable amount of circumlocution, while appealing to his friendship, relying on his delicacy, as she put it, and going on her knees to him on account of the pressing necessity of the case, as she wanted bread, she asked him for a loan of five hundred francs. He at once made up his mind to supply her with the amount.

The third letter, which was from Deslauriers, spoke of the letter of attorney, and was long and obscure. The advocate had not yet taken any definite action. He urged his friend not to disturb himself: "'Tis useless for you to come back!" even laying singular stress on this point.

Frederick got lost in conjectures of every sort; and he felt anxious to return to Paris. This assumption of a right to control his conduct excited in him a feeling of revolt.

Moreover, he began to experience that nostalgia of the boulevard; and then, his mother was pressing him so much, M. Roque kept revolving about him so constantly, and Mademoiselle Louise was so much attached to him, that it was no longer possible for him to avoid speedily declaring his intentions.

He wanted to think, and he would be better able to form a right estimate of things at a distance.

In order to assign a motive for his journey, Frederick invented a story; and he left home, telling everyone, and himself believing, that he would soon return.

CHAPTER XIII.

Rosanette as a Lovely Turk.

His return to Paris gave him no pleasure. It was an evening at the close of August. The boulevards seemed empty. The passers-by succeeded each other with scowling faces. Here and there a boiler of asphalt was smoking; several houses had their blinds entirely drawn. He made his way to his own residence in the city. He found the hangings covered with dust; and, while dining all alone, Frederick was seized with a strange feeling of forlornness; then his thoughts reverted to Mademoiselle Roque. The idea of being married no longer appeared to him preposterous. They might travel; they might go to Italy, to the East. And he saw her standing on a hillock, or gazing at a landscape, or else leaning on his arm in a Florentine gallery while she stood to look at the pictures. What a pleasure it would be to him merely to watch this good little creature expanding under the splendours of Art and Nature! When she had got free from the commonplace atmosphere in which she had lived, she would, in a little while, become a charming companion. M. Roque's wealth, moreover, tempted him. And yet he shrank from taking this step, regarding it as a weakness, a degradation.

But he was firmly resolved (whatever he might do) on changing his mode of life — that is to say, to lose his heart no more in fruitless passions; and he even hesitated about executing the commission with which he had been intrusted by Louise. This was to buy for her at Jacques Arnoux's establishment two large-sized statues of many colours representing negroes, like those which were at the Prefecture at Troyes. She knew the manufacturer's number, and would not have any other. Frederick was afraid that, if he went back to their house, he might once again fall a victim to his old passion.

These reflections occupied his mind during the entire evening; and he was just about to go to bed when a woman presented herself.

"'Tis I," said Mademoiselle Vatnaz, with a laugh. "I have come in behalf of Rosanette."

So, then, they were reconciled?

"Good heavens, yes! I am not ill-natured, as you are well aware.

And besides, the poor girl — it would take too long to tell you all about it."

In short, the Maréchale wanted to see him; she was waiting for an answer, her letter having travelled from Paris to Nogent. Mademoiselle Vatnaz did not know what was in it.

Then Frederick asked her how the Maréchale was going on.

He was informed that she was now with a very rich man, a Russian, Prince Tzernoukoff, who had seen her at the races in the Champ de Mars last summer.

"He has three carriages, a saddle-horse, livery servants, a groom got up in the English fashion, a country-house, a box at the Italian opera, and a heap of other things. There you are, my dear friend!"

And the Vatnaz, as if she had profited by this change of fortune, appeared gayer and happier. She took off her gloves and examined the furniture and the objects of virtù in the room. She mentioned their exact prices like a second-hand dealer. He ought to have consulted her in order to get them cheaper. Then she congratulated him on his good taste:

"Ha! this is pretty, exceedingly nice! There's nobody like you for these ideas."

The next moment, as her eyes fell on a door close to the pillar of the alcove:

"That's the way you let your friends out, eh?"

And, in a familiar fashion, she laid her finger on his chin. He trembled at the contact of her long hands, at the same time thin and soft. Round her wrists she wore an edging of lace, and on the body of her green dress lace embroidery, like a hussar. Her bonnet of black tulle, with borders hanging down, concealed her forehead a little. Her eyes shone underneath; an odour of patchouli escaped from her headbands. The carcel-lamp placed on a round table, shining down on her like the footlights of a theatre, made her jaw protrude.

She said to him, in an unctuous tone, while she drew forth from her purse three square slips of paper:

"You will take these from me?"

They were three tickets for Delmar's benefit performance.

"What! for him?"

"Certainly."

Mademoiselle Vatnaz, without giving a further explanation, added that she adored him more than ever. If she were to be believed, the comedian was now definitely classed amongst "the leading celebrities of the age." And it was not such or such a personage that he represented, but the very genius of France, the People. He had "the humanitarian spirit; he understood the priesthood of Art." Frederick, in order to put an end to these eulogies, gave her the money for the three seats.

"You need not say a word about this over the way. How late it is, good heavens! I must leave you. Ah! I was forgetting the address — 'tis the Rue Grange-Batelier, number 14."

And, at the door:

"Good-bye, beloved man!"

"Beloved by whom?" asked Frederick. "What a strange woman!"

And he remembered that Dussardier had said to him one day, when talking about her:

"Oh, she's not much!" as if alluding to stories of a by no means edifying character.

Next morning he repaired to the Maréchale's abode. She lived in a new house, the spring-roller blinds of which projected into the street. At the head of each flight of stairs there was a mirror against the wall; before each window there was a flower-stand, and all over the steps extended a carpet of oil-cloth; and when one got inside the door, the coolness of the staircase was refreshing.

It was a man-servant who came to open the door, a footman in a red waistcoat. On a bench in the anteroom a woman and two men, tradespeople, no doubt, were waiting as if in a minister's vestibule. At the left, the door of the dining-room, slightly ajar, afforded a glimpse of empty bottles on the sideboards, and napkins on the backs of chairs; and parallel with it ran a corridor in which gold-coloured sticks supported an espalier of roses. In the courtyard below, two boys with bare arms were scrubbing a landau. Their voices rose to Frederick's ears, mingled with the intermittent sounds made by a currycomb knocking against a stone.

The man-servant returned. "Madame will receive Monsieur," and he led Frederick through a second anteroom, and then into a large drawing-room hung with yellow brocatel with twisted fringes at the corners which were joined at the ceiling, and which seemed to be continued by flowerings of lustre resembling cables. No doubt there had been an entertainment there the night before. Some cigar-ashes had been allowed to remain on the pier-tables.

At last he found his way into a kind of boudoir with stained-glass windows, through which the sun shed a dim light. Trefoils of carved wood adorned the upper portions of the doors. Behind a balustrade, three purple mattresses formed a divan; and the stem of a narghileh made of platinum lay on top of it. Instead of a mirror, there was on the mantelpiece a pyramid-shaped whatnot, displaying on its shelves an entire collection of curiosities, old silver trumpets, Bohemian horns, jewelled clasps, jade studs, enamels, grotesque figures in china, and a little Byzantine virgin with a vermilion ape; and all this was mingled in a golden twilight with the bluish shade of the carpet, the mother-of-pearl reflections of the foot-stools, and the tawny hue of the walls covered with maroon leather. In the corners, on little pedestals, there were bronze vases containing clusters of flowers, which made the atmosphere heavy.

Rosanette presented herself, attired in a pink satin vest with white cashmere trousers, a necklace of piasters, and a red cap encircled with a branch of jasmine.

Frederick started back in surprise, then said he had brought the thing she had been speaking about, and he handed her the bank-note. She gazed at him in astonishment; and, as he still kept the note in his hand, without knowing where to put it:

"Pray take it!"

She seized it; then, as she flung it on the divan:

"You are very kind."

She wanted it to meet the rent of a piece of ground at Bellevue, which she paid in this way every year. Her unceremoniousness wounded Frederick's sensibility. However, so much the better! this would avenge him for the past.

"Sit down," said she. "There — closer." And in a grave tone: "In the first place, I have to thank you, my dear friend, for having risked your life."

"Oh! that's nothing!"

"What! Why, 'tis a very noble act!" — and the Maréchale exhibited an embarrassing sense of gratitude; for it must have been impressed upon her mind that the duel was entirely on account of Arnoux, as the latter, who believed it himself, was not likely to have resisted the temptation of telling her so.

"She is laughing at me, perhaps," thought Frederick.

He had nothing further to detain him, and, pleading that he had an appointment, he rose.

"Oh! no, stay!"

He resumed his seat, and presently complimented her on her costume.

She replied, with an air of dejection:

"'Tis the Prince who likes me to dress in this fashion! And one must smoke such machines as that, too!" Rosanette added, pointing towards the narghileh. "Suppose we try the taste of it? Have you any objection?"

She procured a light, and, finding it hard to set fire to the tobacco, she began to stamp impatiently with her foot. Then a feeling of languor took possession of her; and she remained motionless on the divan, with a cushion under her arm and her body twisted a little on one side, one knee bent and the other leg straight out.

The long serpent of red morocco, which formed rings on the floor, rolled itself over her arm. She rested the amber mouthpiece on her lips, and gazed at Frederick while she blinked her eyes in the midst of the cloud of smoke that enveloped her. A gurgling sound came from her throat as she inhaled the fumes, and from time to time she murmured:

"The poor darling! the poor pet!"

He tried to find something of an agreeable nature to talk about. The thought of Vatnaz recurred to his memory.

He remarked that she appeared to him very lady-like.

"Yes, upon my word," replied the Maréchale. "She is very lucky in having me, that same lady!" — without adding another word, so much reserve was there in their conversation.

Each of them felt a sense of constraint, something that formed a barrier to confidential relations between them. In fact, Rosanette's vanity had been flattered by the duel, of which she believed herself to be the occasion. Then, she was very much astonished that he did not hasten to take advantage of his achievement; and, in order to compel him to return to her, she had invented this story that she wanted five hundred francs. How was it that Frederick did not ask for a little love from her in return? This was a piece of refinement that filled her with amazement, and, with a gush of emotion, she said to him:

"Will you come with us to the sea-baths?"

"What does 'us' mean?"

"Myself and my bird. I'll make you pass for a cousin of mine, as in the old comedies."

"A thousand thanks!"

"Well, then, you will take lodgings near ours."

The idea of hiding himself from a rich man humiliated him.

"No! that is impossible."

"Just as you please!"

Rosanette turned away with tears in her eyes. Frederick noticed this, and in order to testify the interest which he took in her, he said that he was delighted to see her at last in a comfortable position.

She shrugged her shoulders. What, then, was troubling her? Was it, perchance, that she was not loved.

"Oh! as for me, I have always people to love me!"

She added:

"It remains to be seen in what way."

Complaining that she was "suffocating with the heat," the Maréchale unfastened her vest; and, without any other garment round her body, save her silk chemise, she leaned her head on his shoulder so as to awaken his tenderness.

A man of less introspective egoism would not have bestowed a thought at such a moment on the possibility of the Vicomte, M. de Comaing, or anyone else appearing on the scene. But Frederick had been too many times the dupe of these very glances to compromise himself by a fresh humiliation.

She wished to know all about his relationships and his amusements. She even enquired about his financial affairs, and offered to lend him money if he wanted it. Frederick, unable to stand it any longer, took up his hat.

"I'm off, my pet! I hope you'll enjoy yourself thoroughly down there. Au revoir!"

She opened her eyes wide; then, in a dry tone:

"Au revoir!"

He made his way out through the yellow drawing-room, and through the second anteroom. There was on the table, between a vase full of visiting-cards and an inkstand, a chased silver chest. It was Madame Arnoux's. Then he experienced a feeling of tenderness, and, at the same time, as it were, the scandal of a profanation. He felt a longing to raise his hands towards it, and to open it. He was afraid of being seen, and went away.

Frederick was virtuous. He did not go back to the Arnoux's house. He sent his man-servant to buy the two negroes, having given him all the necessary directions; and the case containing them set forth the same evening for Nogent. Next morning, as he was repairing to Deslauriers' lodgings, at the turn where the Rue Vivienne opened out on the boulevard, Madame Arnoux presented herself before him face to face.

The first movement of each of them was to draw back; then the same smile came to the lips of both, and they advanced to meet each other. For a minute, neither of them uttered a single word.

The sunlight fell round her, and her oval face, her long eyelashes, her black lace shawl, which showed the outline of her shoulders, her gown of shot silk, the bouquet of violets at the corner of her bonnet; all seemed to him to possess extraordinary magnificence. An infinite softness poured itself out of her beautiful eyes; and in a faltering voice, uttering at random the first words that came to his lips:

"How is Arnoux?"

"Well, I thank you!"

"And your children?"

"They are very well!"

"Ah! ah! What fine weather we are getting, are we not?"

"Splendid, indeed!"

"You're going out shopping?"

And, with a slow inclination of the head:

"Good-bye!"

She put out her hand, without having spoken one word of an affectionate description, and did not even invite him to dinner at her house. No matter! He would not have given this interview for the most delightful of adventures; and he pondered over its sweetness as he proceeded on his way.

Deslauriers, surprised at seeing him, dissembled his spite; for he cherished still through obstinacy some hope with regard to Madame Arnoux; and he had written to Frederick to prolong his stay in the country in order to be free in his manœuvres.

He informed Frederick, however, that he had presented himself at her house in order to ascertain if their contract stipulated for a community of property between husband and wife: in that case, proceedings might be taken against the wife; "and she put on a queer face when I told her about your marriage."

"Now, then! What an invention!"

"It was necessary in order to show that you wanted your own capital! A person who was indifferent would not have been attacked with the species of fainting fit that she had."

"Really?" exclaimed Frederick.

"Ha! my fine fellow, you are betraying yourself! Come! be honest!"

A feeling of nervous weakness stole over Madame Arnoux's lover.

"Why, no! I assure you! upon my word of honour!"

These feeble denials ended by convincing Deslauriers. He congratulated his friend, and asked him for some details. Frederick gave him none, and even resisted a secret yearning to concoct a few. As for the mortgage, he told the other to do nothing about it, but to wait. Deslauriers thought he was wrong on this point, and remonstrated with him in rather a churlish fashion.

He was, besides, more gloomy, malignant, and irascible than ever. In a year, if fortune did not change, he would embark for America or blow out his brains. Indeed, he appeared to be in such a rage against everything, and so uncompromising in his radicalism, that Frederick could not keep from saying to him:

"Here you are going on in the same way as Sénécal!"

Deslauriers, at this remark, informed him that that individual to whom he alluded had been discharged from Sainte-Pelagie, the magisterial investigation having failed to supply sufficient evidence, no doubt, to justify his being sent for trial.

Dussardier was so much overjoyed at the release of Sénécal, that he wanted to invite his friends to come and take punch with him, and begged of Frederick to be one of the party, giving the latter, at the same time, to understand that he would be found in the company of Hussonnet, who had proved himself a very good friend to Sénécal.

In fact, the Flambard had just become associated with a business establishment whose prospectus contained the following references: "Vineyard Agency. Office of Publicity. Debt Recovery and Intelligence Office, etc." But the Bohemian was afraid that his connection with trade might be prejudicial to his literary reputation, and he had accordingly taken the mathematician to keep the accounts. Although the situation was a poor one, Sénécal would but for it have died of starvation. Not wishing to mortify the worthy shopman, Frederick accepted his invitation.

Dussardier, three days beforehand, had himself waxed the red floor of his garret, beaten the armchair, and knocked off the dust from the chimney-piece, on which might be seen under a globe an alabaster timepiece between a stalactite and a cocoanut. As his two chandeliers and his chamber candlestick were not sufficient, he had borrowed two more candlesticks from the doorkeeper; and these five lights shone on the top of the chest of drawers, which was covered with three napkins in order that it might be fit to have placed on it in such a way as to look attractive some macaroons, biscuits, a fancy cake, and a dozen bottles of beer. At the opposite side, close to the wall, which was hung with yellow paper, there was a little mahogany bookcase containing the Fables of Lachambeaudie, the Mysteries of Paris, and Norvins' Napoléon — and, in the middle of the alcove, the face of Béranger was smiling in a rosewood frame.

The guests (in addition to Deslauriers and Sénécal) were an apothecary who had just been admitted, but who had not enough capital to start in business for himself, a young man of his own house, a town-traveller in wines, an architect, and a gentleman employed in an insurance office. Regimbart had not been able to come. Regret was expressed at his absence.

They welcomed Frederick with a great display of sympathy, as they all knew through Dussardier what he had said at M. Dambreuse's house. Sénécal contented himself with putting out his hand in a dignified manner.

He remained standing near the chimney-piece. The others seated, with their pipes in their mouths, listened to him, while he held forth on universal suffrage, from which he predicted as a result the triumph of Democracy and the practical application of the principles of the Gospel. However, the hour was at hand. The banquets of the party of reform were becoming more numerous in the provinces. Piedmont, Naples, Tuscany — —

"'Tis true," said Deslauriers, interrupting him abruptly. "This cannot last longer!"

And he began to draw a picture of the situation. We had sacrificed Holland to obtain from England the recognition of Louis Philippe; and this precious English alliance was lost, owing to the Spanish marriages. In Switzerland, M. Guizot, in tow with the Austrian, maintained the treaties of 1815. Prussia, with her Zollverein, was preparing embarrassments for us. The Eastern question was still pending.

"The fact that the Grand Duke Constantine sends presents to M. d'Aumale is no reason for placing confidence in Russia. As for home affairs, never have so many blunders, such stupidity, been witnessed. The Government no longer even keeps up its majority. Everywhere, indeed, according to the well-known expression, it is naught! naught! naught! And in the teeth of such public scandals," continued the advocate, with his arms akimbo, "they declare themselves satisfied!"

The allusion to a notorious vote called forth applause. Dussardier uncorked a bottle of beer; the froth splashed on the curtains. He did not mind it. He filled the pipes, cut the cake, offered each of them a slice of it, and several times went downstairs to see whether the punch was coming up; and ere long they lashed themselves up into a state of excitement, as they all felt equally exasperated against Power. Their rage was of a violent character for no other reason save that they hated injustice, and they mixed up with legitimate grievances the most idiotic complaints.

The apothecary groaned over the pitiable condition of our fleet. The insurance agent could not tolerate Marshal Soult's two sentinels. Deslauriers denounced the Jesuits, who had just installed themselves publicly at Lille. Sénécals execrated M. Cousin much more for eclecticism, by teaching that certitude can be deduced from reason, developed selfishness and destroyed solidarity. The traveller in wines, knowing very little about these matters, remarked in a very loud tone that he had forgotten many infamies:

"The royal carriage on the Northern line must have cost eighty thousand francs. Who'll pay the amount?"

"Aye, who'll pay the amount?" repeated the clerk, as angrily as if this amount had been drawn out of his own pocket.

Then followed recriminations against the lynxes of the Bourse and the corruption of officials. According to Sénécals they ought to go higher up, and lay the blame, first of all, on the princes who had revived the morals of the Regency period.

"Have you not lately seen the Duc de Montpensier's friends coming back from Vincennes, no doubt in a state of intoxication, and disturbing with their songs the workmen of the Faubourg Saint-Antoine?"

"There was even a cry of 'Down with the thieves!'" said the apothecary. "I was there, and I joined in the cry!"

"So much the better! The people are at last waking up since the Teste-Cubières case." [D]

"For my part, that case caused me some pain," said Dussardier, "because it imputed dishonour to an old soldier!"

"Do you know," Sénécals went on, "what they have discovered at the Duchesse de Praslin's house — — ?"

But here the door was sent flying open with a kick. Hussonnet entered.

"Hail, messeigneurs," said he, as he seated himself on the bed.

No allusion was made to his article, which he was sorry, however, for having written, as the Maréchale had sharply reprimanded him on account of it.

He had just seen at the Théâtre de Dumas the Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, and declared that it seemed to him a stupid play.

Such a criticism surprised the democrats, as this drama, by its tendency, or rather by its scenery, flattered their passions. They protested. Sénécals, in order to bring this discussion to a close, asked whether the play served the cause of Democracy.

"Yes, perhaps; but it is written in a style — — "

"Well, then, 'tis a good play. What is style? 'Tis the idea!"

And, without allowing Frederick to say a word:

"Now, I was pointing out that in the Praslin case — — "

Hussonnet interrupted him:

"Ha! here's another worn-out trick! I'm disgusted at it!"

"And others as well as you," returned Deslauriers.

"It has only got five papers taken. Listen while I read this paragraph."

And drawing his note-book out of his pocket, he read:

"We have, since the establishment of the best of republics, been subjected to twelve hundred and twenty-nine press prosecutions, from which the results to the writers have been imprisonment extending over a period of three thousand one hundred and forty-one years, and the light sum of seven million one hundred and ten thousand five hundred francs by way of fine.' That's charming, eh?"

They all sneered bitterly.

Frederick, incensed against the others, broke in:

"The Democratie Pacifique has had proceedings taken against it on account of its feuilleton, a novel entitled The Woman's Share."

"Come! that's good," said Hussonnet. "Suppose they prevented us from having our share of the women!"

"But what is it that's not prohibited?" exclaimed Deslauriers. "To smoke in the Luxembourg is prohibited; to sing the Hymn to Pius IX. is prohibited!"

"And the typographers' banquet has been interdicted," a voice cried, with a thick articulation.

It was that of an architect, who had sat concealed in the shade of the alcove, and who had remained silent up to that moment. He added that, the week before, a man named Rouget had been convicted of offering insults to the king.

"That gurnet[E] is fried," said Hussonnet.

This joke appeared so improper to Sénécal, that he reproached Hussonnet for defending the Juggler of the Hôtel de Ville, the friend of the traitor Dumouriez.

"I? quite the contrary!"

He considered Louis Philippe commonplace, one of the National Guard types of men, all that savoured most of the provision-shop and the cotton night-cap! And laying his hand on his heart, the Bohemian gave utterance to the rhetorical phrases:

"It is always with a new pleasure.... Polish nationality will not perish.... Our great works will be pursued.... Give me some money for my little family...."

They all laughed hugely, declaring that he was a delightful fellow, full of wit. Their delight was redoubled at the sight of the bowl of punch which was brought in by the keeper of a café.

The flames of the alcohol and those of the wax-candles soon heated the apartment, and the light from the garret, passing across the courtyard, illuminated the side of an opposite roof with the flue of a chimney, whose black outlines could be traced through the darkness of night. They talked in very loud tones all at the same time. They had taken off their coats; they gave blows to the furniture; they touched glasses.

Hussonnet exclaimed:

"Send up some great ladies, in order that this may be more Tour de Nesles, have more local colouring, and be more Rembrandtesque, gadzooks!"

And the apothecary, who kept stirring about the punch indefinitely, began to sing with expanded chest:

"I've two big oxen in my stable,
Two big white oxen — — "

Sénécal laid his hand on the apothecary's mouth; he did not like disorderly conduct; and the lodgers pressed their faces against the window-panes, surprised at the unwonted uproar that was taking place in Dussardier's room.

The honest fellow was happy, and said that this recalled to his mind their little parties on the Quai Napoléon in days gone by; however, they missed many who used to be present at these reunions, "Pellerin, for instance."

"We can do without him," observed Frederick.

And Deslauriers enquired about Martinon.

"What has become of that interesting gentleman?"

Frederick, immediately giving vent to the ill-will which he bore to Martinon, attacked his mental capacity, his character, his false elegance, his entire personality. He was a perfect specimen of an upstart peasant! The new aristocracy, the mercantile class, was not as good as the old — the nobility. He maintained this, and the democrats expressed their approval, as if he were a member of the one class, and they were in the habit of visiting the other. They were charmed with him. The apothecary compared him to M. d'Alton Shée, who, though a peer of France, defended the cause of the people.

The time had come for taking their departure. They all separated with great handshakings. Dussardier, in a spirit of affectionate solicitude, saw Frederick and Deslauriers home. As soon as they were in the street, the advocate assumed a thoughtful air, and, after a moment's silence:

"You have a great grudge, then, against Pellerin?"

Frederick did not hide his rancour.

The painter, in the meantime, had withdrawn the notorious picture from the show-window. A person should not let himself be put out by trifles. What was the good of making an enemy for himself?

"He has given way to a burst of ill-temper, excusable in a man who hasn't a sou. You, of course, can't understand that!"

And, when Deslauriers had gone up to his own apartments, the shopman did not part with Frederick. He even urged his friend to buy the portrait. In fact, Pellerin, abandoning the hope of being able to intimidate him, had got round them so that they might use their influence to obtain the thing for him.

Deslauriers spoke about it again, and pressed him on the point, urging that the artist's claims were reasonable.

"I am sure that for a sum of, perhaps, five hundred francs — — "

"Oh, give it to him! Wait! here it is!" said Frederick.

The picture was brought the same evening. It appeared to him a still more atrocious daub than when he had seen it first. The half-tints and the shades were darkened under the excessive retouchings, and they seemed obscured when brought into relation with the lights, which, having remained very brilliant here and there, destroyed the harmony of the entire picture.

Frederick revenged himself for having had to pay for it by bitterly disparaging it. Deslauriers believed in Frederick's statement on the point, and expressed approval of his conduct, for he had always been ambitious of constituting a phalanx of which he would be the leader. Certain men take delight in making their friends do things which are disagreeable to them.

Meanwhile, Frederick did not renew his visits to the Dambreuses.

He lacked the capital for the investment. He would have to enter into endless explanations on the subject; he hesitated about making up his mind. Perhaps he was in the right. Nothing was certain now, the coal-mining speculation any more than other things. He would have to give up society of that sort. The end of the matter was that Deslauriers was dissuaded from having anything further to do with the undertaking.

From sheer force of hatred he had grown virtuous, and again he preferred Frederick in a position of mediocrity. In this way he remained his friend's equal and in more intimate relationship with him.

Mademoiselle Roque's commission had been very badly executed. Her father wrote to him, supplying him with the most precise directions, and concluded his letter with this piece of foolery: "At the risk of giving you nigger on the brain!"

Frederick could not do otherwise than call upon the Arnoux's, once more. He went to the warehouse, where he could see nobody. The firm being in a tottering condition, the clerks imitated the carelessness of their master.

He brushed against the shelves laden with earthenware, which filled up the entire space in the centre of the establishment; then, when he reached the lower end, facing the counter, he walked with a more noisy tread in order to make himself heard.

The portières parted, and Madame Arnoux appeared.

"What! you here! you!"

"Yes," she faltered, with some agitation. "I was looking for — —"

He saw her handkerchief near the desk, and guessed that she had come down to her husband's warehouse to have an account given to her as to the business, to clear up some matter that caused her anxiety.

"But perhaps there is something you want?" said she.

"A mere nothing, madame."

"These shop-assistants are intolerable! they are always out of the way."

They ought not to be blamed. On the contrary, he congratulated himself on the circumstance.

She gazed at him in an ironical fashion.

"Well, and this marriage?"

"What marriage?"

"Your own!"

"Mine? I'll never marry as long as I live!"

She made a gesture as if to contradict his words.

"Though, indeed, such things must be, after all? We take refuge in the commonplace, despairing of ever realising the beautiful existence of which we have dreamed."

"All your dreams, however, are not so — candid!"

"What do you mean?"

"When you drive to races with women!"

He cursed the Maréchale. Then something recurred to his memory.

"But it was you begged of me yourself to see her at one time in the interest of Arnoux."

She replied with a shake of her head:

"And you take advantage of it to amuse yourself?"

"Good God! let us forget all these foolish things!"

"'Tis right, since you are going to be married."

And she stifled a sigh, while she bit her lips.

Then he exclaimed:

"But I tell you again I am not! Can you believe that I, with my intellectual requirements, my habits, am going to bury myself in the provinces in order to play cards, look after masons, and walk about in wooden shoes? What object, pray, could I have for taking such a step? You've been told that she was rich, haven't you? Ah! what do I care about money? Could I, after yearning long for that which is most lovely, tender, enchanting, a sort of Paradise under a human form, and having found this sweet ideal at last when this vision hides every other from my view — — "

And taking her head between his two hands, he began to kiss her on the eyelids, repeating:

"No! no! no! never will I marry! never! never!"

She submitted to these caresses, her mingled amazement and delight having bereft her of the power of motion.

The door of the storeroom above the staircase fell back, and she remained with outstretched arms, as if to bid him keep silence. Steps drew near. Then some one said from behind the door:

"Is Madame there?"

"Come in!"

Madame Arnoux had her elbow on the counter, and was twisting about a pen between her fingers quietly when the book-keeper threw aside the portière.

Frederick started up, as if on the point of leaving.

"Madame, I have the honour to salute you. The set will be ready — will it not? I may count on this?"

She made no reply. But by thus silently becoming his accomplice in the deception, she made his face flush with the crimson glow of adultery.

On the following day he paid her another visit. She received him; and, in order to follow up the advantage he had gained, Frederick immediately, without any preamble, attempted to offer some justification for the accidental meeting in the Champ de Mars. It was the merest chance that led to his being in that woman's company. While admitting that she was pretty — which really was not the case — how could she for even a moment absorb his thoughts, seeing that he loved another woman?

"You know it well — I told you it was so!"

Madame Arnoux hung down her head.

"I am sorry you said such a thing."

"Why?"

"The most ordinary proprieties now demand that I should see you no more!"

He protested that his love was of an innocent character. The past ought to be a guaranty as to his future conduct. He had of his own accord made it a point of honour with himself not to disturb her existence, not to deafen her with his complaints.

"But yesterday my heart overflowed."

"We ought not to let our thoughts dwell on that moment, my friend!"

And yet, where would be the harm in two wretched beings mingling their griefs?

"For, indeed, you are not happy any more than I am! Oh! I know you. You have no one who responds to your craving for affection, for devotion. I will do anything you wish! I will not offend you! I swear to you that I will not!"

And he let himself fall on his knees, in spite of himself, giving way beneath the weight of the feelings that oppressed his heart.

"Rise!" she said; "I desire you to do so!"

And she declared in an imperious tone that if he did not comply with her wish, she would never see him again.

"Ha! I defy you to do it!" returned Frederick. "What is there for me to do in the world? Other men strive for riches, celebrity, power! But I have no profession; you are my exclusive occupation, my whole wealth, the object, the centre of my existence and of my thoughts. I can no more live without you than without the air of heaven! Do you not feel the aspiration of my soul ascending towards yours, and that they must intermingle, and that I am dying on your account?"

Madame Arnoux began to tremble in every limb.

"Oh! leave me, I beg of you?"

The look of utter confusion in her face made him pause. Then he advanced a step. But she drew back, with her two hands clasped.

"Leave me in the name of Heaven, for mercy's sake!"

And Frederick loved her so much that he went away.

Soon afterwards, he was filled with rage against himself, declared in his own mind that he was an idiot, and, after the lapse of twenty-four hours, returned.

Madame was not there. He remained at the head of the stairs, stupefied with anger and indignation. Arnoux appeared, and informed Frederick that his wife had, that very morning, gone out to take up her residence at a little country-house of which he had become tenant at Auteuil, as he had given up possession of the house at Saint-Cloud.

"This is another of her whims. No matter, as she is settled at last; and myself, too, for that matter, so much the better. Let us dine together this evening, will you?"

Frederick pleaded as an excuse some urgent business; then he hurried away of his own accord to Auteuil.

Madame Arnoux allowed an exclamation of joy to escape her lips. Then all his bitterness vanished.

He did not say one word about his love. In order to inspire her with confidence in him, he even exaggerated his reserve; and on his asking whether he might call again, she replied: "Why, of course!" putting out her hand, which she withdrew the next moment.

From that time forth, Frederick increased his visits. He promised extra fares to the cabman who drove him. But often he grew impatient at the slow pace of the horse, and, alighting on the ground, he would make a dash after an omnibus, and climb to the top of it out of breath. Then with what disdain he surveyed the faces of those around him, who were not going to see her!

He could distinguish her house at a distance, with an enormous honeysuckle covering, on one side, the planks of the roof. It was a kind of Swiss châlet, painted red, with a balcony outside. In the garden there were three old chestnut-trees, and on a rising ground in the centre might be seen a parasol made of thatch, held up by the trunk of a tree. Under the slatework lining the walls, a big vine-tree, badly fastened, hung from one place to another after the fashion of a rotten cable. The gate-bell, which it was rather hard to pull, was slow in ringing, and a long time always elapsed before it was answered. On each occasion he experienced a pang of suspense, a fear born of irresolution.

Then his ears would be greeted with the pattering of the servant-maid's slippers over the gravel, or else Madame Arnoux herself would make her appearance. One day he came up behind her just as she was stooping down in the act of gathering violets.

Her daughter's capricious disposition had made it necessary to send the girl to a convent. Her little son was at school every afternoon. Arnoux was now in the habit of taking prolonged luncheons at the Palais-Royal with Regimbart and their friend Compain. They gave themselves no bother about anything that occurred, no matter how disagreeable it might be.

It was clearly understood between Frederick and her that they should not belong to each other. By this convention they were preserved from danger, and they found it easier to pour out their hearts to each other.

She told him all about her early life at Chartres, which she spent with her mother, her devotion when she had reached her twelfth year, then her passion for music, when she used to sing till nightfall in her little room, from which the ramparts could be seen.

He related to her how melancholy broodings had haunted him at college, and how a woman's face shone brightly in the cloudland of his imagination, so that, when he first laid eyes upon her, he felt that her features were quite familiar to him.

These conversations, as a rule, covered only the years during which they had been acquainted with each other. He recalled to her recollection insignificant details — the colour of her dress at a certain period, a woman whom they had met on a certain day, what she had said on another occasion; and she replied, quite astonished:

"Yes, I remember!"

Their tastes, their judgments, were the same. Often one of them, when listening to the other, exclaimed:

"That's the way with me."

And the other replied:

"And with me, too!"

Then there were endless complaints about Providence:

"Why was it not the will of Heaven? If we had only met — — !"

"Ah! if I had been younger!" she sighed.

"No, but if I had been a little older."

And they pictured to themselves a life entirely given up to love, sufficiently rich to fill up the vastest solitudes, surpassing all other joys, defying all forms of wretchedness, in which the hours would glide away in a continual outpouring of their own emotions, and which would be as bright and glorious as the palpitating splendour of the stars.

They were nearly always standing at the top of the stairs exposed to the free air of heaven. The tops of trees yellowed by the autumn raised their crests in front of them at unequal heights up to the edge of the pale sky; or else they walked on to the end of the avenue into a summer-house whose only furniture was a couch of grey canvas. Black specks stained the glass; the walls exhaled a mouldy smell; and they remained there chatting freely about all sorts of topics — anything that happened to arise — in a spirit of hilarity. Sometimes the rays of the sun, passing through the Venetian blind, extended from the ceiling down to the flagstones like the strings of a lyre. Particles of dust whirled amid these luminous bars. She amused herself by dividing them with her hand. Frederick gently caught hold of her; and he gazed on the twinings of her veins, the grain of her skin, and the form of her fingers. Each of those fingers of hers was for him more than a thing — almost a person.

She gave him her gloves, and, the week after, her handkerchief. She called him "Frederick;" he called her "Marie," adoring this name, which, as he said, was expressly made to be uttered with a sigh of ecstasy, and which seemed to contain clouds of incense and scattered heaps of roses.

They soon came to an understanding as to the days on which he would call to see her; and, leaving the house as if by mere chance, she walked along the road to meet him.

She made no effort whatever to excite his love, lost in that listlessness which is characteristic of intense happiness. During the whole season she wore a brown silk dressing-gown with velvet borders of the same colour, a large garment, which united the indolence of her attitudes and her grave physiognomy. Besides, she had just reached the autumnal period of womanhood, in which reflection is combined with tenderness, in which the beginning of maturity colours the face with a more intense flame, when strength of feeling mingles with experience of life, and when, having completely expanded, the entire being overflows with a richness in harmony with its beauty. Never had she possessed more sweetness, more leniency. Secure in the thought that she would not err, she abandoned herself to a sentiment which seemed to her won by her sorrows. And, moreover, it was so innocent and fresh! What an abyss lay between the coarseness of Arnoux and the adoration of Frederick!

He trembled at the thought that by an imprudent word he might lose all that he had gained, saying to himself that an opportunity might be found again, but that a foolish step could never be repaired. He wished that she should give herself rather than that he should take her. The assurance of being loved by her delighted him like a foretaste of possession, and then the charm of her person troubled his heart more than his senses. It was an indefinable feeling of bliss, a sort of intoxication that made him lose sight of the possibility of having his happiness completed. Apart from her, he was consumed with longing.

Ere long the conversations were interrupted by long spells of silence. Sometimes a species of sexual shame made them blush in each other's presence. All the precautions they took to hide their love only unveiled it; the stronger it grew, the more constrained they became in manner. The effect of this dissimulation was to intensify their sensibility. They experienced a sensation of delight at the odour of moist leaves; they could not endure the east wind; they got irritated without any apparent cause, and had melancholy forebodings. The sound of a footstep, the creaking of the wainscoting, filled them with as much terror as if they had been guilty. They felt as if they were being pushed towards the edge of a chasm. They were surrounded by a tempestuous atmosphere; and when complaints escaped Frederick's lips, she made accusations against herself.

"Yes, I am doing wrong. I am acting as if I were a coquette! Don't come any more!"

Then he would repeat the same oaths, to which on each occasion she listened with renewed pleasure.

His return to Paris, and the fuss occasioned by New Year's Day, interrupted their meetings to some extent. When he returned, he had an air of greater self-confidence. Every moment she went out to give orders, and in spite of his entreaties she received every visitor that called during the evening.

After this, they engaged in conversations about Léotade, M. Guizot, the Pope, the insurrection at Palermo, and the banquet of the Twelfth Arrondissement, which had caused some disquietude. Frederick eased his mind by railing against Power, for he longed, like Deslauriers, to turn the whole world upside down, so soured had he now become. Madame Arnoux, on her side, had become sad.

Her husband, indulging in displays of wild folly, was flirting with one of the girls in his pottery works, the one who was known as "the girl from Bordeaux." Madame Arnoux was herself informed about it by Frederick. He wanted to make use of it as an argument, "inasmuch as she was the victim of deception."

"Oh! I'm not much concerned about it," she said.

This admission on her part seemed to him to strengthen the intimacy between them. Would Arnoux be seized with mistrust with regard to them?

"No! not now!"

She told him that, one evening, he had left them talking together, and had afterwards come back again and listened behind the door, and as they both were chatting at the time of matters that were of no consequence, he had lived since then in a state of complete security.

"With good reason, too — is that not so?" said Frederick bitterly.

"Yes, no doubt!"

It would have been better for him not to have given so risky an answer.

One day she was not at home at the hour when he usually called. To him there seemed to be a sort of treason in this.

He was next displeased at seeing the flowers which he used to bring her always placed in a glass of water.

"Where, then, would you like me to put them?"

"Oh! not there! However, they are not so cold there as they would be near your heart!"

Not long afterwards he reproached her for having been at the Italian opera the night before without having given him a previous intimation of her intention to go there. Others had seen, admired, fallen in love with her, perhaps; Frederick was fastening on those suspicions of his merely in order to pick a quarrel with her, to torment her; for he was beginning to hate her, and the very least he might expect was that she should share in his sufferings!

One afternoon, towards the middle of February, he surprised her in a state of great mental excitement. Eugène had been complaining about his sore throat. The doctor had told her, however, that it was a trifling ailment — a bad cold, an attack of influenza. Frederick was astonished at the child's stupefied look. Nevertheless, he reassured the mother, and brought forward the cases of several children of the same age who had been attacked with similar ailments, and had been speedily cured.

"Really?"

"Why, yes, assuredly!"

"Oh! how good you are!"

And she caught his hand. He clasped hers tightly in his.

"Oh! let it go!"

"What does it signify, when it is to one who sympathises with you that you offer it? You place every confidence in me when I speak of these things, but you distrust me when I talk to you about my love!"

"I don't doubt you on that point, my poor friend!"

"Why this distrust, as if I were a wretch capable of abusing — —"

"Oh! no! — —"

"If I had only a proof! — —"

"What proof?"

"The proof that a person might give to the first comer — what you have granted to myself!"

And he recalled to her recollection how, on one occasion, they had gone out together, on a winter's twilight, when there was a fog. This seemed now a long time ago. What, then, was to prevent her from showing herself on his arm before the whole world without any fear on her part, and without any mental reservation on his, not having anyone around them who could importune them?

"Be it so!" she said, with a promptness of decision that at first astonished Frederick.

But he replied, in a lively fashion:

"Would you like me to wait at the corner of the Rue Tronchet and the Rue de la Ferme?"

"Good heavens, my friend!" faltered Madame Arnoux.

Without giving her time to reflect, he added:

"Next Tuesday, I suppose?"

"Tuesday?"

"Yes, between two and three o'clock."

"I will be there!"

And she turned aside her face with a movement of shame. Frederick placed his lips on the nape of her neck.

"Oh! this is not right," she said. "You will make me repent."

He turned away, dreading the fickleness which is customary with women. Then, on the threshold, he murmured softly, as if it were a thing that was thoroughly understood:

"On Tuesday!"

She lowered her beautiful eyes in a cautious and resigned fashion.

Frederick had a plan arranged in his mind.

He hoped that, owing to the rain or the sun, he might get her to stop under some doorway, and that, once there, she would go into some house. The difficulty was to find one that would suit.

He made a search, and about the middle of the Rue Tronchet he read, at a distance on a signboard, "Furnished apartments."

The waiter, divining his object, showed him immediately above the ground-floor a room and a closet with two exits. Frederick took it for a month, and paid in advance. Then he went into three shops to buy the rarest perfumery. He got a piece of imitation guipure, which was to replace the horrible red cotton foot-coverlets; he selected a pair of blue satin slippers, only the fear of appearing coarse checked the amount of his purchases. He came back with them; and with more devotion than those who are erecting processional altars, he altered the position of the furniture, arranged the curtains himself, put heather in the fireplace, and covered the chest of drawers with violets. He would have liked to pave the entire apartment with gold. "To-morrow is the time," said he to himself. "Yes, to-morrow! I am not dreaming!" and he felt his heart throbbing violently under the delirious excitement begotten by his anticipations. Then, when everything was ready, he carried off the key in his pocket, as if the happiness which slept there might have flown away along with it.

A letter from his mother was awaiting him when he reached his abode:

"Why such a long absence? Your conduct is beginning to look ridiculous. I understand your hesitating more or less at first with regard to this union. However, think well upon it."

And she put the matter before him with the utmost clearness: an income of forty-five thousand francs. However, "people were talking about it;" and M. Roque was waiting for a definite answer. As for the young girl, her position was truly most embarrassing.

"She is deeply attached to you."

Frederick threw aside the letter even before he had finished reading it, and opened another epistle which came from Deslauriers.

"Dear Old Boy, — The pear is ripe. In accordance with your promise, we may count on you. We meet to-morrow at daybreak, in the Place du Panthéon. Drop into the Café Soufflot. It is necessary for me to have a chat with you before the manifestation takes place."

"Oh! I know them, with their manifestations! A thousand thanks! I have a more agreeable appointment."

And on the following morning, at eleven o'clock, Frederick had left the house. He wanted to give one last glance at the preparations. Then, who could tell but that, by some chance or other, she might be at the place of meeting before him? As he emerged from the Rue Tronchet, he heard a great clamour behind the Madeleine. He pressed forward, and saw at the far end of the square, to the left, a number of men in blouses and well-dressed people.

In fact, a manifesto published in the newspapers had summoned to this spot all who had subscribed to the banquet of the Reform Party. The Ministry had, almost without a moment's delay, posted up a proclamation prohibiting the meeting. The Parliamentary Opposition had, on the previous evening, disclaimed any connection with it; but the patriots, who were unaware of this resolution on the part of their leaders, had come to the meeting-place, followed by a great crowd of spectators. A deputation from the schools had made its way, a short time before, to the house of Odillon Barrot. It was now at the residence of the Minister for Foreign Affairs; and nobody could tell whether the banquet would take place, whether the Government would carry out its threat, and whether the National Guards would make their appearance. People were as much enraged against the deputies as against Power. The crowd was growing bigger and bigger, when suddenly the strains of the "Marseillaise" rang through the air.

It was the students' column which had just arrived on the scene. They marched along at an ordinary walking pace, in double file and in good order, with angry faces, bare hands, and all exclaiming at intervals:

"Long live Reform! Down with Guizot!"

Frederick's friends were there, sure enough. They would have noticed him and dragged him along with them. He quickly sought refuge in the Rue de l'Arcade.

When the students had taken two turns round the Madeleine, they went down in the direction of the Place de la Concorde. It was full of people; and, at a distance, the crowd pressed close together, had the appearance of a field of dark ears of corn swaying to and fro.

At the same moment, some soldiers of the line ranged themselves in battle-array at the left-hand side of the church.

The groups remained standing there, however. In order to put an end to this, some police-officers in civilian dress seized the most riotous of them in a brutal fashion, and carried them off to the guard-house. Frederick, in spite of his indignation, remained silent; he might have been arrested along with the others, and he would have missed Madame Arnoux.

A little while afterwards the helmets of the Municipal Guards appeared. They kept striking about them with the flat side of their sabres. A horse fell down. The people made a rush forward to save him, and as soon as the rider was in the saddle, they all ran away.

Then there was a great silence. The thin rain, which had moistened the asphalt, was no longer falling. Clouds floated past, gently swept on by the west wind.

Frederick began running through the Rue Tronchet, looking before him and behind him.

At length it struck two o'clock.

"Ha! now is the time!" said he to himself. "She is leaving her house; she is approaching," and a minute after, "she would have had time to be here."

Up to three he tried to keep quiet. "No, she is not going to be late — a little patience!"

And for want of something to do he examined the most interesting shops that he passed — a bookseller's, a saddler's and a mourning warehouse. Soon he knew the names of the different books, the various kinds of harness, and every sort of material. The persons who looked after these establishments, from seeing him continually going backwards and forwards, were at first surprised, and then alarmed, and they closed up their shop-fronts.

No doubt she had met with some impediment, and for that reason she must be enduring pain on account of it. But what delight would be afforded in a very short time! For she would come — that was certain. "She has given me her promise!" In the meantime an intolerable feeling of anxiety was gradually seizing hold of him. Impelled by an absurd idea, he returned to his hotel, as if he expected to find her there. At the same moment, she might have reached the street in which their meeting was to take place. He rushed out. Was there no one? And he resumed his tramp up and down the footpath.

He stared at the gaps in the pavement, the mouths of the gutters, the candelabra, and the numbers above the doors. The most trifling objects became for him companions, or rather, ironical spectators, and the regular fronts of the houses seemed to him to have a pitiless aspect. He was suffering from cold feet. He felt as if he were about to succumb to the dejection which was crushing him. The reverberation of his footsteps vibrated through his brain.

When he saw by his watch that it was four o'clock, he experienced, as it were, a sense of vertigo, a feeling of dismay. He tried to repeat some verses to himself, to enter on a calculation, no matter of what sort, to invent some kind of story. Impossible! He was beset by the image of Madame Arnoux; he felt a longing to run in order to meet her. But what road ought he to take so that they might not pass each other?

He went up to a messenger, put five francs into his hand, and ordered him to go to the Rue de Paradis to Jacques Arnoux's residence to enquire "if Madame were at home." Then he took up his post at the corner of the Rue de la Ferme and of the Rue Tronchet, so as to be able to look down both of them at the same time. On the boulevard, in the background of the scene in front of him, confused masses of people were gliding past. He could distinguish, every now and then, the aigrette of a dragoon or a woman's hat; and he strained his eyes in the effort to recognise the wearer. A child in rags, exhibiting a jack-in-the-box, asked him, with a smile, for alms.

The man with the velvet vest reappeared. "The porter had not seen her going out." What had kept her in? If she were ill he would have been told about it. Was it a visitor? Nothing was easier than to say that she was not at home. He struck his forehead.

"Ah! I am stupid! Of course, 'tis this political outbreak that prevented her from coming!"

He was relieved by this apparently natural explanation. Then, suddenly: "But her quarter of the city is quiet." And a horrible doubt seized hold of his mind: "Suppose she was not coming at all, and merely gave me a promise in order to get rid of me? No, no!" What had prevented her from coming was, no doubt, some extraordinary mischance, one of those occurrences that baffled all one's anticipations. In that case she would have written to him.

And he sent the hotel errand-boy to his residence in the Rue Rumfort to find out whether there happened to be a letter waiting for him there.

No letter had been brought. This absence of news reassured him.

He drew omens from the number of coins which he took up in his hand out of his pocket by chance, from the physiognomies of the passers-by, and from the colour of different horses; and when the augury was unfavourable, he forced himself to disbelieve in it. In his sudden outbursts of rage against Madame Arnoux, he abused her in muttering tones. Then came fits of weakness that nearly made him swoon, followed, all of a sudden, by fresh rebounds of hopefulness. She would make her appearance presently! She was there, behind his back! He turned round — there was nobody there! Once he perceived, about thirty paces away, a woman of the same height, with a dress of the same kind. He came up to her — it was not she. It struck five — half-past five — six. The gas-lamps were lighted, Madame Arnoux had not come.

The night before, she had dreamed that she had been, for some time, on the footpath in the Rue Tronchet. She was waiting there for something the nature of which she was not quite clear about, but which, nevertheless, was of great importance; and, without knowing why, she was afraid of being seen. But a pestiferous little dog kept barking at her furiously and biting at the hem of her dress. Every time she shook him off he returned stubbornly to the attack, always barking more violently than before. Madame Arnoux woke up. The dog's barking continued. She strained her ears to listen. It came from her son's room. She rushed to the spot in her bare feet. It was the child himself who was coughing. His hands were burning, his face flushed, and his voice singularly hoarse. Every minute he found it more difficult to breathe freely. She waited there till daybreak, bent over the coverlet watching him.

At eight o'clock the drum of the National Guard gave warning to M. Arnoux that his comrades were expecting his arrival. He dressed himself quickly and went away, promising that he would immediately be passing the house of their doctor, M. Colot.

At ten o'clock, when M. Colot did not make his appearance, Madame Arnoux despatched her chambermaid for him. The doctor was away in the country; and the young man who was taking his place had gone out on some business.

Eugène kept his head on one side on the bolster with contracted eyebrows and dilated nostrils. His pale little face had become whiter than the sheets; and there escaped from his larynx a wheezing caused by his oppressed breathing, which became gradually shorter, dryer, and more metallic. His cough resembled the noise made by those barbarous mechanical inventions by which toy-dogs are enabled to bark.

Madame Arnoux was seized with terror. She rang the bell violently, calling out for help, and exclaiming:

"A doctor! a doctor!"

Ten minutes later came an elderly gentleman in a white tie, and with grey whiskers well trimmed. He put several questions as to the habits, the age, and the constitution of the young patient, and studied the case with his head thrown back. He next wrote out a prescription.

The calm manner of this old man was intolerable. He smelt of aromatics. She would have liked to beat him. He said he would come back in the evening.

The horrible coughing soon began again. Sometimes the child arose suddenly. Convulsive movements shook the muscles of his breast; and in his efforts to breathe his stomach shrank in as if he were suffocating after running too hard. Then he sank down, with his head thrown back and his mouth wide open. With infinite pains, Madame Arnoux tried to make him swallow the contents of the phials, hippo wine, and a potion containing trisulphate of antimony. But he pushed away the spoon, groaning in a feeble voice. He seemed to be blowing out his words.

From time to time she re-read the prescription. The observations of the formulary frightened her. Perhaps the apothecary had made some mistake. Her powerlessness filled her with despair. M. Colot's pupil arrived.

He was a young man of modest demeanour, new to medical work, and he made no attempt to disguise his opinion about the case. He was at first undecided as to what he should do, for fear of compromising himself, and finally he ordered pieces of ice to be applied to the sick child. It took a long time to get ice. The bladder containing the ice burst. It was necessary to change the little boy's shirt. This disturbance brought on an attack of even a more dreadful character than any of the previous ones.

The child began tearing off the linen round his neck, as if he wanted to remove the obstacle that was choking him; and he scratched the walls and seized the curtains of his bedstead, trying to get a point of support to assist him in breathing.

His face was now of a bluish hue, and his entire body, steeped in a cold perspiration, appeared to be growing lean. His haggard eyes were fixed with terror on his mother. He threw his arms round her neck, and hung there in a desperate fashion; and, repressing her rising sobs, she gave utterance in a broken voice to loving words:

"Yes, my pet, my angel, my treasure!"

Then came intervals of calm.

She went to look for playthings — a punchinello, a collection of images, and spread them out on the bed in order to amuse him. She even made an attempt to sing.

She began to sing a little ballad which she used to sing years before, when she was nursing him wrapped up in swaddling-clothes in this same little upholstered chair. But a shiver ran all over his frame, just as when a wave is agitated by the wind. The balls of his eyes protruded. She thought he was going to die, and turned away her eyes to avoid seeing him.

The next moment she felt strength enough in her to look at him. He was still living. The hours succeeded each other — dull, mournful, interminable, hopeless, and she no longer counted the minutes, save by the progress of this mental anguish. The shakings of his chest threw him forward as if to shatter his body. Finally, he vomited something strange, which was like a parchment tube. What was this? She fancied that he had evacuated one end of his entrails. But he now began to breathe freely and regularly. This appearance of well-being frightened her more than anything else that had happened. She was sitting like one petrified, her arms hanging by her sides, her eyes fixed, when M. Colot suddenly made his appearance. The child, in his opinion, was saved.

She did not realise what he meant at first, and made him repeat the words. Was not this one of those consoling phrases which were customary with medical men? The doctor went away with an air of tranquillity. Then it seemed as if the cords that pressed round her heart were loosened.

"Saved! Is this possible?"

Suddenly the thought of Frederick presented itself to her mind in a clear and inexorable fashion. It was a warning sent to her by Providence. But the Lord in His mercy had not wished to complete her chastisement. What expiation could she offer hereafter if she were to persevere in this love-affair? No doubt insults would be flung at her son's head on her account; and Madame Arnoux saw him a young man, wounded in a combat, carried off on a litter, dying. At one spring she threw herself on the little chair, and, letting her soul escape towards the heights of heaven, she vowed to God that she would sacrifice, as a holocaust, her first real passion, her only weakness as a woman.

Frederick had returned home. He remained in his armchair, without even possessing enough of energy to curse her. A sort of slumber fell upon him, and, in the midst of his nightmare, he could hear the rain falling, still under the impression that he was there outside on the footpath.

Next morning, yielding to an incapacity to resist the temptation which clung to him, he again sent a messenger to Madame Arnoux's house.

Whether the true explanation happened to be that the fellow did not deliver his message, or that she had too many things to say to explain herself in a word or two, the same answer was brought back. This insolence was too great! A feeling of angry pride took possession of him. He swore in his own mind that he would never again cherish even a desire; and, like a group of leaves carried away by a hurricane, his love disappeared. He experienced a sense of relief, a feeling of stoical joy, then a need of violent action; and he walked on at random through the streets.

Men from the faubourgs were marching past armed with guns and old swords, some of them wearing red caps, and all singing the "Marseillaise" or the "Girondins." Here and there a National Guard was hurrying to join his mayoral department. Drums could be heard rolling in the distance. A conflict was going on at Porte Saint-Martin. There was something lively and warlike in the air. Frederick kept walking on without stopping. The excitement of the great city made him gay.

On the Frascati hill he got a glimpse of the Maréchale's windows: a wild idea occurred to him, a reaction of youthfulness. He crossed the boulevard.

The yard-gate was just being closed; and Delphine, who was in the act of writing on it with a piece of charcoal, "Arms given," said to him in an eager tone:

"Ah! Madame is in a nice state! She dismissed a groom who insulted her this morning. She thinks there's going to be pillage everywhere. She is frightened to death! and the more so as Monsieur has gone!"

"What Monsieur?"

"The Prince!"

Frederick entered the boudoir. The Maréchale appeared in her petticoat, and her hair hanging down her back in disorder.

"Ah! thanks! You are going to save me! 'tis the second time! You are one of those who never count the cost!"

"A thousand pardons!" said Frederick, catching her round the waist with both hands.

"How now? What are you doing?" stammered the Maréchale, at the same time, surprised and cheered up by his manner.

He replied:

"I am the fashion! I'm reformed!"

She let herself fall back on the divan, and continued laughing under his kisses.

They spent the afternoon looking out through the window at the people in the street. Then he brought her to dine at the Trois Frères Provençaux. The meal was a long and dainty one. They came back on foot for want of a vehicle.

At the announcement of a change of Ministry, Paris had changed. Everyone was in a state of delight. People kept promenading about the streets, and every floor was illuminated with lamps, so that it seemed as if it were broad daylight. The soldiers made their way back to their barracks, worn out and looking quite depressed. The people saluted them with exclamations of "Long live the Line!"

They went on without making any response. Among the National Guard, on the contrary, the officers, flushed with enthusiasm, brandished their sabres, vociferating:

"Long live Reform!"

And every time the two lovers heard this word they laughed.

Frederick told droll stories, and was quite gay.

Making their way through the Rue Duphot, they reached the boulevards. Venetian lanterns hanging from the houses formed wreaths of flame. Underneath, a confused swarm of people kept in constant motion. In the midst of those moving shadows could be seen, here and there, the steely glitter of bayonets. There was a great uproar. The crowd was too compact, and it was impossible to make one's way back in a straight line. They were entering the Rue Caumartin, when suddenly there burst forth behind them a noise like the crackling made by an immense piece of silk in the act of being torn across. It was the discharge of musketry on the Boulevard des Capucines.

"Ha! a few of the citizens are getting a crack," said Frederick calmly; for there are situations in which a man of the least cruel disposition is so much detached from his fellow-men that he would see the entire human race perishing without a single throb of the heart.

The Maréchale was clinging to his arm with her teeth chattering. She declared that she would not be able to walk twenty steps further. Then, by a refinement of hatred, in order the better to offer an outrage in his own soul to Madame Arnoux, he led Rosanette to the hotel in the Rue Tronchet, and brought her up to the room which he had got ready for the other.

The flowers were not withered. The guipure was spread out on the bed. He drew forth from the cupboard the little slippers. Rosanette considered this forethought on his part a great proof of his delicacy of sentiment. About one o'clock she was awakened by distant rolling sounds, and she saw that he was sobbing with his head buried in the pillow.

"What's the matter with you now, my own darling?"

"'Tis the excess of happiness," said Frederick. "I have been too long yearning after you!"

CHAPTER XIV.

The Barricade.

He was abruptly roused from sleep by the noise of a discharge of musketry; and, in spite of Rosanette's entreaties, Frederick was fully determined to go and see what was happening. He hurried down to the Champs-Élysées, from which shots were being fired. At the corner of the Rue Saint-Honoré some men in blouses ran past him, exclaiming:

"No! not that way! to the Palais-Royal!"

Frederick followed them. The grating of the Convent of the Assumption had been torn away. A little further on he noticed three paving-stones in the middle of the street, the beginning of a barricade, no doubt; then fragments of bottles and bundles of iron-wire, to obstruct the cavalry; and, at the same moment, there rushed suddenly out of a lane a tall young man of pale complexion, with his black hair flowing over his shoulders, and with a sort of pea-coloured swaddling-cloth thrown round him. In his hand he held a long military musket, and he dashed along on the tips of his slippers with the air of a somnambulist and with the nimbleness of a tiger. At intervals a detonation could be heard.

On the evening of the day before, the spectacle of the wagon containing five corpses picked up from amongst those that were lying on the Boulevard des Capucines had charged the disposition of the people; and, while at the Tuileries the aides-de-camp succeeded each other, and M. Molé, having set about the composition of a new Cabinet, did not come back, and M. Thiers was making efforts to constitute another, and while the King was cavilling and hesitating, and finally assigned the post of commander-in-chief to Bugeaud in order to prevent him from making use of it, the insurrection was organising itself in a formidable manner, as if it were directed by a single arm.

Men endowed with a kind of frantic eloquence were engaged in haranguing the populace at the street-corners, others were in the churches ringing the tocsin as loudly as ever they could. Lead was cast for bullets, cartridges were rolled about. The trees on the boulevards, the urinals, the benches, the gratings, the gas-burners, everything was torn off and thrown down. Paris, that morning, was covered with barricades. The resistance which was offered was of short duration, so that at eight o'clock the people, by voluntary surrender or by force, had got possession of five barracks, nearly all the municipal buildings, the most favourable strategic points. Of its own accord, without any effort, the Monarchy was melting away in rapid dissolution, and now an attack was made on the guard-house of the Château d'Eau, in order to liberate fifty prisoners, who were not there.

Frederick was forced to stop at the entrance to the square. It was filled with groups of armed men. The Rue Saint-Thomas and the Rue Fromanteau were occupied by companies of the Line. The Rue de Valois was choked up by an enormous barricade. The smoke which fluttered about at the top of it partly opened. Men kept running overhead, making violent gestures; they vanished from sight; then the firing was again renewed. It was answered from the guard-house without anyone being seen inside. Its windows, protected by oaken window-shutters, were pierced with loop-holes; and the monument with its two storeys, its two wings, its fountain on the first floor and its little door in the centre, was beginning to be speckled with white spots under the shock of the bullets. The three steps in front of it remained unoccupied.

At Frederick's side a man in a Greek cap, with a cartridge-box over his knitted vest, was holding a dispute with a woman with a Madras neckerchief round her shoulders. She said to him:

"Come back now! Come back!"

"Leave me alone!" replied the husband. "You can easily mind the porter's lodge by yourself. I ask, citizen, is this fair? I have on every occasion done my duty — in 1830, in '32, in '34, and in '39! To-day they're fighting again. I must fight! Go away!"

And the porter's wife ended by yielding to his remonstrances and to those of a National Guard near them — a man of forty, whose simple face was adorned with a circle of white beard. He loaded his gun and fired while talking to Frederick, as cool in the midst of the outbreak as a horticulturist in his garden. A young lad with a packing-cloth thrown over him was trying to coax this man to give him a few caps, so that he might make use of a gun he had, a fine fowling-piece which a "gentleman" had made him a present of.

"Catch on behind my back," said the good man, "and keep yourself from being seen, or you'll get yourself killed!"

The drums beat for the charge. Sharp cries, hurrahs of triumph burst forth. A continual ebbing to and fro made the multitude sway backward and forward. Frederick, caught between two thick masses of people, did not move an inch, all the time fascinated and exceedingly amused by the scene around him. The wounded who sank to the ground, the dead lying at his feet, did not seem like persons really wounded or really dead. The impression left on his mind was that he was looking on at a show.

In the midst of the surging throng, above the sea of heads, could be seen an old man in a black coat, mounted on a white horse with a velvet saddle. He held in one hand a green bough, in the other a paper, and he kept shaking them persistently; but at length, giving up all hope of obtaining a hearing, he withdrew from the scene.

The soldiers of the Line had gone, and only the municipal troops remained to defend the guard-house. A wave of dauntless spirits dashed up the steps; they were flung down; others came on to replace them, and the gate resounded under blows from iron bars. The municipal guards did not give way. But a wagon, stuffed full of hay, and burning like a gigantic torch, was dragged against the walls. Faggots were speedily brought, then straw, and a barrel of spirits of wine. The fire mounted up to the stones along the wall; the building began to send forth smoke on all sides like the crater of a volcano; and at its summit, between the balustrades of the terrace, huge flames escaped with a harsh noise. The first story of the Palais-Royal was occupied by National Guards. Shots were fired through every window in the square; the bullets whizzed, the water of the fountain, which had burst, was mingled with the blood, forming little pools on the ground. People slipped in the mud over clothes, shakos, and weapons. Frederick felt something soft under his foot. It was the hand of a sergeant in a grey great-coat, lying on his face in the stream that ran along the street. Fresh bands of people were continually coming up, pushing on the combatants at the guard-house. The firing became quicker. The wine-shops were open; people went into them from time to time to smoke a pipe and drink a glass of beer, and then came back again to fight. A lost dog began to howl. This made the people laugh.

Frederick was shaken by the impact of a man falling on his shoulder with a bullet through his back and the death-rattle in his throat. At this shot, perhaps directed against himself, he felt himself stirred up to rage; and he was plunging forward when a National Guard stopped him.

"'Tis useless! the King has just gone! Ah! if you don't believe me, go and see for yourself!"

This assurance calmed Frederick. The Place du Carrousel had a tranquil aspect. The Hôtel de Nantes stood there as fixed as ever; and the houses in the rear; the dome of the Louvre in front, the long gallery of wood at the right, and the waste plot of ground that ran unevenly as far as the sheds of the stall-keepers were, so to speak, steeped in the grey hues of the atmosphere, where indistinct murmurs seemed to mingle with the fog; while, at the opposite side of the square, a stiff light, falling through the parting of the clouds on the façade of the Tuileries, cut out all its windows into white patches. Near the Arc de Triomphe a dead horse lay on the ground. Behind the gratings groups consisting of five or six persons were chatting. The doors leading into the château were open, and the servants at the thresholds allowed the people to enter.

Below stairs, in a kind of little parlour, bowls of café au lait were handed round. A few of those present sat down to the table and made merry; others remained standing, and amongst the latter was a hackney-coachman. He snatched up with both hands a glass vessel full of powdered sugar, cast a restless glance right and left, and then began to eat voraciously, with his nose stuck into the mouth of the vessel.

At the bottom of the great staircase a man was writing his name in a register.

Frederick was able to recognise him by his back.

"Hallo, Hussonnet!"

"Yes, 'tis I," replied the Bohemian. "I am introducing myself at court. This is a nice joke, isn't it?"

"Suppose we go upstairs?"

And they reached presently the Salle des Maréchaux. The portraits of those illustrious generals, save that of Bugeaud, which had been pierced through the stomach, were all intact. They were represented leaning on their sabres with a gun-carriage behind each of them, and in formidable attitudes in contrast with the occasion. A large timepiece proclaimed it was twenty minutes past one.

Suddenly the "Marseillaise" resounded. Hussonnet and Frederick bent over the balusters. It was the people. They rushed up the stairs, shaking with a dizzying, wave-like motion bare heads, or helmets, or red caps, or else bayonets or human shoulders with such impetuosity that some people disappeared every now and then in this swarming mass, which was mounting up without a moment's pause, like a river compressed by an equinoctial tide, with a continuous roar under an irresistible impulse. When they got to the top of the stairs, they were scattered, and their chant died away. Nothing could any longer be heard but the tramp of all the shoes intermingled with the chopping sound of many voices. The crowd not being in a mischievous mood, contented themselves with looking about them. But, from time to time, an elbow, by pressing too hard, broke through a pane of glass, or else a vase or a statue rolled from a bracket down on the floor. The wainscotings cracked under the pressure of people against them. Every face was flushed; the perspiration was rolling down their features in large beads. Hussonnet made this remark:

"Heroes have not a good smell."

"Ah! you are provoking," returned Frederick.

And, pushed forward in spite of themselves, they entered an apartment in which a dais of red velvet rose as far as the ceiling. On the throne below sat a representative of the proletariat in effigy with a black beard, his shirt gaping open, a jolly air, and the stupid look of a baboon. Others climbed up the platform to sit in his place.

"What a myth!" said Hussonnet. "There you see the sovereign people!"

The armchair was lifted up on the hands of a number of persons and passed across the hall, swaying from one side to the other.

"By Jove, 'tis like a boat! The Ship of State is tossing about in a stormy sea! Let it dance the cancan! Let it dance the cancan!"

They had drawn it towards a window, and in the midst of hisses, they launched it out.

"Poor old chap!" said Hussonnet, as he saw the effigy falling into the garden, where it was speedily picked up in order to be afterwards carried to the Bastille and burned.

Then a frantic joy burst forth, as if, instead of the throne, a future of boundless happiness had appeared; and the people, less through a spirit of vindictiveness than to assert their right of possession, broke or tore the glasses, the curtains, the lustres, the tapers, the tables, the chairs, the stools, the entire furniture, including the very albums and engravings, and the corbels of the tapestry. Since they had triumphed, they must needs amuse themselves! The common herd ironically wrapped themselves up in laces and cashmeres. Gold fringes were rolled round the sleeves of blouses. Hats with ostriches' feathers adorned blacksmiths' heads, and ribbons of the Legion of Honour supplied waistbands for prostitutes. Each person satisfied his or her caprice; some danced, others drank. In the queen's apartment a woman gave a gloss to her hair with pomatum. Behind a folding-screen two lovers were playing cards. Hussonnet pointed out to Frederick an individual who was smoking a dirty pipe with his elbows resting on a balcony; and the popular frenzy redoubled with a continuous crash of broken porcelain and pieces of crystal, which, as they rebounded, made sounds resembling those produced by the plates of musical glasses.

Then their fury was overshadowed. A nauseous curiosity made them rummage all the dressing-rooms, all the recesses. Returned convicts thrust their arms into the beds in which princesses had slept, and rolled themselves on the top of them, to console themselves for not being able to embrace their owners. Others, with sinister faces, roamed about silently, looking for something to steal, but too great a multitude was there. Through the bays of the doors could be seen in the suite of apartments only the dark mass of people between the gilding of the walls under a cloud of dust. Every breast was panting. The heat became more and more suffocating; and the two friends, afraid of being stifled, seized the opportunity of making their way out.

In the antechamber, standing on a heap of garments, appeared a girl of the town as a statue of Liberty, motionless, her grey eyes wide open — a fearful sight.

They had taken three steps outside the château when a company of the National Guards, in great-coats, advanced towards them, and, taking off their foraging-caps, and, at the same time, uncovering their skulls, which were slightly bald, bowed very low to the people. At this testimony of respect, the ragged victors bridled up. Hussonnet and Frederick were not without experiencing a certain pleasure from it as well as the rest.

They were filled with ardour. They went back to the Palais-Royal. In front of the Rue Fromanteau, soldiers' corpses were heaped up on the straw. They passed close to the dead without a single quiver of emotion, feeling a certain pride in being able to keep their countenance.

The Palais overflowed with people. In the inner courtyard seven piles of wood were flaming. Pianos, chests of drawers, and clocks were hurled out through the windows. Fire-engines sent streams of water up to the roofs. Some vagabonds tried to cut the hose with their sabres. Frederick urged a pupil of the Polytechnic School to interfere. The latter did not understand him, and, moreover, appeared to be an idiot. All around, in the two galleries, the populace, having got possession of the cellars, gave themselves up to a horrible carouse. Wine flowed in streams and wetted people's feet; the mudlarks drank out of the tail-ends of the bottles, and shouted as they staggered along.

"Come away out of this," said Hussonnet; "I am disgusted with the people."

All over the Orléans Gallery the wounded lay on mattresses on the ground, with purple curtains folded round them as coverlets; and the small shopkeepers' wives and daughters from the quarter brought them broth and linen.

"No matter!" said Frederick; "for my part, I consider the people sublime."

The great vestibule was filled with a whirlwind of furious individuals. Men tried to ascend to the upper storys in order to put the finishing touches to the work of wholesale destruction. National Guards, on the steps, strove to keep them back. The most intrepid was a chasseur, who had his head bare, his hair bristling, and his straps in pieces. His shirt caused a swelling between his trousers and his coat, and he struggled desperately in the midst of the others. Hussonnet, who had sharp sight, recognised Arnoux from a distance.

Then they went into the Tuileries garden, so as to be able to breathe more freely. They sat down on a bench; and they remained for some minutes with their eyes closed, so much stunned that they had not the energy to say a word. The people who were passing came up to them and informed them that the Duchesse d'Orléans had been appointed Regent, and that it was all over. They were experiencing that species of comfort which follows rapid dénouements, when at the windows of the attics in the château appeared men-servants tearing their liveries to pieces. They flung their torn clothes into the garden, as a mark of renunciation. The people hooted at them, and then they retired.

The attention of Frederick and Hussonnet was distracted by a tall fellow who was walking quickly between the trees with a musket on his shoulder. A cartridge-box was pressed against his pea-jacket; a handkerchief was wound round his forehead under his cap. He turned his head to one side. It was Dussardier; and casting himself into their arms:

"Ah! what good fortune, my poor old friends!" without being able to say another word, so much out of breath was he with fatigue.

He had been on his legs for the last twenty-four hours. He had been engaged at the barricades of the Latin Quarter, had fought in the Rue Rabuteau, had saved three dragoons' lives, had entered the Tuileries with Colonel Dunoyer, and, after that, had repaired to the Chamber, and then to the Hôtel de Ville.

"I have come from it! all goes well! the people are victorious! the workmen and the employers are embracing one another. Ha! if you knew what I have seen! what brave fellows! what a fine sight it was!"

And without noticing that they had no arms:

"I was quite certain of finding you there! This has been a bit rough — no matter!"

A drop of blood ran down his cheek, and in answer to the questions put to him by the two others:

"Oh! 'tis nothing! a slight scratch from a bayonet!"

"However, you really ought to take care of yourself."

"Pooh! I am substantial! What does this signify? The Republic is proclaimed! We'll be happy henceforth! Some journalists, who were talking just now in front of me, said they were going to liberate Poland and Italy! No more kings! You understand? The entire land free! the entire land free!"

And with one comprehensive glance at the horizon, he spread out his arms in a triumphant attitude. But a long file of men rushed over the terrace on the water's edge.

"Ah, deuce take it! I was forgetting. I must be off. Good-bye!"

He turned round to cry out to them while brandishing his musket:

"Long live the Republic!"

From the chimneys of the château escaped enormous whirlwinds of black smoke which bore sparks along with them. The ringing of the bells sent out over the city a wild and startling alarm. Right and left, in every direction, the conquerors discharged their weapons.

Frederick, though he was not a warrior, felt the Gallic blood leaping in his veins. The magnetism of the public enthusiasm had seized hold of him. He inhaled with a voluptuous delight the stormy atmosphere filled with the odour of gunpowder; and, in the meantime, he quivered under the effluvium of an immense love, a supreme and universal tenderness, as if the heart of all humanity were throbbing in his breast.

Hussonnet said with a yawn:

"It would be time, perhaps, to go and instruct the populace."

Frederick followed him to his correspondence-office in the Place de la Bourse; and he began to compose for the Troyes newspaper an account of recent events in a lyric style — a veritable tit-bit — to which he attached his signature. Then they dined together at a tavern. Hussonnet was pensive; the eccentricities of the Revolution exceeded his own.

After leaving the café, when they repaired to the Hôtel de Ville to learn the news, the boyish impulses which were natural to him had got the upper hand once more. He scaled the barricades like a chamois, and answered the sentinels with broad jokes of a patriotic flavour.

They heard the Provisional Government proclaimed by torchlight. At last, Frederick got back to his house at midnight, overcome with fatigue.

"Well," said he to his man-servant, while the latter was undressing him, "are you satisfied?"

"Yes, no doubt, Monsieur; but I don't like to see the people dancing to music."

Next morning, when he awoke, Frederick thought of Deslauriers. He hastened to his friend's lodgings. He ascertained that the advocate had just left Paris, having been appointed a provincial commissioner.

At the soirée given the night before, he had got into contact with Ledru-Rollin, and laying siege to him in the name of the Law Schools, had snatched from him a post, a mission. However, the doorkeeper explained, he was going to write and give his address in the following week.

After this, Frederick went to see the Maréchale. She gave him a chilling reception. She resented his desertion of her. Her bitterness disappeared when he had given her repeated assurances that peace was restored.

All was quiet now. There was no reason to be afraid. He kissed her, and she declared herself in favour of the Republic, as his lordship the Archbishop of Paris had already done, and as the magistracy, the Council of State, the Institute, the marshals of France, Changarnier, M. de Falloux, all the Bonapartists, all the Legitimists, and a considerable number of Orléanists were about to do with a swiftness indicative of marvellous zeal.

The fall of the Monarchy had been so rapid that, as soon as the first stupefaction that succeeded it had passed away, there was amongst the middle class a feeling of astonishment at the fact that they were still alive. The summary execution of some thieves, who were shot without a trial, was regarded as an act of signal justice. For a month Lamartine's phrase was repeated with reference to the red flag, "which had only gone the round of the Champ de Mars, while the tricoloured flag," etc.; and all ranged themselves under its shade, each party seeing amongst the three colours only its own, and firmly determined, as soon as it would be the most powerful, to tear away the two others.

As business was suspended, anxiety and love of gaping drove everyone into the open air. The careless style of costume generally adopted attenuated differences of social position. Hatred masked itself; expectations were openly indulged in; the multitude seemed full of good-nature. The pride of having gained their rights shone in the people's faces. They displayed the gaiety of a carnival, the manners of a bivouac. Nothing could be more amusing than the aspect of Paris during the first days that followed the Revolution.

Frederick gave the Maréchale his arm, and they strolled along through the streets together. She was highly diverted by the display of rosettes in every buttonhole, by the banners hung from every window, and the bills of every colour that were posted upon the walls, and threw some money here and there into the collection-boxes for the wounded, which were placed on chairs in the middle of the pathway. Then she stopped before some caricatures representing Louis Philippe as a pastry-cook, as a mountebank, as a dog, or as a leech. But she was a little frightened at the sight of Caussidière's men with their sabres and scarfs. At other times it was a tree of Liberty that was being planted. The clergy vied with each other in blessing the Republic, escorted by servants in gold lace; and the populace thought this very fine. The most frequent spectacle was that of deputations from no matter what, going to demand something at the Hôtel de Ville, for every trade, every industry, was looking to the Government to put a complete end to its wretchedness. Some of them, it is true, went to offer it advice or to congratulate it, or merely to pay it a little visit, and to see the machine performing its functions. One day, about the middle of the month of March, as they were passing the Pont d'Arcole, having to do some commission for Rosanette in the Latin Quarter, Frederick saw approaching a column of individuals with oddly-shaped hats and long beards. At its head, beating a drum, walked a negro who had formerly been an artist's model; and the man who bore the banner, on which this inscription floated in the wind, "Artist-Painters," was no other than Pellerin.

He made a sign to Frederick to wait for him, and then reappeared five minutes afterwards, having some time before him; for the Government was, at that moment, receiving a deputation from the stone-cutters. He was going with his colleagues to ask for the creation of a Forum of Art, a kind of Exchange where the interests of Æsthetics would be discussed. Sublime masterpieces would be produced, inasmuch as the workers would amalgamate their talents. Ere long Paris would be covered with gigantic monuments. He would decorate them. He had even begun a figure of the Republic. One of his comrades had come to take it, for they were closely pursued by the deputation from the poulterers.

"What stupidity!" growled a voice in the crowd. "Always some humbug, nothing strong!"

It was Regimbart. He did not salute Frederick, but took advantage of the occasion to give vent to his own bitterness.

The Citizen spent his days wandering about the streets, pulling his moustache, rolling his eyes about, accepting and propagating any dismal news that was communicated to him; and he had only two phrases: "Take care! we're going to be run over!" or else, "Why, confound it! they're juggling with the Republic!" He was discontented with everything, and especially with the fact that we had not taken back our natural frontiers.

The very name of Lamartine made him shrug his shoulders. He did not consider Ledru-Rollin "sufficient for the problem," referred to Dupont (of the Eure) as an old numbskull, Albert as an idiot, Louis Blanc as an Utopist, and Blanqui as an exceedingly dangerous man; and when Frederick asked him what would be the best thing to do, he replied, pressing his arm till he nearly bruised it:

"To take the Rhine, I tell you! to take the Rhine, damn it!"

Then he blamed the Reactionaries. They were taking off the mask. The sack of the château of Neuilly and Suresne, the fire at Batignolles, the troubles at Lyons, all the excesses and all the grievances, were just now being exaggerated by having superadded to them Ledru-Rollin's circular, the forced currency of bank-notes, the fall of the funds to sixty francs, and, to crown all, as the supreme iniquity, a final blow, a culminating horror, the duty of forty-five centimes! And over and above all these things, there was again Socialism! Although these theories, as new as the game of goose, had been discussed sufficiently for forty years to fill a number of libraries, they terrified the wealthier citizens, as if they had been a hailstorm of aërolites; and they expressed indignation at them by virtue of that hatred which the advent of every idea provokes, simply because it is an idea — an odium from which it derives subsequently its glory, and which causes its enemies to be always beneath it, however lowly it may be.

Then Property rose in their regard to the level of Religion, and was confounded with God. The attacks made on it appeared to them a sacrilege; almost a species of cannibalism. In spite of the most humane legislation that ever existed, the spectre of '93 reappeared, and the chopper of the guillotine vibrated in every syllable of the word "Republic," which did not prevent them from despising it for its weakness. France, no longer feeling herself mistress of the situation, was beginning to shriek with terror, like a blind man without his stick or an infant that had lost its nurse.

Of all Frenchmen, M. Dambreuse was the most alarmed. The new condition of things threatened his fortune, but, more than anything else, it deceived his experience. A system so good! a king so wise! was it possible? The ground was giving way beneath their feet! Next morning he dismissed three of his servants, sold his horses, bought a soft hat to go out into the streets, thought even of letting his beard grow; and he remained at home, prostrated, reading over and over again newspapers most hostile to his own ideas, and plunged into such a gloomy mood that even the jokes about the pipe of Flocon[F] had not the power to make him smile.

As a supporter of the last reign, he was dreading the vengeance of the people so far as concerned his estates in Champagne when Frederick's lucubration fell into his hands. Then it occurred to his mind that his young friend was a very useful personage, and that he might be able, if not to serve him, at least to protect him, so that, one morning, M. Dambreuse presented himself at Frederick's residence, accompanied by Martinon.

This visit, he said, had no object save that of seeing him for a little while, and having a chat with him. In short, he rejoiced at the events that had happened, and with his whole heart adopted "our sublime motto, Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity," having always been at bottom a Republican. If he voted under the other régime with the Ministry, it was simply in order to accelerate an inevitable downfall. He even inveighed against M. Guizot, "who has got us into a nice hobble, we must admit!" By way of retaliation, he spoke in an enthusiastic fashion about Lamartine, who had shown himself "magnificent, upon my word of honour, when, with reference to the red flag — —"

"Yes, I know," said Frederick. After which he declared that his sympathies were on the side of the working-men.

"For, in fact, more or less, we are all working-men!" And he carried his impartiality so far as to acknowledge that Proudhon had a certain amount of logic in his views. "Oh, a great deal of logic, deuce take it!"

Then, with the disinterestedness of a superior mind, he chatted about the exhibition of pictures, at which he had seen Pellerin's work. He considered it original and well-painted.

Martinon backed up all he said with expressions of approval; and likewise was of his opinion that it was necessary to rally boldly to the side of the Republic. And he talked about the husbandman, his father, and assumed the part of the peasant, the man of the people. They soon came to the question of the elections for the National Assembly, and the candidates in the arrondissement of La Fortelle. The Opposition candidate had no chance.

"You should take his place!" said M. Dambreuse.

Frederick protested.

"But why not?" For he would obtain the suffrages of the Extremists owing to his personal opinions, and that of the Conservatives on account of his family; "And perhaps also," added the banker, with a smile, "thanks to my influence, in some measure."

Frederick urged as an obstacle that he did not know how to set about it.

There was nothing easier if he only got himself recommended to the patriots of the Aube by one of the clubs of the capital. All he had to do was to read out, not a profession of faith such as might be seen every day, but a serious statement of principles.

"Bring it to me; I know what goes down in the locality; and you can, I say again, render great services to the country — to us all — to myself."

In such times people ought to aid each other, and, if Frederick had need of anything, he or his friends — —

"Oh, a thousand thanks, my dear Monsieur!"

"You'll do as much for me in return, mind!"

Decidedly, the banker was a decent man.

Frederick could not refrain from pondering over his advice; and soon he was dazzled by a kind of dizziness.

The great figures of the Convention passed before his mental vision. It seemed to him that a splendid dawn was about to rise. Rome, Vienna and Berlin were in a state of insurrection, and the Austrians had been driven out of Venice. All Europe was agitated. Now was the time to make a plunge into the movement, and perhaps to accelerate it; and then he was fascinated by the costume which it was said the deputies would wear. Already he saw himself in a waistcoat with lapels and a tricoloured sash; and this itching, this hallucination, became so violent that he opened his mind to Dambreuse.

The honest fellow's enthusiasm had not abated.

"Certainly — sure enough! Offer yourself!"

Frederick, nevertheless, consulted Deslauriers.

The idiotic opposition which trammelled the commissioner in his province had augmented his Liberalism. He at once replied, exhorting Frederick with the utmost vehemence to come forward as a candidate. However, as the latter was desirous of having the approval of a great number of persons, he confided the thing to Rosanette one day, when Mademoiselle Vatnaz happened to be present.

She was one of those Parisian spinsters who, every evening when they have given their lessons or tried to sell little sketches, or to dispose of poor manuscripts, return to their own homes with mud on their petticoats, make their own dinner, which they eat by themselves, and then, with their soles resting on a foot-warmer, by the light of a filthy lamp, dream of a love, a family, a hearth, wealth — all that they lack. So it was that, like many others, she had hailed in the Revolution the advent of vengeance, and she delivered herself up to a Socialistic propaganda of the most unbridled description.

The enfranchisement of the proletariat, according to the Vatnaz, was only possible by the enfranchisement of woman. She wished to have her own sex admitted to every kind of employment, to have an enquiry made into the paternity of children, a different code, the abolition, or at least a more intelligent regulation, of marriage. In that case every Frenchwoman would be bound to marry a Frenchman, or to adopt an old man. Nurses and midwives should be officials receiving salaries from the State.

There should be a jury to examine the works of women, special editors for women, a polytechnic school for women, a National Guard for women, everything for women! And, since the Government ignored their rights, they ought to overcome force by force. Ten thousand citizenesses with good guns ought to make the Hôtel de Ville quake!

Frederick's candidature appeared to her favourable for carrying out her ideas. She encouraged him, pointing out the glory that shone on the horizon. Rosanette was delighted at the notion of having a man who would make speeches at the Chamber.

"And then, perhaps, they'll give you a good place?"

Frederick, a man prone to every kind of weakness, was infected by the universal mania. He wrote an address and went to show it to M. Dambreuse.

At the sound made by the great door falling back, a curtain gaped open a little behind a casement, and a woman appeared at it. He had not time to find out who she was; but, in the anteroom, a picture arrested his attention — Pellerin's picture — which lay on a chair, no doubt provisionally.

It represented the Republic, or Progress, or Civilisation, under the form of Jesus Christ driving a locomotive, which was passing through a virgin forest. Frederick, after a minute's contemplation, exclaimed:

"What a vile thing!"

"Is it not — eh?" said M. Dambreuse, coming in unexpectedly just at the moment when the other was giving utterance to this opinion, and fancying that it had reference, not so much to the picture as to the doctrine glorified by the work. Martinon presented himself at the same time. They made their way into the study, and Frederick was drawing a paper out of his pocket, when Mademoiselle Cécile, entering suddenly, said, articulating her words in an ingenuous fashion:

"Is my aunt here?"

"You know well she is not," replied the banker. "No matter! act as if you were at home, Mademoiselle."

"Oh! thanks! I am going away!"

Scarcely had she left when Martinon seemed to be searching for his handkerchief.

"I forgot to take it out of my great-coat — excuse me!"

"All right!" said M. Dambreuse.

Evidently he was not deceived by this manœuvre, and even seemed to regard it with favour. Why? But Martinon soon reappeared, and Frederick began reading his address.

At the second page, which pointed towards the preponderance of the financial interests as a disgraceful fact, the banker made a grimace. Then, touching on reforms, Frederick demanded free trade.

"What? Allow me, now!"

The other paid no attention, and went on. He called for a tax on yearly incomes, a progressive tax, a European federation, and the education of the people, the encouragement of the fine arts on the liberal scale.

"When the country could provide men like Delacroix or Hugo with incomes of a hundred thousand francs, where would be the harm?"

At the close of the address advice was given to the upper classes.

"Spare nothing, ye rich; but give! give!"

He stopped, and remained standing. The two who had been listening to him did not utter a word. Martinon opened his eyes wide; M. Dambreuse was quite pale. At last, concealing his emotion under a bitter smile:

"That address of yours is simply perfect!" And he praised the style exceedingly in order to avoid giving his opinion as to the matter of the address.

This virulence on the part of an inoffensive young man frightened him, especially as a sign of the times.

Martinon tried to reassure him. The Conservative party, in a little while, would certainly be able to take its revenge. In several cities the commissioners of the provisional government had been driven away; the elections were not to occur till the twenty-third of April; there was plenty of time. In short, it was necessary for M. Dambreuse to present himself personally in the Aube; and from that time forth, Martinon no longer left his side, became his secretary, and was as attentive to him as any son could be.

Frederick arrived at Rosanette's house in a very self-complacent mood. Delmar happened to be there, and told him of his intention to stand as a candidate at the Seine elections. In a placard addressed to the people, in which he addressed them in the familiar manner which one adopts towards an individual, the actor boasted of being able to understand them, and of having, in order to save them, got himself "crucified for the sake of art," so that he was the incarnation, the ideal of the popular spirit, believing that he had, in fact, such enormous power over the masses that he proposed by-and-by, when he occupied a ministerial office, to quell any outbreak by himself alone; and, with regard to the means he would employ, he gave this answer: "Never fear! I'll show them my head!"

Frederick, in order to mortify him, gave him to understand that he was himself a candidate. The mummer, from the moment that his future colleague aspired to represent the province, declared himself his servant, and offered to be his guide to the various clubs.

They visited them, or nearly all, the red and the blue, the furious and the tranquil, the puritanical and the licentious, the mystical and the intemperate, those that had voted for the death of kings, and those in which the frauds in the grocery trade had been denounced; and everywhere the tenants cursed the landlords; the blouse was full of spite against broadcloth; and the rich conspired against the poor. Many wanted indemnities on the ground that they had formerly been martyrs of the police; others appealed for money in order to carry out certain inventions, or else there were plans of phalansteria, projects for cantonal bazaars, systems of public felicity; then, here and there a flash of genius amid these clouds of folly, sudden as splashes, the law formulated by an oath, and flowers of eloquence on the lips of some soldier-boy, with a shoulder-belt strapped over his bare, shirtless chest. Sometimes, too, a gentleman made his appearance — an aristocrat of humble demeanour, talking in a plebeian strain, and with his hands unwashed, so as to make them look hard. A patriot recognised him; the most virtuous mobbed him; and he went off with rage in his soul. On the pretext of good sense, it was desirable to be always disparaging the advocates, and to make use as often as possible of these expressions: "To carry his stone to the building," "social problem," "workshop."

Delmar did not miss the opportunities afforded him for getting in a word; and when he no longer found anything to say, his device was to plant himself in some conspicuous position with one of his arms akimbo and the other in his waistcoat, turning himself round abruptly in profile, so as to give a good view of his head. Then there were outbursts of applause, which came from Mademoiselle Vatnaz at the lower end of the hall.

Frederick, in spite of the weakness of orators, did not dare to try the experiment of speaking. All those people seemed to him too unpolished or too hostile.

But Dussardier made enquiries, and informed him that there existed in the Rue Saint-Jacques a club which bore the name of the "Club of Intellect." Such a name gave good reason for hope. Besides, he would bring some friends there.

He brought those whom he had invited to take punch with him — the bookkeeper, the traveller in wines, and the architect; even Pellerin had offered to come, and Hussonnet would probably form one of the party, and on the footpath before the door stood Regimbart, with two individuals, the first of whom was his faithful Compain, a rather thick-set man marked with small-pox and with bloodshot eyes; and the second, an ape-like negro, exceedingly hairy, and whom he knew only in the character of "a patriot from Barcelona."

They passed through a passage, and were then introduced into a large room, no doubt used by a joiner, and with walls still fresh and smelling of plaster. Four argand lamps were hanging parallel to each other, and shed an unpleasant light. On a platform, at the end of the room, there was a desk with a bell; underneath it a table, representing the rostrum, and on each side two others, somewhat lower, for the secretaries. The audience that adorned the benches consisted of old painters of daubs, ushers, and literary men who could not get their works published.

In the midst of those lines of paletots with greasy collars could be seen here and there a woman's cap or a workman's linen smock. The bottom of the apartment was even full of workmen, who had in all likelihood come there to pass away an idle hour, and who had been introduced by some speakers in order that they might applaud.

Frederick took care to place himself between Dussardier and Regimbart, who was scarcely seated when he leaned both hands on his walking-stick and his chin on his hands and shut his eyes, whilst at the other end of the room Delmar stood looking down at the assembly. Sénécal appeared at the president's desk.

The worthy bookkeeper thought Frederick would be pleased at this unexpected discovery. It only annoyed him.

The meeting exhibited great respect for the president. He was one who, on the twenty-fifth of February, had desired an immediate organisation of labour. On the following day, at the Prado, he had declared himself in favour attacking the Hôtel de Ville; and, as every person at that period took some model for imitation, one copied Saint-Just, another Danton, another Marat; as for him, he tried to be like Blanqui, who imitated Robespierre. His black gloves, and his hair brushed back, gave him a rigid aspect exceedingly becoming.

He opened the proceedings with the declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen — a customary act of faith. Then, a vigorous voice struck up Béranger's "Souvenirs du Peuple."

Other voices were raised:

"No! no! not that!"

"La Casquette!" the patriots at the bottom of the apartment began to howl.

And they sang in chorus the favourite lines of the period:

"Doff your hat before my cap —

Kneel before the working-man!"

At a word from the president the audience became silent.

One of the secretaries proceeded to inspect the letters.

Some young men announced that they burned a number of the Assemblée Nationale every evening in front of the Panthéon, and they urged on all patriots to follow their example.

"Bravo! adopted!" responded the audience.

The Citizen Jean Jacques Langreneux, a printer in the Rue Dauphin, would like to have a monument raised to the memory of the martyrs of Thermidor.

Michel Evariste Népomucène, ex-professor, gave expression to the wish that the European democracy should adopt unity of language. A dead language might be used for that purpose — as, for example, improved Latin.

"No; no Latin!" exclaimed the architect.

"Why?" said the college-usher.

And these two gentlemen engaged in a discussion, in which the others also took part, each putting in a word of his own for effect; and the conversation on this topic soon became so tedious that many went away. But a little old man, who wore at the top of his prodigiously high forehead a pair of green spectacles, asked permission to speak in order to make an important communication.

It was a memorandum on the assessment of taxes. The figures flowed on in a continuous stream, as if they were never going to end. The impatience of the audience found vent at first in murmurs, in whispered talk. He allowed nothing to put him out. Then they began hissing; they catcalled him. Sénécals called the persons who were interrupting to order. The orator went on like a machine. It was necessary to catch him by the shoulder in order to stop him. The old fellow looked as if he were waking out of a dream, and, placidly lifting his spectacles, said:

"Pardon me, citizens! pardon me! I am going — a thousand excuses!"

Frederick was disconcerted with the failure of the old man's attempts to read this written statement. He had his own address in his pocket, but an extemporaneous speech would have been preferable.

Finally the president announced that they were about to pass on to the important matter, the electoral question. They would not discuss the big Republican lists. However, the "Club of Intellect" had every right, like every other, to form one, "with all respect for the pachas of the Hôtel de Ville," and the citizens who solicited the popular mandate might set forth their claims.

"Go on, now!" said Dussardier.

A man in a cassock, with woolly hair and a petulant expression on his face, had already raised his hand. He said, with a stutter, that his name was Ducretot, priest and agriculturist, and that he was the author of a work entitled "Manures." He was told to send it to a horticultural club.

Then a patriot in a blouse climbed up into the rostrum. He was a plebeian, with broad shoulders, a big face, very mild-looking, with long black hair. He cast on the assembly an almost voluptuous glance, flung back his head, and, finally, spreading out his arms:

"You have repelled Ducretot, O my brothers! and you have done right; but it was not through irreligion, for we are all religious."

Many of those present listened open-mouthed, with the air of catechumens and in ecstatic attitudes.

"It is not either because he is a priest, for we, too, are priests! The workman is a priest, just as the founder of Socialism was — the Master of us all, Jesus Christ!"

The time had arrived to inaugurate the Kingdom of God. The Gospel led directly to '89. After the abolition of slavery, the abolition of the proletariat. They had had the age of hate — the age of love was about to begin.

"Christianity is the keystone and the foundation of the new edifice — —"

"You are making game of us?" exclaimed the traveller in wines.

"Who has given me such a priest's cap?"

This interruption gave great offence. Nearly all the audience got on benches, and, shaking their fists, shouted: "Atheist! aristocrat! low rascal!" whilst the president's bell kept ringing continuously, and the cries of "Order! order!" redoubled. But, aimless, and, moreover, fortified by three cups of coffee which he had swallowed before coming to the meeting, he struggled in the midst of the others:

"What? I an aristocrat? Come, now!"

When, at length, he was permitted to give an explanation, he declared that he would never be at peace with the priests; and, since something had just been said about economical measures, it would be a splendid one to put an end to the churches, the sacred pyxes, and finally all creeds.

Somebody raised the objection that he was going very far.

"Yes! I am going very far! But, when a vessel is caught suddenly in a storm — — "

Without waiting for the conclusion of this simile, another made a reply to his observation:

"Granted! But this is to demolish at a single stroke, like a mason devoid of judgment — — "

"You are insulting the masons!" yelled a citizen covered with plaster. And persisting in the belief that provocation had been offered to him, he vomited forth insults, and wished to fight, clinging tightly to the bench whereon he sat. It took no less than three men to put him out.

Meanwhile the workman still remained on the rostrum. The two secretaries gave him an intimation that he should come down. He protested against the injustice done to him.

"You shall not prevent me from crying out, 'Eternal love to our dear France! eternal love all to the Republic!'"

"Citizens!" said Compain, after this — "Citizens!"

And, by dint of repeating "Citizens," having obtained a little silence, he leaned on the rostrum with his two red hands, which looked like stumps, bent forward his body, and blinking his eyes:

"I believe that it would be necessary to give a larger extension to the calf's head."

All who heard him kept silent, fancying that they had misunderstood his words.

"Yes! the calf's head!"

Three hundred laughs burst forth at the same time. The ceiling shook.

At the sight of all these faces convulsed with mirth, Compain shrank back. He continued in an angry tone:

"What! you don't know what the calf's head is!"

It was a paroxysm, a delirium. They held their sides. Some of them even tumbled off the benches to the ground with convulsions of laughter. Compain, not being able to stand it any longer, took refuge beside Regimbart, and wanted to drag him away.

"No! I am remaining till 'tis all over!" said the Citizen.

This reply caused Frederick to make up his mind; and, as he looked about to the right and the left to see whether his friends were prepared to support him, he saw Pellerin on the rostrum in front of him.

The artist assumed a haughty tone in addressing the meeting.

"I would like to get some notion as to who is the candidate amongst all these that represents art. For my part, I have painted a picture."

"We have nothing to do with painting pictures!" was the churlish remark of a thin man with red spots on his cheek-bones.

Pellerin protested against this interruption.

But the other, in a tragic tone:

"Ought not the Government to make an ordinance abolishing prostitution and want?"

And this phrase having at once won to his side the popular favour, he thundered against the corruption of great cities.

"Shame and infamy! We ought to catch hold of wealthy citizens on their way out of the Maison d'Or and spit in their faces — unless it be that the Government countenances debauchery! But the collectors of the city dues exhibit towards our daughters and our sisters an amount of indecency — —"

A voice exclaimed, some distance away:

"This is blackguard language! Turn him out!"

"They extract taxes from us to pay for licentiousness! Thus, the high salaries paid to actors — —"

"Help!" cried Pellerin.

He leaped from the rostrum, pushed everybody aside, and declaring that he regarded such stupid accusations with disgust, expatiated on the civilising mission of the player. Inasmuch as the theatre was the focus of national education, he would record his vote for the reform of the theatre; and to begin with, no more managements, no more privileges!

"Yes; of any sort!"

The actor's performance excited the audience, and people moved backwards and forwards knocking each other down.

"No more academies! No more institutes!"

"No missions!"

"No more bachelorships! Down with University degrees!"

"Let us preserve them," said Sénécal; "but let them be conferred by universal suffrage, by the people, the only true judge!"

Besides, these things were not the most useful. It was necessary to take a level which would be above the heads of the wealthy. And he represented them as gorging themselves with crimes under their gilded ceilings; while the poor, writhing in their garrets with famine, cultivated every virtue. The applause became so vehement that he interrupted his discourse. For several minutes he remained with his eyes closed, his head thrown back, and, as it were, lulling himself to sleep over the fury which he had aroused.

Then he began to talk in a dogmatic fashion, in phrases as imperious as laws. The State should take possession of the banks and of the insurance offices. Inheritances should be abolished. A social fund should be established for the workers. Many other measures were desirable in the future. For the time being, these would suffice, and, returning to the question of the elections: "We want pure citizens, men entirely fresh. Let some one offer himself."

Frederick arose. There was a buzz of approval made by his friends. But Sénécal, assuming the attitude of a Fouquier-Tinville, began to ask questions as to his Christian name and surname, his antecedents, life, and morals.

Frederick answered succinctly, and bit his lips. Sénécal asked whether anyone saw any impediment to this candidature.

"No! no!"

But, for his part, he saw some. All around him bent forward and strained their ears to listen. The citizen who was seeking for their support had not delivered a certain sum promised by him for the foundation of a democratic journal. Moreover, on the twenty-second of February, though he had had sufficient notice on the subject, he had failed to be at the meeting-place in the Place de Panthéon.

"I swear that he was at the Tuileries!" exclaimed Dussardier.

"Can you swear to having seen him at the Panthéon?"

Dussardier hung down his head. Frederick was silent. His friends, scandalised, regarded him with disquietude.

"In any case," Sénécal went on, "do you know a patriot who will answer to us for your principles?"

"I will!" said Dussardier.

"Oh! this is not enough; another!"

Frederick turned round to Pellerin. The artist replied to him with a great number of gestures, which meant:

"Ah! my dear boy, they have rejected myself! The deuce! What would you have?"

Thereupon Frederick gave Regimbart a nudge.

"Yes, that's true; 'tis time! I'm going."

And Regimbart stepped upon the platform; then, pointing towards the Spaniard, who had followed him:

"Allow me, citizens, to present to you a patriot from Barcelona!"

The patriot made a low bow, rolled his gleaming eyes about, and with his hand on his heart:

"Ciudadanos! mucho aprecio el honor that you have bestowed on me! however great may be vuestra bondad, mayor vuestra atención!"

"I claim the right to speak!" cried Frederick.

"Desde que se proclamo la constitución de Cadiz, ese pacto fundamental of las libertades Españolas, hasta la ultima revolución, nuestra patria cuenta numerosos y heroicos mártires."

Frederick once more made an effort to obtain a hearing:

"But, citizens! — --"

The Spaniard went on: "El martes proximo tendra lugar en la iglesia de la Magdalena un servicio fúnebre."

"In fact, this is ridiculous! Nobody understands him!"

This observation exasperated the audience.

"Turn him out! Turn him out!"

"Who? I?" asked Frederick.

"Yourself!" said S n cal, majestically. "Out with you!"

He rose to leave, and the voice of the Iberian pursued him:

"Y todos los Espa oles desear en ver alli reunidas las disputaciones de los clubs y de la milicia nacional. An oraci n f nebre en honour of the libertad Espa ola y del mundo entero will be pronunciado por un miembro del clero of Paris en la sala Bonne Nouvelle. Honour al pueblo frances que llamaria yo el primero pueblo del mundo, sino fuese ciudadano de otra naci n!"

"Aristo!" screamed one blackguard, shaking his fist at Frederick, as the latter, boiling with indignation, rushed out into the yard adjoining the place where the meeting was held.

He reproached himself for his devotedness, without reflecting that, after all, the accusations brought against him were just.

What fatal idea was this candidature! But what asses! what idiots! He drew comparisons between himself and these men, and soothed his wounded pride with the thought of their stupidity.

Then he felt the need of seeing Rosanette. After such an exhibition of ugly traits, and so much magniloquence, her dainty person would be a source of relaxation. She was aware that he had intended to present himself at a club that evening. However, she did not even ask him a single question when he came in. She was sitting near the fire, ripping open the lining of a dress. He was surprised to find her thus occupied.

"Hallo! what are you doing?"

"You can see for yourself," said she, dryly. "I am mending my clothes! So much for this Republic of yours!"

"Why do you call it mine?"

"Perhaps you want to make out that it's mine!"

And she began to upbraid him for everything that had happened in France for the last two months, accusing him of having brought about the Revolution and with having ruined her prospects by making everybody that had money leave Paris, and that she would by-and-by be dying in a hospital.

"It is easy for you to talk lightly about it, with your yearly income! However, at the rate at which things are going on, you won't have your yearly income long."

"That may be," said Frederick. "The most devoted are always misunderstood, and if one were not sustained by one's conscience, the brutes that you mix yourself up with would make you feel disgusted with your own self-denial!"

Rosanette gazed at him with knitted brows.

"Eh? What? What self-denial? Monsieur has not succeeded, it would seem? So much the better! It will teach you to make patriotic donations. Oh, don't lie! I know you have given them three hundred francs, for this Republic of yours has to be kept. Well, amuse yourself with it, my good man!"

Under this avalanche of abuse, Frederick passed from his former disappointment to a more painful disillusion.

He withdrew to the lower end of the apartment. She came up to him.

"Look here! Think it out a bit! In a country as in a house, there must be a master, otherwise, everyone pockets something out of the money spent. At first, everybody knows that Ledru-Rollin is head over ears in debt. As for Lamartine, how can you expect a poet to understand politics? Ah! 'tis all very well for you to shake your head and to presume that you have more brains than others; all the same, what I say is true! But you are always cavilling; a person can't get in a word with you! For instance, there's Fournier-Fontaine, who had stores at Saint-Roch! do you know how much he failed for? Eight hundred thousand francs! And Gomer, the packer opposite to him — another Republican, that one — he smashed the tongs on his wife's head, and he drank so much absinthe that he is going to be put into a private asylum. That's the way with the whole of them — the Republicans! A Republic at twenty-five percent. Ah! yes! plume yourself upon it!"

Frederick took himself off. He was disgusted at the foolishness of this girl, which revealed itself all at once in the language of the populace. He felt himself even becoming a little patriotic once more.

The ill-temper of Rosanette only increased. Mademoiselle Vatnaz irritated him with her enthusiasm. Believing that she had a mission, she felt a furious desire to make speeches, to carry on disputes, and — sharper than Rosanette in matters of this sort — overwhelmed her with arguments.

One day she made her appearance burning with indignation against Hussonnet, who had just indulged in some blackguard remarks at the Woman's Club. Rosanette approved of this conduct, declaring even that she would take men's clothes to go and "give them a bit of her mind, the entire lot of them, and to whip them."

Frederick entered at the same moment.

"You'll accompany me — won't you?"

And, in spite of his presence, a bickering match took place between them, one of them playing the part of a citizen's wife and the other of a female philosopher.

According to Rosanette, women were born exclusively for love, or in order to bring up children, to be housekeepers.

According to Mademoiselle Vatnaz, women ought to have a position in the Government. In former times, the Gaulish women, and also the Anglo-Saxon women, took part in the legislation; the squaws of the Hurons formed a portion of the Council. The work of civilisation was common to both. It was necessary that all should contribute towards it, and that fraternity should be substituted for egoism, association for individualism, and cultivation on a large scale for minute subdivision of land.

"Come, that is good! you know a great deal about culture just now!"

"Why not? Besides, it is a question of humanity, of its future!"

"Mind your own business!"

"This is my business!"

They got into a passion. Frederick interposed. The Vatnaz became very heated, and went so far as to uphold Communism.

"What nonsense!" said Rosanette. "How could such a thing ever come to pass?"

The other brought forward in support of her theory the examples of the Essenes, the Moravian Brethren, the Jesuits of Paraguay, the family of the Pingons near Thiers in Auvergne; and, as she gesticulated a great deal, her gold chain got entangled in her bundle of trinkets, to which was attached a gold ornament in the form of a sheep.

Suddenly, Rosanette turned exceedingly pale.

Mademoiselle Vatnaz continued extricating her trinkets.

"Don't give yourself so much trouble," said Rosanette. "Now, I know your political opinions."

"What?" replied the Vatnaz, with a blush on her face like that of a virgin.

"Oh! oh! you understand me."

Frederick did not understand. There had evidently been something taking place between them of a more important and intimate character than Socialism.

"And even though it should be so," said the Vatnaz in reply, rising up unflinchingly. "'Tis a loan, my dear — set off one debt against the other."

"Faith, I don't deny my own debts. I owe some thousands of francs — a nice sum. I borrow, at least; I don't rob anyone."

Mademoiselle Vatnaz made an effort to laugh.

"Oh! I would put my hand in the fire for him."

"Take care! it is dry enough to burn."

The spinster held out her right hand to her, and keeping it raised in front of her:

"But there are friends of yours who find it convenient for them."

"Andalusians, I suppose? as castanets?"

"You beggar!"

The Maréchale made her a low bow.

"There's nobody so charming!"

Mademoiselle Vatnaz made no reply. Beads of perspiration appeared on her temples. Her eyes fixed themselves on the carpet. She panted for breath. At last she reached the door, and slamming it vigorously: "Good night! You'll hear from me!"

"Much I care!" said Rosanette. The effort of self-suppression had shattered her nerves. She sank down on the divan, shaking all over, stammering forth words of abuse, shedding tears. Was it this threat on the part of the Vatnaz that had caused so much agitation in her mind? Oh, no! what did she care, indeed, about that one? It was the golden sheep, a present, and in the midst of her tears the name of Delmar escaped her lips. So, then, she was in love with the mummer?

"In that case, why did she take on with me?" Frederick asked himself. "How is it that he has come back again? Who compels her to keep me? Where is the sense of this sort of thing?"

Rosanette was still sobbing. She remained all the time stretched at the edge of the divan, with her right cheek resting on her two hands, and she seemed a being so dainty, so free from self-consciousness, and so sorely troubled, that he drew closer to her and softly kissed her on the forehead.

Thereupon she gave him assurances of her affection for him; the Prince had just left her, they would be free. But she was for the time being short of money. "You saw yourself that this was so, the other day, when I was trying to turn my old linings to use." No more equipages now! And this was not all; the upholsterer was threatening to resume possession of the bedroom and the large drawing-room furniture. She did not know what to do.

Frederick had a mind to answer:

"Don't annoy yourself about it. I will pay."

But the lady knew how to lie. Experience had enlightened her. He confined himself to mere expressions of sympathy.

Rosanette's fears were not vain. It was necessary to give up the furniture and to quit the handsome apartment in the Rue Drouot. She took another on the Boulevard Poissonnière, on the fourth floor.

The curiosities of her old boudoir were quite sufficient to give to the three rooms a coquettish air. There were Chinese blinds, a tent on the terrace, and in the drawing-room a second-hand carpet still perfectly new, with ottomans covered with pink silk. Frederick had contributed largely to these purchases. He had felt the joy of a newly-married man who possesses at last a house of his own, a wife of his own — and, being much pleased with the place, he used to sleep there nearly every evening.

One morning, as he was passing out through the anteroom, he saw, on the third floor, on the staircase, the shako of a National Guard who was ascending it. Where in the world was he going?

Frederick waited. The man continued his progress up the stairs, with his head slightly bent down. He raised his eyes. It was my lord Arnoux!

The situation was clear. They both reddened simultaneously, overcome by a feeling of embarrassment common to both.

Arnoux was the first to find a way out of the difficulty.

"She is better — isn't that so?" as if Rosanette were ill, and he had come to learn how she was.

Frederick took advantage of this opening.

"Yes, certainly! at least, so I was told by her maid," wishing to convey that he had not been allowed to see her.

Then they stood facing each other, both undecided as to what they would do next, and eyeing one another intently. The question now was, which of the two was going to remain. Arnoux once more solved the problem.

"Pshaw! I'll come back by-and-by. Where are you going? I go with you!"

And, when they were in the street, he chatted as naturally as usual. Unquestionably he was not a man of jealous disposition, or else he was too good-natured to get angry. Besides, his time was devoted to serving his country. He never left off his uniform now. On the twenty-ninth of March he had defended the offices of the Presse. When the Chamber was invaded, he distinguished himself by his courage, and he was at the banquet given to the National Guard at Amiens.

Hussonnet, who was still on duty with him, availed himself of his flask and his cigars; but, irreverent by nature, he delighted in contradicting him, disparaging the somewhat inaccurate style of the decrees; and decrying the conferences at the Luxembourg, the women known as the "Vésuviennes," the political section bearing the name of "Tyroliens"; everything, in fact, down to the Car of Agriculture, drawn by horses to the ox-market, and escorted by ill-favoured young girls. Arnoux, on the other hand, was the upholder of authority, and dreamed of uniting the different parties. However, his own affairs had taken an unfavourable turn, and he was more or less anxious about them.

He was not much troubled about Frederick's relations with the Maréchale; for this discovery made him feel justified (in his conscience) in withdrawing the allowance which he had renewed since the Prince had left her. He pleaded by way of excuse for this step the embarrassed condition in which he found himself, uttered many lamentations — and Rosanette was generous. The result was that M. Arnoux regarded himself as the lover who appealed entirely to the heart, an idea that raised him in his own estimation and made him feel young again. Having no doubt that Frederick was paying the Maréchale, he fancied that he was "playing a nice trick" on the young man, even called at the house in such a stealthy fashion as to keep the other in ignorance of the fact, and when they happened to meet, left the coast clear for him.

Frederick was not pleased with this partnership, and his rival's politeness seemed only an elaborate piece of sarcasm. But by taking offence at it, he would have removed from his path every opportunity of ever finding his way back to Madame Arnoux; and then, this was the only means whereby he could hear about her movements. The earthenware-dealer, in accordance with his usual practice, or perhaps with some cunning design, recalled her readily in the course of conversation, and asked him why he no longer came to see her.

Frederick, having exhausted every excuse he could frame, assured him that he had called several times to see Madame Arnoux, but without success. Arnoux was convinced that this was so, for he had often referred in an eager tone at home to the absence of their friend, and she had invariably replied that she was out when he called, so that these two lies, in place of contradicting, corroborated each other.

The young man's gentle ways and the pleasure of finding a dupe in him made Arnoux like him all the better. He carried familiarity to its extreme limits, not through disdain, but through assurance. One day he wrote saying that very urgent business compelled him to be away in the country for twenty-four hours. He begged of the young man to mount guard in his stead. Frederick dared not refuse, so he repaired to the guard-house in the Place du Carrousel.

He had to submit to the society of the National Guards, and, with the exception of a sugar-refiner, a witty fellow who drank to an inordinate extent, they all appeared to him more stupid than their cartridge-boxes. The principal subject of conversation amongst them was the substitution of sashes for belts. Others declaimed against the national workshops.

One man said:

"Where are we going?"

The man to whom the words had been addressed opened his eyes as if he were standing on the verge of an abyss.

"Where are we going?"

Then, one who was more daring than the rest exclaimed:

"It cannot last! It must come to an end!"

And as the same kind of talk went on till night, Frederick was bored to death.

Great was his surprise when, at eleven o'clock, he suddenly beheld Arnoux, who immediately explained that he had hurried back to set him at liberty, having disposed of his own business.

The fact was that he had no business to transact. The whole thing was an invention to enable him to spend twenty-four hours alone with Rosanette. But the worthy Arnoux had placed too much confidence in his own powers, so that, now in the state of lassitude which was the result, he was seized with remorse. He had come to thank Frederick, and to invite him to have some supper.

"A thousand thanks! I'm not hungry. All I want is to go to bed."

"A reason the more for having a snack together. How flabby you are! One does not go home at such an hour as this. It is too late! It would be dangerous!"

Frederick once more yielded. Arnoux was quite a favorite with his brethren-in-arms, who had not expected to see him — and he was a particular crony of the refiner. They were all fond of him, and he was such a good fellow that he was sorry Hussonnet was not there. But he wanted to shut his eyes for one minute, no longer.

"Sit down beside me!" said he to Frederick, stretching himself on the camp-bed without taking off his belt and straps. Through fear of an alarm, in spite of the regulation, he even kept his gun in his hand, then stammered out some words:

"My darling! my little angel!" and ere long was fast asleep.

Those who had been talking to each other became silent; and gradually there was a deep silence in the guard-house. Frederick tormented by the fleas, kept staring about him. The wall, painted yellow, had, half-way up, a long shelf, on which the knapsacks formed a succession of little humps, while underneath, the muskets, which had the colour of lead, rose up side by side; and there could be heard a succession of snores, produced by the National Guards, whose stomachs were outlined through the darkness in a confused fashion. On the top of the stove stood an empty bottle and some plates. Three straw chairs were drawn around the table, on which a pack of cards was displayed. A drum, in the middle of the bench, let its strap hang down.

A warm breath of air making its way through the door caused the lamp to smoke. Arnoux slept with his two arms wide apart; and, as his gun was placed in a slightly crooked position, with the butt-end downward, the mouth of the barrel came up right under his arm. Frederick noticed this, and was alarmed.

"But, no, I'm wrong, there's nothing to be afraid of! And yet, suppose he met his death!"

And immediately pictures unrolled themselves before his mind in endless succession.

He saw himself with her at night in a post-chaise, then on a river's bank on a summer's evening, and under the reflection of a lamp at home in their own house. He even fixed his attention on household expenses and domestic arrangements, contemplating, feeling already his happiness between his hands; and in order to realise it, all that was needed was that the cock of the gun should rise. The end of it could be pushed with one's toe, the gun would go off — it would be a mere accident — nothing more!

Frederick brooded over this idea like a playwright in the agonies of composition. Suddenly it seemed to him that it was not far from being carried into practical operation, and that he was going to contribute to that result — that, in fact, he was yearning for it; and then a feeling of absolute terror took possession of him. In the midst of this mental distress he experienced a sense of pleasure, and he allowed himself to sink deeper and deeper into it, with a dreadful consciousness all the time that his scruples were vanishing. In the wildness of his reverie the rest of the world became effaced, and he could only realise that he was still alive from the intolerable oppression on his chest.

"Let us take a drop of white wine!" said the refiner, as he awoke.

Arnoux sprang to his feet, and, as soon as the white wine was swallowed, he wanted to relieve Frederick of his sentry duty.

Then he brought him to have breakfast in the Rue de Chartres, at Parly's, and as he required to recuperate his energies, he ordered two dishes of meat, a lobster, an omelet with rum, a salad, etc., and finished this off with a brand of Sauterne of 1819 and one of '42 Romanée, not to speak of the champagne at dessert and the liqueurs.

Frederick did not in any way gainsay him. He was disturbed in mind as if by the thought that the other might somehow trace on his countenance the idea that had lately flitted before his imagination. With both elbows on the table and his head bent forward, so that he annoyed Frederick by his fixed stare, he confided some of his hobbies to the young man.

He wanted to take for farming purposes all the embankments on the

Northern line, in order to plant potatoes there, or else to organise on the boulevards a monster cavalcade in which the celebrities of the period would figure. He would let all the windows, which would, at the rate of three francs for each person, produce a handsome profit. In short, he dreamed of a great stroke of fortune by means of a monopoly. He assumed a moral tone, nevertheless, found fault with excesses and all sorts of misconduct, spoke about his "poor father," and every evening, as he said, made an examination of his conscience before offering his soul to God.

"A little curaçao, eh?"

"Just as you please."

As for the Republic, things would right themselves; in fact, he looked on himself as the happiest man on earth; and forgetting himself, he exalted Rosanette's attractive qualities, and even compared her with his wife. It was quite a different thing. You could not imagine a lovelier person!

"Your health!"

Frederick touched glasses with him. He had, out of complaisance, drunk a little too much. Besides, the strong sunlight dazzled him; and when they went up the Rue Vivienne together again, their shoulders touched each other in a fraternal fashion.

When he got home, Frederick slept till seven o'clock. After that he called on the Maréchale. She had gone out with somebody — with Arnoux, perhaps! Not knowing what to do with himself, he continued his promenade along the boulevard, but could not get past the Porte Saint-Martin, owing to the great crowd that blocked the way.

Want had abandoned to their own resources a considerable number of workmen, and they used to come there every evening, no doubt for the purpose of holding a review and awaiting a signal.

In spite of the law against riotous assemblies, these clubs of despair increased to a frightful extent, and many citizens repaired every day to the spot through bravado, and because it was the fashion.

All of a sudden Frederick caught a glimpse, three paces away, of M. Dambreuse along with Martinon. He turned his head away, for M. Dambreuse having got himself nominated as a representative of the people, he cherished a secret spite against him. But the capitalist stopped him.

"One word, my dear monsieur! I have some explanations to make to you."

"I am not asking you for any."

"Pray listen to me!"

It was not his fault in any way. Appeals had been made to him; pressure had, to a certain extent, been placed on him. Martinon immediately endorsed all that he had said. Some of the electors of Nogent had presented themselves in a deputation at his house.

"Besides, I expected to be free as soon as — —"

A crush of people on the footpath forced M. Dambreuse to get out of the way. A minute after he reappeared, saying to Martinon:

"This is a genuine service, really, and you won't have any reason to regret — —"

All three stood with their backs resting against a shop in order to be able to chat more at their ease.

From time to time there was a cry of, "Long live Napoléon! Long live Barbès! Down with Marie!"

The countless throng kept talking in very loud tones; and all these voices, echoing through the houses, made, so to speak, the continuous ripple of waves in a harbour. At intervals they ceased; and then could be heard voices singing the "Marseillaise."

Under the court-gates, men of mysterious aspect offered sword-sticks to those who passed. Sometimes two individuals, one of whom preceded the other, would wink, and then quickly hurry away. The footpaths were filled with groups of staring idlers. A dense crowd swayed to and fro on the pavement. Entire bands of police-officers, emerging from the alleys, had scarcely made their way into the midst of the multitude when they were swallowed up in the mass of people. Little red flags here and there looked like flames. Coachmen, from the place where they sat high up, gesticulated energetically, and then turned to go back. It was a case of perpetual movement — one of the strangest sights that could be conceived.

"How all this," said Martinon, "would have amused Mademoiselle Cécile!"

"My wife, as you are aware, does not like my niece to come with us," returned M. Dambreuse with a smile.

One could scarcely recognise in him the same man. For the past three months he had been crying, "Long live the Republic!" and he had even voted in favour of the banishment of Orléans. But there should be an end of concessions. He exhibited his rage so far as to carry a tomahawk in his pocket.

Martinon had one, too. The magistracy not being any longer irremovable, he had withdrawn from Parquet, so that he surpassed M. Dambreuse in his display of violence.

The banker had a special antipathy to Lamartine (for having supported Ledru-Rollin) and, at the same time, to Pierre Leroux, Proudhon, Considérant, Lamennais, and all the cranks, all the Socialists.

"For, in fact, what is it they want? The duty on meat and arrest for debt have been abolished. Now the project of a bank for mortgages is under consideration; the other day it was a national bank; and here are five millions in the Budget for the working-men! But luckily, it is over, thanks to Monsieur de Falloux! Good-bye to them! let them go!"

In fact, not knowing how to maintain the three hundred thousand men in the national workshops, the Minister of Public Works had that very day signed an order inviting all citizens between the ages of eighteen and twenty to take service as soldiers, or else to start for the provinces to cultivate the ground there.

They were indignant at the alternative thus put before them, convinced that the object was to destroy the Republic. They were aggrieved by the thought of having to live at a distance from the capital, as if it were a kind of exile. They saw themselves dying of fevers in desolate parts of the country. To many of them, moreover, who had been accustomed to work of a refined description, agriculture seemed a degradation; it was, in short, a mockery, a decisive breach of all the promises which had been made to them. If they offered any resistance, force would be employed against them. They had no doubt of it, and made preparations to anticipate it.

About nine o'clock the riotous assemblies which had formed at the Bastille and at the Châtelet ebbed back towards the boulevard. From the Porte Saint-Denis to the Porte Saint-Martin nothing could be seen save an enormous swarm of people, a single mass of a dark blue shade, nearly black. The men of whom one caught a glimpse all had glowing eyes, pale complexions, faces emaciated with hunger and excited with a sense of wrong.

Meanwhile, some clouds had gathered. The tempestuous sky roused the electricity that was in the people, and they kept whirling about of their own accord with the great swaying movements of a swelling sea, and one felt that there was an incalculable force in the depths of this excited throng, and as it were, the energy of an element. Then they all began exclaiming: "Lamps! lamps!" Many windows had no illumination, and stones were flung at the panes. M. Dambreuse deemed it prudent to withdraw from the scene. The two young men accompanied him home. He predicted great disasters. The people might once more invade the Chamber, and on this point he told them how he should have been killed on the fifteenth of May had it not been for the devotion of a National Guard.

"But I had forgotten! he is a friend of yours — your friend the earthenware manufacturer — Jacques Arnoux!" The rioters had been actually throttling him, when that brave citizen caught him in his arms and put him safely out of their reach.

So it was that, since then, there had been a kind of intimacy between them.

"It would be necessary, one of these days, to dine together, and, since you often see him, give him the assurance that I like him very much. He is an excellent man, and has, in my opinion, been slandered; and he has his wits about him in the morning. My compliments once more! A very good evening!"

Frederick, after he had quitted M. Dambreuse, went back to the Maréchale, and, in a very gloomy fashion, said that she should choose between him and Arnoux. She replied that she did not understand "dumps of this sort," that she did not care about Arnoux, and had no desire to cling to him. Frederick was thirsting to fly from Paris. She did not offer any opposition to this whim; and next morning they set out for Fontainebleau.

The hotel at which they stayed could be distinguished from others by a fountain that rippled in the middle of the courtyard attached to it. The doors of the various apartments opened out on a corridor, as in monasteries. The room assigned to them was large, well-furnished, hung with print, and noiseless, owing to the scarcity of tourists. Alongside the houses, people who had nothing to do kept passing up and down; then, under their windows, when the day was declining, children in the street would engage in a game of base; and this tranquillity, following so soon the tumult they had witnessed in Paris, filled them with astonishment and exercised over them a soothing influence.

Every morning at an early hour, they went to pay a visit to the château. As they passed in through the gate, they had a view of its entire front, with the five pavilions covered with sharp-pointed roofs, and its staircase of horseshoe-shape opening out to the end of the courtyard, which is hemmed in, to right and left, by two main portions of the building further down. On the paved ground lichens blended their colours here and there with the tawny hue of bricks, and the entire appearance of the palace, rust-coloured like old armour, had about it something of the impassiveness of royalty — a sort of warlike, melancholy grandeur.

At last, a man-servant made his appearance with a bunch of keys in his hand. He first showed them the apartments of the queens, the Pope's oratory, the gallery of Francis I., the mahogany table on which the Emperor signed his abdication, and in one of the rooms cut in two the old Galerie des Cerfs, the place where Christine got Monaldeschi assassinated. Rosanette listened to this narrative attentively, then, turning towards Frederick:

"No doubt it was through jealousy? Mind yourself!" After this they passed through the Council Chamber, the Guards' Room, the Throne Room, and the drawing-room of Louis XIII. The uncurtained windows sent forth a white light. The handles of the window-fastenings and the copper feet of the pier-tables were slightly tarnished with dust. The armchairs were everywhere hidden under coarse linen covers. Above the doors could be seen reliquaries of Louis XIV., and here and there hangings representing the gods of Olympus, Psyche, or the battles of Alexander.

As she was passing in front of the mirrors, Rosanette stopped for a moment to smooth her head-bands.

After passing through the donjon-court and the Saint-Saturnin Chapel, they reached the Festal Hall.

They were dazzled by the magnificence of the ceiling, which was divided into octagonal apartments set off with gold and silver, more finely chiselled than a jewel, and by the vast number of paintings covering the walls, from the immense chimney-piece, where the arms of France were surrounded by crescents and quivers, down to the musicians' gallery, which had been erected at the other end along the entire width of the hall. The ten arched windows were wide open; the sun threw its lustre on the pictures, so that they glowed beneath its rays; the blue sky continued in an endless curve the ultramarine of the arches; and from the depths of the woods, where the lofty summits of the trees filled up the horizon, there seemed to come an echo of flourishes blown by ivory trumpets, and mythological ballets, gathering together under the foliage princesses and nobles disguised as nymphs or fauns — an epoch of ingenuous science, of violent passions, and sumptuous art, when the ideal was to sweep away the world in a vision of the Hesperides, and when the mistresses of kings mingled their glory with the stars. There was a portrait of one of the most beautiful of these celebrated women in the form of Diana the huntress, and even the Infernal Diana, no doubt in order to indicate the power which she possessed even beyond the limits of the tomb. All these symbols confirmed her glory, and there remained about the spot something of her, an indistinct voice, a radiation that stretched out indefinitely. A feeling of mysterious retrospective voluptuousness took possession of Frederick.

In order to divert these passionate longings into another channel, he began to gaze tenderly on Rosanette, and asked her would she not like to have been this woman?

"What woman?"

"Diane de Poitiers!"

He repeated:

"Diane de Poitiers, the mistress of Henry II."

She gave utterance to a little "Ah!" that was all.

Her silence clearly demonstrated that she knew nothing about the matter, and had failed to comprehend his meaning, so that out of complaisance he said to her:

"Perhaps you are getting tired of this?"

"No, no — quite the reverse." And lifting up her chin, and casting around her a glance of the vaguest description, Rosanette let these words escape her lips:

"It recalls some memories to me!"

Meanwhile, it was easy to trace on her countenance a strained expression, a certain sense of awe; and, as this air of gravity made her look all the prettier, Frederick overlooked it.

The carps' pond amused her more. For a quarter of an hour she kept flinging pieces of bread into the water in order to see the fishes skipping about.

Frederick had seated himself by her side under the linden-trees. He saw in imagination all the personages who had haunted these walls — Charles V., the Valois Kings, Henry IV., Peter the Great, Jean Jacques Rousseau, and "the fair mourners of the stage-boxes," Voltaire, Napoléon, Pius VII., and Louis Philippe; and he felt himself environed, elbowed, by these tumultuous dead people. He was stunned by such a confusion of historic figures, even though he found a certain fascination in contemplating them, nevertheless.

At length they descended into the flower-garden.

It is a vast rectangle, which presents to the spectator, at the first glance, its wide yellow walks, its square grass-plots, its ribbons of box-wood, its yew-trees shaped like pyramids, its low-lying green swards, and its narrow borders, in which thinly-sown flowers make spots on the grey soil. At the end of the garden may be seen a park through whose entire length a canal makes its way.

Royal residences have attached to them a peculiar kind of melancholy, due, no doubt, to their dimensions being much too large for the limited number of guests entertained within them, to the silence which one feels astonished to find in them after so many flourishes of trumpets, to the immobility of their luxurious furniture, which attests by the aspect of age and decay it gradually assumes the transitory character of dynasties, the eternal wretchedness of all things; and this exhalation of the centuries, enervating and funereal, like the perfume of a mummy, makes itself felt even in untutored brains. Rosanette yawned immoderately. They went back to the hotel.

After their breakfast an open carriage came round for them. They started from Fontainebleau at a point where several roads diverged, then went up at a walking pace a gravelly road leading towards a little pine-wood. The trees became larger, and, from time to time, the driver would say, "This is the Frères Siamois, the Pharamond, the Bouquet de Roi," not forgetting a single one of these notable sites, sometimes even drawing up to enable them to admire the scene.

They entered the forest of Franchard. The carriage glided over the grass like a sledge; pigeons which they could not see began cooing. Suddenly, the waiter of a café made his appearance, and they alighted before the railing of a garden in which a number of round tables were placed. Then, passing on the left by the walls of a ruined abbey, they made their way over big boulders of stone, and soon reached the lower part of the gorge.

It is covered on one side with sandstones and juniper-trees tangled together, while on the other side the ground, almost quite bare, slopes towards the hollow of the valley, where a foot-track makes a pale line through the brown heather; and far above could be traced a flat cone-shaped summit with a telegraph-tower behind it.

Half-an-hour later they stepped out of the vehicle once more, in order to climb the heights of Aspremont.

The roads form zigzags between the thick-set pine-trees under rocks with angular faces. All this corner of the forest has a sort of choked-up look — a rather wild and solitary aspect. One thinks of hermits in connection with it — companions of huge stags with fiery crosses between their horns, who were wont to welcome with paternal smiles the good kings of France when they knelt before their grottoes. The warm air was filled with a resinous odour, and roots of trees crossed one another like veins close to the soil. Rosanette slipped over them, grew dejected, and felt inclined to shed tears.

But, at the very top, she became joyous once more on finding, under a roof made of branches, a sort of tavern where carved wood was sold. She drank a bottle of lemonade, and bought a holly-stick; and, without one glance towards the landscape which disclosed itself from the plateau, she entered the Brigands' Cave, with a waiter carrying a torch in front of her. Their carriage was awaiting them in the Bas Breau.

A painter in a blue blouse was working at the foot of an oak-tree with his box of colours on his knees. He raised his head and watched them as they passed.

In the middle of the hill of Chailly, the sudden breaking of a cloud caused them to turn up the hoods of their cloaks. Almost immediately the rain stopped, and the paving-stones of the street glistened under the sun when they were re-entering the town.

Some travellers, who had recently arrived, informed them that a terrible battle had stained Paris with blood. Rosanette and her lover were not surprised. Then everybody left; the hotel became quiet, the gas was put out, and they were lulled to sleep by the murmur of the fountain in the courtyard.

On the following day they went to see the Wolf's Gorge, the Fairies' Pool, the Long Rock, and the Marlotte.[\[G\]](#) Two days later, they began again at random, just as their coachman thought fit to drive them, without asking where they were, and often even neglecting the famous sites.

They felt so comfortable in their old landau, low as a sofa, and covered with a rug made of a striped material which was quite faded. The moats, filled with brushwood, stretched out under their eyes with a gentle, continuous movement. White rays passed like arrows through the tall ferns. Sometimes a road that was no longer used presented itself before them, in a straight line, and here and there might be seen a feeble growth of weeds. In the centre between four cross-roads, a crucifix extended its four arms. In other places, stakes were bending down like dead trees, and little curved paths, which were lost under the leaves, made them feel a longing to pursue them. At the same moment the horse turned round; they entered there; they plunged into the mire. Further down moss had sprouted out at the sides of the deep ruts.

They believed that they were far away from all other people, quite alone. But suddenly a game-keeper with his gun, or a band of women in rags with big bundles of fagots on their backs, would hurry past them.

When the carriage stopped, there was a universal silence. The only sounds that reached them were the blowing of the horse in the shafts with the faint cry of a bird more than once repeated.

The light at certain points illuminating the outskirts of the wood, left the interior in deep shadow, or else, attenuated in the foreground by a sort of twilight, it exhibited in the background violet vapours, a white radiance. The midday sun, falling directly on wide tracts of greenery, made splashes of light over them, hung gleaming drops of silver from the ends of the branches, streaked the grass with long lines of emeralds, and flung gold spots on the beds of dead leaves. When they let their heads fall back, they could distinguish the sky through the tops of the trees. Some of them, which were enormously high, looked like patriarchs or emperors, or, touching one another at their extremities formed with their long shafts, as it were, triumphal arches; others, sprouting forth obliquely from below, seemed like falling columns. This heap of big vertical lines gaped open. Then, enormous green billows unrolled themselves in unequal embossments as far as the surface of the valleys, towards which advanced the brows of other hills looking down on white plains, which ended by losing themselves in an undefined pale tinge.

Standing side by side, on some rising ground, they felt, as they drank in the air, the pride of a life more free penetrating into the depths of their souls, with a superabundance of energy, a joy which they could not explain.

The variety of trees furnished a spectacle of the most diversified character. The beeches with their smooth white bark twisted their tops together. Ash trees softly curved their bluish branches. In the tufts of the hornbeams rose up holly stiff as bronze. Then came a row of thin birches, bent into elegiac attitudes; and the pine-trees, symmetrical as organ pipes, seemed to be singing a song as they swayed to and fro. There were gigantic oaks with knotted forms, which had been violently shaken, stretched themselves out from the soil and pressed close against each other, and with firm trunks resembling torsos, launched forth to heaven despairing appeals with their bare arms and furious threats, like a group of Titans struck motionless in the midst of their rage. An atmosphere of gloom, a feverish languor, brooded over the pools, whose sheets of water were cut into flakes by the overshadowing thorn-trees. The lichens on their banks, where the wolves come to drink, are of the colour of sulphur, burnt, as it were, by the footprints of witches, and the incessant croaking of the frogs responds to the cawing of the crows as they wheel through the air. After this they passed through the monotonous glades, planted here and there with a staddle. The sound of iron falling with a succession of rapid blows could be heard. On the side of the hill a group of quarrymen were breaking the rocks. These rocks became more and more numerous and finally filled up the entire landscape, cube-shaped like houses, flat like flagstones, propping up, overhanging, and became intermingled with each other, as if they were the ruins, unrecognisable and monstrous, of some vanished city. But the wild chaos they exhibited made one rather dream of volcanoes, of deluges, of great unknown cataclysms. Frederick said they had been there since the beginning of the world, and would remain so till the end. Rosanette turned aside her head, declaring that this would drive her out of her mind, and went off to collect sweet heather. The little violet blossoms, heaped up near one another, formed unequal plates, and the soil, which was giving way underneath, placed soft dark fringes on the sand spangled with mica.

One day they reached a point half-way up a hill, where the soil was full of sand. Its surface, untrodden till now, was streaked so as to resemble symmetrical waves. Here and there, like promontories on the dry bed of an ocean, rose up rocks with the vague outlines of animals, tortoises thrusting forward their heads, crawling seals, hippopotami, and bears. Not a soul around them. Not a single sound. The shingle glowed under the dazzling rays of the sun, and all at once in this vibration of light the specimens of the brute creation that met their gaze began to move about. They returned home quickly, flying from the dizziness that had seized hold of them, almost dismayed.

The gravity of the forest exercised an influence over them, and hours passed in silence, during which, allowing themselves to yield to the lulling effects of springs, they remained as it were sunk in the torpor of a calm intoxication. With his arm around her waist, he listened to her talking while the birds were warbling, noticed with the same glance the black grapes on her bonnet and the juniper-berries, the draperies of her veil, and the spiral forms assumed by the clouds, and when he bent towards her the freshness of her skin mingled with the strong perfume of the woods. They found amusement in everything. They showed one another, as a curiosity, gossamer threads of the Virgin hanging from bushes, holes full of water in the middle of stones, a squirrel on the branches, the way in which two butterflies kept flying after them; or else, at twenty paces from them, under the trees, a hind strode on peacefully, with an air of nobility and gentleness, its doe walking by its side.

Rosanette would have liked to run after it to embrace it.

She got very much alarmed once, when a man suddenly presenting himself, showed her three vipers in a box. She wildly flung herself on Frederick's breast. He felt happy at the thought that she was weak and that he was strong enough to defend her.

That evening they dined at an inn on the banks of the Seine. The table was near the window, Rosanette sitting opposite him, and he contemplated her little well-shaped white nose, her turned-up lips, her bright eyes, the swelling bands of her nut-brown hair, and her pretty oval face. Her dress of raw silk clung to her somewhat drooping shoulders, and her two hands, emerging from their sleeves, joined close together as if they were one — carved, poured out wine, moved over the table-cloth. The waiters placed before them a chicken with its four limbs stretched out, a stew of eels in a dish of pipe-clay, wine that had got spoiled, bread that was too hard, and knives with notches in them. All these things made the repast more enjoyable and strengthened the illusion. They fancied that they were in the middle of a journey in Italy on their honeymoon. Before starting again they went for a walk along the bank of the river.

The soft blue sky, rounded like a dome, leaned at the horizon on the indentations of the woods. On the opposite side, at the end of the meadow, there was a village steeple; and further away, to the left, the roof of a house made a red spot on the river, which wound its way without any apparent motion. Some rushes bent over it, however, and the water lightly shook some poles fixed at its edge in order to hold nets. An osier bow-net and two or three old fishing-boats might be seen there. Near the inn a girl in a straw hat was drawing buckets out of a well. Every time they came up again, Frederick heard the grating sound of the chain with a feeling of inexpressible delight.

He had no doubt that he would be happy till the end of his days, so natural did his felicity appear to him, so much a part of his life, and so intimately associated with this woman's being. He was irresistibly impelled to address her with words of endearment. She answered with pretty little speeches, light taps on the shoulder, displays of tenderness that charmed him by their unexpectedness. He discovered in her quite a new sort of beauty, in fact, which was perhaps only the reflection of surrounding things, unless it happened to bud forth from their hidden potentialities.

When they were lying down in the middle of the field, he would stretch himself out with his head on her lap, under the shelter of her parasol; or else with their faces turned towards the green sward, in the centre of which they rested, they kept gazing towards one another so that their pupils seemed to intermingle, thirsting for one another and ever satiating their thirst, and then with half-closed eyelids they lay side by side without uttering a single word.

Now and then the distant rolling of a drum reached their ears. It was the signal-drum which was being beaten in the different villages calling on people to go and defend Paris.

"Oh! look here! 'tis the rising!" said Frederick, with a disdainful pity, all this excitement now presenting to his mind a pitiful aspect by the side of their love and of eternal nature.

And they talked about whatever happened to come into their heads, things that were perfectly familiar to them, persons in whom they took no interest, a thousand trifles. She chatted with him about her chambermaid and her hairdresser. One day she was so self-forgetful that she told him her age — twenty-nine years. She was becoming quite an old woman.

Several times, without intending it, she gave him some particulars with reference to her own life. She had been a "shop girl," had taken a trip to England, and had begun studying for the stage; all this she told without any explanation of how these changes had come about; and he found it impossible to reconstruct her entire history.

She related to him more about herself one day when they were seated side by side under a plane-tree at the back of a meadow. At the road-side, further down, a little barefooted girl, standing amid a heap of dust, was making a cow go to pasture. As soon as she caught sight of them she came up to beg, and while with one hand she held up her tattered petticoat, she kept scratching with the other her black hair, which, like a wig of Louis XIV.'s time, curled round her dark face, lighted by a magnificent pair of eyes.

"She will be very pretty by-and-by," said Frederick.

"How lucky she is, if she has no mother!" remarked Rosanette.

"Eh? How is that?"

"Certainly. I, if it were not for mine — —"

She sighed, and began to speak about her childhood. Her parents were weavers in the Croix-Rousse. She acted as an apprentice to her father. In vain did the poor man wear himself out with hard work; his wife was continually abusing him, and sold everything for drink. Rosanette could see, as if it were yesterday, the room they occupied with the looms ranged lengthwise against the windows, the pot boiling on the stove, the bed painted like mahogany, a cupboard facing it, and the obscure loft where she used to sleep up to the time when she was fifteen years old. At length a gentleman made his appearance on the scene — a fat man with a face of the colour of boxwood, the manners of a devotee, and a suit of black clothes. Her mother and this man had a conversation together, with the result that three days afterwards — Rosanette stopped, and with a look in which there was as much bitterness as shamelessness:

"It was done!"

Then, in response to a gesture of Frederick.

"As he was married (he would have been afraid of compromising himself in his own house), I was brought to a private room in a restaurant, and told that I would be happy, that I would get a handsome present.

"At the door, the first thing that struck me was a candelabrum of vermilion on a table, on which there were two covers. A mirror on the ceiling showed their reflections, and the blue silk hangings on the walls made the entire apartment resemble an alcove; I was seized with astonishment. You understand — a poor creature who had never seen anything before. In spite of my dazed condition of mind, I got frightened. I wanted to go away. However, I remained.

"The only seat in the room was a sofa close beside the table. It was so soft that it gave way under me. The mouth of the hot-air stove in the middle of the carpet sent out towards me a warm breath, and there I sat without taking anything. The waiter, who was standing near me, urged me to eat. He poured out for me immediately a large glass of wine. My head began to swim, I wanted to open the window. He said to me:

"No, Mademoiselle! that is forbidden."

"And he left me.

"The table was covered with a heap of things that I had no knowledge of. Nothing there seemed to me good. Then I fell back on a pot of jam, and patiently waited. I did not know what prevented him from coming. It was very late — midnight at last — I couldn't bear the fatigue any longer. While pushing aside one of the pillows, in order to hear better, I found under my hand a kind of album — a book of engravings, they were vulgar pictures. I was sleeping on top of it when he entered the room."

She hung down her head and remained pensive.

The leaves rustled around them. Amid the tangled grass a great foxglove was swaying to and fro. The sunlight flowed like a wave over the green expanse, and the silence was interrupted at intervals by the browsing of the cow, which they could no longer see.

Rosanette kept her eyes fixed on a particular spot, three paces away from her, her nostrils heaving, and her mind absorbed in thought. Frederick caught hold of her hand.

"How you suffered, poor darling!"

"Yes," said she, "more than you imagine! So much so that I wanted to make an end of it — they had to fish me up!"

"What?"

"Ah! think no more about it! I love you, I am happy! kiss me!"

And she picked off, one by one, the sprigs of the thistles which clung to the hem of her gown.

Frederick was thinking more than all on what she had not told him. What were the means by which she had gradually emerged from wretchedness? To what lover did she owe her education? What had occurred in her life down to the day when he first came to her house? Her latest avowal was a bar to these questions. All he asked her was how she had made Arnoux's acquaintance.

"Through the Vatnaz."

"Wasn't it you that I once saw with both of them at the Palais-Royal?"

He referred to the exact date. Rosanette made a movement which showed a sense of deep pain.

"Yes, it is true! I was not gay at that time!"

But Arnoux had proved himself a very good fellow. Frederick had no doubt of it. However, their friend was a queer character, full of faults. He took care to recall them. She quite agreed with him on this point.

"Never mind! One likes him, all the same, this camel!"

"Still — even now?" said Frederick.

She began to redden, half smiling, half angry.

"Oh, no! that's an old story. I don't keep anything hidden from you. Even though it might be so, with him it is different. Besides, I don't think you are nice towards your victim!"

"My victim!"

Rosanette caught hold of his chin.

"No doubt!"

And in the lisping fashion in which nurses talk to babies:

"Have always been so good! Never went a-by-by with his wife?"

"I! never at any time!"

Rosanette smiled. He felt hurt by this smile of hers, which seemed to him a proof of indifference.

But she went on gently, and with one of those looks which seem to appeal for a denial of the truth:

"Are you perfectly certain?"

"Not a doubt of it!"

Frederick solemnly declared on his word of honour that he had never bestowed a thought on Madame Arnoux, as he was too much in love with another woman.

"Why, with you, my beautiful one!"

"Ah! don't laugh at me! You only annoy me!"

He thought it a prudent course to invent a story — to pretend that he was swayed by a passion. He manufactured some circumstantial details. This woman, however, had rendered him very unhappy.

"Decidedly, you have not been lucky," said Rosanette.

"Oh! oh! I may have been!" wishing to convey in this way that he had been often fortunate in his love-affairs, so that she might have a better opinion of him, just as Rosanette did not avow how many lovers she had had, in order that he might have more respect for her — for there will always be found in the midst of the most intimate confidences restrictions, false shame, delicacy, and pity. You divine either in the other or in yourself precipices or miry paths which prevent you from penetrating any farther; moreover, you feel that you will not be understood. It is hard to express accurately the thing you mean, whatever it may be; and this is the reason why perfect unions are rare.

The poor Maréchale had never known one better than this. Often, when she gazed at Frederick, tears came into her eyes; then she would raise them or cast a glance towards the horizon, as if she saw there some bright dawn, perspectives of boundless felicity. At last, she confessed one day to him that she wished to have a mass said, "so that it might bring a blessing on our love."

How was it, then, that she had resisted him so long? She could not tell herself. He repeated his question a great many times; and she replied, as she clasped him in her arms:

"It was because I was afraid, my darling, of loving you too well!"

On Sunday morning, Frederick read, amongst the list of the wounded given in a newspaper, the name of Dussardier. He uttered a cry, and showing the paper to Rosanette, declared that he was going to start at once for Paris.

"For what purpose?"

"In order to see him, to nurse him!"

"You are not going, I'm sure, to leave me by myself?"

"Come with me!"

"Ha! to poke my nose in a squabble of that sort? Oh, no, thanks!"

"However, I cannot — —"

"Ta! ta! ta! as if they had need of nurses in the hospitals! And then, what concern is he of yours any longer? Everyone for himself!"

He was roused to indignation by this egoism on her part, and he reproached himself for not being in the capital with the others. Such indifference to the misfortunes of the nation had in it something shabby, and only worthy of a small shopkeeper. And now, all of a sudden, his intrigue with Rosanette weighed on his mind as if it were a crime. For an hour they were quite cool towards each other.

Then she appealed to him to wait, and not expose himself to danger.

"Suppose you happen to be killed?"

"Well, I should only have done my duty!"

Rosanette gave a jump. His first duty was to love her; but, no doubt, he did not care about her any longer. There was no common sense in what he was going to do. Good heavens! what an idea!

Frederick rang for his bill. But to get back to Paris was not an easy matter. The Leloir stagecoach had just left; the Lecomte berlins would not be starting; the diligence from Bourbonnais would not be passing till a late hour that night, and perhaps it might be full, one could never tell. When he had lost a great deal of time in making enquiries about the various modes of conveyance, the idea occurred to him to travel post. The master of the post-house refused to supply him with horses, as Frederick had no passport. Finally, he hired an open carriage — the same one in which they had driven about the country — and at about five o'clock they arrived in front of the Hôtel du Commerce at Melun.

The market-place was covered with piles of arms. The prefect had forbidden the National Guards to proceed towards Paris. Those who did not belong to his department wished to go on. There was a great deal of shouting, and the inn was packed with a noisy crowd.

Rosanette, seized with terror, said she would not go a step further, and once more begged of him to stay. The innkeeper and his wife joined in her entreaties. A decent sort of man who happened to be dining there interposed, and observed that the fighting would be over in a very short time. Besides, one ought to do his duty. Thereupon the Maréchale redoubled her sobs. Frederick got exasperated. He handed her his purse, kissed her quickly, and disappeared.

On reaching Corbeil, he learned at the station that the insurgents had cut the rails at regular distances, and the coachman refused to drive him any farther; he said that his horses were "overspent."

Through his influence, however, Frederick managed to procure an indifferent cabriolet, which, for the sum of sixty francs, without taking into account the price of a drink for the driver, was to convey him as far as the Italian barrier. But at a hundred paces from the barrier his coachman made him descend and turn back. Frederick was walking along the pathway, when suddenly a sentinel thrust out his bayonet. Four men seized him, exclaiming:

"This is one of them! Look out! Search him! Brigand! scoundrel!"

And he was so thoroughly stupefied that he let himself be dragged to the guard-house of the barrier, at the very point where the Boulevards des Gobelins and de l'Hôpital and Rues Godefroy and Mauffetard converge.

Four barricades formed at the ends of four different ways enormous sloping ramparts of paving-stones. Torches were glimmering here and there. In spite of the rising clouds of dust he could distinguish foot-soldiers of the Line and National Guards, all with their faces blackened, their chests uncovered, and an aspect of wild excitement.

They had just captured the square, and had shot down a number of men. Their rage had not yet cooled. Frederick said he had come from Fontainebleau to the relief of a wounded comrade who lodged in the Rue Bellefond. Not one of them would believe him at first. They examined his hands; they even put their noses to his ear to make sure that he did not smell of powder.

However, by dint of repeating the same thing, he finally satisfied a captain, who directed two fusiliers to conduct him to the guard-house of the Jardin des Plantes. They descended the Boulevard de l'Hôpital. A strong breeze was blowing. It restored him to animation.

After this they turned up the Rue du Marché aux Chevaux. The Jardin des Plantes at the right formed a long black mass, whilst at the left the entire front of the Pitié, illuminated at every window, blazed like a conflagration, and shadows passed rapidly over the window-panes.

The two men in charge of Frederick went away. Another accompanied him to the Polytechnic School. The Rue Saint-Victor was quite dark, without a gas-lamp or a light at any window to relieve the gloom. Every ten minutes could be heard the words:

"Sentinels! mind yourselves!"

And this exclamation, cast into the midst of the silence, was prolonged like the repeated striking of a stone against the side of a chasm as it falls through space.

Every now and then the stamp of heavy footsteps could be heard drawing nearer. This was nothing less than a patrol consisting of about a hundred men. From this confused mass escaped whisperings and the dull clanking of iron; and, moving away with a rhythmic swing, it melted into the darkness.

In the middle of the crossing, where several streets met, a dragoon sat motionless on his horse. From time to time an express rider passed at a rapid gallop; then the silence was renewed. Cannons, which were being drawn along the streets, made, on the pavement, a heavy rolling sound that seemed full of menace — a sound different from every ordinary sound — which oppressed the heart. The sounds was profound, unlimited — a black silence. Men in white blouses accosted the soldiers, spoke one or two words to them, and then vanished like phantoms.

The guard-house of the Polytechnic School overflowed with people. The threshold was blocked up with women, who had come to see their sons or their husbands. They were sent on to the Panthéon, which had been transformed into a dead-house; and no attention was paid to Frederick. He pressed forward resolutely, solemnly declaring that his friend Dussardier was waiting for him, that he was at death's door. At last they sent a corporal to accompany him to the top of the Rue Saint-Jacques, to the Mayor's office in the twelfth arrondissement.

The Place du Panthéon was filled with soldiers lying asleep on straw. The day was breaking; the bivouac-fires were extinguished.

The insurrection had left terrible traces in this quarter. The soil of the streets, from one end to the other, was covered with risings of various sizes. On the wrecked barricades had been piled up omnibuses, gas-pipes, and cart-wheels. In certain places there were little dark pools, which must have been blood. The houses were riddled with projectiles, and their framework could be seen under the plaster that was peeled off. Window-blinds, each attached only by a single nail, hung like rags. The staircases having fallen in, doors opened on vacancy. The interiors of rooms could be perceived with their papers in strips. In some instances dainty objects had remained in them quite intact. Frederick noticed a timepiece, a parrot-stick, and some engravings.

When he entered the Mayor's office, the National Guards were chattering without a moment's pause about the deaths of Bréa and Négrier, about the deputy Charbonnel, and about the Archbishop of Paris. He heard them saying that the Duc d'Aumale had landed at Boulogne, that Barbès had fled from Vincennes, that the artillery were coming up from Bourges, and that abundant aid was arriving from the provinces. About three o'clock some one brought good news.

Truce-bearers from the insurgents were in conference with the President of the Assembly.

Thereupon they all made merry; and as he had a dozen francs left, Frederick sent for a dozen bottles of wine, hoping by this means to hasten his deliverance. Suddenly a discharge of musketry was heard. The drinking stopped. They peered with distrustful eyes into the unknown — it might be Henry V.

In order to get rid of responsibility, they took Frederick to the Mayor's office in the eleventh arrondissement, which he was not permitted to leave till nine o'clock in the morning.

He started at a running pace from the Quai Voltaire. At an open window an old man in his shirt-sleeves was crying, with his eyes raised. The Seine glided peacefully along. The sky was of a clear blue; and in the trees round the Tuileries birds were singing.

Frederick was just crossing the Place du Carrousel when a litter happened to be passing by. The soldiers at the guard-house immediately presented arms; and the officer, putting his hand to his shako, said: "Honour to unfortunate bravery!" This phrase seemed to have almost become a matter of duty. He who pronounced it appeared to be, on each occasion, filled with profound emotion. A group of people in a state of fierce excitement followed the litter, exclaiming:

"We will avenge you! we will avenge you!"

The vehicles kept moving about on the boulevard, and women were making lint before the doors. Meanwhile, the outbreak had been quelled, or very nearly so. A proclamation from Cavaignac, just posted up, announced the fact. At the top of the Rue Vivienne, a company of the Garde Mobile appeared. Then the citizens uttered cries of enthusiasm. They raised their hats, applauded, danced, wished to embrace them, and to invite them to drink; and flowers, flung by ladies, fell from the balconies.

At last, at ten o'clock, at the moment when the cannon was booming as an attack was being made on the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, Frederick reached the abode of Dussardier. He found the bookkeeper in his garret, lying asleep on his back. From the adjoining apartment a woman came forth with silent tread — Mademoiselle Vatnaz.

She led Frederick aside and explained to him how Dussardier had got wounded.

On Saturday, on the top of a barricade in the Rue Lafayette, a young fellow wrapped in a tricoloured flag cried out to the National Guards: "Are you going to shoot your brothers?" As they advanced, Dussardier threw down his gun, pushed away the others, sprang over the barricade, and, with a blow of an old shoe, knocked down the insurgent, from whom he tore the flag. He had afterwards been found under a heap of rubbish with a slug of copper in his thigh. It was found necessary to make an incision in order to extract the projectile.

Mademoiselle Vatnaz arrived the same evening, and since then had not quitted his side.

She intelligently prepared everything that was needed for the dressings, assisted him in taking his medicine or other liquids, attended to his slightest wishes, left and returned again with footsteps more light than those of a fly, and gazed at him with eyes full of tenderness.

Frederick, during the two following weeks, did not fail to come back every morning. One day, while he was speaking about the devotion of the Vatnaz, Dussardier shrugged his shoulders:

"Oh! no! she does this through interested motives."

"Do you think so?"

He replied: "I am sure of it!" without seeming disposed to give any further explanation.

She had loaded him with kindnesses, carrying her attentions so far as to bring him the newspapers in which his gallant action was extolled. He even confessed to Frederick that he felt uneasy in his conscience.

Perhaps he ought to have put himself on the other side with the men in blouses; for, indeed, a heap of promises had been made to them which had not been carried out. Those who had vanquished them hated the Republic; and, in the next place, they had treated them very harshly. No doubt they were in the wrong — not quite, however; and the honest fellow was tormented by the thought that he might have fought against the righteous cause. Sénécal, who was immured in the Tuileries, under the terrace at the water's edge, had none of this mental anguish.

There were nine hundred men in the place, huddled together in the midst of filth, without the slightest order, their faces blackened with powder and clotted blood, shivering with ague and breaking out into cries of rage, and those who were brought there to die were not separated from the rest. Sometimes, on hearing the sound of a detonation, they believed that they were all going to be shot. Then they dashed themselves against the walls, and after that fell back again into their places, so much stupefied by suffering that it seemed to them that they were living in a nightmare, a mournful hallucination. The lamp, which hung from the arched roof, looked like a stain of blood, and little green and yellow flames fluttered about, caused by the emanations from the vault. Through fear of epidemics, a commission was appointed. When he had advanced a few steps, the President recoiled, frightened by the stench from the excrements and from the corpses.

As soon as the prisoners drew near a vent-hole, the National Guards who were on sentry, in order to prevent them from shaking the bars of the grating, prodded them indiscriminately with their bayonets.

As a rule they showed no pity. Those who were not beaten wished to signalise themselves. There was a regular outbreak of fear. They avenged themselves at the same time on newspapers, clubs, mobs, speech-making — everything that had exasperated them during the last three months, and in spite of the victory that had been gained, equality (as if for the punishment of its defenders and the exposure of its enemies to ridicule) manifested itself in a triumphal fashion — an equality of brute beasts, a dead level of sanguinary vileness; for the fanaticism of self-interest balanced the madness of want, aristocracy had the same fits of fury as low debauchery, and the cotton cap did not show itself less hideous than the red cap. The public mind was agitated just as it would be after great convulsions of nature. Sensible men were rendered imbeciles for the rest of their lives on account of it.

Père Roque had become very courageous, almost foolhardy. Having arrived on the 26th at Paris with some of the inhabitants of Nogent, instead of going back at the same time with them, he had gone to give his assistance to the National Guard encamped at the Tuileries; and he was quite satisfied to be placed on sentry in front of the terrace at the water's side. There, at any rate, he had these brigands under his feet! He was delighted to find that they were beaten and humiliated, and he could not refrain from uttering invectives against them.

One of them, a young lad with long fair hair, put his face to the bars, and asked for bread. M. Roque ordered him to hold his tongue. But the young man repeated in a mournful tone:

"Bread!"

"Have I any to give you?"

Other prisoners presented themselves at the vent-hole, with their bristling beards, their burning eyeballs, all pushing forward, and yelling:

"Bread!"

Père Roque was indignant at seeing his authority slighted. In order to frighten them he took aim at them; and, borne onward into the vault by the crush that nearly smothered him, the young man, with his head thrown backward, once more exclaimed:

"Bread!"

"Hold on! here it is!" said Père Roque, firing a shot from his gun. There was a fearful howl — then, silence. At the side of the trough something white could be seen lying.

After this, M. Roque returned to his abode, for he had a house in the Rue Saint-Martin, which he used as a temporary residence; and the injury done to the front of the building during the riots had in no slight degree contributed to excite his rage. It seemed to him, when he next saw it, that he had exaggerated the amount of damage done to it. His recent act had a soothing effect on him, as if it indemnified him for his loss.

It was his daughter herself who opened the door for him. She immediately made the remark that she had felt uneasy at his excessively prolonged absence. She was afraid that he had met with some misfortune — that he had been wounded.

This manifestation of filial love softened Père Roque. He was astonished that she should have set out on a journey without Catherine.

"I sent her out on a message," was Louise's reply.

And she made enquiries about his health, about one thing or another; then, with an air of indifference, she asked him whether he had chanced to come across Frederick:

"No; I didn't see him!"

It was on his account alone that she had come up from the country. Some one was walking at that moment in the lobby.

"Oh! excuse me — —"

And she disappeared.

Catherine had not found Frederick. He had been several days away, and his intimate friend, M. Deslauriers, was now living in the provinces.

Louise once more presented herself, shaking all over, without being able to utter a word. She leaned against the furniture.

"What's the matter with you? Tell me — what's the matter with you?" exclaimed her father.

She indicated by a wave of her hand that it was nothing, and with a great effort of will she regained her composure.

The keeper of the restaurant at the opposite side of the street brought them soup. But Père Roque had passed through too exciting an ordeal to be able to control his emotions. "He is not likely to die;" and at dessert he had a sort of fainting fit. A doctor was at once sent for, and he prescribed a potion. Then, when M. Roque was in bed, he asked to be as well wrapped up as possible in order to bring on perspiration. He gasped; he moaned.

"Thanks, my good Catherine! Kiss your poor father, my chicken! Ah! those revolutions!"

And, when his daughter scolded him for having made himself ill by tormenting his mind on her account, he replied:

"Yes! you are right! But I couldn't help it! I am too sensitive!"

CHAPTER XV.

"How Happy Could I Be With Either."

Madame Dambreuse, in her boudoir, between her niece and Miss John, was listening to M. Roque as he described the severe military duties he had been forced to perform.

She was biting her lips, and appeared to be in pain.

"Oh! 'tis nothing! it will pass away!"

And, with a gracious air:

"We are going to have an acquaintance of yours at dinner with us,
— Monsieur Moreau."

Louise gave a start.

"Oh! we'll only have a few intimate friends there — amongst others, Alfred de Cisy."

And she spoke in terms of high praise about his manners, his personal appearance, and especially his moral character.

Madame Dambreuse was nearer to a correct estimate of the state of affairs than she imagined; the Vicomte was contemplating marriage. He said so to Martinon, adding that Mademoiselle Cécile was certain to like him, and that her parents would accept him.

To warrant him in going so far as to confide to another his intentions on the point, he ought to have satisfactory information with regard to her dowry. Now Martinon had a suspicion that Cécile was M. Dambreuse's natural daughter; and it is probable that it would have been a very strong step on his part to ask for her hand at any risk. Such audacity, of course, was not unaccompanied by danger; and for this reason Martinon had, up to the present, acted in a way that could not compromise him. Besides, he did not see how he could well get rid of the aunt. Cisy's confidence induced him to make up his mind; and he had formally made his proposal to the banker, who, seeing no obstacle to it, had just informed Madame Dambreuse about the matter.

Cisy presently made his appearance. She arose and said:

"You have forgotten us. Cécile, shake hands!"

At the same moment Frederick entered the room.

"Ha! at last we have found you again!" exclaimed Père Roque. "I called with Cécile on you three times this week!"

Frederick had carefully avoided them. He pleaded by way of excuse that he spent all his days beside a wounded comrade.

For a long time, however, a heap of misfortunes had happened to him, and he tried to invent stories to explain his conduct. Luckily the guests arrived in the midst of his explanation. First of all M. Paul de Grémonville, the diplomatist whom he met at the ball; then Fumichon, that manufacturer whose conservative zeal had scandalised him one evening. After them came the old Duchesse de Montreuil Nantua.

But two loud voices in the anteroom reached his ears. They were that of M. de Nonancourt, an old beau with the air of a mummy preserved in cold cream, and that of Madame de Larsillois, the wife of a prefect of Louis Philippe. She was terribly frightened, for she had just heard an organ playing a polka which was a signal amongst the insurgents. Many of the wealthy class of citizens had similar apprehensions; they thought that men in the catacombs were going to blow up the Faubourg Saint-Germain. Some noises escaped from cellars, and things that excited suspicion were passed up to windows.

Everyone in the meantime made an effort to calm Madame de Larsillois. Order was re-established. There was no longer anything to fear.

"Cavaignac has saved us!"

As if the horrors of the insurrection had not been sufficiently numerous, they exaggerated them. There had been twenty-three thousand convicts on the side of the Socialists — no less!

They had no doubt whatever that food had been poisoned, that Gardes Mobiles had been sawn between two planks, and that there had been inscriptions on flags inciting the people to pillage and incendiarism.

"Aye, and something more!" added the ex-prefect.

"Oh, dear!" said Madame Dambreuse, whose modesty was shocked, while she indicated the three young girls with a glance.

M. Dambreuse came forth from his study accompanied by Martinon. She turned her head round and responded to a bow from Pellerin, who was advancing towards her. The artist gazed in a restless fashion towards the walls. The banker took him aside, and conveyed to him that it was desirable for the present to conceal his revolutionary picture.

"No doubt," said Pellerin, the rebuff which he received at the Club of Intellect having modified his opinions.

M. Dambreuse let it slip out very politely that he would give him orders for other works.

"But excuse me. Ah! my dear friend, what a pleasure!"

Arnoux and Madame Arnoux stood before Frederick.

He had a sort of vertigo. Rosanette had been irritating him all the afternoon with her display of admiration for soldiers, and the old passion was re-awakened.

The steward came to announce that dinner was on the table. With a look she directed the Vicomte to take Cécile's arm, while she said in a low tone to Martinon, "You wretch!" And then they passed into the dining-room.

Under the green leaves of a pineapple, in the middle of the tablecloth, a dorado stood, with its snout reaching towards a quarter of roebuck and its tail just grazing a bushy dish of crayfish. Figs, huge cherries, pears, and grapes (the first fruits of Parisian cultivation) rose like pyramids in baskets of old Saxe. Here and there a bunch of flowers mingled with the shining silver plate. The white silk blinds, drawn down in front of the windows, filled the apartment with a mellow light. It was cooled by two fountains, in which there were pieces of ice; and tall men-servants, in short breeches, waited on them. All these luxuries seemed more precious after the emotion of the past few days. They felt a fresh delight at possessing things which they had been afraid of losing; and Nonancourt expressed the general sentiment when he said:

"Ah! let us hope that these Republican gentlemen will allow us to dine!"

"In spite of their fraternity!" Père Roque added, with an attempt at wit.

These two personages were placed respectively at the right and at the left of Madame Dambreuse, her husband being exactly opposite her, between Madame Larsillois, at whose side was the diplomatist and the old Duchesse, whom Fumichon elbowed. Then came the painter, the dealer in faïence, and Mademoiselle Louise; and, thanks to Martinon, who had carried her chair to enable her to take a seat near Louise, Frederick found himself beside Madame Arnoux.

She wore a black barège gown, a gold hoop on her wrist, and, as on the first day that he dined at her house, something red in her hair, a branch of fuchsia twisted round her chignon. He could not help saying:

"'Tis a long time since we saw each other."

"Ah!" she returned coldly.

He went on, in a mild tone, which mitigated the impertinence of his question:

"Have you thought of me now and then?"

"Why should I think of you?"

Frederick was hurt by these words.

"You are right, perhaps, after all."

But very soon, regretting what he had said, he swore that he had not lived a single day without being ravaged by the remembrance of her.

"I don't believe a single word of it, Monsieur."

"However, you know that I love you!"

Madame Arnoux made no reply.

"You know that I love you!"

She still kept silent.

"Well, then, go be hanged!" said Frederick to himself.

And, as he raised his eyes, he perceived Mademoiselle Roque at the other side of Madame Arnoux.

She thought it gave her a coquettish look to dress entirely in green, a colour which contrasted horribly with her red hair. The buckle of her belt was large and her collar cramped her neck. This lack of elegance had, no doubt, contributed to the coldness which Frederick at first displayed towards her. She watched him from where she sat, some distance away from him, with curious glances; and Arnoux, close to her side, in vain lavished his gallantries — he could not get her to utter three words, so that, finally abandoning all hope of making himself agreeable to her, he listened to the conversation. She now began rolling about a slice of Luxembourg pineapple in her pea-soup.

Louis Blanc, according to Fumichon, owned a large house in the Rue Saint-Dominique, which he refused to let to the workmen.

"For my part, I think it rather a funny thing," said Nonancourt, "to see Ledru-Rollin hunting over the Crown lands."

"He owes twenty thousand francs to a goldsmith!" Cisy interposed,

"and 'tis maintained — — "

Madame Darnbreuse stopped him.

"Ah! how nasty it is to be getting hot about politics! and for such a young man, too! fie, fie! Pay attention rather to your fair neighbour!"

After this, those who were of a grave turn of mind attacked the newspapers. Arnoux took it on himself to defend them. Frederick mixed himself up in the discussion, describing them as commercial establishments just like any other house of business. Those who wrote for them were, as a rule, imbeciles or humbugs; he gave his listeners to understand that he was acquainted with journalists, and combated with sarcasms his friend's generous sentiments.

Madame Arnoux did not notice that this was said through a feeling of spite against her.

Meanwhile, the Vicomte was torturing his brain in the effort to make a conquest of Mademoiselle Cécile. He commenced by finding fault with the shape of the decanters and the graving of the knives, in order to show his artistic tastes. Then he talked about his stable, his tailor and his shirtmaker. Finally, he took up the subject of religion, and seized the opportunity of conveying to her that he fulfilled all his duties.

Martinon set to work in a better fashion. With his eyes fixed on her continually, he praised, in a monotonous fashion, her birdlike profile, her dull fair hair, and her hands, which were unusually short. The plain-looking young girl was delighted at this shower of flatteries.

It was impossible to hear anything, as all present were talking at the tops of their voices. M. Roque wanted "an iron hand" to govern France. Nonancourt even regretted that the political scaffold was abolished. They ought to have all these scoundrels put to death together.

"Now that I think of it, are we speaking of Dussardier?" said M. Darnbreuse, turning towards Frederick.

The worthy shopman was now a hero, like Sallesse, the brothers Jeanson, the wife of Pequillet, etc.

Frederick, without waiting to be asked, related his friend's history; it threw around him a kind of halo.

Then they came quite naturally to refer to different traits of courage. According to the diplomatist, it was not hard to face death, witness the case of men who fight duels.

"We might take the Vicomte's testimony on that point," said Martinon.

The Vicomte's face got very flushed.

The guests stared at him, and Louise, more astonished than the rest, murmured:

"What is it, pray?"

"He sank before Frederick," returned Arnoux, in a very low tone.

"Do you know anything, Mademoiselle?" said Nonancourt presently, and he repeated her answer to Madame Dambreuse, who, bending forward a little, began to fix her gaze on Frederick.

Martinon did not wait for Cécile's questions. He informed her that this affair had reference to a woman of improper character. The young girl drew back slightly in her chair, as if to escape from contact with such a libertine.

The conversation was renewed. The great wines of Bordeaux were sent round, and the guests became animated. Pellerin had a dislike to the Revolution, because he attributed to it the complete loss of the Spanish Museum.

This is what grieved him most as a painter.

As he made the latter remark, M. Roque asked:

"Are you not yourself the painter of a very notable picture?"

"Perhaps! What is it?"

"It represents a lady in a costume — faith! — a little light, with a purse, and a peacock behind."

Frederick, in his turn, reddened. Pellerin pretended that he had not heard the words.

"Nevertheless, it is certainly by you! For your name is written at the bottom of it, and there is a line on it stating that it is Monsieur Moreau's property."

One day, when Père Roque and his daughter were waiting at his residence to see him, they saw the Maréchale's portrait. The old gentleman had even taken it for "a Gothic painting."

"No," said Pellerin rudely, "'tis a woman's portrait."

Martinon added:

"And a living woman's, too, and no mistake! Isn't that so, Cisy?"

"Oh! I know nothing about it."

"I thought you were acquainted with her. But, since it causes you pain, I must beg a thousand pardons!"

Cisy lowered his eyes, proving by his embarrassment that he must have played a pitiable part in connection with this portrait. As for Frederick, the model could only be his mistress. It was one of those convictions which are immediately formed, and the faces of the assembly revealed it with the utmost clearness.

"How he lied to me!" said Madame Arnoux to herself.

"It is for her, then, that he left me," thought Louise.

Frederick had an idea that these two stories might compromise him; and when they were in the garden, Mademoiselle Cécile's wooer burst out laughing in his face.

"Oh, not at all! 'twill do you good! Go ahead!"

What did he mean? Besides, what was the cause of this good nature, so contrary to his usual conduct? Without giving any explanation, he proceeded towards the lower end, where the ladies were seated. The men were standing round them, and, in their midst, Pellerin was giving vent to his ideas. The form of government most favourable for the arts was an enlightened monarchy. He was disgusted with modern times, "if it were only on account of the National Guard" — he regretted the Middle Ages and the days of Louis XIV. M. Roque congratulated him on his opinions, confessing that they overcame all his prejudices against artists. But almost without a moment's delay he went off when the voice of Fumichon attracted his attention.

Arnoux tried to prove that there were two Socialisms — a good and a bad. The manufacturer saw no difference whatever between them, his head becoming dizzy with rage at the utterance of the word "property."

"'Tis a law written on the face of Nature! Children cling to their toys. All peoples, all animals are of my opinion. The lion even, if he were able to speak, would declare himself a proprietor! Thus I myself, messieurs, began with a capital of fifteen thousand francs. Would you be surprised to hear that for thirty years I used to get up at four o'clock every morning? I've had as much pain as five hundred devils in making my fortune! And people will come and tell me I'm not the master, that my money is not my money; in short, that property is theft!"

"But Proudhon — — "

"Let me alone with your Proudhon! if he were here I think I'd strangle him!"

He would have strangled him. After the intoxicating drink he had swallowed Fumichon did not know what he was talking about any longer, and his apoplectic face was on the point of bursting like a bombshell.

"Good morrow, Arnoux," said Hussonnet, who was walking briskly over the grass.

He brought M. Dambreuse the first leaf of a pamphlet, bearing the title of "The Hydra," the Bohemian defending the interests of a reactionary club, and in that capacity he was introduced by the banker to his guests.

Hussonnet amused them by relating how the dealers in tallow hired three hundred and ninety-two street boys to bawl out every evening "Lamps," [H] and then turning into ridicule the principles of '89, the emancipation of the negroes, and the orators of the Left; and he even went so far as to do "Prudhomme on a Barricade," perhaps under the influence of a kind of jealousy of these rich people who had enjoyed a good dinner. The caricature did not please them overmuch. Their faces grew long.

This, however, was not a time for joking, so Nonancourt observed, as he recalled the death of Monseigneur Affre and that of General de Bréa. These events were being constantly alluded to, and arguments were constructed out of them. M. Roque described the archbishop's end as "everything that one could call sublime." Fumichon gave the palm to the military personage, and instead of simply expressing regret for these two murders, they held disputes with a view to determining which ought to excite the greatest indignation. A second comparison was next instituted, namely, between Lamoricière and Cavaignac, M. Dambreuse glorifying Cavaignac, and Nonancourt, Lamoricière.

Not one of the persons present, with the exception of Arnoux, had ever seen either of them engaged in the exercise of his profession. None the less, everyone formulated an irrevocable judgment with reference to their operations.

Frederick, however, declined to give an opinion on the matter, confessing that he had not served as a soldier. The diplomatist and M.

Dambreuse gave him an approving nod of the head. In fact, to have fought against the insurrection was to have defended the Republic. The result, although favourable, consolidated it; and now they had got rid of the vanquished, they wanted to be conquerors.

As soon as they had got out into the garden, Madame Dambreuse, taking Cisy aside, chided him for his awkwardness. When she caught sight of Martinon, she sent him away, and then tried to learn from her future nephew the cause of his witticisms at the Vicomte's expense.

"There's nothing of the kind."

"And all this, as it were, for the glory of M. Moreau. What is the object of it?"

"There's no object. Frederick is a charming fellow. I am very fond of him."

"And so am I, too. Let him come here. Go and look for him!"

After two or three commonplace phrases, she began by lightly disparaging her guests, and in this way she placed him on a higher level than the others. He did not fail to run down the rest of the ladies more or less, which was an ingenious way of paying her compliments. But she left his side from time to time, as it was a reception-night, and ladies were every moment arriving; then she returned to her seat, and the entirely accidental arrangement of the chairs enabled them to avoid being overheard.

She showed herself playful and yet grave, melancholy and yet quite rational. Her daily occupations interested her very little — there was an order of sentiments of a less transitory kind. She complained of the poets, who misrepresent the facts of life, then she raised her eyes towards heaven, asking of him what was the name of a star.

Two or three Chinese lanterns had been suspended from the trees; the wind shook them, and lines of coloured light quivered on her white dress. She sat, after her usual fashion, a little back in her armchair, with a footstool in front of her. The tip of a black satin shoe could be seen; and at intervals Madame Dambreuse allowed a louder word than usual, and sometimes even a laugh, to escape her.

These coquetries did not affect Martinon, who was occupied with Cécile; but they were bound to make an impression on M. Roque's daughter, who was chatting with Madame Arnoux. She was the only member of her own sex present whose manners did not appear disdainful. Louise came and sat beside her; then, yielding to the desire to give vent to her emotions:

"Does he not talk well — Frederick Moreau, I mean?"

"Do you know him?"

"Oh! intimately! We are neighbours; and he used to amuse himself with me when I was quite a little girl."

Madame Arnoux cast at her a sidelong glance, which meant:

"I suppose you are not in love with him?"

The young girl's face replied with an untroubled look:

"Yes."

"You see him often, then?"

"Oh, no! only when he comes to his mother's house. 'Tis ten months now since he came. He promised, however, to be more particular."

"The promises of men are not to be too much relied on, my child."

"But he has not deceived me!"

"As he did others!"

Louise shivered: "Can it be by any chance that he promised something to her;" and her features became distracted with distrust and hate.

Madame Arnoux was almost afraid of her; she would have gladly withdrawn what she had said. Then both became silent.

As Frederick was sitting opposite them on a folding-stool, they kept staring at him, the one with propriety out of the corner of her eye, the other boldly, with parted lips, so that Madame Dambreuse said to him:

"Come, now, turn round, and let her have a good look at you!"

"Whom do you mean?"

"Why, Monsieur Roque's daughter!"

And she rallied him on having won the heart of this young girl from the provinces. He denied that this was so, and tried to make a laugh of it.

"Is it credible, I ask you? Such an ugly creature!"

However, he experienced an intense feeling of gratified vanity. He recalled to mind the reunion from which he had returned one night, some time before, his heart filled with bitter humiliation, and he drew a deep breath, for it seemed to him that he was now in the environment that really suited him, as if all these things, including the Dambreuse mansion, belonged to himself. The ladies formed a semicircle around him while they listened to what he was saying, and in order to create an effect, he declared that he was in favor of the re-establishment of divorce, which he maintained should be easily procurable, so as to enable people to quit one another and come back to one another without any limit as often as they liked. They uttered loud protests; a few of them began to talk in whispers. Little exclamations every now and then burst forth from the place where the wall was overshadowed with aristolochia. One would imagine that it was a mirthful cackling of hens; and he developed his theory with that self-complacency which is generated by the consciousness of success. A man-servant brought into the arbour a tray laden with ices. The gentlemen drew close together and began to chat about the recent arrests.

Thereupon Frederick revenged himself on the Vicomte by making him believe that he might be prosecuted as a Legitimist. The other urged by way of reply that he had not stirred outside his own room. His adversary enumerated in a heap the possible mischances. MM. Dambreuse and Grémonville found the discussion very amusing. Then they paid Frederick compliments, while expressing regret at the same time that he did not employ his abilities in the defence of order. They grasped his hand with the utmost warmth; he might for the future count on them. At last, just as everyone was leaving, the Vicomte made a low bow to Cécile:

"Mademoiselle, I have the honour of wishing you a very good evening."

She replied coldly:

"Good evening." But she gave Martinon a parting smile.

Père Roque, in order to continue the conversation between himself and Arnoux, offered to see him home, "as well as Madame" — they were going the same way. Louise and Frederick walked in front of them. She had caught hold of his arm; and, when she was some distance away from the others she said:

"Ah! at last! at last! I've had enough to bear all the evening! How nasty those women were! What haughty airs they had!"

He made an effort to defend them.

"First of all, you might certainly have spoken to me the moment you came in, after being away a whole year!"

"It was not a year," said Frederick, glad to be able to give some sort of rejoinder on this point in order to avoid the other questions.

"Be it so; the time appeared very long to me, that's all. But, during this horrid dinner, one would think you felt ashamed of me. Ah! I understand — I don't possess what is needed in order to please as they do."

"You are mistaken," said Frederick.

"Really! Swear to me that you don't love anyone!"

He did swear.

"You love nobody but me alone?"

"I assure you, I do not."

This assurance filled her with delight. She would have liked to lose her way in the streets, so that they might walk about together the whole night.

"I have been so much tormented down there! Nothing was talked about but barricades. I imagined I saw you falling on your back covered with blood! Your mother was confined to her bed with rheumatism. She knew nothing about what was happening. I had to hold my tongue. I could stand it no longer, so I took Catherine with me."

And she related to him all about her departure, her journey, and the lie she told her father.

"He's bringing me back in two days. Come to-morrow evening, as if you were merely paying a casual visit, and take advantage of the opportunity to ask for my hand in marriage."

Never had Frederick been further from the idea of marriage. Besides, Mademoiselle Roque appeared to him a rather absurd young person. How different she was from a woman like Madame Dambreuse! A very different future was in store for him. He had found reason to-day to feel perfectly certain on that point; and, therefore, this was not the time to involve himself, from mere sentimental motives, in a step of such momentous importance. It was necessary now to be decisive — and then he had seen Madame Arnoux once more. Nevertheless he was rather embarrassed by Louise's candour.

He said in reply to her last words:

"Have you considered this matter?"

"How is that?" she exclaimed, frozen with astonishment and indignation.

He said that to marry at such a time as this would be a piece of folly.

"So you don't want to have me?"

"Nay, you don't understand me!"

And he plunged into a confused mass of verbiage in order to impress upon her that he was kept back by more serious considerations; that he had business on hand which it would take a long time to dispose of; that even his inheritance had been placed in jeopardy (Louise cut all this explanation short with one plain word); that, last of all, the present political situation made the thing undesirable. So, then, the most reasonable course was to wait patiently for some time. Matters would, no doubt, right themselves — at least, he hoped so; and, as he could think of no further grounds to go upon just at that moment, he pretended to have been suddenly reminded that he should have been with Dussardier two hours ago.

Then, bowing to the others, he darted down the Rue Hauteville, took a turn round the Gymnase, returned to the boulevard, and quickly rushed up Rosanette's four flights of stairs.

M. and Madame Arnoux left Père Roque and his daughter at the entrance of the Rue Saint-Denis. Husband and wife returned home without exchanging a word, as he was unable to continue chattering any longer, feeling quite worn out. She even leaned against his shoulder. He was the only man who had displayed any honourable sentiments during the evening. She entertained towards him feelings of the utmost indulgence. Meanwhile, he cherished a certain degree of spite against Frederick.

"Did you notice his face when a question was asked about the portrait? When I told you that he was her lover, you did not wish to believe what I said!"

"Oh! yes, I was wrong!"

Arnoux, gratified with his triumph, pressed the matter even further.

"I'd even make a bet that when he left us, a little while ago, he went to see her again. He's with her at this moment, you may be sure! He's finishing the evening with her!"

Madame Arnoux had pulled down her hat very low.

"Why, you're shaking all over!"

"That's because I feel cold!" was her reply.

As soon as her father was asleep, Louise made her way into Catherine's room, and, catching her by the shoulders, shook her.

"Get up — quick! as quick as ever you can! and go and fetch a cab for me!"

Catherine replied that there was not one to be had at such an hour.

"Will you come with me yourself there, then?"

"Where, might I ask?"

"To Frederick's house!"

"Impossible! What do you want to go there for?"

It was in order to have a talk with him. She could not wait. She must see him immediately.

"Just think of what you're about to do! To present yourself this way at a house in the middle of the night! Besides, he's asleep by this time!"

"I'll wake him up!"

"But this is not a proper thing for a young girl to do!"

"I am not a young girl — I'm his wife! I love him! Come — put on your shawl!"

Catherine, standing at the side of the bed, was trying to make up her mind how to act. She said at last:

"No! I won't go!"

"Well, stay behind then! I'll go there by myself!"

Louise glided like an adder towards the staircase. Catherine rushed after her, and came up with her on the footpath outside the house. Her remonstrances were fruitless; and she followed the girl, fastening her undervest as she hurried along in the rear. The walk appeared to her exceedingly tedious. She complained that her legs were getting weak from age.

"I'll go on after you — faith, I haven't the same thing to drive me on that you have!"

Then she grew softened.

"Poor soul! You haven't anyone now but your Catau, don't you see?"

From time to time scruples took hold of her mind.

"Ah, this is a nice thing you're making me do! Suppose your father happened to wake and miss you! Lord God, let us hope no misfortune will happen!"

In front of the Théâtre des Variétés, a patrol of National Guards stopped them.

Louise immediately explained that she was going with her servant to look for a doctor in the Rue Rumfort. The patrol allowed them to pass on.

At the corner of the Madeleine they came across a second patrol, and, Louise having given the same explanation, one of the National Guards asked in return:

"Is it for a nine months' ailment, ducky?"

"Oh, damn it!" exclaimed the captain, "no blackguardisms in the ranks! Pass on, ladies!"

In spite of the captain's orders, they still kept cracking jokes.

"I wish you much joy!"

"My respects to the doctor!"

"Mind the wolf!"

"They like laughing," Catherine remarked in a loud tone. "That's the way it is to be young."

At length they reached Frederick's abode.

Louise gave the bell a vigorous pull, which she repeated several times. The door opened a little, and, in answer to her inquiry, the porter said:

"No!"

"But he must be in bed!"

"I tell you he's not. Why, for nearly three months he has not slept at home!"

And the little pane of the lodge fell down sharply, like the blade of a guillotine.

They remained in the darkness under the archway.

An angry voice cried out to them:

"Be off!"

The door was again opened; they went away.

Louise had to sit down on a boundary-stone; and clasping her face with her hands, she wept copious tears welling up from her full heart. The day was breaking, and carts were making their way into the city.

Catherine led her back home, holding her up, kissing her, and offering her every sort of consolation that she could extract from her own experience. She need not give herself so much trouble about a lover. If this one failed her, she could find others.

CHAPTER XVI.

Unpleasant News from Rosanette.

When Rosanette's enthusiasm for the Gardes Mobiles had calmed down, she became more charming than ever, and Frederick insensibly glided into the habit of living with her.

The best portion of the day was the morning on the terrace. In a light cambric dress, and with her stockingless feet thrust into slippers, she kept moving about him — went and cleaned her canaries' cage, gave her gold-fishes some water, and with a fire-shovel did a little amateur gardening in the box filled with clay, from which arose a trellis of nasturtiums, giving an attractive look to the wall. Then, resting, with their elbows on the balcony, they stood side by side, gazing at the vehicles and the passers-by; and they warmed themselves in the sunlight, and made plans for spending the evening. He absented himself only for two hours at most, and, after that, they would go to some theatre, where they would get seats in front of the stage; and Rosanette, with a large bouquet of flowers in her hand, would listen to the instruments, while Frederick, leaning close to her ear, would tell her comic or amatory stories. At other times they took an open carriage to drive to the Bois de Boulogne. They kept walking about slowly until the middle of the night. At last they made their way home through the Arc de Triomphe and the grand avenue, inhaling the breeze, with the stars above their heads, and with all the gas-lamps ranged in the background of the perspective like a double string of luminous pearls.

Frederick always waited for her when they were going out together. She was a very long time fastening the two ribbons of her bonnet; and she smiled at herself in the mirror set in the wardrobe; then she would draw her arm over his, and, making him look at himself in the glass beside her:

"We produce a good effect in this way, the two of us side by side. Ah! my poor darling, I could eat you!"

He was now her chattel, her property. She wore on her face a continuous radiance, while at the same time she appeared more languishing in manner, more rounded in figure; and, without being able to explain in what way, he found her altered, nevertheless.

One day she informed him, as if it were a very important bit of news, that my lord Arnoux had lately set up a linen-draper's shop for a woman who was formerly employed in his pottery-works. He used to go there every evening — "he spent a great deal on it no later than a week ago; he had even given her a set of rosewood furniture."

"How do you know that?" said Frederick.

"Oh! I'm sure of it."

Delphine, while carrying out some orders for her, had made enquiries about the matter. She must, then, be much attached to Arnoux to take such a deep interest in his movements. He contented himself with saying to her in reply:

"What does this signify to you?"

Rosanette looked surprised at this question.

"Why, the rascal owes me money. Isn't it atrocious to see him keeping beggars?"

Then, with an expression of triumphant hate in her face:

"Besides, she is having a nice laugh at him. She has three others on hand. So much the better; and I'll be glad if she eats him up, even to the last farthing!"

Arnoux had, in fact, let himself be made use of by the girl from Bordeaux with the indulgence which characterises senile attachments. His manufactory was no longer going on. The entire state of his affairs was pitiable; so that, in order to set them afloat again, he was at first projecting the establishment of a café chantant, at which only patriotic pieces would be sung. With a grant from the Minister, this establishment would become at the same time a focus for the purpose of propagandism and a source of profit. Now that power had been directed into a different channel, the thing was impossible.

His next idea was a big military hat-making business. He lacked capital, however, to give it a start.

He was not more fortunate in his domestic life. Madame Arnoux was less agreeable in manner towards him, sometimes even a little rude. Berthe always took her father's part. This increased the discord, and the house was becoming intolerable. He often set forth in the morning, passed his day in making long excursions out of the city, in order to divert his thoughts, then dined at a rustic tavern, abandoning himself to his reflections.

The prolonged absence of Frederick disturbed his habits. Then he presented himself one afternoon, begged of him to come and see him as in former days, and obtained from him a promise to do so.

Frederick did not feel sufficient courage within him to go back to Madame Arnoux's house. It seemed to him as if he had betrayed her. But this conduct was very pusillanimous. There was no excuse for it. There was only one way of ending the matter, and so, one evening, he set out on his way.

As the rain was falling, he had just turned up the Passage Jouffroy, when, under the light shed from the shop-windows, a fat little man accosted him. Frederick had no difficulty in recognising Compain, that orator whose motion had excited so much laughter at the club. He was leaning on the arm of an individual whose head was muffled in a zouave's red cap, with a very long upper lip, a complexion as yellow as an orange, a tuft of beard under his jaw, and big staring eyes listening with wonder.

Compain was, no doubt, proud of him, for he said:

"Let me introduce you to this jolly dog! He is a bootmaker whom I include amongst my friends. Come and let us take something!"

Frederick having thanked him, he immediately thundered against Rateau's motion, which he described as a manœuvre of the aristocrats. In order to put an end to it, it would be necessary to begin '93 over again! Then he enquired about Regimbart and some others, who were also well known, such as Masselin, Sanson, Lecornu, Maréchal, and a certain Deslauriers, who had been implicated in the case of the carbines lately intercepted at Troyes.

All this was new to Frederick. Compain knew nothing more about the subject. He quitted the young man with these words:

"You'll come soon, will you not? for you belong to it."

"To what?"

"The calf's head!"

"What calf's head?"

"Ha, you rogue!" returned Compain, giving him a tap on the stomach.

And the two terrorists plunged into a café.

Ten minutes later Frederick was no longer thinking of Deslauriers. He was on the footpath of the Rue de Paradis in front of a house; and he was staring at the light which came from a lamp in the second floor behind a curtain.

At length he ascended the stairs.

"Is Arnoux there?"

The chambermaid answered:

"No; but come in all the same."

And, abruptly opening a door:

"Madame, it is Monsieur Moreau!"

She arose, whiter than the collar round her neck.

"To what do I owe the honour — of a visit — so unexpected?"

"Nothing. The pleasure of seeing old friends once more."

And as he took a seat:

"How is the worthy Arnoux going on?"

"Very well. He has gone out."

"Ah, I understand! still following his old nightly practices. A little distraction!"

"And why not? After a day spent in making calculations, the head needs a rest."

She even praised her husband as a hard-working man. Frederick was irritated at hearing this eulogy; and pointing towards a piece of black cloth with a narrow blue braid which lay on her lap:

"What is it you are doing there?"

"A jacket which I am trimming for my daughter."

"Now that you remind me of it, I have not seen her. Where is she, pray?"

"At a boarding-school," was Madame Arnoux's reply.

Tears came into her eyes. She held them back, while she rapidly plied her needle. To keep himself in countenance, he took up a number of L'Illustration which had been lying on the table close to where she sat.

"These caricatures of Cham are very funny, are they not?"

"Yes."

Then they relapsed into silence once more.

All of a sudden, a fierce gust of wind shook the window-panes.

"What weather!" said Frederick.

"It was very good of you, indeed, to come here in the midst of this dreadful rain."

"Oh! what do I care about that? I'm not like those whom it prevents, no doubt, from going to keep their appointments."

"What appointments?" she asked with an ingenuous air.

"Don't you remember?"

A shudder ran through her frame and she hung down her head.

He gently laid his hand on her arm.

"I assure you that you have given me great pain."

She replied, with a sort of wail in her voice:

"But I was frightened about my child."

She told him about Eugène's illness, and all the tortures which she had endured on that day.

"Thanks! thanks! I doubt you no longer. I love you as much as ever."

"Ah! no; it is not true!"

"Why so?"

She glanced at him coldly.

"You forget the other! the one you took with you to the races! the woman whose portrait you have — your mistress!"

"Well, yes!" exclaimed Frederick, "I don't deny anything! I am a wretch! Just listen to me!"

If he had done this, it was through despair, as one commits suicide. However, he had made her very unhappy in order to avenge himself on her with his own shame.

"What mental anguish! Do you not realise what it means?"

Madame Arnoux turned away her beautiful face while she held out her hand to him; and they closed their eyes, absorbed in a kind of intoxication that was like a sweet, ceaseless rocking. Then they stood face to face, gazing at one another.

"Could you believe it possible that I no longer loved you?"

She replied in a low voice, full of caressing tenderness:

"No! in spite of everything, I felt at the bottom of my heart that it was impossible, and that one day the obstacle between us two would disappear!"

"So did I; and I was dying to see you again."

"I once passed close to you in the Palais-Royal!"

"Did you really?"

And he spoke to her of the happiness he experienced at coming across her again at the Dambreuses' house.

"But how I hated you that evening as I was leaving the place!"

"Poor boy!"

"My life is so sad!"

"And mine, too! If it were only the vexations, the anxieties, the humiliations, all that I endure as wife and as mother, seeing that one must die, I would not complain; the frightful part of it is my solitude, without anyone."

"But you have me here with you!"

"Oh! yes!"

A sob of deep emotion made her bosom swell. She spread out her arms, and they strained one another, while their lips met in a long kiss.

A creaking sound on the floor not far from them reached their ears. There was a woman standing close to them; it was Rosanette. Madame Arnoux had recognised her. Her eyes, opened to their widest, scanned this woman, full of astonishment and indignation. At length Rosanette said to her:

"I have come to see Monsieur Arnoux about a matter of business."

"You see he is not here."

"Ah! that's true," returned the Maréchale. "Your nurse is right! A thousand apologies!"

And turning towards Frederick:

"So here you are — you?"

The familiar tone in which she addressed him, and in her own presence, too, made Madame Arnoux flush as if she had received a slap right across the face.

"I tell you again, he is not here!"

Then the Maréchale, who was looking this way and that, said quietly:

"Let us go back together! I have a cab waiting below."

He pretended not to hear.

"Come! let us go!"

"Ah! yes! this is a good opportunity! Go! go!" said Madame Arnoux.

They went off together, and she stooped over the head of the stairs in order to see them once more, and a laugh — piercing, heart-rending, reached them from the place where she stood. Frederick pushed Rosanette into the cab, sat down opposite her, and during the entire drive did not utter a word.

The infamy, which it outraged him to see once more flowing back on him, had been brought about by himself alone. He experienced at the same time the dishonour of a crushing humiliation and the regret caused by the loss of his new-found happiness. Just when, at last, he had it in his grasp, it had for ever more become impossible, and that through the fault of this girl of the town, this harlot. He would have liked to strangle her. He was choking with rage. When they had got into the house he flung his hat on a piece of furniture and tore off his cravat.

"Ha! you have just done a nice thing — confess it!"

She planted herself boldly in front of him.

"Ah! well, what of that? Where's the harm?"

"What! You are playing the spy on me?"

"Is that my fault? Why do you go to amuse yourself with virtuous women?"

"Never mind! I don't wish you to insult them."

"How have I insulted them?"

He had no answer to make to this, and in a more spiteful tone:

"But on the other occasion, at the Champ de Mars — —"

"Ah! you bore us to death with your old women!"

"Wretch!"

He raised his fist.

"Don't kill me! I'm pregnant!"

Frederick staggered back.

"You are lying!"

"Why, just look at me!"

She seized a candlestick, and pointing at her face:

"Don't you recognise the fact there?"

Little yellow spots dotted her skin, which was strangely swollen. Frederick did not deny the evidence. He went to the window, and opened it, took a few steps up and down the room, and then sank into an armchair.

This event was a calamity which, in the first place, put off their rupture, and, in the next place, upset all his plans. The notion of being a father, moreover, appeared to him grotesque, inadmissible. But why? If, in place of the Maréchale — — And his reverie became so deep that he had a kind of hallucination. He saw there, on the carpet, in front of the chimney-piece, a little girl. She resembled Madame Arnoux and himself a little — dark, and yet fair, with two black eyes, very large eyebrows, and a red ribbon in her curling hair. (Oh, how he would have loved her!) And he seemed to hear her voice saying: "Papa! papa!"

Rosanette, who had just undressed herself, came across to him, and noticing a tear in his eyelids, kissed him gravely on the forehead.

He arose, saying:

"By Jove, we mustn't kill this little one!"

Then she talked a lot of nonsense. To be sure, it would be a boy, and its name would be Frederick. It would be necessary for her to begin making its clothes; and, seeing her so happy, a feeling of pity for her took possession of him. As he no longer cherished any anger against her, he desired to know the explanation of the step she had recently taken. She said it was because Mademoiselle Vatnaz had sent her that day a bill which had been protested for some time past; and so she hastened to Arnoux to get the money from him.

"I'd have given it to you!" said Frederick.

"It is a simpler course for me to get over there what belongs to me, and to pay back to the other one her thousand francs."

"Is this really all you owe her?"

She answered:

"Certainly!"

On the following day, at nine o'clock in the evening (the hour specified by the doorkeeper), Frederick repaired to Mademoiselle Vatnaz's residence.

In the anteroom, he jostled against the furniture, which was heaped together. But the sound of voices and of music guided him. He opened a door, and tumbled into the middle of a rout. Standing up before a piano, which a young lady in spectacles was fingering, Delmar, as serious as a pontiff, was declaiming a humanitarian poem on prostitution; and his hollow voice rolled to the accompaniment of the metallic chords. A row of women sat close to the wall, attired, as a rule, in dark colours without neck-bands or sleeves. Five or six men, all people of culture, occupied seats here and there. In an armchair was seated a former writer of fables, a mere wreck now; and the pungent odour of the two lamps was intermingled with the aroma of the chocolate which filled a number of bowls placed on the card-table.

Mademoiselle Vatnaz, with an Oriental shawl thrown over her shoulders, sat at one side of the chimney-piece. Dussardier sat facing her at the other side. He seemed to feel himself in an embarrassing position. Besides, he was rather intimidated by his artistic surroundings. Had the Vatnaz, then, broken off with Delmar? Perhaps not. However, she seemed jealous of the worthy shopman; and Frederick, having asked to let him exchange a word with her, she made a sign to him to go with them into her own apartment. When the thousand francs were paid down before her, she asked, in addition, for interest.

"'Tisn't worth while," said Dussardier.

"Pray hold your tongue!"

This want of moral courage on the part of so brave a man was agreeable to Frederick as a justification of his own conduct. He took away the bill with him, and never again referred to the scandal at Madame Arnoux's house. But from that time forth he saw clearly all the defects in the Maréchale's character.

She possessed incurable bad taste, incomprehensible laziness, the ignorance of a savage, so much so that she regarded Doctor Derogis as a person of great celebrity, and she felt proud of entertaining himself and his wife, because they were "married people." She lectured with a pedantic air on the affairs of daily life to Mademoiselle Irma, a poor little creature endowed with a little voice, who had as a protector a gentleman "very well off," an ex-clerk in the Custom-house, who had a rare talent for card tricks. Rosanette used to call him "My big Loulou." Frederick could no longer endure the repetition of her stupid words, such as "Some custard," "To Chaillot," "One could never know," etc.; and she persisted in wiping off the dust in the morning from her trinkets with a pair of old white gloves. He was above all disgusted by her treatment of her servant, whose wages were constantly in arrear, and who even lent her money. On the days when they settled their accounts, they used to wrangle like two fish-women; and then, on becoming reconciled, used to embrace each other. It was a relief to him when Madame Dambreuse's evening parties began again.

There, at any rate, he found something to amuse him. She was well versed in the intrigues of society, the changes of ambassadors, the personal character of dressmakers; and, if commonplaces escaped her lips, they did so in such a becoming fashion, that her language might be regarded as the expression of respect for propriety or of polite irony. It was worth while to watch the way in which, in the midst of twenty persons chatting around her, she would, without overlooking any of them, bring about the answers she desired and avoid those that were dangerous. Things of a very simple nature, when related by her, assumed the aspect of confidences. Her slightest smile gave rise to dreams; in short, her charm, like the exquisite scent which she usually carried about with her, was complex and indefinable.

While he was with her, Frederick experienced on each occasion the pleasure of a new discovery, and, nevertheless, he always found her equally serene the next time they met, like the reflection of limpid waters.

But why was there such coldness in her manner towards her niece? At times she even darted strange looks at her.

As soon as the question of marriage was started, she had urged as an objection to it, when discussing the matter with M. Dambreuse, the state of "the dear child's" health, and had at once taken her off to the baths of Balaruc. On her return fresh pretexts were raised by her — that the young man was not in a good position, that this ardent passion did not appear to be a very serious attachment, and that no risk would be run by waiting. Martinon had replied, when the suggestion was made to him, that he would wait. His conduct was sublime. He lectured Frederick. He did more. He enlightened him as to the best means of pleasing Madame Dambreuse, even giving him to understand that he had ascertained from the niece the sentiments of her aunt.

As for M. Dambreuse, far from exhibiting jealousy, he treated his young friend with the utmost attention, consulted him about different things, and even showed anxiety about his future, so that one day, when they were talking about Père Roque, he whispered with a sly air: "You have done well."

And Cécile, Miss John, the servants and the porter, every one of them exercised a fascination over him in this house. He came there every evening, quitting Rosanette for that purpose. Her approaching maternity rendered her graver in manner, and even a little melancholy, as if she were tortured by anxieties. To every question put to her she replied:

"You are mistaken; I am quite well."

She had, as a matter of fact, signed five notes in her previous transactions, and not having the courage to tell Frederick after the first had been paid, she had gone back to the abode of Arnoux, who had promised her, in writing, the third part of his profits in the lighting of the towns of Languedoc by gas (a marvellous undertaking!), while requesting her not to make use of this letter at the meeting of shareholders. The meeting was put off from week to week.

Meanwhile the Maréchale wanted money. She would have died sooner than ask Frederick for any. She did not wish to get it from him; it would have spoiled their love. He contributed a great deal to the household expenses; but a little carriage, which he hired by the month, and other sacrifices, which were indispensable since he had begun to visit the Dambreuses, prevented him from doing more for his mistress. On two or three occasions, when he came back to the house at a different hour from his usual time, he fancied he could see men's backs disappearing behind the door, and she often went out without wishing to state where she was going. Frederick did not attempt to enquire minutely into these matters. One of these days he would make up his mind as to his future course of action. He dreamed of another life which would be more amusing and more noble. It was the fact that he had such an ideal before his mind that rendered him indulgent towards the Dambreuse mansion.

It was an establishment in the neighbourhood of the Rue de Poitiers. There he met the great M. A., the illustrious B., the profound C., the eloquent Z., the immense Y., the old terrors of the Left Centre, the paladins of the Right, the burgraves of the golden mean; the eternal good old men of the comedy. He was astonished at their abominable style of talking, their meannesses, their rancours, their dishonesty — all these personages, after voting for the Constitution, now striving to destroy it; and they got into a state of great agitation, and launched forth manifestoes, pamphlets, and biographies. Hussonnet's biography of Fumichon was a masterpiece. Nonancourt devoted himself to the work of propagandism in the country districts; M. de Grémonville worked up the clergy; and Martinon brought together the young men of the wealthy class. Each exerted himself according to his resources, including Cisy himself. With his thoughts now all day long absorbed in matters of grave moment, he kept making excursions here and there in a cab in the interests of the party.

M. Dambreuse, like a barometer, constantly gave expression to its latest variation. Lamartine could not be alluded to without eliciting from this gentleman the quotation of a famous phrase of the man of the people: "Enough of poetry!" Cavaignac was, from this time forth, nothing better in his eyes than a traitor. The President, whom he had admired for a period of three months, was beginning to fall off in his esteem (as he did not appear to exhibit the "necessary energy"); and, as he always wanted a savior, his gratitude, since the affair of the Conservatoire, belonged to Changarnier: "Thank God for Changarnier.... Let us place our reliance on Changarnier.... Oh, there's nothing to fear as long as Changarnier — — "

M. Thiers was praised, above all, for his volume against Socialism, in which he showed that he was quite as much of a thinker as a writer. There was an immense laugh at Pierre Leroux, who had quoted passages from the philosophers in the Chamber. Jokes were made about the phalansterian tail. The "Market of Ideas" came in for a meed of applause, and its authors were compared to Aristophanes. Frederick patronised the work as well as the rest.

Political verbiage and good living had an enervating effect on his morality. Mediocre in capacity as these persons appeared to him, he felt proud of knowing them, and internally longed for the respectability that attached to a wealthy citizen. A mistress like Madame Dambreuse would give him a position.

He set about taking the necessary steps for achieving that object.

He made it his business to cross her path, did not fail to go and greet her with a bow in her box at the theatre, and, being aware of the hours when she went to church, he would plant himself behind a pillar in a melancholy attitude. There was a continual interchange of little notes between them with regard to curiosities to which they drew each other's attention, preparations for a concert, or the borrowing of books or reviews. In addition to his visit each night, he sometimes made a call just as the day was closing; and he experienced a progressive succession of pleasures in passing through the large front entrance, through the courtyard, through the anteroom, and through the two reception-rooms. Finally, he reached her boudoir, which was as quiet as a tomb, as warm as an alcove, and in which one jostled against the upholstered edging of furniture in the midst of objects of every sort placed here and there — chiffoniers, screens, bowls, and trays made of lacquer, or shell, or ivory, or malachite, expensive trifles, to which fresh additions were frequently made. Amongst single specimens of these rarities might be noticed three Etretat rollers which were used as paper-presses, and a Frisian cap hung from a Chinese folding-screen. Nevertheless, there was a harmony between all these things, and one was even impressed by the noble aspect of the entire place, which was, no doubt, due to the loftiness of the ceiling, the richness of the portières, and the long silk fringes that floated over the gold legs of the stools.

She nearly always sat on a little sofa, close to the flower-stand, which garnished the recess of the window. Frederick, seating himself on the edge of a large wheeled ottoman, addressed to her compliments of the most appropriate kind that he could conceive; and she looked at him, with her head a little on one side, and a smile playing round her mouth.

He read for her pieces of poetry, into which he threw his whole soul in order to move her and excite her admiration. She would now and then interrupt him with a disparaging remark or a practical observation; and their conversation relapsed incessantly into the eternal question of Love. They discussed with each other what were the circumstances that produced it, whether women felt it more than men, and what was the difference between them on that point. Frederick tried to express his opinion, and, at the same time, to avoid anything like coarseness or insipidity. This became at length a species of contest between them, sometimes agreeable and at other times tedious.

Whilst at her side, he did not experience that ravishment of his entire being which drew him towards Madame Arnoux, nor the feeling of voluptuous delight with which Rosanette had, at first, inspired him.

But he felt a passion for her as a thing that was abnormal and difficult of attainment, because she was of aristocratic rank, because she was wealthy, because she was a devotee — imagining that she had a delicacy of sentiment as rare as the lace she wore, together with amulets on her skin, and modest instincts even in her depravity.

He made a certain use of his old passion for Madame Arnoux, uttering in his new flame's hearing all those amorous sentiments which the other had caused him to feel in downright earnest, and pretending that it was Madame Dambreuse herself who had occasioned them. She received these avowals like one accustomed to such things, and, without giving him a formal repulse, did not yield in the slightest degree; and he came no nearer to seducing her than Martinon did to getting married. In order to bring matters to an end with her niece's suitor, she accused him of having money for his object, and even begged of her husband to put the matter to the test. M. Dambreuse then declared to the young man that Cécile, being the orphan child of poor parents, had neither expectations nor a dowry.

Martinon, not believing that this was true, or feeling that he had gone too far to draw back, or through one of those outbursts of idiotic infatuation which may be described as acts of genius, replied that his patrimony, amounting to fifteen thousand francs a year, would be sufficient for them. The banker was touched by this unexpected display of disinterestedness. He promised the young man a tax-collectorship, undertaking to obtain the post for him; and in the month of May, 1850, Martinon married Mademoiselle Cécile. There was no ball to celebrate the event. The young people started the same evening for Italy. Frederick came next day to pay a visit to Madame Dambreuse. She appeared to him paler than usual. She sharply contradicted him about two or three matters of no importance. However, she went on to observe, all men were egoists.

There were, however, some devoted men, though he might happen himself to be the only one.

"Pooh, pooh! you're just like the rest of them!"

Her eyelids were red; she had been weeping.

Then, forcing a smile:

"Pardon me; I am in the wrong. Sad thoughts have taken possession of my mind."

He could not understand what she meant to convey by the last words.

"No matter! she is not so hard to overcome as I imagined," he thought.

She rang for a glass of water, drank a mouthful of it, sent it away again, and then began to complain of the wretched way in which her servants attended on her. In order to amuse her, he offered to become her servant himself, pretending that he knew how to hand round plates, dust furniture, and announce visitors — in fact, to do the duties of a valet-de-chambre, or, rather, of a running-footman, although the latter was now out of fashion. He would have liked to cling on behind her carriage with a hat adorned with cock's feathers.

"And how I would follow you with majestic stride, carrying your pug on my arm!"

"You are facetious," said Madame Dambreuse.

Was it not a piece of folly, he returned, to take everything seriously? There were enough of miseries in the world without creating fresh ones. Nothing was worth the cost of a single pang. Madame Dambreuse raised her eyelids with a sort of vague approval.

This agreement in their views of life impelled Frederick to take a bolder course. His former miscalculations now gave him insight. He went on:

"Our grandsires lived better. Why not obey the impulse that urges us onward?" After all, love was not a thing of such importance in itself.

"But what you have just said is immoral!"

She had resumed her seat on the little sofa. He sat down at the side of it, near her feet.

"Don't you see that I am lying! For in order to please women, one must exhibit the thoughtlessness of a buffoon or all the wild passion of tragedy! They only laugh at us when we simply tell them that we love them! For my part, I consider those hyperbolical phrases which tickle their fancy a profanation of true love, so that it is no longer possible to give expression to it, especially when addressing women who possess more than ordinary intelligence."

She gazed at him from under her drooping eyelids. He lowered his voice, while he bent his head closer to her face.

"Yes! you frighten me! Perhaps I am offending you? Forgive me! I did not intend to say all that I have said! 'Tis not my fault! You are so beautiful!"

Madame Dambreuse closed her eyes, and he was astonished at his easy victory. The tall trees in the clouds streaked the sky with long strips of red, and on every side there seemed to be a suspension of vital movements. Then he recalled to mind, in a confused sort of way, evenings just the same as this, filled with the same unbroken silence. Where was it that he had known them?

He sank upon his knees, seized her hand, and swore that he would love her for ever. Then, as he was leaving her, she beckoned to him to come back, and said to him in a low tone:

"Come by-and-by and dine with us! We'll be all alone!"

It seemed to Frederick, as he descended the stairs, that he had become a different man, that he was surrounded by the balmy temperature of hot-houses, and that he was beyond all question entering into the higher sphere of patrician adulteries and lofty intrigues. In order to occupy the first rank there all he required was a woman of this stamp. Greedy, no doubt, of power and of success, and married to a man of inferior calibre, for whom she had done prodigious services, she longed for some one of ability in order to be his guide. Nothing was impossible now. He felt himself capable of riding two hundred leagues on horseback, of travelling for several nights in succession without fatigue. His heart overflowed with pride.

Just in front of him, on the footpath, a man wrapped in a seedy overcoat was walking, with downcast eyes, and with such an air of dejection that Frederick, as he passed, turned aside to have a better look at him. The other raised his head. It was Deslauriers. He hesitated. Frederick fell upon his neck.

"Ah! my poor old friend! What! 'tis you!"

And he dragged Deslauriers into his house, at the same time asking his friend a heap of questions.

Ledru-Rollin's ex-commissioner commenced by describing the tortures to which he had been subjected. As he preached fraternity to the Conservatives, and respect for the laws to the Socialists, the former tried to shoot him, and the latter brought cords to hang him with. After June he had been brutally dismissed. He found himself involved in a charge of conspiracy — that which was connected with the seizure of arms at Troyes. He had subsequently been released for want of evidence to sustain the charge. Then the acting committee had sent him to London, where his ears had been boxed in the very middle of a banquet at which he and his colleagues were being entertained. On his return to Paris — —

"Why did you not call here, then, to see me?"

"You were always out! Your porter had mysterious airs — I did not know what to think; and, in the next place, I had no desire to reappear before you in the character of a defeated man."

He had knocked at the portals of Democracy, offering to serve it with his pen, with his tongue, with all his energies. He had been everywhere repelled. They had mistrusted him; and he had sold his watch, his bookcase, and even his linen.

"It would be much better to be breaking one's back on the pontoons of Belle Isle with Sénécals!"

Frederick, who had been fastening his cravat, did not appear to be much affected by this news.

"Ha! so he is transported, this good Sénécals?"

Deslauriers replied, while he surveyed the walls with an envious air:

"Not everybody has your luck!"

"Excuse me," said Frederick, without noticing the allusion to his own circumstances, "but I am dining in the city. We must get you something to eat; order whatever you like. Take even my bed!"

This cordial reception dissipated Deslauriers' bitterness.

"Your bed? But that might inconvenience you!"

"Oh, no! I have others!"

"Oh, all right!" returned the advocate, with a laugh. "Pray, where are you dining?"

"At Madame Dambreuse's."

"Can it be that you are — perhaps — — ?"

"You are too inquisitive," said Frederick, with a smile, which confirmed this hypothesis.

Then, after a glance at the clock, he resumed his seat.

"That's how it is! and we mustn't despair, my ex-defender of the people!"

"Oh, pardon me; let others bother themselves about the people henceforth!"

The advocate detested the working-men, because he had suffered so much on their account in his province, a coal-mining district. Every pit had appointed a provisional government, from which he received orders.

"Besides, their conduct has been everywhere charming — at Lyons, at Lille, at Havre, at Paris! For, in imitation of the manufacturers, who would fain exclude the products of the foreigner, these gentlemen call on us to banish the English, German, Belgian, and Savoyard workmen. As for their intelligence, what was the use of that precious trades' union of theirs which they established under the Restoration? In 1830 they joined the National Guard, without having the common sense to get the upper hand of it. Is it not the fact that, since the morning when 1848 dawned, the various trade-bodies had not reappeared with their banners? They have even demanded popular representatives for themselves, who are not to open their lips except on their own behalf. All this is the same as if the deputies who represent beetroot were to concern themselves about nothing save beetroot. Ah! I've had enough of these dodgers who in turn prostrate themselves before the scaffold of Robespierre, the boots of the Emperor, and the umbrella of Louis Philippe — a rabble who always yield allegiance to the person that flings bread into their mouths. They are always crying out against the venality of Talleyrand and Mirabeau; but the messenger down below there would sell his country for fifty centimes if they'd only promise to fix a tariff of three francs on his walk. Ah! what a wretched state of affairs! We ought to set the four corners of Europe on fire!"

Frederick said in reply:

"The spark is what you lack! You were simply a lot of shopboys, and even the best of you were nothing better than penniless students. As for the workmen, they may well complain; for, if you except a million taken out of the civil list, and of which you made a grant to them with the meanest expressions of flattery, you have done nothing for them, save to talk in stilted phrases! The workman's certificate remains in the hands of the employer, and the person who is paid wages remains (even in the eye of the law), the inferior of his master, because his word is not believed. In short, the Republic seems to me a worn-out institution. Who knows? Perhaps Progress can be realised only through an aristocracy or through a single man? The initiative always comes from the top, and whatever may be the people's pretensions, they are lower than those placed over them!"

"That may be true," said Deslauriers.

According to Frederick, the vast majority of citizens aimed only at a life of peace (he had been improved by his visits to the Dambreuses), and the chances were all on the side of the Conservatives. That party, however, was lacking in new men.

"If you came forward, I am sure — —"

He did not finish the sentence. Deslauriers saw what Frederick meant, and passed his two hands over his head; then, all of a sudden:

"But what about yourself? Is there anything to prevent you from doing it? Why would you not be a deputy?"

In consequence of a double election there was in the Aube a vacancy for a candidate. M. Dambreuse, who had been re-elected as a member of the Legislative Assembly, belonged to a different arrondissement.

"Do you wish me to interest myself on your behalf?" He was acquainted with many publicans, schoolmasters, doctors, notaries' clerks and their masters. "Besides, you can make the peasants believe anything you like!"

Frederick felt his ambition rekindling.

Deslauriers added:

"You would find no trouble in getting a situation for me in Paris."

"Oh! it would not be hard to manage it through Monsieur Dambreuse."

"As we happened to have been talking just now about coal-mines," the advocate went on, "what has become of his big company? This is the sort of employment that would suit me, and I could make myself useful to them while preserving my own independence."

Frederick promised that he would introduce him to the banker before three days had passed.

The dinner, which he enjoyed alone with Madame Dambreuse, was a delightful affair. She sat facing him with a smile on her countenance at the opposite side of the table, whereon was placed a basket of flowers, while a lamp suspended above their heads shed its light on the scene; and, as the window was open, they could see the stars. They talked very little, distrusting themselves, no doubt; but, the moment the servants had turned their backs, they sent across a kiss to one another from the tips of their lips. He told her about his idea of becoming a candidate. She approved of the project, promising even to get M. Dambreuse to use every effort on his behalf.

As the evening advanced, some of her friends presented themselves for the purpose of congratulating her, and, at the same time, expressing sympathy with her; she must be so much pained at the loss of her niece. Besides, it was all very well for newly-married people to go on a trip; by-and-by would come incumbrances, children. But really, Italy did not realise one's expectations. They had not as yet passed the age of illusions; and, in the next place, the honeymoon made everything look beautiful. The last two who remained behind were M. de Grémonville and Frederick. The diplomatist was not inclined to leave. At last he departed at midnight. Madame Dambreuse beckoned to Frederick to go with him, and thanked him for this compliance with her wishes by giving him a gentle pressure with her hand more delightful than anything that had gone before.

The Maréchale uttered an exclamation of joy on seeing him again. She had been waiting for him for the last five hours. He gave as an excuse for the delay an indispensable step which he had to take in the interests of Deslauriers. His face wore a look of triumph, and was surrounded by an aureola which dazzled Rosanette.

"'Tis perhaps on account of your black coat, which fits you well; but I have never seen you look so handsome! How handsome you are!"

In a transport of tenderness, she made a vow internally never again to belong to any other man, no matter what might be the consequence, even if she were to die of want.

Her pretty eyes sparkled with such intense passion that Frederick took her upon his knees and said to himself:

"What a rascally part I am playing!" while admiring his own perversity.

CHAPTER XVII.

A Strange Betrothal.

M. Dambreuse, when Deslauriers presented himself at his house, was thinking of reviving his great coal-mining speculation. But this fusion of all the companies into one was looked upon unfavourably; there was an outcry against monopolies, as if immense capital were not needed for carrying out enterprises of this kind!

Deslauriers, who had read for the purpose the work of Gobet and the articles of M. Chappe in the Journal des Mines, understood the question perfectly. He demonstrated that the law of 1810 established for the benefit of the grantee a privilege which could not be transferred. Besides, a democratic colour might be given to the undertaking. To interfere with the formation of coal-mining companies was against the principle even of association.

M. Dambreuse intrusted to him some notes for the purpose of drawing up a memorandum. As for the way in which he meant to pay for the work, he was all the more profuse in his promises from the fact that they were not very definite.

Deslauriers called again at Frederick's house, and gave him an account of the interview. Moreover, he had caught a glimpse of Madame Dambreuse at the bottom of the stairs, just as he was going out.

"I wish you joy — upon my soul, I do!"

Then they had a chat about the election. There was something to be devised in order to carry it.

Three days later Deslauriers reappeared with a sheet of paper covered with handwriting, intended for the newspapers, and which was nothing less than a friendly letter from M. Dambreuse, expressing approval of their friend's candidature. Supported by a Conservative and praised by a Red, he ought to succeed. How was it that the capitalist had put his signature to such a lucubration? The advocate had, of his own motion, and without the least appearance of embarrassment, gone and shown it to Madame Dambreuse, who, thinking it quite appropriate, had taken the rest of the business on her own shoulders.

Frederick was astonished at this proceeding. Nevertheless, he approved of it; then, as Deslauriers was to have an interview with M. Roque, his friend explained to him how he stood with regard to Louise.

"Tell them anything you like; that my affairs are in an unsettled state, that I am putting them in order. She is young enough to wait!"

Deslauriers set forth, and Frederick looked upon himself as a very able man. He experienced, moreover, a feeling of gratification, a profound satisfaction. His delight at being the possessor of a rich woman was not spoiled by any contrast. The sentiment harmonised with the surroundings. His life now would be full of joy in every sense.

Perhaps the most delicious sensation of all was to gaze at Madame Dambreuse in the midst of a number of other ladies in her drawing-room. The propriety of her manners made him dream of other attitudes. While she was talking in a tone of coldness, he would recall to mind the loving words which she had murmured in his ear. All the respect which he felt for her virtue gave him a thrill of pleasure, as if it were a homage which was reflected back on himself; and at times he felt a longing to exclaim:

"But I know her better than you! She is mine!"

It was not long ere their relations came to be socially recognised as an established fact. Madame Dambreuse, during the whole winter, brought Frederick with her into fashionable society.

He nearly always arrived before her; and he watched her as she entered the house they were visiting with her arms uncovered, a fan in her hand, and pearls in her hair. She would pause on the threshold (the lintel of the door formed a framework round her head), and she would open and shut her eyes with a certain air of indecision, in order to see whether he was there.

She drove him back in her carriage; the rain lashed the carriage-blinds. The passers-by seemed merely shadows wavering in the mire of the street; and, pressed close to each other, they observed all these things vaguely with a calm disdain. Under various pretexts, he would linger in her room for an entire additional hour.

It was chiefly through a feeling of ennui that Madame Dambreuse had yielded. But this latest experience was not to be wasted. She desired to give herself up to an absorbing passion; and so she began to heap on his head adulations and caresses.

She sent him flowers; she had an upholstered chair made for him. She made presents to him of a cigar-holder, an inkstand, a thousand little things for daily use, so that every act of his life should recall her to his memory. These kind attentions charmed him at first, and in a little while appeared to him very simple.

She would step into a cab, get rid of it at the opening into a by-way, and come out at the other end; and then, gliding along by the walls, with a double veil on her face, she would reach the street where Frederick, who had been keeping watch, would take her arm quickly to lead her towards his house. His two men-servants would have gone out for a walk, and the doorkeeper would have been sent on some errand. She would throw a glance around her — nothing to fear! — and she would breathe forth the sigh of an exile who beholds his country once more. Their good fortune emboldened them. Their appointments became more frequent. One evening, she even presented herself, all of a sudden, in full ball-dress. These surprises might have perilous consequences. He reproached her for her lack of prudence. Nevertheless, he was not taken with her appearance. The low body of her dress exposed her thinness too freely.

It was then that he discovered what had hitherto been hidden from him — the disillusion of his senses. None the less did he make professions of ardent love; but in order to call up such emotions he found it necessary to evoke the images of Rosanette and Madame Arnoux.

This sentimental atrophy left his intellect entirely untrammelled; and he was more ambitious than ever of attaining a high position in society. Inasmuch as he had such a stepping-stone, the very least he could do was to make use of it.

One morning, about the middle of January, Sénécal entered his study, and in response to his exclamation of astonishment, announced that he was Deslauriers' secretary. He even brought Frederick a letter. It contained good news, and yet it took him to task for his negligence; he would have to come down to the scene of action at once. The future deputy said he would set out on his way there in two days' time.

Sénéal gave no opinion on the other's merits as a candidate. He spoke about his own concerns and about the affairs of the country.

Miserable as the state of things happened to be, it gave him pleasure, for they were advancing in the direction of Communism. In the first place, the Administration led towards it of its own accord, since every day a greater number of things were controlled by the Government. As for Property, the Constitution of '48, in spite of its weaknesses, had not spared it. The State might, in the name of public utility, henceforth take whatever it thought would suit it. Sénéal declared himself in favour of authority; and Frederick noticed in his remarks the exaggeration which characterised what he had said himself to Deslauriers. The Republican even inveighed against the masses for their inadequacy.

"Robespierre, by upholding the right of the minority, had brought Louis XVI. to acknowledge the National Convention, and saved the people. Things were rendered legitimate by the end towards which they were directed. A dictatorship is sometimes indispensable. Long live tyranny, provided that the tyrant promotes the public welfare!"

Their discussion lasted a long time; and, as he was taking his departure, Sénéal confessed (perhaps it was the real object of his visit) that Deslauriers was getting very impatient at M. Dambreuse's silence.

But M. Dambreuse was ill. Frederick saw him every day, his character of an intimate friend enabling him to obtain admission to the invalid's bedside.

General Changarnier's recall had powerfully affected the capitalist's mind. He was, on the evening of the occurrence, seized with a burning sensation in his chest, together with an oppression that prevented him from lying down. The application of leeches gave him immediate relief. The dry cough disappeared; the respiration became more easy; and, eight days later, he said, while swallowing some broth:

"Ah! I'm better now — but I was near going on the last long journey!"

"Not without me!" exclaimed Madame Dambreuse, intending by this remark to convey that she would not be able to outlive him.

Instead of replying, he cast upon her and upon her lover a singular smile, in which there was at the same time resignation, indulgence, irony, and even, as it were, a touch of humour, a sort of secret satisfaction almost amounting to actual joy.

Frederick wished to start for Nogent. Madame Dambreuse objected to this; and he unpacked and re-packed his luggage by turns according to the changes in the invalid's condition.

Suddenly M. Dambreuse spat forth considerable blood. The "princes of medical science," on being consulted, could not think of any fresh remedy. His legs swelled, and his weakness increased. He had several times evinced a desire to see Cécile, who was at the other end of France with her husband, now a collector of taxes, a position to which he had been appointed a month ago. M. Dambreuse gave express orders to send for her. Madame Dambreuse wrote three letters, which she showed him.

Without trusting him even to the care of the nun, she did not leave him for one second, and no longer went to bed. The ladies who had their names entered at the door-lodge made enquiries about her with feelings of admiration, and the passers-by were filled with respect on seeing the quantity of straw which was placed in the street under the windows.

On the 12th of February, at five o'clock, a frightful hæmoptysis came on. The doctor who had charge of him pointed out that the case had assumed a dangerous aspect. They sent in hot haste for a priest.

While M. Dambreuse was making his confession, Madame kept gazing curiously at him some distance away. After this, the young doctor applied a blister, and awaited the result.

The flame of the lamps, obscured by some of the furniture, lighted up the apartment in an irregular fashion. Frederick and Madame Dambreuse, at the foot of the bed, watched the dying man. In the recess of a window the priest and the doctor chatted in low tones. The good sister on her knees kept mumbling prayers.

At last came a rattling in the throat. The hands grew cold; the face began to turn white. Now and then he drew a deep breath all of a sudden; but gradually this became rarer and rarer. Two or three confused words escaped him. He turned his eyes upward, and at the same moment his respiration became so feeble that it was almost imperceptible. Then his head sank on one side on the pillow.

For a minute, all present remained motionless.

Madame Dambreuse advanced towards the dead body of her husband, and, without an effort — with the unaffectedness of one discharging a duty — she drew down the eyelids. Then she spread out her two arms, her figure writhing as if in a spasm of repressed despair, and quitted the room, supported by the physician and the nun.

A quarter of an hour afterwards, Frederick made his way up to her apartment.

There was in it an indefinable odour, emanating from some delicate substances with which it was filled. In the middle of the bed lay a black dress, which formed a glaring contrast with the pink coverlet.

Madame Dambreuse was standing at the corner of the mantelpiece. Without attributing to her any passionate regret, he thought she looked a little sad; and, in a mournful voice, he said:

"You are enduring pain?"

"I? No — not at all."

As she turned around, her eyes fell on the dress, which she inspected. Then she told him not to stand on ceremony.

"Smoke, if you like! You can make yourself at home with me!"

And, with a great sigh:

"Ah! Blessed Virgin! — what a riddance!"

Frederick was astonished at this exclamation. He replied, as he kissed her hand:

"All the same, you were free!"

This allusion to the facility with which the intrigue between them had been carried on hurt Madame Dambreuse.

"Ah! you don't know the services that I did for him, or the misery in which I lived!"

"What!"

"Why, certainly! Was it a safe thing to have always near him that bastard, a daughter, whom he introduced into the house at the end of five years of married life, and who, were it not for me, might have led him into some act of folly?"

Then she explained how her affairs stood. The arrangement on the occasion of her marriage was that the property of each party should be separate.<sup>[1]</sup> The amount of her inheritance was three hundred thousand francs. M. Dambreuse had guaranteed by the marriage contract that in the event of her surviving him, she should have an income of fifteen thousand francs a year, together with the ownership of the mansion. But a short time afterwards he had made a will by which he gave her all he possessed, and this she estimated, so far as it was possible to ascertain just at present, at over three millions.

Frederick opened his eyes widely.

"It was worth the trouble, wasn't it? However, I contributed to it! It was my own property I was protecting; Cécile would have unjustly robbed me of it."

"Why did she not come to see her father?"

As he asked her this question Madame Dambreuse eyed him attentively; then, in a dry tone:

"I haven't the least idea! Want of heart, probably! Oh! I know what she is! And for that reason she won't get a farthing from me!"

She had not been very troublesome, he pointed out; at any rate, since her marriage.

"Ha! her marriage!" said Madame Dambreuse, with a sneer. And she grudged having treated only too well this stupid creature, who was jealous, self-interested, and hypocritical. "All the faults of her father!" She disparaged him more and more. There was never a person with such profound duplicity, and with such a merciless disposition into the bargain, as hard as a stone — "a bad man, a bad man!"

Even the wisest people fall into errors. Madame Dambreuse had just made a serious one through this overflow of hatred on her part. Frederick, sitting opposite her in an easy chair, was reflecting deeply, scandalised by the language she had used.

She arose and knelt down beside him.

"To be with you is the only real pleasure! You are the only one I love!"

While she gazed at him her heart softened, a nervous reaction brought tears into her eyes, and she murmured:

"Will you marry me?"

At first he thought he had not understood what she meant. He was stunned by this wealth.

She repeated in a louder tone:

"Will you marry me?"

At last he said with a smile:

"Have you any doubt about it?"

Then the thought forced itself on his mind that his conduct was infamous, and in order to make a kind of reparation to the dead man, he offered to watch by his side himself. But, feeling ashamed of this pious sentiment, he added, in a flippant tone:

"It would be perhaps more seemly."

"Perhaps so, indeed," she said, "on account of the servants."

The bed had been drawn completely out of the alcove. The nun was near the foot of it, and at the head of it sat a priest, a different one, a tall, spare man, with the look of a fanatical Spaniard. On the night-table, covered with a white cloth, three wax-tapers were burning.

Frederick took a chair, and gazed at the corpse.

The face was as yellow as straw. At the corners of the mouth there were traces of blood-stained foam. A silk handkerchief was tied around the skull, and on the breast, covered with a knitted waistcoat, lay a silver crucifix between the two crossed hands.

It was over, this life full of anxieties! How many journeys had he not made to various places? How many rows of figures had he not piled together? How many speculations had he not hatched? How many reports had he not heard read? What quackeries, what smiles and curvets! For he had acclaimed Napoléon, the Cossacks, Louis XVIII., 1830, the working-men, every régime, loving power so dearly that he would have paid in order to have the opportunity of selling himself.

But he had left behind him the estate of La Fortelle, three factories in Picardy, the woods of Crancé in the Yonne, a farm near Orléans, and a great deal of personal property in the form of bills and papers.

Frederick thus made an estimate of her fortune; and it would soon, nevertheless, belong to him! First of all, he thought of "what people would say"; then he asked himself what present he ought to make to his mother, and he was concerned about his future equipages, and about employing an old coachman belonging to his own family as the doorkeeper. Of course, the livery would not be the same. He would convert the large reception-room into his own study. There was nothing to prevent him by knocking down three walls from setting up a picture-gallery on the second-floor. Perhaps there might be an opportunity for introducing into the lower portion of the house a hall for Turkish baths. As for M. Dambreuse's office, a disagreeable spot, what use could he make of it?

These reflections were from time to time rudely interrupted by the sounds made by the priest in blowing his nose, or by the good sister in settling the fire.

But the actual facts showed that his thoughts rested on a solid foundation. The corpse was there. The eyelids had reopened, and the pupils, although steeped in clammy gloom, had an enigmatic, intolerable expression.

Frederick fancied that he saw there a judgment directed against himself, and he felt almost a sort of remorse, for he had never any complaint to make against this man, who, on the contrary — —

"Come, now! an old wretch!" and he looked at the dead man more closely in order to strengthen his mind, mentally addressing him thus:

"Well, what? Have I killed you?"

Meanwhile, the priest read his breviary; the nun, who sat motionless, had fallen asleep. The wicks of the three wax-tapers had grown longer.

For two hours could be heard the heavy rolling of carts making their way to the markets. The window-panes began to admit streaks of white. A cab passed; then a group of donkeys went trotting over the pavement. Then came strokes of hammers, cries of itinerant vendors of wood and blasts of horns. Already every other sound was blended with the great voice of awakening Paris.

Frederick went out to perform the duties assigned to him. He first repaired to the Mayor's office to make the necessary declaration; then, when the medical officer had given him a certificate of death, he called a second time at the municipal buildings in order to name the cemetery which the family had selected, and to make arrangements for the funeral ceremonies.

The clerk in the office showed him a plan which indicated the mode of interment adopted for the various classes, and a programme giving full particulars with regard to the spectacular portion of the funeral. Would he like to have an open funeral-car or a hearse with plumes, plaits on the horses, and aigrettes on the footmen, initials or a coat-of-arms, funeral-lamps, a man to display the family distinctions? and what number of carriages would he require?

Frederick did not economise in the slightest degree. Madame Dambreuse was determined to spare no expense.

After this he made his way to the church.

The curate who had charge of burials found fault with the waste of money on funeral pomps. For instance, the officer for the display of armorial distinctions was really useless. It would be far better to have a goodly display of wax-tapers. A low mass accompanied by music would be appropriate.

Frederick gave written directions to have everything that was agreed upon carried out, with a joint undertaking to defray all the expenses.

He went next to the Hôtel de Ville to purchase a piece of ground. A grant of a piece which was two metres in length and one in breadth[J] cost five hundred francs. Did he want a grant for fifty years or forever?

"Oh, forever!" said Frederick.

He took the whole thing seriously and got into a state of intense anxiety about it. In the courtyard of the mansion a marble-cutter was waiting to show him estimates and plans of Greek, Egyptian, and Moorish tombs; but the family architect had already been in consultation with Madame; and on the table in the vestibule there were all sorts of prospectuses with reference to the cleaning of mattresses, the disinfection of rooms, and the various processes of embalming.

After dining, he went back to the tailor's shop to order mourning for the servants; and he had still to discharge another function, for the gloves that he had ordered were of beaver, whereas the right kind for a funeral were floss-silk.

When he arrived next morning, at ten o'clock, the large reception-room was filled with people, and nearly everyone said, on encountering the others, in a melancholy tone:

"It is only a month ago since I saw him! Good heavens! it will be the same way with us all!"

"Yes; but let us try to keep it as far away from us as possible!"

Then there were little smiles of satisfaction; and they even engaged in conversations entirely unsuited to the occasion. At length, the master of the ceremonies, in a black coat in the French fashion and short breeches, with a cloak, cambric mourning-bands, a long sword by his side, and a three-cornered hat under his arm, gave utterance, with a bow, to the customary words:

"Messieurs, when it shall be your pleasure."

The funeral started. It was the market-day for flowers on the Place de la Madeleine. It was a fine day with brilliant sunshine; and the breeze, which shook the canvas tents, a little swelled at the edges the enormous black cloth which was hung over the church-gate. The escutcheon of M. Dambreuse, which covered a square piece of velvet, was repeated there three times. It was: Sable, with an arm sinister or and a clenched hand with a glove argent; with the coronet of a count, and this device: By every path.

The bearers lifted the heavy coffin to the top of the staircase, and they entered the building. The six chapels, the hemicycles, and the seats were hung with black. The catafalque at the end of the choir formed, with its large wax-tapers, a single focus of yellow lights. At the two corners, over the candelabra, flames of spirits of wine were burning.

The persons of highest rank took up their position in the sanctuary, and the rest in the nave; and then the Office for the Dead began.

With the exception of a few, the religious ignorance of all was so profound that the master of the ceremonies had, from time to time, to make signs to them to rise, to kneel, or to resume their seats. The organ and the two double-basses could be heard alternately with the voices. In the intervals of silence, the only sounds that reached the ear were the mumblings of the priest at the altar; then the music and the chanting went on again.

The light of day shone dimly through the three cupolas, but the open door let in, as it were, a stream of white radiance, which, entering in a horizontal direction, fell on every uncovered head; and in the air, half-way towards the ceiling of the church, floated a shadow, which was penetrated by the reflection of the gildings that decorated the ribbing of the pendentives and the foliage of the capitals.

Frederick, in order to distract his attention, listened to the Dies iræ. He gazed at those around him, or tried to catch a glimpse of the pictures hanging too far above his head, wherein the life of the Magdalen was represented. Luckily, Pellerin came to sit down beside him, and immediately plunged into a long dissertation on the subject of frescoes. The bell began to toll. They left the church.

The hearse, adorned with hanging draperies and tall plumes, set out for Père-Lachaise drawn by four black horses, with their manes plaited, their heads decked with tufts of feathers, and with large trappings embroidered with silver flowing down to their shoes. The driver of the vehicle, in Hessian boots, wore a three-cornered hat with a long piece of crape falling down from it. The cords were held by four personages: a questor of the Chamber of Deputies, a member of the General Council of the Aube, a delegate from the coal-mining company, and Fumichon, as a friend. The carriage of the deceased and a dozen mourning-coaches followed. The persons attending at the funeral came in the rear, filling up the middle of the boulevard.

The passers-by stopped to look at the mournful procession. Women, with their brats in their arms, got up on chairs, and people, who had been drinking glasses of beer in the cafés, presented themselves at the windows with billiard-cues in their hands.

The way was long, and, as at formal meals at which people are at first reserved and then expansive, the general deportment speedily relaxed. They talked of nothing but the refusal of an allowance by the Chamber to the President. M. Piscatory had shown himself harsh; Montalembert had been "magnificent, as usual," and MM. Chamballe, Pidoux, Creton, in short, the entire committee would be compelled perhaps to follow the advice of MM. Quentin-Bauchard and Dufour.

This conversation was continued as they passed through the Rue de la Roquette, with shops on each side, in which could be seen only chains of coloured glass and black circular tablets covered with drawings and letters of gold — which made them resemble grottoes full of stalactites and crockery-ware shops. But, when they had reached the cemetery-gate, everyone instantaneously ceased speaking.

The tombs among the trees: broken columns, pyramids, temples, dolmens, obelisks, and Etruscan vaults with doors of bronze. In some of them might be seen funereal boudoirs, so to speak, with rustic armchairs and folding-stools. Spiders' webs hung like rags from the little chains of the urns; and the bouquets of satin ribbons and the crucifixes were covered with dust. Everywhere, between the balusters on the tombstones, may be observed crowns of immortelles and chandeliers, vases, flowers, black discs set off with gold letters, and plaster statuettes — little boys or little girls or little angels sustained in the air by brass wires; several of them have even a roof of zinc overhead. Huge cables made of glass strung together, black, white, or azure, descend from the tops of the monuments to the ends of the flagstones with long folds, like boas. The rays of the sun, striking on them, made them scintillate in the midst of the black wooden crosses. The hearse advanced along the broad paths, which are paved like the streets of a city. From time to time the axletrees cracked. Women, kneeling down, with their dresses trailing in the grass, addressed the dead in tones of tenderness. Little white fumes arose from the green leaves of the yew trees. These came from offerings that had been left behind, waste material that had been burnt.

M. Dambreuse's grave was close to the graves of Manuel and Benjamin Constant. The soil in this place slopes with an abrupt decline. One has under his feet there the tops of green trees, further down the chimneys of steam-pumps, then the entire great city.

Frederick found an opportunity of admiring the scene while the various addresses were being delivered.

The first was in the name of the Chamber of Deputies, the second in the name of the General Council of the Aube, the third in the name of the coal-mining company of Saone-et-Loire, the fourth in the name of the Agricultural Society of the Yonne, and there was another in the name of a Philanthropic Society. Finally, just as everyone was going away, a stranger began reading a sixth address, in the name of the Amiens Society of Antiquaries.

And thereupon they all took advantage of the occasion to denounce Socialism, of which M. Dambreuse had died a victim. It was the effect produced on his mind by the exhibitions of anarchic violence, together with his devotion to order, that had shortened his days. They praised his intellectual powers, his integrity, his generosity, and even his silence as a representative of the people, "for, if he was not an orator, he possessed instead those solid qualities a thousand times more useful," etc., with all the requisite phrases — "Premature end; eternal regrets; the better land; farewell, or rather no, au revoir!"

The clay, mingled with stones, fell on the coffin, and he would never again be a subject for discussion in society.

However, there were a few allusions to him as the persons who had followed his remains left the cemetery. Hussonnet, who would have to give an account of the interment in the newspapers, took up all the addresses in a chaffing style, for, in truth, the worthy Dambreuse had been one of the most notable pots-de-vin[K] of the last reign. Then the citizens were driven in the mourning-coaches to their various places of business; the ceremony had not lasted very long; they congratulated themselves on the circumstance.

Frederick returned to his own abode quite worn out.

When he presented himself next day at Madame Dambreuse's residence, he was informed that she was busy below stairs in the room where M. Dambreuse had kept his papers.

The cardboard receptacles and the different drawers had been opened confusedly, and the account-books had been flung about right and left. A roll of papers on which were endorsed the words "Repayment hopeless" lay on the ground. He was near falling over it, and picked it up. Madame Dambreuse had sunk back in the armchair, so that he did not see her.

"Well? where are you? What is the matter!"

She sprang to her feet with a bound.

"What is the matter? I am ruined, ruined! do you understand?"

M. Adolphe Langlois, the notary, had sent her a message to call at his office, and had informed her about the contents of a will made by her husband before their marriage. He had bequeathed everything to Cécile; and the other will was lost. Frederick turned very pale. No doubt she had not made sufficient search.

"Well, then, look yourself!" said Madame Dambreuse, pointing at the objects contained in the room.

The two strong-boxes were gaping wide, having been broken open with blows of a cleaver, and she had turned up the desk, rummaged in the cupboards, and shaken the straw-mattings, when, all of a sudden, uttering a piercing cry, she dashed into corner where she had just noticed a little box with a brass lock. She opened it — nothing!

"Ah! the wretch! I, who took such devoted care of him!"

Then she burst into sobs.

"Perhaps it is somewhere else?" said Frederick.

"Oh! no! it was there! in that strong-box, I saw it there lately. 'Tis burned! I'm certain of it!"

One day, in the early stage of his illness, M. Dambreuse had gone down to this room to sign some documents.

"'Tis then he must have done the trick!"

And she fell back on a chair, crushed. A mother grieving beside an empty cradle was not more woeful than Madame Dambreuse was at the sight of the open strong-boxes. Indeed, her sorrow, in spite of the baseness of the motive which inspired it, appeared so deep that he tried to console her by reminding her that, after all, she was not reduced to sheer want.

"It is want, when I am not in a position to offer you a large fortune!"

She had not more than thirty thousand livres a year, without taking into account the mansion, which was worth from eighteen to twenty thousand, perhaps.

Although to Frederick this would have been opulence, he felt, none the less, a certain amount of disappointment. Farewell to his dreams and to all the splendid existence on which he had intended to enter! Honour compelled him to marry Madame Dambreuse. For a minute he reflected; then, in a tone of tenderness:

"I'll always have yourself!"

She threw herself into his arms, and he clasped her to his breast with an emotion in which there was a slight element of admiration for himself.

Madame Dambreuse, whose tears had ceased to flow, raised her face, beaming all over with happiness, and seizing his hand:

"Ah! I never doubted you! I knew I could count on you!"

The young man did not like this tone of anticipated certainty with regard to what he was pluming himself on as a noble action.

Then she brought him into her own apartment, and they began to arrange their plans for the future. Frederick should now consider the best way of advancing himself in life. She even gave him excellent advice with reference to his candidature.

The first point was to be acquainted with two or three phrases borrowed from political economy. It was necessary to take up a specialty, such as the stud system, for example; to write a number of notes on questions of local interest, to have always at his disposal post-offices or tobacconists' shops, and to do a heap of little services. In this respect M. Dambreuse had shown himself a true model. Thus, on one occasion, in the country, he had drawn up his wagonette, full of friends of his, in front of a cobbler's stall, and had bought a dozen pairs of shoes for his guests, and for himself a dreadful pair of boots, which he had not even the courage to wear for an entire fortnight. This anecdote put them into a good humour. She related others, and that with a renewal of grace, youthfulness, and wit.

She approved of his notion of taking a trip immediately to Nogent. Their parting was an affectionate one; then, on the threshold, she murmured once more:

"You love me — do you not?"

"Eternally," was his reply.

A messenger was waiting for him at his own house with a line written in lead-pencil informing him that Rosanette was about to be confined. He had been so much preoccupied for the past few days that he had not bestowed a thought upon the matter.

She had been placed in a special establishment at Chaillot.

Frederick took a cab and set out for this institution.

At the corner of the Rue de Marbeuf he read on a board in big letters: "Private Lying-in-Hospital, kept by Madame Alessandri, first-class midwife, ex-pupil of the Maternity, author of various works, etc." Then, in the centre of the street, over the door — a little side-door — there was another sign-board: "Private Hospital of Madame Alessandri," with all her titles.

Frederick gave a knock. A chambermaid, with the figure of an Abigail, introduced him into the reception-room, which was adorned with a mahogany table and armchairs of garnet velvet, and with a clock under a globe.

Almost immediately Madame appeared. She was a tall brunette of forty, with a slender waist, fine eyes, and the manners of good society. She apprised Frederick of the mother's happy delivery, and brought him up to her apartment.

Rosanette broke into a smile of unutterable bliss, and, as if drowned in the floods of love that were suffocating her, she said in a low tone:

"A boy — there, there!" pointing towards a cradle close to her bed.

He flung open the curtains, and saw, wrapped up in linen, a yellowish-red object, exceedingly shrivelled-looking, which had a bad smell, and which was bawling lustily.

"Embrace him!"

He replied, in order to hide his repugnance:

"But I am afraid of hurting him."

"No! no!"

Then, with the tips of his lips, he kissed his child.

"How like you he is!"

And with her two weak arms, she clung to his neck with an outburst of feeling which he had never witnessed on her part before.

The remembrance of Madame Dambreuse came back to him. He reproached himself as a monster for having deceived this poor creature, who loved and suffered with all the sincerity of her nature. For several days he remained with her till night.

She felt happy in this quiet place; the window-shutters in front of it remained always closed. Her room, hung with bright chintz, looked out on a large garden. Madame Alessandri, whose only shortcoming was that she liked to talk about her intimate acquaintanceship with eminent physicians, showed her the utmost attention. Her associates, nearly all provincial young ladies, were exceedingly bored, as they had nobody to come to see them. Rosanette saw that they regarded her with envy, and told this to Frederick with pride. It was desirable to speak low, nevertheless. The partitions were thin, and everyone stood listening at hiding-places, in spite of the constant thrumming of the pianos.

At last, he was about to take his departure for Nogent, when he got a letter from Deslauriers. Two fresh candidates had offered themselves, the one a Conservative, the other a Red; a third, whatever he might be, would have no chance. It was all Frederick's fault; he had let the lucky moment pass by; he should have come sooner and stirred himself.

"You have not even been seen at the agricultural assembly!" The advocate blamed him for not having any newspaper connection.

"Ah! if you had followed my advice long ago! If we had only a public print of our own!"

He laid special stress on this point. However, many persons who would have voted for him out of consideration for M. Dambreuse, abandoned him now. Deslauriers was one of the number. Not having anything more to expect from the capitalist, he had thrown over his protégé.

Frederick took the letter to show it to Madame Dambreuse.

"You have not been to Nogent, then?" said she.

"Why do you ask?"

"Because I saw Deslauriers three days ago."

Having learned that her husband was dead, the advocate had come to make a report about the coal-mines, and to offer his services to her as a man of business. This seemed strange to Frederick; and what was his friend doing down there?

Madame Dambreuse wanted to know how he had spent his time since they had parted.

"I have been ill," he replied.

"You ought at least to have told me about it."

"Oh! it wasn't worth while;" besides, he had to settle a heap of things, to keep appointments and to pay visits.

From that time forth he led a double life, sleeping religiously at the Maréchale's abode and passing the afternoon with Madame Dambreuse, so that there was scarcely a single hour of freedom left to him in the middle of the day.

The infant was in the country at Andilly. They went to see it once a week.

The wet-nurse's house was on rising ground in the village, at the end of a little yard as dark as a pit, with straw on the ground, hens here and there, and a vegetable-cart under the shed.

Rosanette would begin by frantically kissing her baby, and, seized with a kind of delirium, would keep moving to and fro, trying to milk the she-goat, eating big pieces of bread, and inhaling the odour of manure; she even wanted to put a little of it into her handkerchief.

Then they took long walks, in the course of which she went into the nurseries, tore off branches from the lilac-trees which hung down over the walls, and exclaimed, "Gee ho, donkey!" to the asses that were drawing cars along, and stopped to gaze through the gate into the interior of one of the lovely gardens; or else the wet-nurse would take the child and place it under the shade of a walnut-tree; and for hours the two women would keep talking the most tiresome nonsense.

Frederick, not far away from them, gazed at the beds of vines on the slopes, with here and there a clump of trees; at the dusty paths resembling strips of grey ribbon; at the houses, which showed white and red spots in the midst of the greenery; and sometimes the smoke of a locomotive stretched out horizontally to the bases of the hills, covered with foliage, like a gigantic ostrich's feather, the thin end of which was disappearing from view.

Then his eyes once more rested on his son. He imagined the child grown into a young man; he would make a companion of him; but perhaps he would be a blockhead, a wretched creature, in any event. He was always oppressed by the illegality of the infant's birth; it would have been better if he had never been born! And Frederick would murmur, "Poor child!" his heart swelling with feelings of unutterable sadness.

They often missed the last train. Then Madame Dambreuse would scold him for his want of punctuality. He would invent some falsehood.

It was necessary to invent some explanations, too, to satisfy Rosanette. She could not understand how he spent all his evenings; and when she sent a messenger to his house, he was never there! One day, when he chanced to be at home, the two women made their appearance almost at the same time. He got the Maréchale to go away, and concealed Madame Dambreuse, pretending that his mother was coming up to Paris.

Ere long, he found these lies amusing. He would repeat to one the oath which he had just uttered to the other, send them bouquets of the same sort, write to them at the same time, and then would institute a comparison between them. There was a third always present in his thoughts. The impossibility of possessing her seemed to him a justification of his perfidies, which were intensified by the fact that he had to practise them alternately; and the more he deceived, no matter which of the two, the fonder of him she grew, as if the love of one of them added heat to that of the other, and, as if by a sort of emulation, each of them were seeking to make him forget the other.

"Admire my confidence in you!" said Madame Dambreuse one day to him, opening a sheet of paper, in which she was informed that M. Moreau and a certain Rose Bron were living together as husband and wife.

"Can it be that this is the lady of the races?"

"What an absurdity!" he returned. "Let me have a look at it!"

The letter, written in Roman characters, had no signature. Madame

Dambreuse, in the beginning, had tolerated this mistress, who furnished a cloak for their adultery. But, as her passion became stronger, she had insisted on a rupture — a thing which had been effected long since, according to Frederick's account; and when he had ceased to protest, she replied, half closing her eyes, in which shone a look like the point of a stiletto under a muslin robe:

"Well — and the other?"

"What other?"

"The earthenware-dealer's wife!"

He shrugged his shoulders disdainfully. She did not press the matter.

But, a month later, while they were talking about honour and loyalty, and he was boasting about his own (in a casual sort of way, for the sake of precaution), she said to him:

"It is true — you are acting uprightly — you don't go back there any more?"

Frederick, who was at the moment thinking of the Maréchale, stammered:

"Where, pray?"

"To Madame Arnoux's."

He implored her to tell him from whom she got the information. It was through her second dressmaker, Madame Regimbart.

So, she knew all about his life, and he knew nothing about hers!

In the meantime, he had found in her dressing-room the miniature of a gentleman with long moustaches — was this the same person about whose suicide a vague story had been told him at one time? But there was no way of learning any more about it! However, what was the use of it? The hearts of women are like little pieces of furniture wherein things are secreted, full of drawers fitted into each other; one hurts himself, breaks his nails in opening them, and then finds within only some withered flower, a few grains of dust — or emptiness! And then perhaps he felt afraid of learning too much about the matter.

She made him refuse invitations where she was unable to accompany him, stuck to his side, was afraid of losing him; and, in spite of this union which was every day becoming stronger, all of a sudden, abysses disclosed themselves between the pair about the most trifling questions — an estimate of an individual or a work of art.

She had a style of playing on the piano which was correct and hard. Her spiritualism (Madame Dambreuse believed in the transmigration of souls into the stars) did not prevent her from taking the utmost care of her cash-box. She was haughty towards her servants; her eyes remained dry at the sight of the rags of the poor. In the expressions of which she habitually made use a candid egoism manifested itself: "What concern is that of mine? I should be very silly! What need have I?" and a thousand little acts incapable of analysis revealed hateful qualities in her. She would have listened behind doors; she could not help lying to her confessor. Through a spirit of despotism, she insisted on Frederick going to the church with her on Sunday. He obeyed, and carried her prayer-book.

The loss of the property she had expected to inherit had changed her considerably. These marks of grief, which people attributed to the death of M. Dambreuse, rendered her interesting, and, as in former times, she had a great number of visitors. Since Frederick's defeat at the election, she was ambitious of obtaining for both of them an embassy in Germany; therefore, the first thing they should do was to submit to the reigning ideas.

Some persons were in favour of the Empire, others of the Orléans family, and others of the Comte de Chambord; but they were all of one opinion as to the urgency of decentralisation, and several expedients were proposed with that view, such as to cut up Paris into many large streets in order to establish villages there, to transfer the seat of government to Versailles, to have the schools set up at Bourges, to suppress the libraries, and to entrust everything to the generals of division; and they glorified a rustic existence on the assumption that the uneducated man had naturally more sense than other men! Hatreds increased — hatred of primary teachers and wine-merchants, of the classes of philosophy, of the courses of lectures on history, of novels, red waistcoats, long beards, of independence in any shape, or any manifestation of individuality, for it was necessary "to restore the principle of authority" — let it be exercised in the name of no matter whom; let it come from no matter where, as long as it was Force, Authority! The Conservatives now talked in the very same way as Sénécals. Frederick was no longer able to understand their drift, and once more he found at the house of his former mistress the same remarks uttered by the same men.

The salons of the unmarried women (it was from this period that their importance dates) were a sort of neutral ground where reactionaries of different kinds met. Hussonnet, who gave himself up to the depreciation of contemporary glories (a good thing for the restoration of Order), inspired Rosanette with a longing to have evening parties like any other. He undertook to publish accounts of them, and first of all he brought a man of grave deportment, Fumichon; then came Nonancourt, M. de Grémonville, the Sieur de Larsilloix, ex-prefect, and Cisy, who was now an agriculturist in Lower Brittany, and more Christian than ever.

In addition, men who had at one time been the Maréchale's lovers, such as the Baron de Comaing, the Comte de Jumillac, and others, presented themselves; and Frederick was annoyed by their free-and-easy behaviour.

In order that he might assume the attitude of master in the house, he increased the rate of expenditure there. Then he went in for keeping a groom, took a new habitation, and got a fresh supply of furniture. These displays of extravagance were useful for the purpose of making his alliance appear less out of proportion with his pecuniary position. The result was that his means were soon terribly reduced — and Rosanette was entirely ignorant of the fact!

One of the lower middle-class, who had lost caste, she adored a domestic life, a quiet little home. However, it gave her pleasure to have "an at home day." In referring to persons of her own class, she called them "Those women!" She wished to be a society lady, and believed herself to be one. She begged of him not to smoke in the drawing-room any more, and for the sake of good form tried to make herself look thin.

She played her part badly, after all; for she grew serious, and even before going to bed always exhibited a little melancholy, just as there are cypress trees at the door of a tavern.

He found out the cause of it; she was dreaming of marriage — she, too! Frederick was exasperated at this. Besides, he recalled to mind her appearance at Madame Arnoux's house, and then he cherished a certain spite against her for having held out against him so long.

He made enquiries none the less as to who her lovers had been. She denied having had any relations with any of the persons he mentioned. A sort of jealous feeling took possession of him. He irritated her by asking questions about presents that had been made to her, and were still being made to her; and in proportion to the exciting effect which the lower portion of her nature produced upon him, he was drawn towards her by momentary illusions which ended in hate.

Her words, her voice, her smile, all had an unpleasant effect on him, and especially her glances with that woman's eye forever limpid and foolish. Sometimes he felt so tired of her that he would have seen her die without being moved at it. But how could he get into a passion with her? She was so mild that there was no hope of picking a quarrel with her.

Deslauriers reappeared, and explained his sojourn at Nogent by saying that he was making arrangements to buy a lawyer's office. Frederick was glad to see him again. It was somebody! and as a third person in the house, he helped to break the monotony.

The advocate dined with them from time to time, and whenever any little disputes arose, always took Rosanette's part, so that Frederick, on one occasion, said to him:

"Ah! you can have with her, if it amuses you!" so much did he long for some chance of getting rid of her.

About the middle of the month of June, she was served with an order made by the law courts by which Maître Athanase Gautherot, sheriff's officer, called on her to pay him four thousand francs due to Mademoiselle Clemence Vatnaz; if not, he would come to make a seizure on her.

In fact, of the four bills which she had at various times signed, only one had been paid; the money which she happened to get since then having been spent on other things that she required.

She rushed off at once to see Arnoux. He lived now in the Faubourg Saint-Germain, and the porter was unable to tell her the name of the street. She made her way next to the houses of several friends of hers, could not find one of them at home, and came back in a state of utter despair.

She did not wish to tell Frederick anything about it, fearing lest this new occurrence might prejudice the chance of a marriage between them.

On the following morning, M. Athanase Gautherot presented himself with two assistants close behind him, one of them sallow with a mean-looking face and an expression of devouring envy in his glance, the other wearing a collar and straps drawn very tightly, with a sort of thimble of black taffeta on his index-finger — and both ignobly dirty, with greasy necks, and the sleeves of their coats too short.

Their employer, a very good-looking man, on the contrary, began by apologising for the disagreeable duty he had to perform, while at the same time he threw a look round the room, "full of pretty things, upon my word of honour!" He added, "Not to speak of the things that can't be seized." At a gesture the two bailiff's men disappeared.

Then he became twice as polite as before. Could anyone believe that a lady so charming would not have a genuine friend! A sale of her goods under an order of the courts would be a real misfortune. One never gets over a thing like that. He tried to excite her fears; then, seeing that she was very much agitated, suddenly assumed a paternal tone. He knew the world. He had been brought into business relations with all these ladies — and as he mentioned their names, he examined the frames of the pictures on the walls. They were old pictures of the worthy Arnoux, sketches by Sombary, water-colours by Burieu, and three landscapes by Dittmer. It was evident that Rosanette was ignorant of their value, Maître Gautherot turned round to her:

"Look here! to show that I am a decent fellow, do one thing: give me up those Dittmers here — and I am ready to pay all. Do you agree?"

At that moment Frederick, who had been informed about the matter by Delphine in the anteroom, and who had just seen the two assistants, came in with his hat on his head, in a rude fashion. Maître Gautherot resumed his dignity; and, as the door had been left open:

"Come on, gentlemen — write down! In the second room, let us say — an oak table with its two leaves, two sideboards — —"

Frederick here stopped him, asking whether there was not some way of preventing the seizure.

"Oh! certainly! Who paid for the furniture?"

"I did."

"Well, draw up a claim — you have still time to do it."

Maître Gautherot did not take long in writing out his official report, wherein he directed that Mademoiselle Bron should attend at an enquiry in chambers with reference to the ownership of the furniture, and having done this he withdrew.

Frederick uttered no reproach. He gazed at the traces of mud left on the floor by the bailiff's shoes, and, speaking to himself:

"It will soon be necessary to look about for money!"

"Ah! my God, how stupid I am!" said the Maréchale.

She ransacked a drawer, took out a letter, and made her way rapidly to the Languedoc Gas Lighting Company, in order to get the transfer of her shares.

She came back an hour later. The interest in the shares had been sold to another. The clerk had said, in answer to her demand, while examining the sheet of paper containing Arnoux's written promise to her: "This document in no way constitutes you the proprietor of the shares. The company has no cognisance of the matter." In short, he sent her away unceremoniously, while she choked with rage; and Frederick would have to go to Arnoux's house at once to have the matter cleared up.

But Arnoux would perhaps imagine that he had come to recover in an indirect fashion the fifteen thousand francs due on the mortgage which he had lost; and then this claim from a man who had been his mistress's lover seemed to him a piece of baseness.

Selecting a middle course, he went to the Dambreuse mansion to get Madame Regimbart's address, sent a messenger to her residence, and in this way ascertained the name of the café which the Citizen now haunted.

It was the little café on the Place de la Bastille, in which he sat all day in the corner to the right at the lower end of the establishment, never moving any more than if he were a portion of the building.

After having gone successively through the half-cup of coffee, the glass of grog, the "bishop," the glass of mulled wine, and even the red wine and water, he fell back on beer, and every half hour he let fall this word, "Bock!" having reduced his language to what was actually indispensable. Frederick asked him if he saw Arnoux occasionally.

"No!"

"Look here — why?"

"An imbecile!"

Politics, perhaps, kept them apart, and so Frederick thought it a judicious thing to enquire about Compain.

"What a brute!" said Regimbart.

"How is that?"

"His calf's head!"

"Ha! explain to me what the calf's head is!"

Regimbart's face wore a contemptuous smile.

"Some tomfoolery!"

After a long interval of silence, Frederick went on to ask:

"So, then, he has changed his address?"

"Who?"

"Arnoux!"

"Yes — Rue de Fleurus!"

"What number?"

"Do I associate with the Jesuits?"

"What, Jesuits!"

The Citizen replied angrily:

"With the money of a patriot whom I introduced to him, this pig has set up as a dealer in beads!"

"It isn't possible!"

"Go there, and see for yourself!"

It was perfectly true; Arnoux, enfeebled by a fit of sickness, had turned religious; besides, he had always had a stock of religion in his composition, and (with that mixture of commercialism and ingenuity which was natural to him), in order to gain salvation and fortune both together, he had begun to traffick in religious objects.

Frederick had no difficulty in discovering his establishment, on whose signboard appeared these words: "Emporium of Gothic Art — Restoration of articles used in ecclesiastical ceremonies — Church ornaments — Polychromatic sculpture — Frankincense of the Magi, Kings, &c., &c."

At the two corners of the shop-window rose two wooden statues, streaked with gold, cinnabar, and azure, a Saint John the Baptist with his sheepskin, and a Saint Genevieve with roses in her apron and a distaff under her arm; next, groups in plaster, a good sister teaching a little girl, a mother on her knees beside a little bed, and three collegians before the holy table. The prettiest object there was a kind of châlet representing the interior of a crib with the ass, the ox, and the child Jesus stretched on straw — real straw. From the top to the bottom of the shelves could be seen medals by the dozen, every sort of beads, holy-water basins in the form of shells, and portraits of ecclesiastical dignitaries, amongst whom Monsignor Affre and our Holy Father shone forth with smiles on their faces.

Arnoux sat asleep at his counter with his head down. He had aged terribly. He had even round his temples a wreath of rosebuds, and the reflection of the gold crosses touched by the rays of the sun fell over him.

Frederick was filled with sadness at this spectacle of decay. Through devotion to the Maréchale he, however, submitted to the ordeal, and stepped forward. At the end of the shop Madame Arnoux showed herself; thereupon, he turned on his heel.

"I couldn't see him," he said, when he came back to Rosanette.

And in vain he went on to promise that he would write at once to his notary at Havre for some money — she flew into a rage. She had never seen a man so weak, so flabby. While she was enduring a thousand privations, other people were enjoying themselves.

Frederick was thinking about poor Madame Arnoux, and picturing to himself the heart-rending impoverishment of her surroundings. He had seated himself before the writing-desk; and, as Rosanette's voice still kept up its bitter railing:

"Ah! in the name of Heaven, hold your tongue!"

"Perhaps you are going to defend them?"

"Well, yes!" he exclaimed; "for what's the cause of this display of fury?"

"But why is it that you don't want to make them pay up? 'Tis for fear of vexing your old flame — confess it!"

He felt an inclination to smash her head with the timepiece. Words failed him. He relapsed into silence.

Rosanette, as she walked up and down the room, continued:

"I am going to hurl a writ at this Arnoux of yours. Oh! I don't want your assistance. I'll get legal advice."

Three days later, Delphine rushed abruptly into the room where her mistress sat.

"Madame! madame! there's a man here with a pot of paste who has given me a fright!"

Rosanette made her way down to the kitchen, and saw there a vagabond whose face was pitted with smallpox. Moreover, one of his arms was paralysed, and he was three fourths drunk, and hiccoughed every time he attempted to speak.

This was Maître Gautherot's bill-sticker. The objections raised against the seizure having been overruled, the sale followed as a matter of course.

For his trouble in getting up the stairs he demanded, in the first place, a half-glass of brandy; then he wanted another favour, namely, tickets for the theatre, on the assumption that the lady of the house was an actress. After this he indulged for some minutes in winks, whose import was perfectly incomprehensible. Finally, he declared that for forty sous he would tear off the corners of the poster which he had already affixed to the door below stairs. Rosanette found herself referred to by name in it — a piece of exceptional harshness which showed the spite of the Vatnaz.

She had at one time exhibited sensibility, and had even, while suffering from the effects of a heartache, written to Béranger for his advice. But under the ravages of life's storms, her spirit had become soured, for she had been forced, in turn, to give lessons on the piano, to act as manageress of a table d'hôte, to assist others in writing for the fashion journals, to sublet apartments, and to traffic in lace in the world of light women, her relations with whom enabled her to make herself useful to many persons, and amongst others to Arnoux. She had formerly been employed in a commercial establishment.

There it was one of her functions to pay the workwomen; and for each of them there were two livres, one of which always remained in her hands. Dussardier, who, through kindness, kept the amount payable to a girl named Hortense Baslin, presented himself one day at the cash-office at the moment when Mademoiselle Vatnaz was presenting this girl's account, 1,682 francs, which the cashier paid her. Now, on the very day before this, Dussardier had entered down the sum as 1,082 in the girl Baslin's book. He asked to have it given back to him on some pretext; then, anxious to bury out of sight the story of this theft, he stated that he had lost it. The workwoman ingenuously repeated this falsehood to Mademoiselle Vatnaz, and the latter, in order to satisfy her mind about the matter, came with a show of indifference to talk to the shopman on the subject. He contented himself with the answer: "I have burned it!" — that was all. A little while afterwards she quitted the house, without believing that the book had been really destroyed, and filled with the idea that Dussardier had preserved it.

On hearing that he had been wounded, she rushed to his abode, with the object of getting it back. Then, having discovered nothing, in spite of the closest searches, she was seized with respect, and presently with love, for this youth, so loyal, so gentle, so heroic and so strong! At her age such good fortune in an affair of the heart was a thing that one would not expect. She threw herself into it with the appetite of an ogress; and she had given up literature, Socialism, "the consoling doctrines and the generous Utopias," the course of lectures which she had projected on the "Desubalternization of Woman" — everything, even Delmar himself; finally she offered to unite herself to Dussardier in marriage.

Although she was his mistress, he was not at all in love with her. Besides, he had not forgotten her theft. Then she was too wealthy for him. He refused her offer. Thereupon, with tears in her eyes, she told him about what she had dreamed — it was to have for both of them a confectioner's shop. She possessed the capital that was required beforehand for the purpose, and next week this would be increased to the extent of four thousand francs. By way of explanation, she referred to the proceedings she had taken against the Maréchale.

Dussardier was annoyed at this on account of his friend. He recalled to mind the cigar-holder that had been presented to him at the guard-house, the evenings spent in the Quai Napoléon, the many pleasant chats, the books lent to him, the thousand acts of kindness which Frederick had done in his behalf. He begged of the Vatnaz to abandon the proceedings.

She rallied him on his good nature, while exhibiting an antipathy against Rosanette which he could not understand. She longed only for wealth, in fact, in order to crush her, by-and-by, with her four-wheeled carriage.

Dussardier was terrified by these black abysses of hate, and when he had ascertained what was the exact day fixed for the sale, he hurried out. On the following morning he made his appearance at Frederick's house with an embarrassed countenance.

"I owe you an apology."

"For what, pray?"

"You must take me for an ingrate, I, whom she is the — — " He faltered.

"Oh! I'll see no more of her. I am not going to be her accomplice!" And as the other was gazing at him in astonishment:

"Isn't your mistress's furniture to be sold in three days' time?"

"Who told you that?"

"Herself — the Vatnaz! But I am afraid of giving you offence — — "

"Impossible, my dear friend!"

"Ah! that is true — you are so good!"

And he held out to him, in a cautious fashion, a hand in which he clasped a little pocket-book made of sheep-leather.

It contained four thousand francs — all his savings.

"What! Oh! no! no! — --"

"I knew well I would wound your feelings," returned Dussardier, with a tear in the corner of his eye.

Frederick pressed his hand, and the honest fellow went on in a piteous tone:

"Take the money! Give me that much pleasure! I am in such a state of despair. Can it be, furthermore, that all is over? I thought we should be happy when the Revolution had come. Do you remember what a beautiful thing it was? how freely we breathed! But here we are flung back into a worse condition of things than ever.

"Now, they are killing our Republic, just as they killed the other one — the Roman! ay, and poor Venice! poor Poland! poor Hungary! What abominable deeds! First of all, they knocked down the trees of Liberty, then they restricted the right to vote, shut up the clubs, re-established the censorship and surrendered to the priests the power of teaching, so that we might look out for the Inquisition. Why not? The Conservatives want to give us a taste of the stick. The newspapers are fined merely for pronouncing an opinion in favour of abolishing the death-penalty. Paris is overflowing with bayonets; sixteen departments are in a state of siege; and then the demand for amnesty is again rejected!"

He placed both hands on his forehead, then, spreading out his arms as if his mind were in a distracted state:

"If, however, we only made the effort! if we were only sincere, we might understand each other. But no! The workmen are no better than the capitalists, you see! At Elbœuf recently they refused to help at a fire! There are wretches who profess to regard Barbès as an aristocrat! In order to make the people ridiculous, they want to get nominated for the presidency Nadaud, a mason — just imagine! And there is no way out of it — no remedy! Everybody is against us! For my part, I have never done any harm; and yet this is like a weight pressing down on my stomach. If this state of things continues, I'll go mad. I have a mind to do away with myself. I tell you I want no money for myself! You'll pay it back to me, deuce take it! I am lending it to you."

Frederick, who felt himself constrained by necessity, ended by taking the four thousand francs from him. And so they had no more disquietude so far as the Vatnaz was concerned.

But it was not long ere Rosanette was defeated in her action against Arnoux; and through sheer obstinacy she wished to appeal.

Deslauriers exhausted his energies in trying to make her understand that Arnoux's promise constituted neither a gift nor a regular transfer. She did not even pay the slightest attention to him, her notion being that the law was unjust — it was because she was a woman; men backed up each other amongst themselves. In the end, however, she followed his advice.

He made himself so much at home in the house, that on several occasions he brought Sénécal to dine there. Frederick, who had advanced him money, and even got his own tailor to supply him with clothes, did not like this unceremoniousness; and the advocate gave his old clothes to the Socialist, whose means of existence were now of an exceedingly uncertain character.

He was, however, anxious to be of service to Rosanette. One day, when she showed him a dozen shares in the Kaolin Company (that enterprise which led to Arnoux being cast in damages to the extent of thirty thousand francs), he said to her:

"But this is a shady transaction, and you have now a grand chance!"

She had the right to call on him to pay her debts. In the first place, she could prove that he was jointly bound to pay all the company's liabilities, since he had certified personal debts as collective debts — in short, he had embezzled sums which were payable only to the company.

"All this renders him guilty of fraudulent bankruptcy under articles 586 and 587 of the Commercial Code, and you may be sure, my pet, we'll send him packing."

Rosanette threw herself on his neck. He entrusted her case next day to his former master, not having time to devote attention to it himself, as he had business at Nogent. In case of any urgency, Sénécal could write to him.

His negotiations for the purchase of an office were a mere pretext. He spent his time at M. Roque's house, where he had begun not only by sounding the praises of their friend, but by imitating his manners and language as much as possible; and in this way he had gained Louise's confidence, while he won over that of her father by making an attack on Ledru-Rollin.

If Frederick did not return, it was because he mingled in aristocratic society, and gradually Deslauriers gave them to understand that he was in love with somebody, that he had a child, and that he was keeping a fallen creature.

The despair of Louise was intense. The indignation of Madame Moreau was not less strong. She saw her son whirling towards the bottom of a gulf the depth of which could not be determined, was wounded in her religious ideas as to propriety, and as it were, experienced a sense of personal dishonour; then all of a sudden her physiognomy underwent a change. To the questions which people put to her with regard to Frederick, she replied in a sly fashion:

"He is well, quite well."

She was aware that he was about to be married to Madame Dambreuse.

The date of the event had been fixed, and he was even trying to think of some way of making Rosanette swallow the thing.

About the middle of autumn she won her action with reference to the kaolin shares. Frederick was informed about it by Sénécal, whom he met at his own door, on his way back from the courts.

It had been held that M. Arnoux was privy to all the frauds, and the ex-tutor had such an air of making merry over it that Frederick prevented him from coming further, assuring Sénécal that he would convey the intelligence to Rosanette. He presented himself before her with a look of irritation on his face.

"Well, now you are satisfied!"

But, without minding what he had said:

"Look here!"

And she pointed towards her child, which was lying in a cradle close to the fire. She had found it so sick at the house of the wet-nurse that morning that she had brought it back with her to Paris.

All the infant's limbs were exceedingly thin, and the lips were covered with white specks, which in the interior of the mouth became, so to speak, clots of blood-stained milk.

"What did the doctor say?"

"Oh! the doctor! He pretends that the journey has increased his — I don't know what it is, some name in 'ite' — in short, that he has the thrush.[\[L\]](#) Do you know what that is?"

Frederick replied without hesitation: "Certainly," adding that it was nothing.

But in the evening he was alarmed by the child's debilitated look and by the progress of these whitish spots, resembling mould, as if life, already abandoning this little frame, had left now nothing but matter from which vegetation was sprouting. His hands were cold; he was no longer able to drink anything; and the nurse, another woman, whom the porter had gone and taken on chance at an office, kept repeating:

"It seems to me he's very low, very low!"

Rosanette was up all night with the child.

In the morning she went to look for Frederick.

"Just come and look at him. He doesn't move any longer."

In fact, he was dead. She took him up, shook him, clasped him in her arms, calling him most tender names, covered him with kisses, broke into sobs, turned herself from one side to the other in a state of distraction, tore her hair, uttered a number of shrieks, and then let herself sink on the edge of the divan, where she lay with her mouth open and a flood of tears rushing from her wildly-glaring eyes.

Then a torpor fell upon her, and all became still in the apartment. The furniture was overturned. Two or three napkins were lying on the floor. It struck six. The night-light had gone out.

Frederick, as he gazed at the scene, could almost believe that he was dreaming. His heart was oppressed with anguish. It seemed to him that this death was only a beginning, and that behind it was a worse calamity, which was just about to come on.

Suddenly, Rosanette said in an appealing tone:

"We'll preserve the body — shall we not?"

She wished to have the dead child embalmed. There were many objections to this. The principal one, in Frederick's opinion, was that the thing was impracticable in the case of children so young. A portrait would be better. She adopted this idea. He wrote a line to Pellerin, and Delphine hastened to deliver it.

Pellerin arrived speedily, anxious by this display of zeal to efface all recollection of his former conduct. The first thing he said was:

"Poor little angel! Ah, my God, what a misfortune!"

But gradually (the artist in him getting the upper hand) he declared that nothing could be made out of those yellowish eyes, that livid face, that it was a real case of still-life, and would, therefore, require very great talent to treat it effectively; and so he murmured:

"Oh, 'tisn't easy — 'tisn't easy!"

"No matter, as long as it is life-like," urged Rosanette.

"Pooh! what do I care about a thing being life-like? Down with Realism! 'Tis the spirit that must be portrayed by the painter! Let me alone! I am going to try to conjure up what it ought to be!"

He reflected, with his left hand clasping his brow, and with his right hand clutching his elbow; then, all of a sudden:

"Ha, I have an idea! a pastel! With coloured mezzotints, almost spread out flat, a lovely model could be obtained with the outer surface alone!"

He sent the chambermaid to look for his box of colours; then, having a chair under his feet and another by his side, he began to throw out great touches with as much complacency as if he had drawn them in accordance with the bust. He praised the little Saint John of Correggio, the Infanta Rosa of Velasquez, the milk-white flesh-tints of Reynolds, the distinction of Lawrence, and especially the child with long hair that sits in Lady Gower's lap.

"Besides, could you find anything more charming than these little toads? The type of the sublime (Raphael has proved it by his Madonnas) is probably a mother with her child?"

Rosanette, who felt herself stifling, went away; and presently Pellerin said:

"Well, about Arnoux; you know what has happened?"

"No! What?"

"However, it was bound to end that way!"

"What has happened, might I ask?"

"Perhaps by this time he is — — Excuse me!"

The artist got up in order to raise the head of the little corpse higher.

"You were saying — — " Frederick resumed.

And Pellerin, half-closing his eyes, in order to take his dimensions better:

"I was saying that our friend Arnoux is perhaps by this time locked up!"

Then, in a tone of satisfaction:

"Just give a little glance at it. Is that the thing?"

"Yes, 'tis quite right. But about Arnoux?"

Pellerin laid down his pencil.

"As far as I could understand, he was sued by one Mignot, an intimate friend of Regimbart — a long-headed fellow that, eh? What an idiot! Just imagine! one day — — "

"What! it's not Regimbart that's in question, is it?"

"It is, indeed! Well, yesterday evening, Arnoux had to produce twelve thousand francs; if not, he was a ruined man."

"Oh! this perhaps is exaggerated," said Frederick.

"Not a bit. It looked to me a very serious business, very serious!"

At that moment Rosanette reappeared, with red spots under her eyes, which glowed like dabs of paint. She sat down near the drawing and gazed at it. Pellerin made a sign to the other to hold his tongue on account of her. But Frederick, without minding her:

"Nevertheless, I can't believe — — "

"I tell you I met him yesterday," said the artist, "at seven o'clock in the evening, in the Rue Jacob. He had even taken the precaution to have his passport with him; and he spoke about embarking from Havre, he and his whole camp."

"What! with his wife?"

"No doubt. He is too much of a family man to live by himself."

"And are you sure of this?"

"Certain, faith! Where do you expect him to find twelve thousand francs?"

Frederick took two or three turns round the room. He panted for breath, bit his lips, and then snatched up his hat.

"Where are you going now?" said Rosanette.

He made no reply, and the next moment he had disappeared.

CHAPTER XVIII.

An Auction.

Twelve thousand francs should be procured, or, if not, he would see Madame Arnoux no more; and until now there had lingered in his breast an unconquerable hope. Did she not, as it were, constitute the very substance of his heart, the very basis of his life? For some minutes he went staggering along the footpath, his mind tortured with anxiety, and nevertheless gladdened by the thought that he was no longer by the other's side.

Where was he to get the money? Frederick was well aware from his own experience how hard it was to obtain it immediately, no matter at what cost. There was only one person who could help him in the matter — Madame Dambreuse. She always kept a good supply of bank-notes in her escritoire. He called at her house; and in an unblushing fashion:

"Have you twelve thousand francs to lend me?"

"What for?"

That was another person's secret. She wanted to know who this person was. He would not give way on this point. They were equally determined not to yield. Finally, she declared that she would give nothing until she knew for what purpose it was wanted.

Frederick's face became very flushed; and he stated that one of his comrades had committed a theft. It was necessary to replace the sum this very day.

"Let me know his name? His name? Come! what's his name?"

"Dussardier!"

And he threw himself on his knees, imploring of her to say nothing about it.

"What idea have you got into your head about me?" Madame Dambreuse replied. "One would imagine that you were the guilty party yourself. Pray, have done with your tragic airs! Hold on! here's the money! and much good may it do him!"

He hurried off to see Arnoux. That worthy merchant was not in his shop. But he was still residing in the Rue de Paradis, for he had two domiciles.

In the Rue de Paradis, the porter said that M. Arnoux had been away since the evening before. As for Madame, he ventured to say nothing; and Frederick, having rushed like an arrow up the stairs, laid his ear against the keyhole. At length, the door was opened. Madame had gone out with Monsieur. The servant could not say when they would be back; her wages had been paid, and she was leaving herself.

Suddenly he heard the door creaking.

"But is there anyone in the room?"

"Oh, no, Monsieur! it is the wind."

Thereupon he withdrew. There was something inexplicable in such a rapid disappearance.

Regimbart, being Mignot's intimate friend, could perhaps enlighten him? And Frederick got himself driven to that gentleman's house at Montmartre in the Rue l'Empereur.

Attached to the house there was a small garden shut in by a grating which was stopped up with iron plates. Three steps before the hall-door set off the white front; and a person passing along the footpath could see the two rooms on the ground-floor, the first of which was a parlour with ladies' dresses lying on the furniture on every side, and the second the workshop in which Madame Regimbart's female assistants were accustomed to sit.

They were all convinced that Monsieur had important occupations, distinguished connections, that he was a man altogether beyond comparison. When he was passing through the lobby with his hat cocked up at the sides, his long grave face, and his green frock-coat, the girls stopped in the midst of their work. Besides, he never failed to address to them a few words of encouragement, some observation which showed his ceremonious courtesy; and, afterwards, in their own homes they felt unhappy at not having been able to preserve him as their ideal.

No one, however, was so devoted to him as Madame Regimbart, an intelligent little woman, who maintained him by her handicraft.

As soon as M. Moreau had given his name, she came out quickly to meet him, knowing through the servants what his relations were with Madame Dambreuse. Her husband would be back in a moment; and Frederick, while he followed her, admired the appearance of the house and the profusion of oil-cloth that was displayed in it. Then he waited a few minutes in a kind of office, into which the Citizen was in the habit of retiring, in order to be alone with his thoughts.

When they met, Regimbart's manner was less cranky than usual.

He related Arnoux's recent history. The ex-manufacturer of earthenware had excited the vanity of Mignot, a patriot who owned a hundred shares in the Siècle, by professing to show that it would be necessary from the democratic standpoint to change the management and the editorship of the newspaper; and under the pretext of making his views prevail in the next meeting of shareholders, he had given the other fifty shares, telling him that he could pass them on to reliable friends who would back up his vote. Mignot would have no personal responsibility, and need not annoy himself about anyone; then, when he had achieved success, he would be able to secure a good place in the administration of at least from five to six thousand francs. The shares had been delivered. But Arnoux had at once sold them, and with the money had entered into partnership with a dealer in religious articles. Thereupon came complaints from Mignot, to which Arnoux sent evasive answers. At last the patriot had threatened to bring against him a charge of cheating if he did not restore his share-certificates or pay an equivalent sum — fifty thousand francs.

Frederick's face wore a look of despondency.

"That is not the whole of it," said the Citizen. "Mignot, who is an honest fellow, has reduced his claim to one fourth. New promises on the part of the other, and, of course, new dodges. In short, on the morning of the day before yesterday Mignot sent him a written application to pay up, within twenty-four hours, twelve thousand francs, without prejudice to the balance."

"But I have the amount!" said Frederick.

The Citizen slowly turned round:

"Humbug!"

"Excuse me! I have the money in my pocket. I brought it with me."

"How you do go at it! By Jove, you do! However, 'tis too late now — the complaint has been lodged, and Arnoux is gone."

"Alone?"

"No! along with his wife. They were seen at the Havre terminus."

Frederick grew exceedingly pale. Madame Regimbart thought he was going to faint. He regained his self-possession with an effort, and had even sufficient presence of mind to ask two or three questions about the occurrence. Regimbart was grieved at the affair, considering that it would injure the cause of Democracy. Arnoux had always been lax in his conduct and disorderly in his life.

"A regular hare-brained fellow! He burned the candle at both ends! The petticoat has ruined him! 'Tis not himself that I pity, but his poor wife!" For the Citizen admired virtuous women, and had a great esteem for Madame Arnoux.

"She must have suffered a nice lot!"

Frederick felt grateful to him for his sympathy; and, as if Regimbart had done him a service, pressed his hand effusively.

"Have you done all that's necessary in the matter?" was Rosanette's greeting to him when she saw him again.

He had not been able to pluck up courage to do it, he answered, and walked about the streets at random to divert his thoughts.

At eight o'clock, they passed into the dining-room; but they remained seated face to face in silence, gave vent each to a deep sigh every now and then, and pushed away their plates.

Frederick drank some brandy. He felt quite shattered, crushed, annihilated, no longer conscious of anything save a sensation of extreme fatigue.

She went to look at the portrait. The red, the yellow, the green, and the indigo made glaring stains that jarred with each other, so that it looked a hideous thing — almost ridiculous.

Besides, the dead child was now unrecognisable. The purple hue of his lips made the whiteness of his skin more remarkable. His nostrils were more drawn than before, his eyes more hollow; and his head rested on a pillow of blue taffeta, surrounded by petals of camelias, autumn roses, and violets. This was an idea suggested by the chambermaid, and both of them had thus with pious care arranged the little corpse. The mantelpiece, covered with a cloth of guipure, supported silver-gilt candlesticks with bunches of consecrated box in the spaces between them. At the corners there were a pair of vases in which pastilles were burning. All these things, taken in conjunction with the cradle, presented the aspect of an altar; and Frederick recalled to mind the night when he had watched beside M. Dambreuse's deathbed.

Nearly every quarter of an hour Rosanette drew aside the curtains in order to take a look at her child. She saw him in imagination, a few months hence, beginning to walk; then at college, in the middle of the recreation-ground, playing a game of base; then at twenty years a full-grown young man; and all these pictures conjured up by her brain created for her, as it were, the son she would have lost, had he only lived, the excess of her grief intensifying in her the maternal instinct.

Frederick, sitting motionless in another armchair, was thinking of Madame Arnoux.

No doubt she was at that moment in a train, with her face leaning against a carriage window, while she watched the country disappearing behind her in the direction of Paris, or else on the deck of a steamboat, as on the occasion when they first met; but this vessel carried her away into distant countries, from which she would never return. He next saw her in a room at an inn, with trunks covering the floor, the wall-paper hanging in shreds, and the door shaking in the wind. And after that — to what would she be compelled to turn? Would she have to become a school-mistress or a lady's companion, or perhaps a chambermaid? She was exposed to all the vicissitudes of poverty. His utter ignorance as to what her fate might be tortured his mind. He ought either to have opposed her departure or to have followed her. Was he not her real husband? And as the thought impressed itself on his consciousness that he would never meet her again, that it was all over forever, that she was lost to him beyond recall, he felt, so to speak, a rending of his entire being, and the tears that had been gathering since morning in his heart overflowed.

Rosanette noticed the tears in his eyes.

"Ah! you are crying just like me! You are grieving, too?"

"Yes! yes! I am — —"

He pressed her to his heart, and they both sobbed, locked in each other's arms.

Madame Dambreuse was weeping too, as she lay, face downwards, on her bed, with her hands clasped over her head.

Olympe Regimbart having come that evening to try on her first coloured gown after mourning, had told her about Frederick's visit, and even about the twelve thousand francs which he had ready to transfer to M. Arnoux.

So, then, this money, the very money which he had got from her, was intended to be used simply for the purpose of preventing the other from leaving Paris — for the purpose, in fact, of preserving a mistress!

At first, she broke into a violent rage, and determined to drive him from her door, as she would have driven a lackey. A copious flow of tears produced a soothing effect upon her. It was better to keep it all to herself, and say nothing about it.

Frederick brought her back the twelve thousand francs on the following day.

She begged of him to keep the money lest he might require it for his friend, and she asked a number of questions about this gentleman. Who, then, had tempted him to such a breach of trust? A woman, no doubt! Women drag you into every kind of crime.

This bantering tone put Frederick out of countenance. He felt deep remorse for the calumny he had invented. He was reassured by the reflection that Madame Dambreuse could not be aware of the facts. All the same, she was very persistent about the subject; for, two days later, she again made enquiries about his young friend, and, after that, about another — Deslauriers.

"Is this young man trustworthy and intelligent?"

Frederick spoke highly of him.

"Ask him to call on me one of these mornings; I want to consult him about a matter of business."

She had found a roll of old papers in which there were some bills of Arnoux, which had been duly protested, and which had been signed by Madame Arnoux. It was about these very bills Frederick had called on M. Dambreuse on one occasion while the latter was at breakfast; and, although the capitalist had not sought to enforce repayment of this outstanding debt, he had not only got judgment on foot of them from the Tribunal of Commerce against Arnoux, but also against his wife, who knew nothing about the matter, as her husband had not thought fit to give her any information on the point.

Here was a weapon placed in Madame Dambreuse's hands — she had no doubt about it. But her notary would advise her to take no step in the affair. She would have preferred to act through some obscure person, and she thought of that big fellow with such an impudent expression of face, who had offered her his services.

Frederick ingenuously performed this commission for her.

The advocate was enchanted at the idea of having business relations with such an aristocratic lady.

He hurried to Madame Dambreuse's house.

She informed him that the inheritance belonged to her niece, a further reason for liquidating those debts which she should repay, her object being to overwhelm Martinon's wife by a display of greater attention to the deceased's affairs.

Deslauriers guessed that there was some hidden design underlying all this. He reflected while he was examining the bills. Madame Arnoux's name, traced by her own hand, brought once more before his eyes her entire person, and the insult which he had received at her hands. Since vengeance was offered to him, why should he not snatch at it?

He accordingly advised Madame Dambreuse to have the bad debts which went with the inheritance sold by auction. A man of straw, whose name would not be divulged, would buy them up, and would exercise the legal rights thus given him to realise them. He would take it on himself to provide a man to discharge this function.

Towards the end of the month of November, Frederick, happening to pass through the street in which Madame Arnoux had lived, raised his eyes towards the windows of her house, and saw posted on the door a placard on which was printed in large letters:

"Sale of valuable furniture, consisting of kitchen utensils, body and table linen, shirts and chemises, lace, petticoats, trousers, French and Indian cashmeres, an Erard piano, two Renaissance oak chests, Venetian mirrors, Chinese and Japanese pottery."

"'Tis their furniture!" said Frederick to himself, and his suspicions were confirmed by the doorkeeper.

As for the person who had given instructions for the sale, he could get no information on that head. But perhaps the auctioneer, Maître Berthelmont, might be able to throw light on the subject.

The functionary did not at first want to tell what creditor was having the sale carried out. Frederick pressed him on the point. It was a gentleman named Sénécal, an agent; and Maître Berthelmont even carried his politeness so far as to lend his newspaper — the Petites

Affiches — to Frederick.

The latter, on reaching Rosanette's house, flung down this paper on the table spread wide open.

"Read that!"

"Well, what?" said she with a face so calm that it roused up in him a feeling of revolt.

"Ah! keep up that air of innocence!"

"I don't understand what you mean."

"'Tis you who are selling out Madame Arnoux yourself!"

She read over the announcement again.

"Where is her name?"

"Oh! 'tis her furniture. You know that as well as I do."

"What does that signify to me?" said Rosanette, shrugging her shoulders.

"What does it signify to you? But you are taking your revenge, that's all. This is the consequence of your persecutions. Haven't you outraged her so far as to call at her house? — you, a worthless creature! and this to the most saintly, the most charming, the best woman that ever lived! Why do you set your heart on ruining her?"

"I assure you, you are mistaken!"

"Come now! As if you had not put Sénécal forward to do this!"

"What nonsense!"

Then he was carried away with rage.

"You lie! you lie! you wretch! You are jealous of her! You have got a judgment against her husband! Sénécal is already mixed up in your affairs. He detests Arnoux; and your two hatreds have entered into a combination with one another. I saw how delighted he was when you won that action of yours about the kaolin shares. Are you going to deny this?"

"I give you my word — —"

"Oh, I know what that's worth — your word!"

And Frederick reminded her of her lovers, giving their names and circumstantial details. Rosanette drew back, all the colour fading from her face.

"You are astonished at this. You thought I was blind because I shut my eyes. Now I have had enough of it. We do not die through the treacheries of a woman of your sort. When they become too monstrous we get out of the way. To inflict punishment on account of them would be only to degrade oneself."

She twisted her arms about.

"My God, who can it be that has changed him?"

"Nobody but yourself."

"And all this for Madame Arnoux!" exclaimed Rosanette, weeping.

He replied coldly:

"I have never loved any woman but her!"

At this insult her tears ceased to flow.

"That shows your good taste! A woman of mature years, with a complexion like liquorice, a thick waist, big eyes like the ventholes of a cellar, and just as empty! As you like her so much, go and join her!"

"This is just what I expected. Thank you!"

Rosanette remained motionless, stupefied by this extraordinary behaviour.

She even allowed the door to be shut; then, with a bound, she pulled him back into the anteroom, and flinging her arms around him:

"Why, you are mad! you are mad! this is absurd! I love you!" Then she changed her tone to one of entreaty:

"Good heavens! for the sake of our dead infant!"

"Confess that it was you who did this trick!" said Frederick.

She still protested that she was innocent.

"You will not acknowledge it?"

"No!"

"Well, then, farewell! and forever!"

"Listen to me!"

Frederick turned round:

"If you understood me better, you would know that my decision is irrevocable!"

"Oh! oh! you will come back to me again!"

"Never as long as I live!"

And he slammed the door behind him violently.

Rosanette wrote to Deslauriers saying that she wanted to see him at once.

He called one evening, about five days later; and, when she told him about the rupture:

"That's all! A nice piece of bad luck!"

She thought at first that he would have been able to bring back Frederick; but now all was lost. She ascertained through the doorkeeper that he was about to be married to Madame Dambreuse.

Deslauriers gave her a lecture, and showed himself an exceedingly gay fellow, quite a jolly dog; and, as it was very late, asked permission to pass the night in an armchair.

Then, next morning, he set out again for Nogent, informing her that he was unable to say when they would meet once more. In a little while, there would perhaps be a great change in his life.

Two hours after his return, the town was in a state of revolution. The news went round that M. Frederick was going to marry Madame Dambreuse. At length the three Mesdemoiselles Auger, unable to stand it any longer, made their way to the house of Madame Moreau, who with an air of pride confirmed this intelligence. Père Roque became quite ill when he heard it. Louise locked herself up; it was even rumoured that she had gone mad.

Meanwhile, Frederick was unable to hide his dejection. Madame Dambreuse, in order to divert his mind, no doubt, from gloomy thoughts, redoubled her attentions. Every afternoon they went out for a drive in her carriage; and, on one occasion, as they were passing along the Place de la Bourse, she took the idea into her head to pay a visit to the public auction-rooms for the sake of amusement.

It was the 1st of December, the very day on which the sale of Madame Arnoux's furniture was to take place. He remembered the date, and manifested his repugnance, declaring that this place was intolerable on account of the crush and the noise. She only wanted to get a peep at it. The brougham drew up. He had no alternative but to accompany her.

In the open space could be seen washhand-stands without basins, the wooden portions of armchairs, old hampers, pieces of porcelain, empty bottles, mattresses; and men in blouses or in dirty frock-coats, all grey with dust, and mean-looking faces, some with canvas sacks over their shoulders, were chatting in separate groups or hailing each other in a disorderly fashion.

Frederick urged that it was inconvenient to go on any further.

"Pooh!"

And they ascended the stairs. In the first room, at the right, gentlemen, with catalogues in their hands, were examining pictures; in another, a collection of Chinese weapons were being sold. Madame Dambreuse wanted to go down again. She looked at the numbers over the doors, and she led him to the end of the corridor towards an apartment which was blocked up with people.

He immediately recognised the two whatnots belonging to the office of L'Art Industriel, her work-table, all her furniture. Heaped up at the end of the room according to their respective heights, they formed a long slope from the floor to the windows, and at the other sides of the apartment, the carpets and the curtains hung down straight along the walls. There were underneath steps occupied by old men who had fallen asleep. At the left rose a sort of counter at which the auctioneer, in a white cravat, was lightly swinging a little hammer. By his side a young man was writing, and below him stood a sturdy fellow, between a commercial traveller and a vendor of countermarks, crying out: "Furniture for sale." Three attendants placed the articles on a table, at the sides of which sat in a row second-hand dealers and old-clothes' women. The general public at the auction kept walking in a circle behind them.

When Frederick came in, the petticoats, the neckerchiefs, and even the chemises were being passed on from hand to hand, and then given back. Sometimes they were flung some distance, and suddenly strips of whiteness went flying through the air. After that her gowns were sold, and then one of her hats, the broken feather of which was hanging down, then her furs, and then three pairs of boots; and the disposal by sale of these relics, wherein he could trace in a confused sort of way the very outlines of her form, appeared to him an atrocity, as if he had seen carrion crows mangling her corpse. The atmosphere of the room, heavy with so many breaths, made him feel sick. Madame Dambreuse offered him her smelling-bottle. She said that she found all this highly amusing.

The bedroom furniture was now exhibited. Maître Berthelmot named a price. The crier immediately repeated it in a louder voice, and the three auctioneer's assistants quietly waited for the stroke of the hammer, and then carried off the article sold to an adjoining apartment. In this way disappeared, one after the other, the large blue carpet spangled with camellias, which her dainty feet used to touch so lightly as she advanced to meet him, the little upholstered easy-chair, in which he used to sit facing her when they were alone together, the two screens belonging to the mantelpiece, the ivory of which had been rendered smoother by the touch of her hands, and a velvet pincushion, which was still bristling with pins. It was as if portions of his heart had been carried away with these things; and the monotony of the same voices and the same gestures benumbed him with fatigue, and caused within him a mournful torpor, a sensation like that of death itself.

There was a rustle of silk close to his ear. Rosanette touched him.

It was through Frederick himself that she had learned about this auction. When her first feelings of vexation was over, the idea of deriving profit from it occurred to her mind. She had come to see it in a white satin vest with pearl buttons, a furbelowed gown, tight-fitting gloves on her hands, and a look of triumph on her face.

He grew pale with anger. She stared at the woman who was by his side.

Madame Dambreuse had recognised her, and for a minute they examined each other from head to foot minutely, in order to discover the defect, the blemish — the one perhaps envying the other's youth, and the other filled with spite at the extreme good form, the aristocratic simplicity of her rival.

At last Madame Dambreuse turned her head round with a smile of inexpressible insolence.

The crier had opened a piano — her piano! While he remained standing before it he ran the fingers of his right hand over the keys, and put up the instrument at twelve hundred francs; then he brought down the figures to one thousand, then to eight hundred, and finally to seven hundred.

Madame Dambreuse, in a playful tone, laughed at the appearance of some socket that was out of gear.

The next thing placed before the second-hand dealers was a little chest with medallions and silver corners and clasps, the same one which he had seen at the first dinner in the Rue de Choiseul, which had subsequently been in Rosanette's house, and again transferred back to Madame Arnoux's residence. Often, during their conversations his eyes wandered towards it. He was bound to it by the dearest memories, and his soul was melting with tender emotions about it, when suddenly

Madame Dambreuse said:

"Look here! I am going to buy that!"

"But it is not a very rare article," he returned.

She considered it, on the contrary, very pretty, and the appraiser commended its delicacy.

"A gem of the Renaissance! Eight hundred francs, messieurs! Almost entirely of silver! With a little whiting it can be made to shine brilliantly."

And, as she was pushing forward through the crush of people:

"What an odd idea!" said Frederick.

"You are annoyed at this!"

"No! But what can be done with a fancy article of that sort?"

"Who knows? Love-letters might be kept in it, perhaps!"

She gave him a look which made the allusion very clear.

"A reason the more for not robbing the dead of their secrets."

"I did not imagine she was dead." And then in a loud voice she went on to bid:

"Eight hundred and eighty francs!"

"What you're doing is not right," murmured Frederick.

She began to laugh.

"But this is the first favour, dear, that I am asking from you."

"Come, now! doesn't it strike you that at this rate you won't be a very considerate husband?"

Some one had just at that moment made a higher bid.

"Nine hundred francs!"

"Nine hundred francs!" repeated Maître Berthelot.

"Nine hundred and ten — fifteen — twenty — thirty!" squeaked the auctioneer's crier, with jerky shakes of his head as he cast a sweeping glance at those assembled around him.

"Show me that I am going to have a wife who is amenable to reason," said Frederick.

And he gently drew her towards the door.

The auctioneer proceeded:

"Come, come, messieurs; nine hundred and thirty. Is there any bidder at nine hundred and thirty?"

Madame Dambreuse, just as she had reached the door, stopped, and raising her voice to a high pitch:

"One thousand francs!"

There was a thrill of astonishment, and then a dead silence.

"A thousand francs, messieurs, a thousand francs! Is nobody advancing on this bid? Is that clear? Very well, then — one thousand francs! going! — gone!"

And down came the ivory hammer. She passed in her card, and the little chest was handed over to her. She thrust it into her muff.

Frederick felt a great chill penetrating his heart.

Madame Dambreuse had not let go her hold of his arm; and she had not the courage to look up at his face in the street, where her carriage was awaiting her.

She flung herself into it, like a thief flying away after a robbery, and then turned towards Frederick. He had his hat in his hand.

"Are you not going to come in?"

"No, Madame!"

And, bowing to her frigidly, he shut the carriage-door, and then made a sign to the coachman to drive away.

The first feeling that he experienced was one of joy at having regained his independence. He was filled with pride at the thought that he had avenged Madame Arnoux by sacrificing a fortune to her; then, he was amazed at his own act, and he felt doubled up with extreme physical exhaustion.

Next morning his man-servant brought him the news.

The city had been declared to be in a state of siege; the Assembly had been dissolved; and a number of the representatives of the people had been imprisoned at Mazas. Public affairs had assumed to his mind an utterly unimportant aspect, so deeply preoccupied was he by his private troubles.

He wrote to several tradesmen countermanding various orders which he had given for the purchase of articles in connection with his projected marriage, which now appeared to him in the light of a rather mean speculation; and he execrated Madame Dambreuse, because, owing to her, he had been very near perpetrating a vile action. He had forgotten the Maréchale, and did not even bother himself about Madame Arnoux — absorbed only in one thought — lost amid the wreck of his dreams, sick at heart, full of grief and disappointment, and in his hatred of the artificial atmosphere wherein he had suffered so much, he longed for the freshness of green fields, the repose of provincial life, a sleeping existence spent beneath his natal roof in the midst of ingenuous hearts. At last, when Wednesday evening arrived, he made his way out into the open air.

On the boulevard numerous groups had taken up their stand. From time to time a patrol came and dispersed them; they gathered together again in regular order behind it. They talked freely and in loud tones, made chaffing remarks about the soldiers, without anything further happening.

"What! are they not going to fight?" said Frederick to a workman.

"They're not such fools as to get themselves killed for the well-off people! Let them take care of themselves!"

And a gentleman muttered, as he glanced across at the inhabitants of the faubourgs:

"Socialist rascals! If it were only possible, this time, to exterminate them!"

Frederick could not, for the life of him, understand the necessity of so much rancour and vituperative language. His feeling of disgust against Paris was intensified by these occurrences, and two days later he set out for Nogent by the first train.

The houses soon became lost to view; the country stretched out before his gaze. Alone in his carriage, with his feet on the seat in front of him, he pondered over the events of the last few days, and then on his entire past. The recollection of Louise came back to his mind.

"She, indeed, loved me truly! I was wrong not to snatch at this chance of happiness. Pooh! let us not think any more about it!"

Then, five minutes afterwards: "Who knows, after all? Why not, later?"

His reverie, like his eyes, wandered afar towards vague horizons.

"She was artless, a peasant girl, almost a savage; but so good!"

In proportion as he drew nearer to Nogent, her image drew closer to him. As they were passing through the meadows of Sourdun, he saw her once more in imagination under the poplar-trees, as in the old days, cutting rushes on the edges of the pools. And now they had reached their destination; he stepped out of the train.

Then he leaned with his elbows on the bridge, to gaze again at the isle and the garden where they had walked together one sunshiny day, and the dizzy sensation caused by travelling, together with the weakness engendered by his recent emotions, arousing in his breast a sort of exaltation, he said to himself:

"She has gone out, perhaps; suppose I were to go and meet her!"

The bell of Saint-Laurent was ringing, and in the square in front of the church there was a crowd of poor people around an open carriage, the only one in the district — the one which was always hired for weddings. And all of a sudden, under the church-gate, accompanied by a number of well-dressed persons in white cravats, a newly-married couple appeared.

He thought he must be labouring under some hallucination. But no! It was, indeed, Louise! covered with a white veil which flowed from her red hair down to her heels; and with her was no other than Deslauriers, attired in a blue coat embroidered with silver — the costume of a prefect.

How was this?

Frederick concealed himself at the corner of a house to let the procession pass.

Shamefaced, vanquished, crushed, he retraced his steps to the railway-station, and returned to Paris.

The cabman who drove him assured him that the barricades were erected from the Château d'Eau to the Gymnase, and turned down the Faubourg Saint-Martin. At the corner of the Rue de Provence, Frederick stepped out in order to reach the boulevards.

It was five o'clock. A thin shower was falling. A number of citizens blocked up the footpath close to the Opera House. The houses opposite were closed. No one at any of the windows. All along the boulevard, dragoons were galloping behind a row of wagons, leaning with drawn swords over their horses; and the plumes of their helmets, and their large white cloaks, rising up behind them, could be seen under the glare of the gas-lamps, which shook in the wind in the midst of a haze. The crowd gazed at them mute with fear.

In the intervals between the cavalry-charges, squads of policemen arrived on the scene to keep back the people in the streets.

But on the steps of Tortoni, a man — Dussardier — who could be distinguished at a distance by his great height, remained standing as motionless as a caryatide.

One of the police-officers, marching at the head of his men, with his three-cornered hat drawn over his eyes, threatened him with his sword.

The other thereupon took one step forward, and shouted:

"Long live the Republic!"

The next moment he fell on his back with his arms crossed.

A yell of horror arose from the crowd. The police-officer, with a look of command, made a circle around him; and Frederick, gazing at him in open-mouthed astonishment, recognised Sénécal.

When a woman
Suddenly came in

CHAPTER XIX.

A Bitter-Sweet Reunion.

He travelled.

He realised the melancholy associated with packet-boats, the chill one feels on waking up under tents, the dizzy effect of landscapes and ruins, and the bitterness of ruptured sympathies.

He returned home.

He mingled in society, and he conceived attachments to other women. But the constant recollection of his first love made these appear insipid; and besides the vehemence of desire, the bloom of the sensation had vanished. In like manner, his intellectual ambitions had grown weaker. Years passed; and he was forced to support the burthen of a life in which his mind was unoccupied and his heart devoid of energy.

Towards the end of March, 1867, just as it was getting dark, one evening, he was sitting all alone in his study, when a woman suddenly came in.

"Madame Arnoux!"

"Frederick!"

She caught hold of his hands, and drew him gently towards the window, and, as she gazed into his face, she kept repeating:

""Tis he! Yes, indeed — 'tis he!"

In the growing shadows of the twilight, he could see only her eyes under the black lace veil that hid her face.

When she had laid down on the edge of the mantelpiece a little pocket-book bound in garnet velvet, she seated herself in front of him, and they both remained silent, unable to utter a word, smiling at one another.

At last he asked her a number of questions about herself and her husband.

They had gone to live in a remote part of Brittany for the sake of economy, so as to be able to pay their debts. Arnoux, now almost a chronic invalid, seemed to have become quite an old man. Her daughter had been married and was living at Bordeaux, and her son was in garrison at Mostaganem.

Then she raised her head to look at him again:

"But I see you once more! I am happy!"

He did not fail to let her know that, as soon as he heard of their misfortune, he had hastened to their house.

"I was fully aware of it!"

"How?"

She had seen him in the street outside the house, and had hidden herself.

"Why did you do that?"

Then, in a trembling voice, and with long pauses between her words:

"I was afraid! Yes — afraid of you and of myself!"

This disclosure gave him, as it were, a shock of voluptuous joy. His heart began to throb wildly. She went on:

"Excuse me for not having come sooner." And, pointing towards the little pocket-book covered with golden palm-branches:

"I embroidered it on your account expressly. It contains the amount for which the Belleville property was given as security."

Frederick thanked her for letting him have the money, while chiding her at the same time for having given herself any trouble about it.

"No! 'tis not for this I came! I was determined to pay you this visit — then I would go back there again."

And she spoke about the place where they had taken up their abode.

It was a low-built house of only one story; and there was a garden attached to it full of huge box-trees, and a double avenue of chestnut-trees, reaching up to the top of the hill, from which there was a view of the sea.

"I go there and sit down on a bench, which I have called 'Frederick's bench.'"

Then she proceeded to fix her gaze on the furniture, the objects of virtù, the pictures, with eager intentness, so that she might be able to carry away the impressions of them in her memory. The Maréchale's portrait was half-hidden behind a curtain. But the gilding and the white spaces of the picture, which showed their outlines through the midst of the surrounding darkness, attracted her attention.

"It seems to me I knew that woman?"

"Impossible!" said Frederick. "It is an old Italian painting."

She confessed that she would like to take a walk through the streets on his arm.

They went out.

The light from the shop-windows fell, every now and then, on her pale profile; then once more she was wrapped in shadow, and in the midst of the carriages, the crowd, and the din, they walked on without paying any heed to what was happening around them, without hearing anything, like those who make their way across the fields over beds of dead leaves.

They talked about the days which they had formerly spent in each other's society, the dinners at the time when L'Art Industriel flourished, Arnoux's fads, his habit of drawing up the ends of his collar and of squeezing cosmetic over his moustache, and other matters of a more intimate and serious character. What delight he experienced on the first occasion when he heard her singing! How lovely she looked on her feast-day at Saint-Cloud! He recalled to her memory the little garden at Auteuil, evenings at the theatre, a chance meeting on the boulevard, and some of her old servants, including the negress.

She was astonished at his vivid recollection of these things.

"Sometimes your words come back to me like a distant echo, like the sound of a bell carried on by the wind, and when I read passages about love in books, it seems to me that it is about you I am reading."

"All that people have found fault with as exaggerated in fiction you have made me feel," said Frederick. "I can understand Werther, who felt no disgust at his Charlotte for eating bread and butter."

"Poor, dear friend!"

She heaved a sigh; and, after a prolonged silence:

"No matter; we shall have loved each other truly!"

"And still without having ever belonged to each other!"

"This perhaps is all the better," she replied.

"No, no! What happiness we might have enjoyed!"

"Oh, I am sure of it with a love like yours!"

And it must have been very strong to endure after such a long separation.

Frederick wished to know from her how she first discovered that he loved her.

"It was when you kissed my wrist one evening between the glove and the cuff. I said to myself, 'Ah! yes, he loves me — he loves me;' nevertheless, I was afraid of being assured of it. So charming was your reserve, that I felt myself the object, as it were, of an involuntary and continuous homage."

He regretted nothing now. He was compensated for all he had suffered in the past.

When they came back to the house, Madame Arnoux took off her bonnet. The lamp, placed on a bracket, threw its light on her white hair. Frederick felt as if some one had given him a blow in the middle of the chest.

In order to conceal from her his sense of disillusion, he flung himself on the floor at her feet, and seizing her hands, began to whisper in her ear words of tenderness:

"Your person, your slightest movements, seemed to me to have a more than human importance in the world. My heart was like dust under your feet. You produced on me the effect of moonlight on a summer's night, when around us we find nothing but perfumes, soft shadows, gleams of whiteness, infinity; and all the delights of the flesh and of the spirit were for me embodied in your name, which I kept repeating to myself while I tried to kiss it with my lips. I thought of nothing further. It was Madame Arnoux such as you were with your two children, tender, grave, dazzlingly beautiful, and yet so good! This image effaced every other. Did I not think of it alone? for I had always in the very depths of my soul the music of your voice and the brightness of your eyes!"

She accepted with transports of joy these tributes of adoration to the woman whom she could no longer claim to be. Frederick, becoming intoxicated with his own words, came to believe himself in the reality of what he said. Madame Arnoux, with her back turned to the light of the lamp, stooped towards him. He felt the caress of her breath on his forehead, and the undefined touch of her entire body through the garments that kept them apart. Their hands were clasped; the tip of her boot peeped out from beneath her gown, and he said to her, as if ready to faint:

"The sight of your foot makes me lose my self-possession."

An impulse of modesty made her rise. Then, without any further movement, she said, with the strange intonation of a somnambulist:

"At my age! — he — Frederick! Ah! no woman has ever been loved as I have been. No! Where is the use in being young? What do I care about them, indeed? I despise them — all those women who come here!"

"Oh! very few women come to this place," he returned, in a complaisant fashion.

Her face brightened up, and then she asked him whether he meant to be married.

He swore that he never would.

"Are you perfectly sure? Why should you not?"

"Tis on your account!" said Frederick, clasping her in his arms.

She remained thus pressed to his heart, with her head thrown back, her lips parted, and her eyes raised. Suddenly she pushed him away from her with a look of despair, and when he implored of her to say something to him in reply, she bent forward and whispered:

"I would have liked to make you happy!"

Frederick had a suspicion that Madame Arnoux had come to offer herself to him, and once more he was seized with a desire to possess her — stronger, fiercer, more desperate than he had ever experienced before. And yet he felt, the next moment, an unaccountable repugnance to the thought of such a thing, and, as it were, a dread of incurring the guilt of incest. Another fear, too, had a different effect on him — lest disgust might afterwards take possession of him. Besides, how embarrassing it would be! — and, abandoning the idea, partly through prudence, and partly through a resolve not to degrade his ideal, he turned on his heel and proceeded to roll a cigarette between his fingers.

She watched him with admiration.

"How dainty you are! There is no one like you! There is no one like you!"

It struck eleven.

"Already!" she exclaimed; "at a quarter-past I must go."

She sat down again, but she kept looking at the clock, and he walked up and down the room, puffing at his cigarette. Neither of them could think of anything further to say to the other. There is a moment at the hour of parting when the person that we love is with us no longer.

At last, when the hands of the clock got past the twenty-five minutes, she slowly took up her bonnet, holding it by the strings.

"Good-bye, my friend — my dear friend! I shall never see you again! This is the closing page in my life as a woman. My soul shall remain with you even when you see me no more. May all the blessings of Heaven be yours!"

And she kissed him on the forehead, like a mother.

But she appeared to be looking for something, and then she asked him for a pair of scissors.

She unfastened her comb, and all her white hair fell down.

With an abrupt movement of the scissors, she cut off a long lock from the roots.

"Keep it! Good-bye!"

When she was gone, Frederick rushed to the window and threw it open. There on the footpath he saw Madame Arnoux beckoning towards a passing cab. She stepped into it. The vehicle disappeared.

And this was all.

CHAPTER XX.

"Wait Till You Come to Forty Year."

About the beginning of this winter, Frederick and Deslauriers were chatting by the fireside, once more reconciled by the fatality of their nature, which made them always reunite and be friends again.

Frederick briefly explained his quarrel with Madame Dambreuse, who had married again, her second husband being an Englishman.

Deslauriers, without telling how he had come to marry Mademoiselle Roque, related to his friend how his wife had one day eloped with a singer. In order to wipe away to some extent the ridicule that this brought upon him, he had compromised himself by an excess of governmental zeal in the exercise of his functions as prefect. He had been dismissed. After that, he had been an agent for colonisation in Algeria, secretary to a pasha, editor of a newspaper, and canvasser for advertisements, his latest employment being the office of settling disputed cases for a manufacturing company.

As for Frederick, having squandered two thirds of his means, he was now living like a citizen of comparatively humble rank.

Then they questioned each other about their friends.

Martinon was now a member of the Senate.

Hussonnet occupied a high position, in which he was fortunate enough to have all the theatres and entire press dependent upon him.

Cisy, given up to religion, and the father of eight children, was living in the château of his ancestors.

Pellerin, after turning his hand to Fourrièrism, homœopathy, table-turning, Gothic art, and humanitarian painting, had become a photographer; and he was to be seen on every dead wall in Paris, where he was represented in a black coat with a very small body and a big head.

"And what about your chum Sénécal?" asked Frederick.

"Disappeared — I can't tell you where! And yourself — what about the woman you were so passionately attached to, Madame Arnoux?"

"She is probably at Rome with her son, a lieutenant of chasseurs."

"And her husband?"

"He died a year ago."

"You don't say so?" exclaimed the advocate. Then, striking his forehead:

"Now that I think of it, the other day in a shop I met that worthy Maréchale, holding by the hand a little boy whom she has adopted. She is the widow of a certain M. Oudry, and is now enormously stout. What a change for the worse! — she who formerly had such a slender waist!"

Deslauriers did not deny that he had taken advantage of the other's despair to assure himself of that fact by personal experience.

"As you gave me permission, however."

This avowal was a compensation for the silence he had maintained with reference to his attempt with Madame Arnoux.

Frederick would have forgiven him, inasmuch as he had not succeeded in the attempt.

Although a little annoyed at the discovery, he pretended to laugh at it; and the allusion to the Maréchale brought back the Vatnaz to his recollection.

Deslauriers had never seen her any more than the others who used to come to the Arnoux's house; but he remembered Regimbart perfectly.

"Is he still living?"

"He is barely alive. Every evening regularly he drags himself from the Rue de Grammont to the Rue Montmartre, to the cafés, enfeebled, bent in two, emaciated, a spectre!"

"Well, and what about Compain?"

Frederick uttered a cry of joy, and begged of the ex-delegate of the provisional government to explain to him the mystery of the calf's head.

"'Tis an English importation. In order to parody the ceremony which the Royalists celebrated on the thirtieth of January, some Independents founded an annual banquet, at which they have been accustomed to eat calves' heads, and at which they make it their business to drink red wine out of calves' skulls while giving toasts in favour of the extermination of the Stuarts. After Thermidor, the Terrorists organised a brotherhood of a similar description, which proves how prolific folly is."

"You seem to me very dispassionate about politics?"

"Effect of age," said the advocate.

And then they each proceeded to summarise their lives.

They had both failed in their objects — the one who dreamed only of love, and the other of power.

What was the reason of this?

"'Tis perhaps from not having taken up the proper line," said Frederick.

"In your case that may be so. I, on the contrary, have sinned through excess of rectitude, without taking into account a thousand secondary things more important than any. I had too much logic, and you too much sentiment."

Then they blamed luck, circumstances, the epoch at which they were born.

Frederick went on:

"We have never done what we thought of doing long ago at Sens, when you wished to write a critical history of Philosophy and I a great mediæval romance about Nogent, the subject of which I had found in Froissart: 'How Messire Brokars de Fenestranges and the Archbishop of Troyes attacked Messire Eustache d'Ambrecicourt.' Do you remember?"

And, exhuming their youth with every sentence, they said to each other:

"Do you remember?"

They saw once more the college playground, the chapel, the parlour, the fencing-school at the bottom of the staircase, the faces of the ushers and of the pupils — one named Angelmare, from Versailles, who used to cut off trousers-straps from old boots, M. Mirbal and his red whiskers, the two professors of linear drawing and large drawing, who were always wrangling, and the Pole, the fellow-countryman of Copernicus, with his planetary system on pasteboard, an itinerant astronomer whose lecture had been paid for by a dinner in the refectory, then a terrible debauch while they were out on a walking excursion, the first pipes they had smoked, the distribution of prizes, and the delightful sensation of going home for the holidays.

It was during the vacation of 1837 that they had called at the house of the Turkish woman.

This was the phrase used to designate a woman whose real name was Zoraïde Turc; and many persons believed her to be a Mohammedan, a Turk, which added to the poetic character of her establishment, situated at the water's edge behind the rampart. Even in the middle of summer there was a shadow around her house, which could be recognised by a glass bowl of goldfish near a pot of mignonette at a window. Young ladies in white nightdresses, with painted cheeks and long earrings, used to tap at the panes as the students passed; and as it grew dark, their custom was to hum softly in their hoarse voices at the doorsteps.

This home of perdition spread its fantastic notoriety over all the arrondissement. Allusions were made to it in a circumlocutory style: "The place you know — a certain street — at the bottom of the Bridges." It made the farmers' wives of the district tremble for their husbands, and the ladies grow apprehensive as to their servants' virtue, inasmuch as the sub-prefect's cook had been caught there; and, to be sure, it exercised a fascination over the minds of all the young lads of the place.

Now, one Sunday, during vesper-time, Frederick and Deslauriers, having previously curled their hair, gathered some flowers in Madame Moreau's garden, then made their way out through the gate leading into the fields, and, after taking a wide sweep round the vineyards, came back through the Fishery, and stole into the Turkish woman's house with their big bouquets still in their hands.

Frederick presented his as a lover does to his betrothed. But the great heat, the fear of the unknown, and even the very pleasure of seeing at one glance so many women placed at his disposal, excited him so strangely that he turned exceedingly pale, and remained there without advancing a single step or uttering a single word. All the girls burst out laughing, amused at his embarrassment. Fancying that they were turning him into ridicule, he ran away; and, as Frederick had the money, Deslauriers was obliged to follow him.

They were seen leaving the house; and the episode furnished material for a bit of local gossip which was not forgotten three years later.

They related the story to each other in a prolix fashion, each supplementing the narrative where the other's memory failed; and, when they had finished the recital:

"That was the best time we ever had!" said Frederick.

"Yes, perhaps so, indeed! It was the best time we ever had," said Deslauriers.

L'ÉDUCATION SENTIMENTALE

TABLE DES MATIÈRES

PREMIÈRE PARTIE

CHAPITRE 1

CHAPITRE 2

CHAPITRE 3

CHAPITRE 4

CHAPITRE 5

CHAPITRE 6

DEUXIEME PARTIE

CHAPITRE 1

CHAPITRE 2

CHAPITRE 3

CHAPITRE 4

CHAPITRE 5

CHAPITRE 6

TROISIÈME PARTIE

CHAPITRE 1

CHAPITRE 2

CHAPITRE 3

CHAPITRE 4

CHAPITRE 5

CHAPITRE 6

CHAPITRE 7

PREMIÈRE PARTIE

CHAPITRE 1

Le 15 septembre 1840, vers six heures du matin, la Ville-de-Montereau, près de partir, fumait à gros tourbillons devant le quai Saint-Bernard.

Des gens arrivaient hors d'haleine ; des barriques, des câbles, des corbeilles de linge gênaient la circulation ; les matelots ne répondaient à personne ; on se heurtait ; les colis montaient entre les deux tambours, et le tapage s'absorbait dans le bruissement de la vapeur, qui, s'échappant par des plaques de tôle, enveloppait tout d'une nuée blanchâtre, tandis que la cloche, à l'avant, tintait sans discontinuer.

Enfin le navire partit ; et les deux berges, peuplées de magasins, de chantiers et d'usines, filèrent comme deux larges rubans que l'on déroule.

Un jeune homme de dix-huit ans, à longs cheveux et qui tenait un album sous son bras, restait auprès du gouvernail, immobile. À travers le brouillard, il contemplait des clochers, des édifices dont il ne savait pas les noms ; puis il embrassa, dans un dernier coup d'œil, l'île Saint-Louis, la Cité, Notre-Dame ; et bientôt, Paris disparaissant, il poussa un grand soupir.

M. Frédéric Moreau, nouvellement reçu bachelier, s'en retournait à Nogent-sur-Seine, où il devait languir pendant deux mois, avant d'aller faire son droit. Sa mère, avec la somme indispensable, l'avait envoyé au Havre voir un oncle, dont elle espérait, pour lui, l'héritage ; il en était revenu la veille seulement ; et il se dédommageait de ne pouvoir séjourner dans la capitale, en regagnant sa province par la route la plus longue.

Le tumulte s'apaisait ; tous avaient pris leur place ; quelques-uns, debout, se chauffaient autour de la machine, et la cheminée crachait avec un râle lent et rythmique son panache de fumée noire ; des gouttelettes de rosée coulaient sur les cuivres ; le pont tremblait sous une petite vibration intérieure, et les deux roues, tournant rapidement, battaient l'eau.

La rivière était bordée par des grèves de sable. On rencontrait des trains de bois qui se mettaient à onduler sous le remous des vagues, ou bien, dans un bateau sans voiles, un homme assis pêchait ; puis les brumes errantes se fondirent, le soleil parut, la colline qui suivait à droite le cours de la Seine peu à peu s'abaissa, et il en surgit une autre, plus proche, sur la rive opposée.

Des arbres la couronnaient parmi des maisons basses couvertes de toits à l'italienne. Elles avaient des jardins en pente que divisaient des murs neufs, des grilles de fer, des gazons, des serres chaudes, et des vases de géraniums, espacés régulièrement sur des terrasses où l'on pouvait s'accouder. Plus d'un, en apercevant ces coquettes résidences, si tranquilles, enviait d'en être le propriétaire, pour vivre là jusqu'à la fin de ses jours, avec un bon billard, une chaloupe, une femme ou quelque autre rêve. Le plaisir tout nouveau d'une excursion maritime facilitait les épanchements. Déjà les farceurs commençaient leurs plaisanteries. Beaucoup chantaient. On était gai. Il se versait des petits verres.

Frédéric pensait à la chambre qu'il occuperait là-bas, au plan d'un drame, à des sujets de tableaux, à des passions futures. Il trouvait que le bonheur mérité par l'excellence de son âme tardait à venir. Il se déclama des vers mélancoliques ; il marchait sur le pont à pas rapides ; il s'avança jusqu'au bout, du côté de la cloche ; — et, dans un cercle de passagers et de matelots, il vit un monsieur qui contait des galanteries à une paysanne, tout en lui maniant la croix d'or qu'elle portait sur la poitrine. C'était un gaillard d'une quarantaine d'années, à cheveux crépus. Sa taille robuste emplissait une jaquette de velours noir, deux émeraudes brillaient à sa chemise de batiste, et son large pantalon blanc tombait sur d'étranges bottes rouges, en cuir de Russie, rehaussées de dessins bleus.

La présence de Frédéric ne le déranger pas. Il se tourna vers lui plusieurs fois, en l'interpellant par des clins d'œil ; ensuite il offrit des cigares à tous ceux qui l'entouraient. Mais, ennuyé de cette compagnie, sans doute, il alla se mettre plus loin ; Frédéric le suivit.

La conversation roula d'abord sur les différentes espèces de tabacs, puis, tout naturellement, sur les femmes. Le monsieur en bottes rouges donna des conseils au jeune homme ; il exposait des théories, narrait des anecdotes, se citait lui-même en exemple, débitant tout cela d'un ton paterne, avec une ingénuité de corruption divertissante.

Il était républicain : il avait voyagé, il connaissait l'intérieur des théâtres, des restaurants, des journaux, et tous les artistes célèbres, qu'il appelait familièrement par leurs prénoms ; Frédéric lui confia bientôt ses projets ; il les encouragea.

Mais il s'interrompit pour observer le tuyau de la cheminée, puis il marmotta vite un long calcul, afin de savoir "combien chaque coup de piston, à tant de fois par minute, devait, etc." — Et, la somme trouvée, il admira beaucoup le paysage. Il se disait heureux d'être échappé aux affaires.

Frédéric éprouvait un certain respect pour lui, et ne résista pas à l'envie de savoir son nom. L'inconnu répondit tout d'une haleine :

— "Jacques Arnoux propriétaire de l'Art industriel, boulevard Montmartre."

Un domestique ayant un galon d'or à la casquette vint lui dire :

— "Si Monsieur voulait descendre ? Mademoiselle pleure."

Il disparut.

L'Art industriel était un établissement hybride, comprenant un journal de peinture et un magasin de tableaux. Frédéric avait vu ce titre-là, plusieurs fois, à l'étalage du libraire de son pays natal, sur d'immenses prospectus, où le nom de Jacques Arnoux se développait magistralement.

Le soleil dardait d'aplomb, en faisant reluire les gabillots de fer autour des mâts, les plaques du bastingage et la surface de l'eau ; elle se coupait à la proue en deux sillons, qui se déroulaient jusqu'au bord des prairies. À chaque détour de la rivière, on retrouvait le même rideau de peupliers pâles. La campagne était toute vide. Il y avait dans le ciel de petits nuages blancs arrêtés, — et l'ennui, vaguement répandu, semblait alanguir la marche du bateau et rendre l'aspect des voyageurs plus insignifiant encore.

À part quelques bourgeois, aux Premières, c'étaient des ouvriers, des gens de boutique avec leurs femmes et leurs enfants. Comme on avait coutume alors de se vêtir sordidement en voyage, presque tous portaient de vieilles calottes grecques ou des chapeaux déteints, de maigres habits noirs, râpés par le frottement du bureau, ou des redingotes ouvrant la capsule de leurs boutons pour avoir trop servi au magasin ; çà et là, quelque gilet à châle laissait voir une chemise de calicot, maculée de café ; des épingles de chrysocale piquaient des cravates en lambeaux ; des sous-pieds cousus retenaient des chaussons de lisière ; deux ou trois gredins qui tenaient des bambous à ganse de cuir lançaient des regards obliques, et des pères de famille ouvraient de gros yeux, en faisant des questions. Ils causaient debout, ou bien accroupis sur leurs bagages ; d'autres dormaient dans des coins ; plusieurs mangeaient. Le pont était sali par des écales de noix, des bouts de cigares, des pelures de poires, des détritres de charcuterie apportée dans du papier ; trois ébénistes, en blouse, stationnaient devant la cantine ; un joueur de harpe en haillons se reposait, accoudé sur son instrument ; on entendait par intervalles le bruit du charbon de terre dans le fourneau, un éclat de voix, un rire ; — et le capitaine, sur la passerelle, marchait d'un tambour à l'autre, sans s'arrêter. Frédéric, pour rejoindre sa place, poussa la grille des Premières, dérangea deux chasseurs avec leurs chiens.

Ce fut comme une apparition :

Elle était assise, au milieu du banc, toute seule ; ou du moins il ne distingua personne, dans l'éblouissement que lui envoyèrent ses yeux. En même temps qu'il passait, elle leva la tête ; il fléchit involontairement les épaules ; et, quand il se fut mis plus loin, du même côté, il la regarda.

Elle avait un large chapeau de paille, avec des rubans roses qui palpaient au vent, derrière elle. Ses bandeaux noirs, contournant la pointe de ses grands sourcils, descendaient très bas et semblaient presser amoureusement l'ovale de sa figure. Sa robe de mousseline claire, tachetée de petits pois, se répandait à plis nombreux. Elle était en train de broder quelque chose ; et son nez droit, son menton, toute sa personne se découpait sur le fond de l'air bleu.

Comme elle gardait la même attitude, il fit plusieurs tours de droite et de gauche pour dissimuler sa manœuvre ; puis il se planta tout près de son ombrelle, posée contre le banc, et il affectait d'observer une chaloupe sur la rivière.

Jamais il n'avait vu cette splendeur de sa peau brune, la séduction de sa taille, ni cette finesse des doigts que la lumière traversait. Il considérait son panier à ouvrage avec ébahissement, comme une chose extraordinaire. Quels étaient son nom, sa demeure, sa vie, son passé ? Il souhaitait connaître les meubles de sa chambre, toutes les robes qu'elle avait portées, les gens qu'elle fréquentait ; et le désir de la possession physique même disparaissait sous une envie plus profonde, dans une curiosité douloureuse qui n'avait pas de limites.

Une négresse, coiffée d'un foulard, se présenta, en tenant par la main une petite fille, déjà grande. L'enfant, dont les yeux roulaient des larmes, venait de s'éveiller. Elle la prit sur ses genoux. "Mademoiselle n'était pas sage, quoiqu'elle eût sept ans bientôt ; sa mère ne l'aimerait plus ; on lui pardonnait trop ses caprices." Et Frédéric se réjouissait d'entendre ces choses, comme s'il eût fait une découverte, une acquisition.

Il la supposait d'origine andalouse, créole peut-être ; elle avait ramené des îles cette négresse avec elle ?

Cependant, un long châle à bandes violettes était placé derrière son dos, sur le bordage de cuivre. Elle avait dû, bien des fois, au milieu de la mer, durant les soirs humides, en envelopper sa taille, s'en couvrir les pieds, dormir dedans ! Mais, entraîné par les franges, il glissait peu à peu, il allait tomber dans l'eau, Frédéric fit un bond et le rattrapa. Elle lui dit :

— "Je vous remercie, monsieur."

Leurs yeux se rencontrèrent.

— "Ma femme, es-tu prête ?" cria le sieur Arnoux, apparaissant dans le capot de l'escalier.

Mlle Marthe courut vers lui, et, cramponnée à son cou, elle tirait ses moustaches. Les sons d'une harpe retentirent, elle voulut voir la musique ; et bientôt le joueur d'instrument, amené par la négresse, entra dans les Premières. Arnoux le reconnut pour un ancien modèle ; il le tutoya, ce qui surprit les assistants. Enfin le harpiste rejeta ses longs cheveux derrière ses épaules, étendit les bras et se mit à jouer.

C'était une romance orientale, où il était question de poignards, de fleurs et d'étoiles. L'homme en haillons chantait cela d'une voix mordante ; les battements de la machine coupaient la mélodie à fausse mesure ; il pinçait plus fort : les cordes vibraient, et leurs sons métalliques semblaient exhaler des sanglots, et comme la plainte d'un amour orgueilleux et vaincu. Des deux côtés de la rivière, des bois s'inclinaient jusqu'au bord de l'eau ; un courant d'air frais passait ; Mme Arnoux regardait au loin d'une manière vague. Quand la musique s'arrêta, elle remua les paupières plusieurs fois, comme si elle sortait d'un songe.

Le harpiste s'approcha d'eux, humblement. Pendant qu'Arnoux cherchait de la monnaie, Frédéric allongea vers la casquette sa main fermée, et, l'ouvrant avec pudeur, il y déposa un louis d'or. Ce n'était pas la vanité qui le poussait à faire cette aumône devant elle, mais une pensée de bénédiction où il l'associait, un mouvement de cœur presque religieux.

Arnoux, en lui montrant le chemin, l'engagea cordialement à descendre. Frédéric affirma qu'il venait de déjeuner ; il se mourait de faim, au contraire ; et il ne possédait plus un centime au fond de sa bourse.

Ensuite il songea qu'il avait bien le droit, comme un autre, de se tenir dans la chambre.

Autour des tables rondes, des bourgeois mangeaient, un garçon de café circulait ; M. et Mme Arnoux étaient dans le fond, à droite ; il s'assit sur la longue banquette de velours, ayant ramassé un journal qui se trouvait là.

Ils devaient, à Montereau, prendre la diligence de Châlons. Leur voyage en Suisse durerait un mois. Mme Arnoux blâma son mari de sa faiblesse pour son enfant. Il chuchota dans son oreille, une gracieuseté, sans doute, car elle sourit. Puis il se dérangea pour fermer derrière son cou le rideau de la fenêtre.

Le plafond, bas et tout blanc, rabattait une lumière crue. Frédéric, en face, distinguait l'ombre de ses cils. Elle trempait ses lèvres dans son verre, cassait un peu de croûte entre ses doigts ; le médaillon de lapis-lazuli, attaché par une chaînette d'or à son poignet, de temps à autre sonnait contre son assiette. Ceux qui étaient là, pourtant, n'avaient pas l'air de la remarquer.

Quelquefois, par les hublots, on voyait glisser le flanc d'une barque qui accostait le navire pour prendre ou déposer des voyageurs. Les gens attablés se penchaient aux ouvertures et nommaient les pays riverains.

Arnoux se plaignait de la cuisine : il se récria considérablement devant l'addition, et il la fit réduire. Puis il emmena le jeune homme à l'avant du bateau pour boire des grogs. Mais Frédéric s'en retourna bientôt sous la tente, où Mme Arnoux était revenue. Elle lisait un mince volume à couverture grise. Les deux coins de sa bouche se relevaient par moments, et un éclair de plaisir illuminait son front. Il jaloussa celui qui avait inventé ces choses dont elle paraissait occupée.

Plus il la contemplait, plus il sentait entre elle et lui se creuser des abîmes. Il songeait qu'il faudrait la quitter tout à l'heure, irrévocablement, sans en avoir arraché une parole, sans lui laisser même un souvenir !

Une plaine s'étendait à droite ; à gauche un herbage allait doucement rejoindre une colline, où l'on apercevait des vignobles, des noyers, un moulin dans la verdure, et des petits chemins au-delà, formant des zigzags sur la roche blanche qui touchait au bord du ciel. Quel bonheur de monter côte à côte, le bras autour de sa taille, pendant que sa robe balayerait les feuilles jaunies, en écoutant sa voix, sous le rayonnement de ses yeux ! Le bateau pouvait s'arrêter, ils n'avaient qu'à descendre ; et cette chose bien simple n'était pas plus facile, cependant, que de remuer le soleil !

Un peu plus loin, on découvrit un château, à toit pointu, avec des tourelles carrées. Un parterre de fleurs s'étalait devant sa façade ; et des avenues s'enfonçaient, comme des voûtes noires, sous les hauts tilleuls. Il se la figura passant au bord des charmilles. A ce moment, une jeune dame et un jeune homme se montrèrent sur le perron, entre les caisses d'orangers. Puis tout disparut.

La petite fille jouait autour de lui. Frédéric voulut la baiser. Elle se cacha derrière sa bonne ; sa mère la gronda de n'être pas aimable pour le monsieur qui avait sauvé son châte. Etait-ce une ouverture indirecte ?

— “Va-t-elle enfin me parler ?” se demandait-il.

Le temps pressait. Comment obtenir une invitation chez Arnoux ? Et il n'imagina rien de mieux que de lui faire remarquer la couleur de l'automne, en ajoutant :

— “Voilà bientôt l'hiver, la saison des bals et des dîners !”

Mais Arnoux était tout occupé de ses bagages. La côte de Surville apparut, les deux ponts se rapprochaient, on longea une corderie, ensuite une rangée de maisons basses ; il y avait, en dessous, des marmites de goudron, des éclats de bois ; et des gamins couraient sur le sable, en faisant la roue. Frédéric reconnut un homme avec un gilet à manches, il lui cria :

— “Dépêche-toi.”

On arrivait. Il chercha péniblement Arnoux dans la foule des passagers, et l'autre répondit en lui serrant la main :

— “Au plaisir, cher monsieur !”

Quand il fut sur le quai, Frédéric se retourna. Elle était près du gouvernail, debout. Il lui envoya un regard où il avait tâché de mettre toute son âme comme s’il n’eût rien fait, elle demeura immobile. Puis, sans égard aux salutations de son domestique :

— “Pourquoi n’as-tu pas amené la voiture jusqu’ici ?”

Le bonhomme s’excusait.

— “Quel maladroït ! Donne-moi de l’argent !” Et il alla manger dans une auberge.

Un quart d’heure après, il eut envie d’entrer comme par hasard dans la cour des diligences. Il la verrait encore, peut-être ?

— “A quoi bon ?” se dit-il.

Et l’américaine l’emporta. Les deux chevaux n’appartenaient pas à sa mère. Elle avait emprunté celui de M. Chambrion, le receveur, pour l’atteler auprès du sien. Isidore, parti la veille, s’était reposé à Bray jusqu’au soir et avait couché à Montereau, si bien que les bêtes rafraîchies trottaient lestement.

Des champs moissonnés se prolongeaient à n’en plus finir. Deux lignes d’arbres bordaient la route, les tas de cailloux se succédaient ; et peu à peu, Villeneuve-Saint-Georges, Ablon, Châtillon, Corbeil et les autres pays, tout son voyage lui revint à la mémoire, d’une façon si nette qu’il distinguait maintenant des détails nouveaux, des particularités plus intimes ; sous le dernier volant de sa robe, son pied passait dans une mince bottine en soie, de couleur marron ; la tente de coutil formait un large dais sur sa tête, et les petits glands rouges de la bordure tremblaient à la brise, perpétuellement.

Elle ressemblait aux femmes des livres romantiques. Il n’aurait voulu rien ajouter, rien retrancher à sa personne. L’univers venait tout à coup de s’élargir. Elle était le point lumineux où l’ensemble des choses convergeait ; et, bercé par le mouvement de la voiture, les paupières à demi closes, le regard dans les nuages, il s’abandonnait à une joie rêveuse et infinie.

A Bray, il n’attendit pas qu’on eût donné l’avoine, il alla devant, sur la route, tout seul. Arnoux l’avait appelée “Marie !” Il cria très haut “Marie !” Sa voix se perdit dans l’air.

Une large couleur de pourpre enflammait le ciel à l’occident. De grosses meules de blé, qui se levaient au milieu des chaumes, projetaient des ombres géantes. Un chien se mit à aboyer dans une ferme, au loin. Il frissonna, pris d'une inquiétude sans cause.

Quand Isidore l'eut rejoint, il se plaça sur le siège pour conduire. Sa défaillance était passée. Il était bien résolu à s'introduire, n'importe comment, chez les Arnoux, et à se lier avec eux. Leur maison devait être amusante, Arnoux lui plaisait d'ailleurs ; puis, qui sait ? Alors, un flot de sang lui monta au visage : ses tempes bourdonnaient, il fit claquer son fouet, secoua les rênes, et il menait les chevaux tel train, que le vieux cocher répétait :

— “Doucement ! doucement vous les rendrez poussifs.”

Peu à peu Frédéric se calma, et il écouta parler son domestique.

On attendait Monsieur avec grande impatience. Mlle Louise avait pleuré pour partir dans la voiture.

— “Qu'est-ce donc, Mlle Louise ?”

— “La petite à M. Roque, vous savez ?”

— “Ah ! j'oubliais !” répliqua Frédéric, négligemment.

Cependant, les deux chevaux n'en pouvaient plus. Ils boitaient l'un et l'autre ; et neuf heures sonnaient à Saint-Laurent lorsqu'il arriva sur la place d'Armes, devant la maison de sa mère. Cette maison, spacieuse, avec un jardin donnant sur la campagne, ajoutait à la considération de Mme Moreau, qui était la personne du pays la plus respectée.

Elle sortait d'une vieille famille de gentilshommes, éteinte maintenant. Son mari, un plébéien que ses parents lui avaient fait épouser, était mort d'un coup d'épée, pendant sa grossesse, en lui laissant une fortune compromise. Elle recevait trois fois la semaine et donnait de temps à autre un beau dîner. Mais le nombre des bougies était calculé d'avance, et elle attendait impatiemment ses fermages. Cette gêne, dissimulée comme un vice, la rendait sérieuse. Cependant, sa vertu s'exerçait sans étalage de prudence, sans aigreur. Ses moindres charités semblaient de grandes aumônes. On la consultait sur le choix des domestiques, l'éducation des jeunes filles, l'art des confitures, et Monseigneur descendait chez elle dans ses tournées épiscopales.

Mme Moreau nourrissait une haute ambition pour son fils. Elle n'aimait pas à entendre blâmer le Gouvernement, par une sorte de prudence anticipée. Il aurait besoin de protections d'abord ; puis, grâce à ses moyens, il deviendrait conseiller d'Etat, ambassadeur, ministre.

Ses triomphes au collège de Sens légitimaient cet orgueil il avait remporté le prix d'honneur.

Quand il entra dans le salon, tous se levèrent à grand bruit, on l'embrassa ; et avec les fauteuils et les chaises on fit un large demi-cercle autour de la cheminée. M. Gamblin lui demanda immédiatement son opinion sur Mme Lafargel. Ce procès, la fureur de l'époque, ne manqua pas d'amener une discussion violente ; Mme Moreau l'arrêta, au regret toutefois de M. Gamblin ; il la jugeait utile pour le jeune homme, en sa qualité de futur jurisconsulte, et il sortit du salon, piqué.

Rien ne devait surprendre dans un ami du père Roque A propos du père Roque, on parla de M. Dambreuse, qui venait d'acquérir le domaine de la Fortelle. Mais le Percepteur avait entraîné Frédéric à l'écart, pour savoir ce qu'il pensait du dernier ouvrage de M. Guizot. Tous désiraient connaître ses affaires ; et Mme Benoît s'y prit adroitement en s'informant de son oncle. Comment allait ce bon parent ? Il ne donnait plus de ses nouvelles. N'avait-il pas un arrière-cousin en Amérique ?

La cuisinière annonça que le potage de Monsieur était servi. On se retira, par discrétion. Puis, dès qu'ils furent seuls, dans la salle, sa mère lui dit, à voix basse :

— “Eh bien ?”

Le vieillard l'avait reçu très cordialement, mais sans montrer ses intentions.

Mme Moreau soupira.

— “Où est-elle, à présent ?” songeait-il.

La diligence roulait, et, enveloppée dans le châle sans doute, elle appuyait contre le drap du coupé sa belle tête endormie.

Ils montaient dans leurs chambres quand un garçon du Cygne de la Croix apporta un billet.

— “Qu'est-ce donc ?”

— “C'est Deslauriers qui a besoin de moi”, dit-il.

— “Ah ! ton camarade !” fit Mme Moreau avec un ricanement de mépris. “L'heure est bien choisie, vraiment !”

Frédéric hésitait. Mais l'amitié fut plus forte. Il prit son chapeau.

— “Au moins, ne sois pas longtemps !” lui dit sa mère.

CHAPITRE 2

Le père de Charles Deslauriers, ancien capitaine de ligne, démissionnaire en 1818, était revenu se marier à Nogent, et, avec l'argent de la dot, avait acheté une charge d'huissier, suffisant à peine pour le faire vivre. Aigri par de longues injustices, souffrant de ses vieilles blessures, et toujours regrettant l'Empereur, il dégorgeait sur son entourage les colères qui l'étouffaient. Peu d'enfants furent plus battus que son fils. Le gamin ne cédait pas, malgré les coups. Sa mère, quand elle tâchait de s'interposer, était rudoyée comme lui. Enfin le Capitaine le plaça dans son étude, et tout le long du jour, il le tenait courbé sur son pupitre à copier des actes, ce qui lui rendit l'épaule droite visiblement plus forte que l'autre.

En 1833, d'après l'invitation de M. le président, le Capitaine vendit son étude. Sa femme mourut d'un cancer. Il alla vivre à Dijon ; ensuite il s'établit marchand d'hommes à Troyes ; et, ayant obtenu pour Charles une demi-bourse, le mit au collège de Sens, où Frédéric le reconnut. Mais l'un avait douze ans, l'autre quinze ; d'ailleurs, mille différences de caractère et d'origine les séparaient.

Frédéric possédait dans sa commode toutes sortes de provisions, des choses recherchées, un nécessaire de toilette, par exemple. Il aimait à dormir tard le matin, à regarder les hirondelles, à lire des pièces de théâtre, et, regrettant les douceurs de la maison, il trouvait rude la vie de collège.

Elle semblait bonne au fils de l'huissier. Il travaillait si bien, qu'au bout de la seconde année, il passa dans la classe de Troisième. Cependant, à cause de sa pauvreté, ou de son humeur querelleuse, une sourde malveillance l'entourait. Mais un domestique, une fois, l'ayant appelé enfant de gueux, en pleine cour des Moyens, il lui sauta à la gorge et l'aurait tué, sans trois maîtres d'études qui intervinrent. Frédéric, emporté d'admiration, le serra dans ses bras. A partir de ce jour, l'intimité fut complète. L'affection d'un grand, sans doute, flatta la vanité du petit, et l'autre accepta comme un bonheur ce dévouement qui s'offrait.

Son père, pendant les vacances, le laissait au collège. Une traduction de Platon ouverte par hasard l'enthousiasma. Alors il s'éprit d'études métaphysiques ; et ses progrès furent rapides, car il les abordait avec des forces jeunes et dans l'orgueil d'une intelligence qui s'affranchit ; Jouffroy, Cousin, Laromiguière, Malebranche, les Ecossaïs, tout ce que la bibliothèque contenait, y passa. Il avait eu besoin d'en voler la clef, pour se procurer des livres.

Les distractions de Frédéric étaient moins sérieuses. Il dessina dans la rue des Trois-Rois la généalogie du Christ, sculptée sur un poteau, puis le portail de la cathédrale. Après les drames moyen âge, il entama les mémoires : Froissart, Comines, Pierre de l'Estoile, Brantôme.

Les images que ces lectures amenaient à son esprit l'obsédaient si fort, qu'il éprouvait le besoin de les reproduire. Il ambitionnait d'être un jour le Walter Scott de la France. Deslauriers méditait un vaste système de philosophie, qui aurait les applications les plus lointaines.

Ils causaient de tout cela, pendant les récréations, dans la cour, en face de l'inscription morale peinte sous l'horloge ; ils en chuchotaient dans la chapelle, à la barbe de saint Louis ; ils en rêvaient dans le dortoir, d'où l'on domine un cimetière. Les jours de promenade, ils se rangeaient derrière les autres, et ils parlaient interminablement.

Ils parlaient de ce qu'ils feraient plus tard, quand ils seraient sortis du collège. D'abord, ils entreprendraient un grand voyage avec l'argent que Frédéric prélèverait sur sa fortune, à sa majorité. Puis ils reviendraient à Paris, ils travailleraient ensemble, ne se quitteraient pas ; — et, comme délassément à leurs travaux, ils auraient des amours de princesses dans des boudoirs de satin, ou de fulgurantes orgies avec des courtisanes illustres. Des doutes succédaient à leurs emportements d'espoir. Après des crises de gaieté verbeuse, ils tombaient dans des silences profonds.

Les soirs d'été, quand ils avaient marché longtemps par les chemins pierreux au bord des vignes, ou sur la grande route en pleine campagne, et que les blés ondulaient au soleil, tandis que des senteurs d'angélique passaient dans l'air, une sorte d'étouffement les prenait, et ils s'étendaient sur le dos, étourdis, enivrés. Les autres, en manches de chemise, jouaient aux barres ou faisaient partir des cerfs-volants. Le pion les appelait. On s'en revenait, en suivant les jardins que traversaient de petits ruisseaux, puis les boulevards ombragés par les vieux murs ; les rues désertes sonnaient sous leurs pas ; la grille s'ouvrait, on remontait l'escalier ; et ils étaient tristes comme après de grandes débauches.

M. le censeur prétendait qu'ils s'exaltaient mutuellement. Cependant, si Frédéric travailla dans les hautes classes, ce fut par les exhortations de son ami ; et, aux vacances de 1837, il l'emmena chez sa mère.

Le jeune homme déplut à Mme Moreau. Il mangea extraordinairement, il refusa d'assister le dimanche aux offices, il tenait des discours républicains ; enfin, elle crut savoir qu'il avait conduit son fils dans des lieux déshonnêtes. On surveilla leurs relations. Ils ne s'en aimèrent que davantage ; et les adieux furent pénibles, quand Deslauriers, l'année suivante, partit du collège, pour étudier le droit à Paris.

Frédéric comptait bien l'y rejoindre. ils ne s'étaient pas vus depuis deux ans ; et, leurs embrassades étant finies, ils allèrent sur les ponts afin de causer plus à l'aise.

Le Capitaine, qui tenait maintenant un billard à Villenauxe, s'était fâché rouge lorsque son fils avait réclamé ses comptes de tutelle, et même lui avait coupé les vivres, tout net. Mais comme il voulait concourir plus tard pour une chaire de professeur à l'Ecole et qu'il n'avait pas d'argent, Deslauriers acceptait à Troyes une place de maître clerc chez un avoué. A force de privations, il économiserait quatre mille francs ; et, s'il ne devait rien toucher de la succession maternelle, il aurait toujours de quoi travailler librement, pendant trois années, en attendant une position. Il fallait donc abandonner leur vieux projet de vivre ensemble dans la Capitale, pour le présent du moins.

Frédéric baissa la tête. C'était le premier de ses rêves qui s'écroulait.

— “Console-toi”, dit le fils du capitaine, “la vie est longue : nous sommes jeunes. Je te rejoindrai ! N'y pense plus !”

Il le secouait par les mains, et, pour le distraire, lui fit des questions sur son voyage.

Frédéric n'eut pas grand'chose à narrer. Mais, au souvenir de Mme Arnoux, son chagrin s'évanouit. Il ne paria pas d'elle, retenu par une pudeur. Il s'étendit en revanche sur Arnoux, rapportant ses discours, ses manières, ses relations ; et Deslauriers l'engagea fortement à cultiver cette connaissance.

Frédéric, dans ces derniers temps n'avait rien écrit ses opinions littéraires étaient changées : il estimait pardessus tout la passion ; Werther, René, Frank, Lara, Lélia et d'autres plus médiocres l'enthousiasmaient presque également. Quelquefois la musique lui semblait seule capable d'exprimer ses troubles intérieurs ; alors, il rêvait des symphonies ; ou bien la surface des choses l'appréhendait, et il voulait peindre. Il avait composé des vers, pourtant ; Deslauriers les trouva fort beaux, mais sans demander une autre pièce.

Quant à lui, il ne donnait plus dans la métaphysique. L'économie sociale et la Révolution française le préoccupaient. C'était, à présent, un grand diable de vingt-deux ans, maigre, avec une large bouche, l'air résolu. Il portait, ce soir-là, un mauvais paletot de lasting ; et ses souliers étaient blancs de poussière, car il avait fait la route de Villenaux à pied, exprès pour voir Frédéric.

Isidore les aborda. Madame priait Monsieur de revenir, et, craignant qu'il n'eût froid, elle lui envoyait son manteau.

— “Reste donc !” dit Deslauriers.

Et ils continuèrent à se promener d'un bout à l'autre des deux ponts qui s'appuient sur l'île étroite, formée par le canal et la rivière.

Quand ils allaient du côté de Nogent, ils avaient, en face, un pâté de maisons s'inclinant quelque peu ; à droite, l'église apparaissait derrière les moulins de bois dont les vannes étaient fermées ; et, à gauche les haies d'arbustes, le long de la rive, terminaient des jardins, que l'on distinguait à peine. Mais, du côté de Paris, la grande route descendait en ligne droite, et des prairies se perdaient au loin, dans les vapeurs de la nuit. Elle était silencieuse et d'une clarté blanchâtre. Des odeurs de feuillage humide montaient jusqu'à eux ; la chute de la prise d'eau, cent pas plus loin, murmurait, avec ce gros bruit doux que font les ondes dans les ténèbres.

Deslauriers s'arrêta, et il dit :

— “Ces bonnes gens qui dorment tranquilles, c'est drôle ! Patience ! un nouveau 89 se prépare ! On est las de constitutions, de chartes, de subtilités, de mensonges ! Ah ! si j'avais un journal ou une tribune, comme je vous secouerais tout cela ! Mais, pour entreprendre n'importe quoi, il faut de l'argent ! Quelle malédiction que d'être le fils d'un cabaretier et de perdre sa jeunesse à la quête de son pain !”

Il baissa la tête, se mordit les lèvres, et il gelottait sous son vêtement mince.

Frédéric lui jeta la moitié de son manteau sur les épaules. Ils s'en enveloppèrent tous deux ; et, se tenant par la taille, ils marchaient dessous, côte à côte.

— “Comment veux-tu que je vive là-bas, sans toi ?” disait Frédéric. L'amertume de son ami avait ramené sa tristesse. “J'aurais fait quelque chose avec une femme qui m'eût aimé... Pourquoi ris-tu ? L'amour est la pâture et comme l'atmosphère du génie. Les émotions extraordinaires produisent les œuvres sublimes. Quant à chercher celle qu'il me faudrait, j'y renonce ! D'ailleurs, si jamais je la trouve, elle me repoussera. Je suis de la race des déshérités, et je m'éteindrai avec un trésor qui était de strass ou de diamant, je n'en sais rien.”

L'ombre de quelqu'un s'allongea sur les pavés, en même temps qu'ils entendirent ces mots :

— “Serviteur, messieurs !”

Celui qui les prononçait était un petit homme, habillé d'une ample redingote brune, et coiffé d'une casquette laissant paraître sous la visière un nez pointu.

— “M. Roque ?” dit Frédéric.

— “Lui-même !” reprit la voix.

Le Nogentais justifia sa présence en contant qu'il revenait d'inspecter ses pièges à loup, dans son jardin, au bord de l'eau.

— “Et vous voilà de retour dans nos pays ? Très bien ! j'ai appris cela par ma fillette. La santé est toujours bonne, j'espère ? Vous ne partez pas encore ?”

Et il s'en alla, rebuté, sans doute, par l'accueil de Frédéric.

Mme Moreau, en effet, ne le fréquentait pas ; le père Roque vivait en concubinage avec sa bonne, et on le considérait fort peu, bien qu'il fût le croupier d'élections, le régisseur de M. Dambreuse.

— “Le banquier qui demeure rue d'Anjou ?” reprit Deslauriers. “Sais-tu ce que tu devrais faire, mon brave ?”

Isidore les interrompit encore une fois. Il avait ordre de ramener Frédéric, définitivement. Madame s'inquiétait, de son absence.

— “Bien, bien ! on y va”, dit Deslauriers ; “il ne découchera pas.”

Et, le domestique étant parti :

— “Tu devrais prier ce vieux de t'introduire chez les Dambreuse ; rien n'est utile comme de fréquenter une maison riche ! Puisque tu as un habit noir et des gants blancs, profite-en ! Il faut que tu ailles dans ce monde là ! Tu m'y mèneras plus tard. Un homme à millions, pense donc ! Arrange-toi pour lui plaire, et à sa femme aussi. Deviens son amant !”

Frédéric se récriait.

— “Mais je te dis là des choses classiques, il me semble ? Rappelle-toi Rastignac dans la Comédie humaine ! Tu réussiras, j'en suis sûr !”

Frédéric avait tant de confiance en Deslauriers, qu'il se sentit ébranlé, et oubliant Mme Arnoux, ou la comprenant dans la prédiction faite sur l'autre, il ne put s'empêcher de sourire.

Le clerc ajouta :

— “Dernier conseil : passe tes examens ! Un titre est toujours bon ; et lâche-moi franchement tes poètes catholiques et sataniques, aussi avancés en philosophie qu'on l'était au XIIe siècle. Ton désespoir est bête. De très grands particuliers ont eu des commencements plus difficiles, à commencer par Mirabeau. D'ailleurs, notre séparation ne sera pas si longue. Je ferai rendre gorge à mon filou de père. Il est temps que je m'en retourne, adieu ! — ” As-tu cent sous pour que je paye mon dîner ? ”

Frédéric lui donna dix francs, le reste de la somme prise le matin à Isidore.

Cependant à vingt toises des ponts, sur la rive gauche, une lumière brillait dans la lucarne d'une maison basse.

Deslauriers l'aperçut. Alors, il dit emphatiquement, tout en retirant son chapeau :

— “Vénus, reine des cieux, serviteur ! Mais la Pénurie est la mère de la Sagesse. Nous a-t-on assez calomniés pour ça, miséricorde !”

Cette allusion à une aventure commune les mit en joie. Ils riaient très haut, dans les rues.

Puis, ayant soldé sa dépense à l'auberge, Deslauriers reconduisit Frédéric jusqu'au carrefour de l'Hôtel-Dieu ; — et, après une longue étreinte, les deux amis se séparèrent.

CHAPITRE 3

Deux mois plus tard, Frédéric, débarqué un matin rue Coq-Héron, songea immédiatement à faire sa grande visite.

Le hasard l'avait servi. Le père Roque était venu lui apporter un rouleau de papiers, en le priant de les remettre lui-même chez M. Dambreuse ; et il accompagnait l'envoi d'un billet décacheté, où il présentait son jeune compatriote.

Mme Moreau parut surprise de cette démarche. Frédéric dissimula le plaisir qu'elle lui causait.

M. Dambreuse s'appelait de son vrai nom le comte d'Ambreuse ; mais, dès 1825, abandonnant peu à peu sa noblesse et son parti, il s'était tourné vers l'industrie ; et, l'oreille dans tous les bureaux, la main dans toutes les entreprises, à l'affût des bonnes occasions, subtil comme un Grec et laborieux comme un Auvergnat, il avait amassé une fortune que l'on disait considérable ; de plus, il était officier de la Légion d'honneur, membre du conseil général de l'Aube, député, pair de France un de ces jours ; complaisant du reste, il fatiguait le ministre par ses demandes continuelles de secours, de croix, de bureaux de tabac ; et, dans ses bouderies contre le pouvoir, il inclinait au centre gauche. Sa femme, la jolie Mme Dambreuse, que citaient les journaux de modes, présidait les assemblées de charité. En cajolant les duchesses, elle apaisait les rancunes du noble faubourg et laissait croire que M. Dambreuse pouvait encore se repentir et rendre des services.

Le jeune homme était troublé en allant chez eux.

— “J'aurais mieux fait de prendre mon habit. On m'invitera sans doute au bal pour la semaine prochaine ? Que va-t-on me dire ?”

L'aplomb lui revint en songeant que M. Dambreuse n'était qu'un bourgeois, et il sauta gaillardement de son cabriolet sur le trottoir de la rue d'Anjou.

Quand il eut poussé une des deux portes cochères, il traversa la cour, gravit le perron et entra dans un vestibule pavé en marbre de couleur.

Un double escalier droit, avec un tapis rouge à baguettes de cuivre, s'appuyait contre les hautes murailles en stuc luisant. Il y avait, au bas des marches, un bananier dont les feuilles larges retombaient sur le velours de la rampe. Deux candélabres de bronze tenaient des globes de porcelaine suspendus à des chaînettes ; les soupiraux des calorifères béants exhalaient un air lourd ; et l'on n'entendait que le tic-tac d'une grande horloge, dressée à l'autre bout du vestibule, sous une panoplie.

Un timbre sonna ; un valet parut, et introduisit Frédéric dans une petite pièce, où l'on distinguait deux coffres-forts, avec des casiers remplis de cartons. M. Dambreuse écrivait au milieu, sur un bureau à cylindre.

Il parcourut la lettre du père Roque, ouvrit avec son canif la toile qui enfermait les papiers, et les examina.

De loin, à cause de sa taille mince, il pouvait sembler jeune encore. Mais ses rares cheveux blancs, ses membres débiles et surtout la pâleur extraordinaire de son visage, accusaient un tempérament délabré. Une énergie impitoyable reposait dans ses yeux glauques, plus froids que des yeux de verre. Il avait les pommettes saillantes, et des mains à articulations noueuses.

Enfin, s'étant levé, il adressa au jeune homme quelques questions sur des personnes de leur connaissance, sur Nogent, sur ses études ; puis il le congédia en s'inclinant. Frédéric sortit par un autre corridor, et se trouva dans le bas de la cour, auprès des remises.

Un coupé bleu, attelé d'un cheval noir, stationnait devant le perron. La portière s'ouvrit, une dame y monta, et la voiture, avec un bruit sourd, se mit à rouler sur le sable.

Frédéric, en même temps qu'elle, arriva de l'autre côté, sous la porte cochère. L'espace n'étant pas assez large, il fut contraint d'attendre. La jeune femme, penchée en dehors du vasistas, parlait tout bas au concierge. Il n'apercevait que son dos, couvert d'une mante violette. Cependant, il plongeait dans l'intérieur de la voiture, tendue de reps bleu, avec des passementeries et des effilés de soie. Les vêtements de la dame l'emplissaient ; il s'échappait de cette petite boîte capitonnée un parfum d'iris, et comme une vague senteur d'élégances féminines. Le cocher lâcha les rênes, le cheval frôla la borne brusquement, et tout disparut.

Frédéric s'en revint à pied, en suivant les boulevards.

Il regrettait de n'avoir pu distinguer Mme Dambreuse.

Un peu plus haut que la rue Montmartre, un embarras de voitures lui fit tourner la tête ; et, de l'autre côté, en face, il lut sur une plaque de marbre :

JACQUES ARNOUX.

Comment n'avait-il pas songé à elle, plus tôt ? La faute venait de Deslauriers, et il s'avança vers la boutique, il n'entra pas, cependant ; il attendit qu'elle parût.

Les hautes glaces transparentes offraient aux regards, dans une disposition habile, des statuettes, des dessins, des gravures, des catalogues, des numéros de l'Art industriel ; et les prix de l'abonnement étaient répétés sur la porte, que décoraient à son milieu, les initiales de l'éditeur. On apercevait, contre les murs, de grands tableaux dont le vernis brillait, puis, dans le fond deux bahuts, chargés de porcelaines, de bronzes, de curiosités alléchantes ; un petit escalier les séparait, fermé dans le haut par une portière de moquette ; et un lustre en vieux saxe, un tapis vert sur le plancher, avec une table en marqueterie, donnaient à cet intérieur plutôt l'apparence d'un salon que d'une boutique.

Frédéric faisait semblant d'examiner les dessins. Après des hésitations infinies, il entra.

Un employé souleva la portière, et répondit que Monsieur ne serait pas "au magasin" avant cinq heures. Mais si la commission pouvait se transmettre...

— "Non ! je reviendrai", répliqua doucement Frédéric.

Les jours suivants furent employés à se chercher un logement ; et il se décida pour une chambre au second étage, dans un hôtel garni, rue Saint-Hyacinthe.

En portant sous son bras un buvard tout neuf, il se rendit à l'ouverture des cours. Trois cents jeunes gens, nu-tête, emplissaient un amphithéâtre où un vieillard en robe rouge dissertait d'une voix monotone ; des plumes grinçaient sur le papier. Il retrouvait dans cette salle l'odeur poussiéreuse des classes, une chaire de forme pareille, le même ennui ! Pendant quinze jours, il y retourna. Mais on n'était pas encore à l'article 3, qu'il avait lâché le Code civil, et il abandonna les Institutes à la Summa divisio personarum.

Les joies qu'il s'était promises n'arrivaient pas ; et, quand il eut épuisé un cabinet de lecture, parcouru les collections du Louvre, et plusieurs fois de suite été au spectacle, il tomba dans un désœuvrement sans fond.

Mille choses nouvelles ajoutaient à sa tristesse. Il lui fallait compter son linge et subir le concierge, rustre à tournure d'infirmier, qui venait le matin retaper son lit, en sentant l'alcool et en grommelant. Son appartement, orné d'une pendule d'albâtre, lui déplaisait. Les cloisons étaient minces ; il entendait les étudiants faire du punch, rire, chanter.

Las de cette solitude, il rechercha un de ses anciens camarades nommé Baptiste Martinon ; et il le découvrit dans une pension bourgeoise de la rue Saint-Jacques, bûchant sa procédure, devant un feu de charbon de terre.

En face de lui, une femme en robe d'indienne reprisait des chaussettes.

Martinon était ce qu'on appelle un fort bel homme grand, joufflu, la physionomie régulière et des yeux bleuâtres à fleur de tête ; son père, un gros cultivateur, le destinait à la magistrature, — et, voulant déjà paraître sérieux, il portait sa barbe taillée en collier.

Comme les ennuis de Frédéric n'avaient point de cause raisonnable et qu'il ne pouvait arguer d'aucun malheur, Martinon ne comprit rien à ses lamentations sur l'existence. Lui, il allait tous les matins à l'Ecole, se promenait ensuite dans le Luxembourg, prenait le soir sa demi-tasse au café, et, avec quinze cents francs par an et l'amour de cette ouvrière, il se trouvait parfaitement heureux.

— “Quel bonheur !” exclama intérieurement Frédéric.

Il avait fait à l'Ecole une autre connaissance, celle de M. de Cisy, enfant de grande famille et qui semblait une demoiselle, à la gentillesse de ses manières.

M. de Cisy s'occupait de dessin, aimait le gothique. Plusieurs fois ils allèrent ensemble admirer la Sainte-Chapelle et Notre-Dame. Mais la distinction du jeune patricien recouvrait une intelligence des plus pauvres. Tout le surprenait ; il riait beaucoup à la moindre plaisanterie, et montrait une ingénuité si complète, que Frédéric le prit d'abord pour un farceur, et finalement le considéra comme un nigaud.

Les épanchements n'étaient donc possibles avec personne ; et il attendait toujours l'invitation des Dambreuse.

Au jour de l'an, il leur envoya des cartes de visite, mais il n'en reçut aucune.

Il était retourné à l'Art industriel.

Il y retourna une troisième fois, et il vit enfin Arnoux qui se disputait au milieu de cinq à six personnes et répondit à peine à son salut ; Frédéric en fut blessé. Il n'en chercha pas moins comment parvenir jusqu'à elle.

Il eut d'abord l'idée de se présenter souvent, pour marchander des tableaux. Puis il songea à glisser dans la boîte du journal quelques articles "très forts", ce qui amènerait des relations. Peut-être valait-il mieux courir droit au but, déclarer son amour ? Alors, il composa une lettre de douze pages, pleine de mouvements lyriques et d'apostrophes ; mais il la déchira, et ne fit rien, ne tenta rien, — immobilisé par la peur de l'insuccès.

Au-dessus de la boutique d'Arnoux, il y avait au premier étage trois fenêtres, éclairées chaque soir. Des ombres circulaient par derrière, une surtout ; c'était la sienne ; — et il se dérangeait de très loin pour regarder ces fenêtres et contempler cette ombre.

Une négresse, qu'il croisa un jour dans les Tuileries tenant une petite fille par la main, lui rappela la négresse de Mme Arnoux. Elle devait y venir comme les autres ; toutes les fois qu'il traversait les Tuileries, son cœur battait, espérant la rencontrer. Les jours de soleil, il continuait sa promenade jusqu'au bout des Champs-Élysées.

Des femmes, nonchalamment assises dans des calèches, et dont les voiles flottaient au vent, défilaient près de lui, au pas ferme de leurs chevaux, avec un balancement insensible qui faisait craquer les cuirs vernis. Les voitures devenaient plus nombreuses, et, se ralentissant à partir du Rond-Point, elles occupaient toute la voie. Les crinières étaient près des crinières, les lanternes près des lanternes ; les étriers d'acier, les gourmettes d'argent, les boucles de cuivre, jetaient çà et là des points lumineux entre les culottes courtes, les gants blancs, et les fourrures qui retombaient sur le blason des portières. Il se sentait comme perdu dans un monde lointain. Ses yeux erraient sur les têtes féminines ; et de vagues ressemblances amenaient à sa mémoire Mme Arnoux. Il se la figurait, au milieu des autres, dans un de ces petits coupés, pareils au coupé de Mme Dambreuse. — Mais le soleil se couchait, et le vent froid soulevait des tourbillons de poussière. Les cochers baissaient le menton dans leurs cravates, les roues se mettaient à tourner plus vite, le macadam grinçait ; et tous les équipages descendaient au grand trot la longue avenue, en se frôlant, se dépassant, s'écartant les uns des autres, puis, sur la place de la Concorde, se dispersaient. Derrière les Tuileries, le ciel prenait la teinte des ardoises. Les arbres du jardin formaient deux masses énormes, violacées par le sommet. Les becs de gaz s'allumaient ; et la Seine, verdâtre dans toute son étendue, se déchirait en moires d'argent contre les piles des ponts.

Il allait dîner, moyennant quarante-trois sols le cachet, dans un restaurant, rue de la Harpe.

Il regardait avec dédain le vieux comptoir d'acajou, les serviettes tachées, l'argenterie crasseuse et les chapeaux suspendus contre la muraille. Ceux qui l'entouraient étaient des étudiants comme lui. Ils causaient de leurs professeurs, de leurs maîtresses. Il s'inquiétait bien des professeurs ! Est-ce qu'il avait une maîtresse ! Pour éviter leurs joies, il arrivait le plus tard possible. Des restes de nourriture couvraient toutes les tables. Les deux garçons fatigués dormaient dans des coins, et une odeur de cuisine, de quinquet et de tabac emplissait la salle déserte.

Puis il remontait lentement les rues. Les réverbères se balançaient, en faisant trembler sur la boue de longs reflets jaunâtres. Des ombres glissaient au bord des trottoirs, avec des parapluies. Le pavé était gras, la brume tombait, et il lui semblait que les ténèbres humides, l'enveloppant, descendaient indéfiniment dans son cœur.

Un remords le prit. Il retourna aux cours. Mais comme il ne connaissait rien aux matières élucidées, des choses très simples l'embarrassèrent.

Il se mit à écrire un roman intitulé : Sylvio, le fils du pêcheur. La chose se passait à Venise. Le héros, c'était lui-même ; l'héroïne, Mme Arnoux. Elle s'appelait Antonia ; — et, pour l'avoir, il assassinait plusieurs gentilshommes, brûlait une partie de la ville et chantait sous son balcon, où palpaient à la brise les rideaux en damas rouge du boulevard Montmartre. Les réminiscences trop nombreuses dont il s'aperçut le découragèrent ; il n'alla pas plus loin, et son désœuvrement redoubla.

Alors, il supplia Deslauriers de venir partager sa chambre. Ils s'arrangeraient pour vivre avec ses deux mille francs de pension ; tout valait mieux que cette existence intolérable. Deslauriers ne pouvait encore quitter Troyes. Il l'engageait à se distraire, et à fréquenter Sénécal.

Sénécal était un répétiteur de mathématiques, homme de forte tête et de convictions républicaines, un futur Saint-Just, disait le clerc. Frédéric avait monté trois fois ses cinq étages, sans en recevoir aucune visite. Il n'y retourna plus.

Il voulut s'amuser. Il se rendit aux bals de l'Opéra. Ces gaietés tumultueuses le glaçaient dès la porte. D'ailleurs, il était retenu par la crainte d'un affront pécuniaire, s'imaginant qu'un souper avec un domino entraînait à des frais considérables, était une grosse aventure.

Il lui semblait, cependant, qu'on devait l'aimer ! Quelquefois, il se réveillait le cœur plein d'espérance, s'habillait soigneusement comme pour un rendez-vous, et il faisait dans Paris des courses interminables. A chaque femme qui marchait devant lui, ou qui s'avancait à sa rencontre, il se disait : "La voilà !" C'était, chaque fois, une déception nouvelle. L'idée de Mme Arnoux fortifiait ces convoitises. Il la trouverait peut-être sur son chemin ; et il imaginait, pour l'aborder, des complications du hasard, des périls extraordinaires dont il la sauverait.

Ainsi les jours s'écoulaient, dans la répétition des mêmes ennuis et des habitudes contractées. Il feuilletait des brochures sous les arcades de l'Odéon, allait lire la Revue des Deux Mondes au café, entraînait dans une salle du Collège de France, écoutait pendant une heure une leçon de chinois ou d'économie politique. Toutes les semaines, il écrivait longuement à Deslauriers, dînait de temps en temps avec Martinon, voyait quelquefois M. de Cisy.

Il loua un piano, et composa des valse allemandes.

Un soir, au théâtre du Palais-Royal, il aperçut, dans une loge d'avant-scène, Arnoux près d'une femme. Était-ce elle ? L'écran de taffetas vert, tiré au bord de la loge, masquait son visage. Enfin la toile se leva ; l'écran s'abattit. C'était une longue personne, de trente ans environ, fanée, et dont les grosses lèvres découvraient, en riant, des dents splendides. Elle causait familièrement avec Arnoux et lui donnait des coups d'éventail sur les doigts. Puis une jeune fille blonde, les paupières un peu rouges comme si elle venait de pleurer, s'assit entre eux. Arnoux resta dès lors à demi penché sur son épaule, en lui tenant des discours qu'elle écoutait sans répondre. Frédéric s'ingéniait à découvrir la condition de ces femmes, modestement habillées de robes sombres, à cols plats rabattus.

A la fin du spectacle, il se précipita dans les couloirs. La foule les remplissait. Arnoux, devant lui, descendait l'escalier, marche à marche, donnant le bras aux deux femmes.

Tout à coup, un bec de gaz l'éclaira. Il avait un crêpe à son chapeau. Elle était morte, peut-être ? Cette idée tourmenta Frédéric si fortement, qu'il courut le lendemain à l'Art industriel, et, payant vite une des gravures étalées devant la montre, il demanda au garçon de boutique comment se portait M. Arnoux.

Le garçon répondit :

— “Mais très bien !”

Frédéric ajouta en pâlisant :

— “Et Madame ?”

— “Madame, aussi !”

Frédéric oublia d'emporter sa gravure.

L'hiver se termina. Il fut moins triste au printemps, se mit à préparer son examen, et, l'ayant subi d'une façon médiocre, partit ensuite pour Nogent.

Il n'alla point à Troyes voir son ami, afin d'éviter les observations de sa mère. Puis, à la rentrée, il abandonna son logement et prit, sur le quai Napoléon, deux pièces, qu'il meubla. L'espoir d'une invitation chez les Dambreuse l'avait quitté ; sa grande passion pour Mme Arnoux commençait à s'éteindre.

CHAPITRE 4

Un matin du mois de décembre, en se rendant au cours de procédure, il crut remarquer dans la rue Saint-Jacques plus d'animation qu'à l'ordinaire. Les étudiants sortaient précipitamment des cafés, ou, par les fenêtres ouvertes, ils s'appelaient d'une maison à l'autre ; les boutiquiers, au milieu du trottoir, regardaient d'un air inquiet ; les volets se fermaient ; et, quand il arriva dans la rue Soufflot, il aperçut un grand rassemblement autour du Panthéon.

Des jeunes gens, par bandes inégales de cinq à douze, se promenaient en se donnant le bras et abordaient les groupes plus considérables qui stationnaient çà et là ; au fond de la place, contre les grilles, des hommes en blouse péroraient, tandis que, le tricorne sur l'oreille et les mains derrière le dos, des sergents de ville erraient le long des murs, en faisant sonner les dalles sous leurs fortes bottes. Tous avaient un air mystérieux, ébahi ; on attendait quelque chose évidemment ; chacun retenait au bord des lèvres une interrogation.

Frédéric se trouvait auprès d'un jeune homme blond, à figure avenante, et portant moustache et barbiche comme un raffiné du temps de Louis XIII. Il lui demanda la cause du désordre.

— “Je n'en sais rien,” reprit l'autre, “ni eux non plus ! C'est leur mode à présent ! quelle bonne farce !”

Et il éclata de rire.

Les pétitions pour la Réforme, que l'on faisait signer dans la garde nationale, jointes au recensement Humann, d'autres événements encore, amenaient depuis six mois, dans Paris, d'inexplicables attroupements ; et même ils se renouvelaient si souvent, que les journaux n'en parlaient plus.

— “Cela manque de galbe et de couleur”, continua le voisin de Frédéric. “Le cuyde, messire, que nous avons dégénéré ! A la bonne époque de Loys onzième, voire de Benjamin Constant, il y avait plus de mutinerie parmi les escoliers. le les treuve pacifiques comme moutons, bêtes comme cornichons, et idoines à estre épiciers, Pasque-Dieu ! Et voilà ce qu'on appelle la Jeunesse des écoles !”

Il écarta les bras, largement, comme Frédéric Lemaître dans Robert Macaire.

— “Jeunesse des écoles, je te bénis !”

Ensuite, apostrophant un chiffonnier, qui remuait des écailles d’huîtres contre la borne d’un marchand de vin :

— “En fais-tu partie, toi, de la Jeunesse des écoles ?”

Le vieillard releva une face hideuse où l’on distinguait, au milieu d’une barbe grise, un nez rouge, et deux yeux avinés stupides.

— “Non ! tu me parais plutôt un de ces hommes à figure patibulaire que l’on voit, dans divers groupes, semant l’or à pleines mains... Oh ! sème, mon patriarche, sème ! Corromps-moi avec les trésors d’Albion ! Are you English ? Je ne repousse pas les présents d’Artaxerxès. Causons un peu de l’union douanière.”

Frédéric sentit quelqu’un lui toucher à l’épaule ; il se retourna. C’était Martinon, prodigieusement pâle.

— “Eh bien !” fit-il en poussant un gros soupir, encore une émeute !
”

Il avait peur d’être compromis, se lamentait. Des hommes en blouse, surtout, l’inquiétaient, comme appartenant à des sociétés secrètes.

— “Est-ce qu’il y a des sociétés secrètes,” dit le jeune homme à moustaches. “C’est une vieille blague du Gouvernement, pour épouvanter les bourgeois !”

Martinon l’engagea à parier plus bas, dans la crainte de la police.

— “Vous croyez encore à la police, vous ? Au fait, que savez-vous, monsieur, si je ne suis pas moi-même un mouchard ?”

Et il le regarda d’une telle manière, que Martinon, fort ému, ne comprit point d’abord la plaisanterie. La foule les poussait, et ils avaient été forcés, tous les trois, de se mettre sur le petit escalier conduisant, par un couloir, dans le nouvel amphithéâtre.

Bientôt la multitude se fendit d’elle-même ; plusieurs têtes se découvrirent ; on saluait l’illustre professeur Samuel Rondelot, qui, enveloppé de sa grosse redingote, levant en l’air ses lunettes d’argent et soufflant de son asthme, s’avançait à pas tranquilles, pour faire son cours. Cet homme était une des gloires judiciaires du XIXe siècle, le rival des Zacharioe, des Rudorff. Sa dignité nouvelle de pair de France n’avait modifié en rien ses allures. On le savait pauvre, et un grand respect l’entourait.

Cependant, du fond de la place, quelques-uns crièrent :

— “A bas Guizot !”

— “A bas Pritchard !”

— “A bas les vendus !”

— “A bas Louis-Philippe !”

La foule oscilla, et, se pressant contre la porte de la cour qui était fermée, elle empêchait le professeur d’aller plus loin. Il s’arrêta devant l’escalier. On l’aperçut bientôt sur la dernière des trois marches. Il parla ; un bourdonnement couvrit sa voix. Bien qu’on l’aimât tout à l’heure, on le haïssait maintenant, car il représentait l’Autorité. Chaque fois qu’il essayait de se faire entendre, les cris recommençaient. Il fit un grand geste pour engager les étudiants à le suivre. Une vocifération universelle lui répondit. Il haussa les épaules dédaigneusement et s’enfonça dans le couloir. Martinon avait profité de sa place pour disparaître en même temps.

— “Quel lâche !” dit Frédéric.

— “Il est prudent !” reprit l’autre.

La foule éclata en applaudissements. Cette retraite du professeur devenait une victoire pour elle. A toutes les fenêtres, des curieux regardaient. Quelques-uns entonnaient la Marseillaise ; d’autres proposaient d’aller chez Béranger.

— “Chez Laffite !”

— “Chez Chateaubriand !”

— “Chez Voltaire !” hurla le jeune homme à moustaches blondes.

Les sergents de ville tâchaient de circuler, en disant le plus doucement qu’ils pouvaient :

— “Partez, messieurs, partez, retirez-vous !”

Quelqu’un cria :

— “A bas les assommeurs !”

C’était une injure usuelle depuis les troubles du mois de septembre. Tous la répétèrent. On huait, on sifflait les gardiens de l’ordre public ; ils commençaient à pâlir ; un d’eux n’y résista plus, et, avisant un petit jeune homme qui s’approchait de trop près, en lui riant au nez, il le repoussa si rudement, qu’il le fit tomber cinq pas plus loin, sur le dos, devant la boutique du marchand de vin. Tous s’écartèrent ; mais presque aussitôt il roula lui-même, terrassé par une sorte d’Hercule dont la chevelure, telle qu’un paquet d’étoupes, débordait sous une casquette en toile cirée.

Arrêté depuis quelques minutes au coin de la rue Saint-Jacques, il avait lâché bien vite un large carton qu'il portait pour bondir vers le sergent de ville et, le tenant renversé sous lui, il labourait sa face à grands coups de poing. Les autres sergents accoururent. Le terrible garçon était si fort, qu'il en fallut quatre, au moins, pour le dompter. Deux le secouaient par le collet, deux autres le tiraient par les bras, un cinquième lui donnait, avec le genou, des bourrades dans les reins, et tous l'appelaient brigand, assassin, émeutier. La poitrine nue et les vêtements en lambeaux, il protestait de son innocence ; il n'avait pu, de sang-froid, voir battre un enfant.

— “Je m'appelle Dussardier ! chez MM. Valinçart frères, dentelles et nouveautés, rue de Cléry. Où est mon carton ? Je veux mon carton” Il répétait : “Dussardier !... rue de Cléry. Mon carton !”

Il s'apaisa pourtant, et, d'un air stoïque, se laissa conduire vers le poste de la rue Descartes. Un flot de monde le suivit. Frédéric et le jeune homme à moustaches marchaient immédiatement par derrière, pleins d'admiration pour le commis et révoltés contre la violence du Pouvoir.

A mesure que l'on avançait, la foule devenait moins grosse.

Les sergents de ville, de temps à autre, se retournaient d'un air féroce ; et les tapageurs n'ayant plus rien à faire, les curieux rien à voir, tous s'en allaient peu à peu. Des passants, que l'on croisait, considéraient Dussardier et se livraient tout haut à des commentaires outrageants. Une vieille femme, sur sa porte, s'écria même qu'il avait volé un pain ; cette injustice augmenta l'irritation des deux amis. Enfin on arriva devant le corps de garde. Il ne restait qu'une vingtaine de personnes. La vue des soldats suffit pour les disperser.

Frédéric et son camarade réclamèrent, hardiment, celui qu'on venait de mettre en prison. Le factionnaire les menaça, s'ils insistaient, de les y fourrer eux-mêmes. Ils demandèrent le chef du poste, et déclinerent leur nom avec leur qualité d'élèves en droit, affirmant que le prisonnier était leur condisciple.

On les fit entrer dans une pièce toute nue, où quatre bancs s'allongeaient contre les murs de plâtre, enfumés. Au fond, un guichet s'ouvrit. Alors parut le robuste visage de Dussardier, qui, dans le désordre de sa chevelure, avec ses petits yeux francs et son nez carré du bout, rappelait confusément la physionomie d'un bon chien.

— “Tu ne nous reconnais pas ?” dit Hussonnet. C'était le nom du jeune homme à moustaches.

— “Mais...”, balbutia Dussardier.

— “Ne fais donc plus l'imbécile”, reprit l'autre ; “on sait que tu es, comme nous, élève en droit.”

Malgré leurs clignements de paupières, Dussardier ne devinait rien. Il parut se recueillir, puis tout à coup :

— “A-t-on trouvé mon carton ?”

Frédéric leva les yeux, découragé. Hussonnet répliqua.

— “Ah ! ton carton, où tu mets tes notes de cours ? Oui, oui ! rassure-toi !”

Ils redoublaient leur pantomime. Dussardier comprit enfin qu'ils venaient pour le servir ; et il se tut, craignant de les compromettre. D'ailleurs, il éprouvait une sorte de honte en se voyant haussé au rang social d'étudiant et le pareil de ces jeunes hommes qui avaient des mains si blanches.

— “Veux-tu faire dire quelque chose à quelqu'un ?” demanda Frédéric.

— “Non, merci, à personne.”

— “Mais ta famille ?”

Il baissa la tête sans répondre : le pauvre garçon était bâtard. Les deux amis restaient étonnés de son silence.

— “As-tu de quoi fumer ?” reprit Frédéric.

Il se palpa, puis retira du fond de sa poche les débris d'une pipe, — une belle pipe en écume de mer, avec un tuyau en bois noir, un couvercle d'argent et un bout d'ambre.

Depuis trois ans, il travaillait à en faire un chef-d'œuvre. Il avait eu soin d'en tenir le fourneau constamment serré dans une gaine de chamois, de la fumer le plus lentement possible, sans jamais la poser sur du marbre, et, chaque soir, de la suspendre au chevet de son lit. A présent, il en secouait les morceaux dans sa main dont les ongles saignaient ; et, le menton sur la poitrine, les prunelles fixes, béant, il contemplait ces ruines de sa joie avec un regard d'une ineffable tristesse.

— “Si nous lui donnions des cigares, hein ?” dit tout bas Hussonnet, en faisant le geste d'en atteindre.

Frédéric avait déjà posé, au bord du guichet, un porte-cigares rempli.

— “Prends donc ! Adieu, bon courage !”

Dussardier se jeta sur les deux mains qui s’avançaient. Il les serrait frénétiquement, la voix entrecoupée par des sanglots.

— “Comment ?... à moi ! à moi !”

Les deux amis se dérobèrent à sa reconnaissance, sortirent, et allèrent déjeuner ensemble au café Tabourey, devant le Luxembourg.

Tout en séparant le beefsteak, Hussonnet apprit à son compagnon qu’il travaillait dans des journaux de modes et fabriquait des réclames pour l’Art industriel.

— “Chez Jacques Arnoux”, dit Frédéric.

— “Vous le connaissez ?”

— “Oui ! non !... C’est-à-dire je l’ai vu, je l’ai rencontré.”

Il demanda négligemment à Hussonnet s’il voyait quelquefois sa femme.

— “De temps à autre”, reprit le bohème.

Frédéric n’osa poursuivre ses questions ; cet homme venait de prendre une place démesurée dans sa vie ; il paya la note du déjeuner, sans qu’il y eût de la part de l’autre aucune protestation.

La sympathie était mutuelle ; ils échangèrent leurs adresses, et Hussonnet l’invita cordialement à l’accompagner jusqu’à la rue de Fleurus.

Ils é taient au milieu du jardin quand l’employé d’Arnoux, retenant son haleine, contourna son visage dans une grimace abominable et se mit à faire le coq. Alors tous les coqs qu’il y avait aux environs lui répondirent par des cocoricos prolongés.

— “C’est un signal”, dit Hussonnet.

Ils s’arrêtèrent près du théâtre Bobino, devant une maison où l’on pénétrait par une allée. Dans la lucarne d’un grenier, entre des capucines et des pois de senteur, une jeune femme se montra, nu-tête, en corset, et appuyant ses deux bras contre le bord de la gouttière.

— “Bonjour, mon ange, bonjour, bibiche”, fit Hussonnet, en lui envoyant des baisers.

Il ouvrit la barrière d’un coup de pied, et disparut.

Frédéric l’attendit toute la semaine. Il n’osait aller chez lui, pour n’avoir point l’air impatient de se faire rendre à déjeuner ; mais il le chercha par tout le quartier latin. Il le rencontra un soir, et l'emmena dans sa chambre sur le quai Napoléon.

La causerie fut longue ; ils s'épanchèrent. Hussonnet ambitionnait la gloire et les profits du théâtre. Il collaborait à des vaudevilles non reçus, "avait des masses de plans", tournait le couplet ; il en chanta quelques-uns. Puis, remarquant dans l'étagère un volume de Hugo et un autre de Lamartine, il se répandit en sarcasmes sur l'école romantique. Ces poètes-là n'avaient ni bon sens ni correction, et n'étaient pas Français, surtout ! Il se vantait de savoir sa langue et épluchait les phrases les plus belles avec cette sévérité hargneuse, ce goût académique qui distinguent les personnes d'humeur folâtre quand elles abordent l'art sérieux.

Frédéric fut blessé dans ses prédilections ; il avait envie de rompre. Pourquoi ne pas hasarder, tout de suite, le mot d'où son bonheur dépendait ? Il demanda au garçon de lettres s'il pouvait le présenter chez Arnoux.

La chose était facile, et ils convinrent du jour suivant.

Hussonnet manqua le rendez-vous ; il en manqua trois autres. Un samedi, vers quatre heures, il apparut. Mais, profitant de la voiture, il s'arrêta d'abord au Théâtre Français pour avoir un coupon de loge ; il se fit descendre chez un tailleur, chez une couturière ; il écrivait des billets chez les concierges. Enfin ils arrivèrent boulevard Montmartre. Frédéric traversa la boutique, monta l'escalier. Arnoux le reconnut dans la glace placée devant son bureau ; et, tout en continuant à écrire, lui tendit la main par-dessus l'épaule.

Cinq ou six personnes, debout, emplissaient l'appartement étroit, qu'éclairait une seule fenêtre donnant sur la cour ; un canapé en damas de laine brune occupant au fond l'intérieur d'une alcôve, entre deux portières d'étoffe semblable. Sur la cheminée couverte de paperasses, il y avait une Vénus en bronze ; deux candélabres, garnis de bougies roses, la flanquaient parallèlement. A droite, près d'un cartonnier, un homme dans un fauteuil lisait le journal, en gardant son chapeau sur sa tête ; les murailles disparaissaient sous des estampes et des tableaux, gravures précieuses ou esquisses de maîtres contemporains, ornées de dédicaces, qui témoignaient pour Jacques Arnoux de l'affection la plus sincère.

— "Cela va toujours bien ?" fit-il en se tournant vers Frédéric.

Et, sans attendre sa réponse, il demanda bas à Hussonnet :

— “Comment l’appellez-vous, votre ami ?”

Puis tout haut :

— “Prenez donc un cigare, sur le cartonnier, dans la boîte.”

L’Art industriel, posé au point central de Paris, était un lieu de rendez-vous commode, un terrain neutre où les rivalités se coudoyaient familièrement. On y voyait ce jour-là, Anténor Braive, le portraitiste des rois ; Jules Burrieu, qui commençait à populariser par ses dessins les guerres d’Algérie ; le caricaturiste Sombaz, le sculpteur Vourdat, d’autres encore, et aucun ne répondait aux préjugés de l’étudiant. Leurs manières étaient simples, leurs propos libres. Le mystique Lovarias débita un conte obscène ; et l’inventeur du paysage oriental, le fameux Dittmer, portait une camisole de tricot sous son gilet, et prit l’omnibus pour s’en retourner.

Il fut d’abord question d’une nommée Apollonie, un ancien modèle que Burrieu prétendait avoir reconnue sur le boulevard, dans une daumont. Hussonnet expliqua cette métamorphose par la série de ses entreteneurs.

— “Comme ce gaillard-là connaît les filles de Paris !” dit Arnoux.

— “Après vous, s’il en reste, sire”, répliqua le bohème, avec un salut militaire, pour imiter le grenadier offrant sa gourde à Napoléon.

Puis on discuta quelques toiles, où la tête d’Apollonia avait servi. Les confrères absents furent critiqués. On s’étonnait du prix de leurs œuvres ; et tous se plaignaient de ne point gagner suffisamment, lorsque entra un homme de taille moyenne, l’habit fermé par un seul bouton, les yeux vifs, l’air un peu fou.

— “Quel tas de bourgeois vous êtes !” dit-il. “Qu’est-ce que cela fait, miséricorde ! Les vieux qui confectionnaient des chefs-d’œuvre ne s’inquiétaient pas du million. Corrège, Murillo...”

— “Ajoutez Pellerin”, dit Sombaz.

Mais sans relever l’épigramme, il continua de discourir avec tant de véhémence, qu’Arnoux fut contraint de lui répéter deux fois :

— “Ma femme a besoin de vous, jeudi. N’oubliez pas !”

Cette parole ramena la pensée de Frédéric sur Mme Arnoux. Sans doute, on pénétrait chez elle par le cabinet près du divan ? Arnoux, pour prendre un mouchoir, venait de l’ouvrir ; Frédéric avait aperçu, dans le fond, un lavabo. Mais une sorte de grommèlement sortit du coin de la cheminée ; c'était le personnage qui lisait son journal, dans le fauteuil. Il avait cinq pieds neuf pouces, les paupières un peu tombantes, la chevelure grise, l'air majestueux — et s'appelait Regimbart.

— “Qu'est-ce donc, citoyen ?” dit Arnoux.

— “Encore une nouvelle canaillerie du Gouvernement !”

Il s'agissait de la destitution d'un maître d'école.

Pellerin reprit son parallèle entre Michel-Ange et Shakespeare. Dittmer s'en allait. Arnoux le rattrapa pour lui mettre dans la main deux billets de banque. Alors, Hussonnet, croyant le moment favorable :

— “Vous ne pourriez pas m'avancer, mon cher patron ?...”

Mais Arnoux s'était rassis et gourmandait un vieillard d'aspect sordide, en lunettes bleues.

— “Ah ! vous êtes joli, père Isaac ! Voilà trois œuvres décriées, perdues ! Tout le monde se fiche de moi ! On les connaît maintenant ! Que voulez-vous que j'en fasse ? Il faudra que je les envoie en Californie !... au diable ! Taisez-vous !”

La spécialité de ce bonhomme consistait à mettre au bas de ces tableaux des signatures de maîtres anciens. Arnoux refusait de le payer ; il le congédia brutalement. Puis, changeant de manières, il salua un monsieur décoré, gourmé, avec favoris et cravate blanche.

Le coude sur l'espagnolette de la fenêtre, il lui parla pendant longtemps, d'un air mielleux. Enfin il éclata :

— “Eh ! je ne suis pas embarrassé d'avoir des courtiers, monsieur le comte !”

Le gentilhomme s'étant résigné, Arnoux lui solda vingt-cinq louis, et, dès qu'il fut dehors :

— “Sont-ils assommants, ces grands seigneurs !”

— “Tous des misérables !” murmura Regimbart.

A mesure que l'heure avançait, les occupations d'Arnoux redoublaient ; il classait des articles, décachetait des lettres, alignait des comptes ; au bruit du marteau dans le magasin, sortait pour surveiller les emballages, puis reprenait sa besogne et, tout en faisant courir sa plume de fer sur le papier, il ripostait aux plaisanteries. Il devait dîner le soir chez son avocat, et partait le lendemain pour la Belgique.

Les autres causaient des choses du jour : le portrait de Cherubini, l'hémicycle des Beaux-Arts l'exposition prochaine. Pellerin déblatérât contre l'Institut. Les cancans, les discussions s'entrecroisaient. L'appartement, bas de plafond, était si rempli, qu'on ne pouvait remuer ; et la lumière des bougies roses passait dans la fumée des cigares comme des rayons de soleil dans la brume.

La porte, près du divan, s'ouvrit, et une grande femme mince entra, — avec des gestes brusques qui faisaient sonner sur sa robe en taffetas noir toutes les breloques de sa montre.

C'était la femme entrevue, l'été dernier, au Palais Royal. Quelques-uns, l'appelant par son nom, échangèrent avec elle des poignées de main. Hussonnet avait enfin arraché une cinquantaine de francs ; la pendule sonna sept heures ; tous se retirèrent.

Arnoux dit à Pellerin de rester, et conduisit Mlle Vatnaz dans le cabinet.

Frédéric n'entendait pas leurs paroles ils chuchotaient. Cependant, la voix féminine s'éleva :

— “Depuis six mois que l'affaire est faite, j'attends toujours !”

Il y eut un long silence, Mlle Vatnaz reparut. Arnoux lui avait encore promis quelque chose.

— “Oh ! oh ! plus tard, nous verrons !”

— “Adieu, homme heureux !” dit-elle, en s'en allant.

Arnoux rentra vivement dans le cabinet, écrasa du cosmétique sur ses moustaches, haussa ses bretelles pour tendre ses sous-pieds ; et, tout en se lavant les mains :

— “Il me faudrait deux dessus de porte, à deux cent cinquante la pièce, genre Boucher, est-ce convenu ?”

— “Soit”, dit l'artiste, devenu rouge.

— “Bon ! et n'oubliez pas ma femme !”

Frédéric accompagna Pellerin jusqu'au haut du faubourg Poissonnière, et lui demanda la permission de venir le voir quelquefois, faveur qui fut accordée gracieusement.

Pellerin lisait tous les ouvrages d'esthétique pour découvrir la véritable théorie du Beau, convaincu, quand il l'aurait trouvée, de faire des chefs-d'œuvre. il s'entourait de tous les auxiliaires imaginables, dessins, plâtres, modèles, gravures ; et il cherchait, se rongait ; il accusait le temps, ses nerfs, son atelier, sortait dans la rue pour rencontrer l'inspiration, tressaillait de l'avoir saisie, puis abandonnait son œuvre et en rêvait une autre qui devait être plus belle. Ainsi tourmenté par des convoitises de gloire et perdant ses jours en discussions, croyant à mille niaiseries, aux systèmes, aux critiques, à l'importance d'un règlement ou d'une réforme en matière d'art, il n'avait, à cinquante ans, encore produit que des ébauches. Son orgueil robuste l'empêchait de subir aucun découragement, mais il était toujours irrité, et dans cette exaltation à la fois factice et naturelle qui constitue les comédiens.

On remarquait en entrant chez lui deux grands tableaux, où les premiers tons, posés çà et là, faisaient sur la toile blanche des taches de brun, de rouge et de bleu. Un réseau de lignes à la craie s'étendait par-dessus, comme les mailles vingt fois reprises d'un filet ; il était même impossible d'y rien comprendre. Pellerin expliqua le sujet de ces deux compositions en indiquant avec le pouce les parties qui manquaient. L'une devait représenter la démence de Nabuchodonosor, l'autre l'incendie de Rome par Néron. Frédéric les admira.

Il admira des académies de femmes échevelées, des paysages où les troncs d'arbre tordus par la tempête foisonnaient, et surtout des caprices à la plume, souvenirs de Callot, de Rembrandt ou de Goya, dont il ne connaissait pas les modèles. Pellerin n'estimait plus ces travaux de sa jeunesse ; maintenant, il était pour le grand style ; il dogmatisa sur Phidias et Winckelmann éloquemment. Les choses autour de lui renforçaient la puissance de sa parole : on voyait une tête de mort sur un prie-Dieu, des yatagans, une robe de moine ; Frédéric l'endossa.

Quand il arrivait de bonne heure, il le surprenait dans son mauvais lit de sangle, que cachait un lambeau de tapisserie ; car Pellerin se couchait tard, fréquentant les théâtres avec assiduité. Il était servi par une vieille femme en haillons, dînait à la gargote et vivait sans maîtresse. Ses connaissances, ramassées pêle-mêle, rendaient ses paradoxes amusants. Sa haine contre le commun et le bourgeois débordait en sarcasmes d'un lyrisme superbe, et il avait pour les maîtres une telle religion, qu'elle le montait presque jusqu'à eux.

Mais pourquoi ne parlait-il jamais de Mme Arnoux ? Quant à son mari, tantôt il l'appelait un bon garçon, d'autres fois un charlatan. Frédéric attendait ses confidences.

Un jour en feuilletant un de ses cartons, il trouva dans le portrait d'une bohémienne quelque chose de Mlle Vatnaz, et, comme cette personne l'intéressait, il voulut savoir sa position.

Elle avait été, croyait Pellerin, d'abord institutrice en province ; maintenant, elle donnait des leçons et tâchait d'écrire dans les petites feuilles.

D'après ses manières avec Arnoux, on pouvait, selon Frédéric, la supposer sa maîtresse.

— “Ah ! bah ! il en a d'autres !”

Alors, le jeune homme, en détournant son visage qui rougissait de honte sous l'infamie de sa pensée, ajouta d'un air crâne :

— “Sa femme le lui rend, sans doute ?”

— “Pas du tout ! elle est honnête !”

Frédéric eut un remords, et se montra plus assidu au journal.

Les grandes lettres composant le nom d'Arnoux sur la plaque de marbre, au haut de la boutique, lui semblaient toutes particulières et grosses de significations, comme une écriture sacrée. Le large trottoir, descendant, facilitait sa marche, la porte tournait presque d'elle-même ; et la poignée, lisse au toucher, avait la douceur et comme l'intelligence d'une main dans la sienne. Insensiblement, il devint aussi ponctuel que Regimbart.

Tous les jours, Regimbart s'asseyait au coin du feu, dans son fauteuil, s'emparait du National, ne le quittait plus, et exprimait sa pensée par des exclamations ou de simples haussements d'épaules. De temps à autre, il s'essuyait le front avec son mouchoir de poche roulé en boudin, et qu'il portait sur sa poitrine, entre deux boutons de sa redingote verte. Il avait un pantalon à plis, des souliers-bottes, une cravate longue ; et son chapeau à bords retroussés le faisait reconnaître, de loin, dans les foules.

A huit heures du matin, il descendait des hauteurs de Montmartre, pour prendre le vin blanc dans la rue Notre-Dame-des-Victoires. Son déjeuner, que suivaient plusieurs parties de billard, le conduisait jusqu'à trois heures. Il se dirigeait alors vers le passage des Panoramas, pour prendre l'absinthe. Après la séance chez Arnoux, il entrait à l'estaminet Bordelais, pour prendre le vermouth ; puis, au lieu de rejoindre sa femme, souvent il préférait dîner seul, dans un petit café de la place Gaillon, où il voulait qu'on lui servît “des plats de ménage, des choses naturelles” ! Enfin il se transportait dans un autre billard, et y restait jusqu’à minuit, jusqu’à une heure du matin, jusqu’au moment où le gaz éteint et les volets fermés, le maître de l’établissement, exténué, le suppliait de sortir.

Et ce n’était pas l’amour des boissons qui attirait dans ces endroits le citoyen Regimbart, mais l’habitude ancienne d’y causer politique ; avec l’âge, sa verve était tombée, il n’avait plus qu’une morosité silencieuse. On aurait dit, à voir le sérieux de son visage, qu’il roulait le monde dans sa tête. Rien n’en sortait ; et personne, même de ses amis, ne lui connaissait d’occupations, bien qu’il se donnât pour tenir un cabinet d’affaires.

Arnoux paraissait l’estimer infiniment. Il dit un jour à Frédéric :
— “Celui-là en sait long, allez ! C’est un homme fort”

Une autre fois, Regimbart étala sur son pupitre des papiers concernant des mines de kaolin en Bretagne Arnoux s’en rapportait à son expérience.

Frédéric se montra plus cérémonieux pour Regimbart, — jusqu’à lui offrir l’absinthe de temps à autre ; et quoiqu’il le jugeât stupide, souvent il demeurait dans sa compagnie pendant une grande heure, uniquement parce que c’était l’ami de Jacques Arnoux.

Après avoir poussé dans leurs débuts des maîtres contemporains, le marchand de tableaux, homme de progrès, avait tâché, tout en conservant des allures artistiques, d’étendre ses profits pécuniaires. Il recherchait l’émancipation des arts, le sublime à bon marché. Toutes les industries du luxe parisien subirent son influence, qui fut bonne pour les petites choses, et funeste pour les grandes. Avec sa rage de flatter l’opinion, il détourna de leur voie les artistes habiles, corrompit les forts, épuisa les faibles et illustra les médiocres ; il en disposait par ses relations et par sa revue. Les rapins ambitionnaient de voir leurs œuvres à sa vitrine et les tapissiers prenaient chez lui des modèles d’ameublement. Frédéric le considérait à la fois comme millionnaire, comme dilettante, comme homme d’action. Bien des choses, pourtant, l’étonnaient, car le sieur Arnoux était malicieux dans son commerce.

Il recevait du fond de l’Allemagne ou de l’Italie une toile achetée à Paris quinze cents francs, et, exhibant une facture qui la portait à quatre mille, la revendait trois mille cinq cents, par complaisance. Un de ses tours ordinaires avec les peintres était d’exiger comme pot-devin une réduction de leur tableau, sous prétexte d'en publier la gravure ; il vendait toujours la réduction et jamais la gravure ne paraissait. A ceux qui se plaignaient d'être exploités, il répondait par une tape sur le ventre. Excellent d'ailleurs, il prodiguait les cigares, tutoyait les inconnus, s'enthousiasmait pour une œuvre ou pour un homme, et, s'obstinant alors, ne regardant à rien, multipliait les courses, les correspondances, les réclames. Il se croyait fort honnête, et, dans son besoin d'expansion, racontait naïvement ses indécidatesses.

Une fois, pour vexer un confrère qui inaugurerait un autre journal de peinture par un grand festin, il pria Frédéric d'écrire sous ses yeux, un peu avant l'heure du rendez-vous, des billets où l'on désinvitait les convives.

— “Cela n'attaque pas l'honneur, vous comprenez ?”

Et le jeune homme n'osa lui refuser ce service.

Le lendemain, en entrant avec Hussonnet dans son bureau, Frédéric vit par la porte (celle qui s'ouvrait sur l'escalier) le bas d'une robe disparaître.

— “Mille excuses !” dit Hussonnet. “Si j'avais cru qu'il y eût des femmes...”

— “Oh ! pour celle-là c'est la mienne”, reprit Arnoux. “Elle montait me faire une petite visite, en passant.”

— “Comment ?” dit Frédéric.

— “Mais oui ! elle s'en retourne chez elle, à la maison.”

Le charme des choses ambiantes se retira tout à coup. Ce qu'il y sentait confusément épandu venait de s'évanouir, ou plutôt n'y avait jamais été. Il éprouvait une surprise infinie et comme la douleur d'une trahison.

Arnoux, en fouillant dans son tiroir, souriait. Se moquait-il de lui ? Le commis déposa sur la table une liasse de papiers humides.

— “Ah ! les affiches !” s'écria le marchand. “Je ne suis pas près de dîner ce soir !”

Regimbart prenait son chapeau.

— “Comment, vous me quittez ?”

— “Sept heures !” dit Regimbart.

Frédéric le suivit.

Au coin de la rue Montmartre, il se retourna ; il regarda les fenêtres du premier étage ; et il rit intérieurement de pitié sur lui-même, en se rappelant avec quel amour il les avait si souvent contemplées ! Où donc vivait-elle ? Comment la rencontrer maintenant ? La solitude se rouvrait autour de son désir plus immense que jamais !

— “Venez-vous la prendre ?” dit Regimbart.

— “Prendre qui ?”

— “L’absinthe !”

Et, cédant à ses obsessions, Frédéric se laissa conduire à l’estaminet Bordelais. Tandis que son compagnon, posé sur, le coude, considérait la carafe, il jetait les yeux de droite et de gauche. Mais il aperçut le profil de Pellerin sur le trottoir ; il cogna vivement contre le carreau, et le peintre n’était pas assis que Regimbart lui demanda pourquoi on ne le voyait plus à l’Art industriel.

— “Que je crève, si j’y retourne ! C’est une brute, un bourgeois, un misérable, un drôle !”

Ces injures flattaient la colère de Frédéric. Il en était blessé cependant, car il lui semblait qu’elles atteignaient un peu Mme Arnoux.

— “Qu’est-ce donc qu’il vous a fait !” dit Regimbart.

Pellerin battit le sol avec son pied, et souffla fortement, au lieu de répondre.

Il se livrait à des travaux clandestins, tels que portraits aux deux crayons ou pastiches de grands maîtres pour les amateurs peu éclairés ; et, comme ces travaux l’humiliaient, il préférait se taire, généralement. Mais “la crasse d’Arnoux” l’exaspérait trop. Il se soulagea.

D’après une commande, dont Frédéric avait été le témoin, il lui avait apporté deux tableaux. Le marchand, alors, s’était permis des critiques ! Il avait blâmé la composition, la couleur et le dessin, le dessin surtout, bref, à aucun prix n’en avait voulu. Mais, forcé par l’échéance dure billet, Pellerin les avait cédés au juif Isaac ; et, quinze jours plus tard, Arnoux, lui-même les vendait à un Espagnol, pour deux mille francs.

— “Pas un sou de moins ! Quelle gredinerie ! et il en fait bien d’autres, parbleu ! Nous le verrons, un de ces matins, en cour d’assises.”

— “Comme vous exagérez !” dit Frédéric d’une voix timide.

— “Allons ! bon ! j’exagère !” s’écria l’artiste, en donnant sur la table un grand coup de poing.

Cette violence rendit au jeune homme tout son aplomb. Sans doute, on pouvait se conduire plus gentiment ; cependant, si Arnoux trouvait ces deux toiles...

— “Mauvaises ! lâchez le mot ! Les connaissez-vous ? Est-ce votre métier ? Or, vous savez, mon petit, moi, je n’admets pas cela, les amateurs !”

— “Eh ! ce ne sont pas mes affaires !” dit Frédéric.

— “Quel intérêt avez-vous donc à le défendre ?” reprit froidement Pellerin.

Le jeune homme balbutia :

— “Mais... parce que je suis son ami.”

— “Embrassez-le de ma part ! bonsoir !”

Et le peintre sortit furieux, sans parler, bien entendu, de sa consommation.

Frédéric s’était convaincu lui-même, en défendant Arnoux. Dans l’échauffement de son éloquence, il fut pris de tendresse pour cet homme intelligent et bon, que ses amis calomniaient et qui maintenant travaillait tout seul, abandonné. Il ne résista pas au singulier besoin de le revoir immédiatement. Dix minutes après, il poussait la porte du magasin.

Arnoux élaborait, avec son commis, des affiches monstres pour une exposition de tableaux.

— “Tiens ! qui vous ramène ?”

Cette question bien simple embarrassa Frédéric ; et, ne sachant que répondre, il demanda si l’on n’avait point trouvé par hasard son calepin, un petit calepin en cuir bleu.

— “Celui où vous mettez vos lettres de femmes ?” dit Arnoux.

Frédéric, en rougissant comme une vierge, se défendit d’une telle supposition.

— “Vos poésies, alors ?” répliqua le marchand.

Il maniait les spécimens étalés, en discutait la forme, la couleur, la bordure ; et Frédéric se sentait de plus en plus irrité par son air de méditation, et surtout par ses mains qui se promenaient sur les affiches, — de grosses mains, un peu molles, à ongles plats. Enfin Arnoux se leva ; et, en disant : “C’est fait !” il lui passa la main sous le menton, familièrement. Cette privauté déplut à Frédéric, il se recula ; puis il franchit le seuil du bureau, pour la dernière fois de son existence, croyait-il. Mme Arnoux, elle-même se trouvait comme diminuée par la vulgarité de son mari.

Il reçut, dans la même semaine, une lettre où Deslauriers annonçait qu'il arriverait à Paris, jeudi prochain. Alors, il se rejeta violemment sur cette affection plus solide et plus haute. Un pareil homme valait toutes les femmes. Il n'aurait plus besoin de Regimbart, de Pellerin, d'Hussonnet, de personne ! Afin de mieux loger son ami, il acheta une couchette de fer, un second fauteuil, dédoubla sa literie ; et, le jeudi matin, il s'habillait pour aller au-devant de Deslauriers quand un coup de sonnette retentit à sa porte. Arnoux entra.

— “Un mot, seulement ! Hier, on m'a envoyé de Genève une belle truite ; nous comptons sur vous, tantôt, à sept heures juste... C'est rue de Choiseul, 24 bis. N'oubliez pas !”

Frédéric fut obligé de s'asseoir. Ses genoux chancelaient. Il se répétait : “Enfin ! enfin !” Puis il écrivit à son tailleur, à son chapelier, à son bottier ; et il fit porter ces trois billets par trois commissionnaires différents. La clef tourna dans la serrure et le concierge parut, avec une malle sur l'épaule.

Frédéric, en apercevant Deslauriers, se mit à trembler comme une femme adultère sous le regard de son époux.

— “Qu'est-ce donc qui te prend ?” dit Deslauriers, “tu dois cependant avoir reçu de moi une lettre ?”

Frédéric n'eut pas la force de mentir.

Il ouvrit les bras et se jeta sur sa poitrine.

Ensuite, le clerc conta son histoire. Son père n'avait pas voulu rendre ses comptes de tutelle, s'imaginant que ces comptes-là se prescrivaient par dix ans. Mais, fort en procédure, Deslauriers avait enfin arraché tout l'héritage de sa mère, sept mille francs nets, qu'il tenait là, sur lui, dans un vieux portefeuille.

— “C'est une réserve, en cas de malheur. Il faut que j'avise à les placer et à me caser moi-même, dès demain matin. Pour aujourd'hui, vacance complète, et tout à toi, mon vieux !”

— “Oh ! ne te gêne pas !” dit Frédéric. “Si tu avais ce soir quelque chose d'important...”

— “Allons donc ! Je serais un fier misérable...”

Cette épithète, lancée au hasard, toucha Frédéric en plein cœur, comme une allusion outrageante.

Le concierge avait disposé sur la table, auprès du feu, des côtelettes, de la galantine, une langouste, un dessert, et deux bouteilles de vin de Bordeaux. Une réception si bonne émut Deslauriers.

— “Tu me traites comme un roi, ma parole !”

Ils causèrent de leur passé, de l’avenir ; et, de temps à autre, ils se prenaient les mains par-dessus la table, en se regardant une minute avec attendrissement. Mais un commissionnaire apporta un chapeau neuf. Deslauriers remarqua, tout haut, combien la coiffe était brillante.

Puis le tailleur, lui-même, vint remettre l’habit auquel il avait donné un coup de fer.

— “On croirait que tu vas te marier”, dit Deslauriers.

Une heure après, un troisième individu survint et retira d’un grand sac noir une paire de bottes vernies, splendides. Pendant que Frédéric les essayait, le bottier observait narquoisement la chaussure du provincial.

— “Monsieur n’a besoin de rien ?”

— “Merci”, répliqua le Clerc, en rentrant sous sa chaise ses vieux souliers à cordons.

Cette humiliation gêna Frédéric. Il reculait à faire son aveu. Enfin, il s’écria, comme saisi par une idée :

— “Ah ! saprelotte, j’oubliais !”

— “Quoi donc ?”

— “Ce soir, je dîne en ville !”

— “Chez les Dambreuse” Pourquoi ne m’en parles-tu jamais dans tes lettres ? ”

Ce n’était pas chez les Dambreuse, mais chez les Arnoux.

— “Tu aurais dû m’avertir !” dit Deslauriers. “Je serais venu un jour plus tard.”

— “Impossible !” répliqua brusquement Frédéric. “On ne m’a invité que ce matin, tout à l’heure.”

Et, pour racheter sa faute et en distraire son ami, il dénoua les cordes emmêlées de sa malle, il arrangea dans la commode toutes ses affaires, il voulait lui donner son propre lit, coucher dans le cabinet au bois. Puis, dès quatre heures, il commença les préparatifs de sa toilette.

— “Tu as bien le temps !” dit l’autre.

Enfin, il s’habilla, il partit.

— “Voilà les riches !” pensa Deslauriers.

il alla dîner rue Saint-Jacques, chez un petit restaurateur qu’il connaissait.

Frédéric s’arrêta plusieurs fois dans l’escalier, tant son cœur battait fort. Un de ses gants trop juste éclata ; et, tandis qu’il enfonçait la déchirure sous la manchette de sa chemise, Arnoux, qui montait par derrière, le saisit au bras et le fit entrer.

L’antichambre, décorée à la chinoise, avait une lanterne peinte, au plafond, et des bambous dans les coins. En traversant le salon, Frédéric trébucha contre une peau de tigre. On n’avait point allumé les flambeaux, mais deux lampes brûlaient dans le boudoir tout au fond.

Mlle Marthe vint dire que sa maman s’habillait. Arnoux l’enleva jusqu’à la hauteur de sa bouche pour la baiser ; puis, voulant choisir lui-même dans la cave certaines bouteilles de vin, il laissa Frédéric avec l’enfant.

Elle avait grandi beaucoup depuis le voyage de Montereau. Ses cheveux bruns descendaient en longs anneaux frisés sur ses bras nus. Sa robe, plus bouffante que le jupon d’une danseuse, laissait voir ses mollets roses, et toute sa gentille personne sentait frais comme un bouquet. Elle reçut les compliments du monsieur avec des airs de coquette, fixa sur lui ses yeux profonds, puis, se coulant parmi les meubles, disparut comme un chat.

Il n’éprouvait plus aucun trouble. Les globes des lampes, recouverts d’une dentelle en papier, envoyaient un jour laiteux et qui attendrissait la couleur des murailles, tendues de satin mauve. A travers les lames du garde-feu, pareil à un gros éventail, on apercevait les charbons dans la cheminée ; il y avait, contre la pendule, un coffret à fermoirs d’argent. Ça et là, des choses intimes traînaient : une poupée au milieu de la causeuse, un fichu contre le dossier d’une chaise, et, sur la table à ouvrage, un tricot de laine d’où pendaient en dehors deux aiguilles d’ivoire, la pointe en bas. C’était un endroit paisible, honnête et familier tout ensemble.

Arnoux rentra ; et, par l’autre portière, Mme Arnoux parut. Comme elle se trouvait enveloppée d’ombre, il ne distingua d’abord que sa tête. Elle avait une robe de velours noir et, dans les cheveux, une longue bourse algérienne en filet de soie rouge qui, s’entortillant à son peigne, lui tombait sur l’épaule gauche.

Arnoux présenta Frédéric.

— “Oh je reconnais Monsieur parfaitement”, répondit-elle.

Puis les convives arrivèrent tous, presque en même temps : Dittmer, Lovarias, Burieu, le compositeur Rosenwald, le poète Théophile Lorris, deux critiques d'art collègues d'Hussonnet, un fabricant de papier, et enfin l'illustre Pierre-Paul Meinsius, le dernier représentant de la grande peinture, qui portait gaillardement avec sa gloire ses quatre-vingts années et son gros ventre.

Lorsqu'on passa dans la salle à manger, Mme Arnoux prit son bras. Une chaise était restée vide pour Pellerin. Arnoux l'aimait, tout en l'exploitant. D'ailleurs, il redoutait sa terrible langue — si bien que, pour l'attendrir, il avait publié dans l'Art industriel son portrait accompagné d'éloges hyperboliques ; et Pellerin, plus sensible à la gloire qu'à l'argent, apparut vers huit heures, tout essoufflé. Frédéric s'imagina qu'ils étaient réconciliés depuis longtemps.

La compagnie, les mets, tout lui plaisait. La salle, telle qu'un parloir moyen âge, était tendue de cuir battu ; une étagère hollandaise se dressait devant un râtelier de chibouques ; et, autour de la table, les verres de Bohême, diversement colorés, faisaient au milieu des fleurs et des fruits comme une illumination dans un jardin.

Il eut à choisir entre dix espèces de moutarde. Il mangea du daspachio, du cari, du gingembre, des merles de Corse, des lasagnes romaines ; il but des vins extraordinaires, du lip-fraoli et du tokay. Arnoux se piquait effectivement de bien recevoir. Il courtoisait en vue des comestibles tous les conducteurs de malle-poste, et il était lié avec des cuisiniers de grandes maisons qui lui communiquaient des sauces.

Mais la causerie surtout amusait Frédéric. Son goût pour les voyages fut caressé par Dittmer, qui parla de l'Orient ; il assouvit sa curiosité des choses du théâtre en écoutant Rosenwald causer de l'Opéra ; et l'existence atroce de la bohème lui parut drôle, à travers la gaieté d'Hussonnet, lequel narra, d'une manière pittoresque, comment il avait passé tout un hiver, n'ayant pour nourriture que du fromage de Hollande. Puis, une discussion entre Lovarias et Burrieu, sur l'école florentine, lui révéla des chefs-d'œuvre, lui ouvrit des horizons, et il eut du mal à contenir son enthousiasme quand Pellerin s'écria :

— “Laissez-moi tranquille avec votre hideuse réalité. Qu'est-ce que cela veut dire, la réalité ? Les uns voient noir, d'autres bleu, la multitude voit bête. Rien de moins naturel que Michel-Ange, rien de plus fort ! Le souci de la vérité extérieure dénote la bassesse contemporaine ; et l'art deviendra, si l'on continue, je ne sais quelle rocambole au-dessous de la religion comme poésie, et de la politique comme intérêt. Vous n'arriverez pas à son but, — oui, son but ! — qui est de nous causer une exaltation impersonnelle, avec de petites œuvres, malgré toutes vos finasseries d'exécution. Voilà les tableaux de Bassolier, par exemple : c'est joli, coquet, propre, et pas lourd ! Ça peut se mettre dans la poche, se prendre en voyage ! Les notaires achètent ça vingt mille francs ; il y a pour trois sous d'idées ; mais, sans l'idée, rien de grand ! sans grandeur, pas de beau ! L'Olympe est une montagne ! Le plus crâne monument, ce sera toujours les Pyramides. Mieux vaut l'exubérance que le goût, le désert qu'un trottoir, et un sauvage qu'un coiffeur !”

Frédéric, en écoutant ces choses, regardait Mme Arnoux. Elles tombaient dans son esprit comme des métaux dans une fournaise, s'ajoutaient à sa passion et faisaient de l'amour.

Il était assis trois places au-dessous d'elle, sur le même côté. De temps à autre, elle se penchait un peu, en tournant la tête pour adresser quelques mots à sa petite fille ; et, comme elle souriait alors, une fossette se creusait dans sa joue, ce qui donnait à son visage un air de bonté plus délicate.

Au moment des liqueurs, elle disparut. La conversation devint très libre ; M. Arnoux y brilla, et Frédéric fut étonné du cynisme de ces hommes. Cependant, leur préoccupation de la femme établissait entre eux et lui comme une égalité, qui le haussait dans sa propre estime.

Rentré au salon, il prit, par contenance, un des albums traînant sur la table. Les grands artistes de l'époque l'avaient illustré de dessins, y avaient mis de la prose, des vers, ou simplement leurs signatures ; parmi les noms fameux, il s'en trouvait beaucoup d'inconnus, et les pensées curieuses n'apparaissaient que sous un débordement de sottises. Toutes contenaient un hommage plus ou moins direct à Mme Arnoux. Frédéric aurait eu peur d'écrire une ligne à côté.

Elle alla chercher dans son boudoir le coffret à fermoirs d'argent qu'il avait remarqué sur la cheminée. C'était un cadeau de son mari, un ouvrage de la Renaissance. Les amis d'Arnoux le complimentèrent, sa femme le remerciait ; il fut pris d'attendrissement, et lui donna devant le monde un baiser.

Ensuite, tous causèrent çà et là, par groupes ; le bonhomme Meinsius était avec Mme Arnoux, sur une bergère, près du feu ; elle se penchait vers son oreille, leurs têtes se touchaient ; — et Frédéric aurait accepté d'être sourd, infirme et laid pour un nom illustre et des cheveux blancs, enfin pour avoir quelque chose qui l'intronisât dans une intimité pareille. Il se rongait le cœur, furieux contre sa jeunesse.

Mais elle vint dans l'angle du salon où il se tenait, lui demanda s'il connaissait quelques-uns des convives, s'il aimait la peinture, depuis combien de temps il étudiait à Paris. Chaque mot qui sortait de sa bouche semblait à Frédéric être une chose nouvelle, une dépendance exclusive de sa personne. Il regardait attentivement les effilés de sa coiffure, caressant par le bout son épaule nue ; et il n'en détachait pas ses yeux, il enfonçait son âme dans la blancheur de cette chair féminine ; cependant, il n'osait lever ses paupières, pour la voir plus haut, face à face.

Rosenwald les interrompit, en priant Mme Arnoux de chanter quelque chose. Il préluda, elle attendait ; ses lèvres s'entrouvrirent, et un son pur, long, filé, monta dans l'air.

Frédéric ne comprit rien aux paroles italiennes.

Cela commençait sur un rythme grave, tel qu'un chant d'église, puis, s'animant crescendo, multipliait les éclats sonores, s'apaisait tout à coup ; et la mélodie revenait amoureusement, avec une oscillation large et paresseuse.

Elle se tenait debout, près du clavier, les bras tombants, le regard perdu. Quelquefois, pour lire la musique, elle clignait ses paupières en avançant le front, un instant. Sa voix de contralto prenait dans les cordes basses une intonation lugubre qui glaçait, et alors sa belle tête, aux grands sourcils, s'inclinait sur son épaule ; sa poitrine se gonflait, ses bras s'écartaient, son cou d'où s'échappaient des roulades se renversait mollement comme sous des baisers aériens ; elle lança trois notes aiguës, redescendit, en jeta une plus haute encore, et, après un silence, termina par un point d'orgue.

Rosenwald n'abandonna pas le piano. Il continua de jouer, pour lui-même. De temps à autre, un des convives disparaissait. A onze heures, comme les derniers s'en allaient, Arnoux sortit avec Pellerin, sous prétexte de le reconduire. Il était de ces gens qui se disent malades quand ils n'ont pas fait leur tour après dîner.

Mme Arnoux s'était avancée dans l'antichambre ; Dittmer et Hussonnet la saluaient, elle leur tendit la main ; elle la tendit également à Frédéric ; et il éprouva comme une pénétration à tous les atomes de sa peau.

Il quitta ses amis ; il avait besoin d'être seul. Son cœur débordait. Pourquoi cette main offerte ? Était-ce un geste irréfléchi, ou un encouragement ? "Allons donc ! je suis fou !" Qu'importait d'ailleurs, puisqu'il pouvait maintenant la fréquenter tout à son aise, vivre dans son atmosphère.

Les rues étaient désertes. Quelquefois une charrette lourde passait, en ébranlant les pavés. Les maisons se succédaient avec leurs façades grises, leurs fenêtres closes ; et il songeait dédaigneusement à tous ces êtres humains couchés derrière ces murs, qui existaient sans la voir, et dont pas un même ne se doutait qu'elle vécût ! Il n'avait plus conscience du milieu, de l'espace, de rien ; et, battant le soi du talon, en frappant avec sa canne les volets des boutiques, il allait toujours devant lui, au hasard, éperdu, entraîné. Un air humide l'enveloppa ; il se reconnut au bord des quais.

Les réverbères brillaient en deux lignes droites, indéfiniment, et de longues flammes rouges vacillaient dans la profondeur de l'eau. Elle était de couleur ardoise, tandis que le ciel, plus clair, semblait soutenu par les grandes, masses d'ombre qui se levaient de chaque côté du fleuve.

Des édifices, que l'on n'apercevait pas, faisaient des redoublements d'obscurité. Un brouillard lumineux flottait au-delà, sur les toits ; tous les bruits se fondaient en un seul bourdonnement ; un vent léger soufflait.

Il s'était arrêté au milieu du Pont-Neuf, et, tête nue, poitrine ouverte, il aspirait l'air. Cependant, il sentait monter du fond de lui-même quelque chose d'intarissable, un afflux de tendresse qui l'énervait, comme le mouvement des ondes sous ses yeux. A l'horloge d'une église, une heure sonna, lentement, pareille à une voix qui l'eût appelé.

Alors, il fut saisi par un de ces frissons de l'âme où il vous semble qu'on est transporté dans un monde supérieur. Une faculté extraordinaire, dont il ne savait pas l'objet, lui était venue. Il se demanda, sérieusement, s'il serait un grand peintre ou un grand poète ; — et il se décida pour la peinture, car les exigences de ce métier le rapprocheraient de Mme Arnoux. Il avait donc trouvé sa vocation ! Le but de son existence était clair maintenant, et l'avenir infaillible.

Quand il eut refermé sa porte, il entendit quelqu'un qui ronflait, dans le cabinet noir, près de la chambre. C'était l'autre. Il n'y pensait plus.

Son visage s'offrait à lui dans la glace. Il se trouva beau et resta une minute à se regarder.

CHAPITRE 5

Le lendemain, avant midi, il s'était acheté une boîte de couleurs, des pinceaux, un chevalet. Pellerin consentit à lui donner des leçons, et Frédéric l'emmena dans son logement pour voir si rien ne manquait parmi ses ustensiles de peinture.

Deslauriers était rentré. Un jeune homme occupait le second fauteuil. Le clerc dit en le montrant :

— “C’est lui ! le voilà ! Sénécâl !”

Ce garçon déplut à Frédéric. Son front était rehaussé par la coupe de ses cheveux taillés en brosse. Quelque chose de dur et de froid perçait dans ses yeux gris ; et sa longue redingote noire, tout son costume sentait le pédagogue et l’ecclésiastique.

D’abord, on causa des choses du jour, entre autres du Stabat de Rossini ; Sénécâl, interrogé, déclara qu’il n’allait jamais au théâtre. Pellerin ouvrit la boîte de couleurs.

— “Est-ce pour toi, tout cela ?” dit le clerc.

— “Mais sans doute !”

— “Tiens ! quelle idée !”

Et il se pencha sur la table, où le répétiteur de mathématiques feuilletait un volume de Louis Blanc. Il l’avait apporté lui-même, et lisait à voix basse des passages, tandis que Pellerin et Frédéric examinaient ensemble la palette, le couteau, les vessies, puis ils vinrent à s’entretenir du dîner chez Arnoux.

— “Le marchand de tableaux ?” demanda Sénécâl. “Joli monsieur, vraiment !”

— “Pourquoi donc ?” dit Pellerin.

Sénécâl répliqua :

— “Un homme qui bat monnaie avec des turpitudes politiques”

Et il se mit à parier d’une lithographie célèbre, représentant toute la famille royale livrée à des occupations édifiantes : Louis-Philippe tenait un code, la reine un paroissien, les princesses brodaient, le duc de Nemours ceignait un sabre ; M. de Joinville montrait une carte géographique à ses jeunes frères ; on apercevait, dans le fond, un lit à deux compartiments. Cette image, intitulée Une bonne famille, avait fait les délices des bourgeois, mais l'affliction des patriotes. Pellerin, d'un ton vexé comme s'il en était l'auteur, répondit que toutes les opinions se valaient ; Sénécals protesta. L'Art devait exclusivement viser à la moralisation des masses ! Il ne fallait reproduire que des sujets poussant aux actions vertueuses ; les autres étaient nuisibles.

— “Mais ça dépend de l'exécution ?” cria Pellerin. “Je peux faire des chefs-d'œuvre !”

— “Tant pis pour vous, alors ! on n'a pas le droit...”

— “Comment ?”

— “Non ! monsieur, vous n'avez pas le droit de m'intéresser à des choses que je réprouve ! Qu'avons-nous besoin de laborieuses bagatelles, dont il est impossible de tirer aucun profit, de ces Vénus, par exemple, avec tous vos paysages ? Je ne vois pas là d'enseignement pour le peuple ! Montrez-nous ses misères, plutôt ! enthousiasmez-nous pour ses sacrifices ! Eh ! bon Dieu, les sujets ne manquent pas : la ferme, l'atelier...”

Pellerin en balbutiait d'indignation, et, croyant avoir trouvé un argument :

— “Molière, l'acceptez-vous ?”

— “Soit !” dit Sénécals. “Je l'admire comme précurseur de la Révolution française.”

— “Ah ! la Révolution ! Quel art ! Jamais il n'y a eu d'époque plus pitoyable !”

— “Pas de plus grande, monsieur.”

Pellerin se croisa les bras, et, le regardant en face :

— “Vous m'avez l'air d'un fameux garde national !”

Son antagoniste, habitué aux discussions, répondit :

— “Je n'en suis pas ! et je la déteste autant que vous Mais, avec des principes pareils, on corrompt les foules Ça fait le compte du Gouvernement, du reste ! il ne serait pas si fort sans la complicité d'un tas de farceurs comme celui-là.”

Le peintre prit la défense du marchand, car les opinions de Sénécals l'exaspéraient. Il osa même soutenir que Jacques Arnoux était un véritable cœur d'or, dévoué à ses amis, chérissant sa femme.

— “Oh ! oh ! si on lui offrait une bonne somme, il ne la refuserait pas pour servir de modèle.”

Frédéric devint blême.

— “Il vous a donc fait bien du tort, monsieur ?”

— “A moi ? non ! Je l’ai vu, une fois, au café, avec un ami. Voilà tout.”

Sénécal disait vrai. Mais il se trouvait agacé, quotidiennement, par les réclames de l’Art industriel. Arnoux était, pour lui, le représentant d’un monde qu’il jugeait funeste à la démocratie. Républicain austère, il suspectait de corruption toutes les élégances, n’ayant d’ailleurs aucun besoin, et étant d’une probité inflexible.

La conversation eut peine à reprendre. Le peintre se rappela bientôt son rendez-vous, le répétiteur ses élèves ; et, quand ils furent sortis, après un long silence, Deslauriers fit différentes questions sur Arnoux.

— “Tu m’y présenteras plus tard, n’est-ce pas, mon vieux ?”

— “Certainement”, dit Frédéric.

Puis ils avisèrent à leur installation. Deslauriers avait obtenu, sans peine, une place de second clerc chez un avoué, pris à l’Ecole de droit son inscription, acheté les livres indispensables, — et la vie qu’ils avaient tant rêvée commença.

Elle fut charmante, grâce à la beauté de leur jeunesse. Deslauriers n’ayant parlé d’aucune convention pécuniaire, Frédéric n’en paria pas. Il subvenait à toutes les dépenses, rangeait l’armoire, s’occupait du ménage ; mais, s’il fallait donner une mercuriale au concierge, le Clerc s’en chargeait, continuant, comme au collège, son rôle de protecteur et d’aîné.

Séparés tout le long du jour, ils se retrouvaient le soir. Chacun prenait sa place au coin du feu et se mettait à la besogne. Ils ne tardaient pas à l’interrompre. C’étaient des épanchements sans fin, des gaietés sans cause, et des disputes quelquefois, à propos de la lampe qui filait ou d’un livre égaré, colères d’une minute, que des rires apaisaient.

La porte du cabinet au bois restant ouverte, ils bavardaient de loin, dans leur lit.

Le matin, ils se promenaient en manches de chemise sur leur terrasse ; le soleil se levait, des brumes légères passaient sur le fleuve, on entendait un glapisement dans le marché aux fleurs à côté ; — et les fumées de leurs pipes tourbillonnaient dans l’air pur, qui rafraîchissait leurs yeux encore bouffis ; ils sentaient, en l’aspirant, un vaste espoir épandu.

Quand il ne pleuvait pas, le dimanche, ils sortaient ensemble ; et, bras dessus bras dessous, ils s'en allaient par les rues. Presque toujours la même réflexion leur survenait à la fois, ou bien ils causaient, sans rien voir autour d'eux. Deslauriers ambitionnait la richesse, comme moyen de puissance sur les hommes. Il aurait voulu remuer beaucoup de monde, faire beaucoup de bruit, avoir trois secrétaires sous ses ordres, et un grand dîner politique une fois par semaine. Frédéric se meublait un palais à la moresque, pour vivre couché sur des divans de cachemire, au murmure d'un jet d'eau, servi par des pages nègres ; — et ces choses rêvées devenaient à la fin tellement précises, qu'elles le désolaient comme s'il les avait perdues.

— “A quoi bon causer de tout cela”, disait-il, “puisque jamais nous ne l'aurons !”

— “Qui sait ?” reprenait Deslauriers.

Malgré ses opinions démocratiques, il l'engageait à s'introduire chez les Dambreuse. L'autre objectait ses tentatives.

— “Bah ! retournes-y ! On t'invitera !”

Ils reçurent, vers le milieu du mois de mars, parmi des notes assez lourdes, celles du restaurateur qui leur apportait à dîner. Frédéric, n'ayant point la somme suffisante, emprunta cent écus à Deslauriers ; quinze jours plus tard, il réitéra la même demande, et le Clerc le gronda pour les dépenses auxquelles il se livrait chez Arnoux.

Effectivement, il n'y mettait point de modération. Une vue de Venise, une vue de Naples et une autre de Constantinople occupant le milieu des trois murailles, des sujets équestres d'Alfred de Dreux çà et là, un groupe de Pradier sur la cheminée, des numéros de l'Art industriel sur le piano, et des cartonnages par terre dans les angles, encombraient le logis d'une telle façon, qu'on avait peine à poser un livre, à remuer les coudes. Frédéric prétendait qu'il lui fallait tout cela pour sa peinture.

Il travaillait chez Pellerin. Mais souvent Pellerin était en courses, — ayant coutume d'assister à tous les enterrements et événements dont les journaux devaient rendre compte ; — et Frédéric passait des heures entièrement seul dans l'atelier. Le calme de cette grande pièce, où l'on n'entendait que le trottement des souris, la lumière qui tombait du plafond, et jusqu'au ronflement du poêle, tout le plongeait d'abord dans une sorte de bien-être intellectuel. Puis ses yeux, abandonnant son ouvrage, se portaient sur les écaillures de la muraille, parmi les bibelots de l'étagère, le long des torsos où la poussière amassée faisait comme des lambeaux de velours ; et, tel qu'un voyageur perdu au milieu d'un bois et que tous les chemins ramènent à la même place, continuellement, il retrouvait au fond de chaque idée le souvenir de Mme Arnoux.

Il se fixait des jours pour aller chez elle ; arrivé au second étage, devant sa porte, il hésitait à sonner. Des pas se rapprochaient ; on ouvrait, et, à ces mots : "Madame est sortie", c'était une délivrance, et comme un fardeau de moins sur son cœur.

Il la rencontra, pourtant. La première fois, il y avait trois dames avec elle ; une autre après-midi, le maître d'écriture de Mlle Marthe survint. D'ailleurs, les hommes que recevait Mme Arnoux ne lui faisaient point de visites. Il n'y retourna plus, par discrétion.

Mais il ne manquait pas, pour qu'on l'invitât aux dîners du jeudi, de se présenter à l'Art industriel, chaque mercredi, régulièrement ; et il y restait après tous les autres, plus longtemps que Regimbart, jusqu'à la dernière minute, en feignant de regarder une gravure, de parcourir un journal. Enfin Arnoux lui disait : — "Êtes-vous libre, demain soir ?" Il acceptait avant que la phrase fût achevée. Arnoux semblait le prendre en affection. Il lui montra l'art de reconnaître les vins, à brûler le punch, à faire des salmis de bécasses ; Frédéric suivait docilement ses conseils, — aimant tout ce qui dépendait de Mme Arnoux, ses meubles, ses domestiques, sa maison, sa rue.

Il ne parlait guère pendant ces dîners ; il la contemplait. Elle avait à droite, contre la tempe, un petit grain de beauté ; ses bandeaux étaient plus noirs que le reste de sa chevelure et toujours comme un peu humides sur les bords ; elle les flattait de temps à autre, avec deux doigts seulement. Il connaissait la forme de chacun de ses ongles, il se délectait à écouter le sifflement de sa robe de soie quand elle passait auprès des portes, il humait en cachette la senteur de son mouchoir ; son peigne, ses gants, ses bagues étaient pour lui des choses particulières, importantes comme des œuvres d'art, presque animées comme des personnes ; toutes lui prenaient le cœur et augmentaient sa passion.

Il n'avait pas eu la force de la cacher à Deslauriers. Quand il revenait de chez Mme Arnoux, il le réveillait comme par mégarde, afin de pouvoir causer d'elle.

Deslauriers, qui couchait dans le cabinet au bois, près de la fontaine, poussait un long bâillement. Frédéric s'asseyait au pied de son lit. D'abord il parlait du dîner, puis il racontait mille détails insignifiants, où il voyait des marques de mépris ou d'affection. Une fois, par exemple, elle avait refusé son bras, pour prendre celui de Dittmer, et Frédéric se désolait.

— “Ah ! quelle bêtise !”

Ou bien elle l'avait appelé son “ami” .

— “Vas-y gaiement, alors !”

— “Mais je n'ose pas”, disait Frédéric.

— “Eh bien, n'y pense plus Bonsoir.”

Deslauriers se retournait vers la ruelle et s'endormait. Il ne comprenait rien à cet amour, qu'il regardait comme une dernière faiblesse d'adolescence ; et, son intimité ne lui suffisant plus, sans doute, il imagina de réunir leurs amis communs une fois la semaine.

Ils arrivaient le samedi, vers neuf heures. Les trois rideaux d'algérienne étaient soigneusement tirés ; la lampe et quatre bougies brûlaient ; au milieu de la table, le pot à tabac, tout plein de pipes, s'étalait entre les bouteilles de bière, la théière, un flacon de rhum et des petits fours. On discutait sur l'immortalité de l'âme, on faisait des parallèles entre les professeurs.

Hussonnet, un soir, introduisit un grand jeune homme habillé d'une redingote trop courte des poignets, et la contenance embarrassée. C'était le garçon qu'ils avaient réclamé au poste, l'année dernière.

N'ayant pu rendre à son maître le carton de dentelle perdu dans la bagarre, celui-ci l'avait accusé de vol, menacé des tribunaux ; maintenant, il était commis dans une maison de roulage. Hussonnet, le matin, l'avait rencontré au coin d'une rue ; et il l'amenait, car Dussardier, par reconnaissance, voulait voir “l'autre” .

Il tendit à Frédéric le porte-cigares encore plein, et qu'il avait gardé religieusement avec l'espoir de le rendre. Les jeunes gens l'invitèrent à revenir. Il n'y manqua pas.

Tous sympathisaient. D'abord, leur haine du Gouvernement avait la hauteur d'un dogme indiscutable. Martinon seul tâchait de défendre Louis-Philippe. On l'accablait sous les lieux communs traînant dans les journaux : l'embastillement de Paris, les lois de septembre, Pritchard, lord Guizot, — si bien que Martinon se taisait, craignant d'offenser quelqu'un. En sept ans de collège, il n'avait pas mérité de pensum, et, à l'Ecole de droit, il savait plaire aux professeurs. Il portait ordinairement une grosse redingote couleur mastic avec des claques en caoutchouc ; mais il apparut un soir dans une toilette de marié : gilet de velours à châle, cravate blanche, chaîne d'or.

L'étonnement redoubla quand on sut qu'il sortait de chez M. Dambreuse. En effet, le banquier Dambreuse venait d'acheter au père Martinon une partie de bois considérable ; le bonhomme lui ayant présenté son fils, il les avait invités à dîner tous les deux.

— "Y avait-il beaucoup de truffes", demanda Deslauriers, "et as-tu pris la taille à son épouse, entre deux portes, sicut decet ?"

Alors, la conversation s'engagea sur les femmes. Pellerin n'admettait pas qu'il y eût de belles femmes (il préférait les tigres) ; d'ailleurs, la femelle de l'homme était une créature inférieure dans la hiérarchie esthétique :

— "Ce qui vous séduit est particulièrement ce qui la dégrade comme idée ; je veux dire les seins, les cheveux..."

— "Cependant", objecta Frédéric, "de longs cheveux noirs, avec de grands yeux noirs..."

— "Oh ! connu !" s'écria Hussonnet. " Assez d'Andalouses sur la pelouse ! des choses antiques ? serviteur ! Car enfin, voyons, pas de blagues ! une lorette est plus amusante que la Vénus de Milo ! Soyons Gaulois, nom d'un petit bonhomme ! et Régence si nous pouvons !

Coulez, bons vins ; femmes, daignez sourire !

Il faut passer de la brune à la blonde ! — Est-ce votre avis, père Dussardier ? "

Dussardier ne répondit pas. Tous le pressèrent pour connaître ses goûts.

— "Eh bien", fit-il en rougissant, "moi, je voudrais aimer la même, toujours !"

Cela fut dit d'une telle façon, qu'il y eut un moment de silence, les uns étant surpris de cette candeur, et les autres y découvrant, peut-être, la secrète convoitise de leur âme.

Sénecal posa sur le chambranle sa chope de bière, et déclara dogmatiquement que, la prostitution étant une tyrannie et le mariage une immoralité, il valait mieux s'abstenir. Deslauriers prenait les femmes comme une distraction, rien de plus. M. de Cisy avait à leur endroit toute espèce de crainte.

Elevé sous les yeux d'une grand-mère dévote, il trouvait la compagnie de ces jeunes gens alléchante comme un mauvais lieu et instructive comme une Sorbonne. On ne lui ménageait pas les leçons ; et il se montrait plein de zèle, jusqu'à vouloir fumer, en dépit des maux de cœur qui le tourmentaient chaque fois, régulièrement. Frédéric l'entourait de soins. Il admirait la nuance de ses cravates, la fourrure de son paletot et surtout ses bottes, minces comme des gants et qui semblaient insolentes de netteté et de délicatesse ; sa voiture l'attendait en bas dans la rue.

Un soir qu'il venait de partir, et que la neige tombait, Sénécal se mit à plaindre son cocher. Puis il déclama contre les gants jaunes, le Jockey-Club. Il faisait plus de cas d'un ouvrier que de ces messieurs.

— "Moi, je travaille, au moins ! je suis pauvre !"

— "Cela se voit", dit à la fin Frédéric, impatienté.

Le répétiteur lui garda rancune pour cette parole.

Mais, Regimbart ayant dit qu'il connaissait un peu Sénécal, Frédéric, voulant faire une politesse à l'ami d'Arnoux, le pria de venir aux réunions du samedi, et la rencontre fut agréable aux deux patriotes.

Ils différaient cependant.

Sénécal — qui avait un crâne en pointe — ne considérait que les systèmes. Regimbart, au contraire, ne voyait dans les faits que les faits. Ce qui l'inquiétait principalement, c'était la frontière du Rhin. Il prétendait se connaître en artillerie, et se faisait habiller par le tailleur de l'Ecole polytechnique.

Le premier jour, quand on lui offrit des gâteaux, il leva les épaules dédaigneusement, en disant que cela convenait aux femmes ; et il ne parut guère plus gracieux les fois suivantes. Du moment que les idées atteignaient une certaine hauteur, il murmurait : "Oh ! pas d'utopies, pas de rêves !" En fait d'art (bien qu'il fréquentât les ateliers, où quelquefois il donnait, par complaisance, une leçon d'escrime), ses opinions n'étaient point transcendantes. Il comparait le style de M. Marrast à celui de Voltaire et Mlle Vatnaz à Mme de Staël, à cause d'une ode sur la Pologne, "où il y avait du cœur". Enfin, Regimbart assommait tout le monde et particulièrement Deslauriers, car le Citoyen était un familier d'Arnoux. Or, le clerc ambitionnait de fréquenter cette maison, espérant y faire des connaissances profitables. "Quand donc m'y mèneras-tu ?" disait-il. Arnoux se trouvait surchargé de besogne, ou bien il partait en voyage ; puis, ce n'était pas la peine, les dîners allaient finir.

S'il avait fallu risquer sa vie pour son ami, Frédéric l'eût fait. Mais comme il tenait à se montrer le plus avantageusement possible, comme il surveillait son langage, ses manières et son costume jusqu'à venir au bureau de l'Art industriel toujours irréprochablement ganté, il avait peur que Deslauriers, avec son vieil habit noir, sa tournure de procureur et ses discours outrecuidants, ne déplût à Mme Arnoux, ce qui pouvait le compromettre, le rabaisser lui-même auprès d'elle. Il admettait bien les autres, mais celui-là, précisément, l'aurait gêné mille fois plus. Le Clerc s'apercevait qu'il ne voulait pas tenir sa promesse, et le silence de Frédéric lui semblait une aggravation d'injure.

Il aurait voulu le conduire absolument, le voir se développer d'après l'idéal de leur jeunesse ; et sa fainéantise le révoltait, comme une désobéissance et comme une trahison. D'ailleurs Frédéric, plein de l'idée de Mme Arnoux, parlait de son mari souvent ; et Deslauriers commença une intolérable scie, consistant à répéter son nom cent fois par jour, à la fin de chaque phrase, comme un tic d'idiot. Quand on frappait à sa porte, il répondait : "Entrez, Arnoux !" Au restaurant, il demandait un fromage de Brie "à l'instar d'Arnoux" ; et, la nuit, feignant d'avoir un cauchemar, il réveillait son compagnon en hurlant : "Arnoux ! Arnoux !" Enfin, un jour, Frédéric, excédé, lui dit d'une voix lamentable :

— "Mais laisse-moi tranquille avec Arnoux !"

— "Jamais !" répondit le clerc.

Toujours lui ! lui partout ! ou brûlante ou glacée !

L'image de l'Arnoux...

«

Tais-toi donc !" s'écria Frédéric en levant le poing.

Il reprit doucement :

— "C'est un sujet qui m'est pénible, tu sais bien."

— "Oh ! pardon, mon bonhomme", répliqua Deslauriers en s'inclinant très bas, "on respectera désormais les nerfs de Mademoiselle ! Pardon encore une fois. Mille excuses !"

Ainsi fut terminée la plaisanterie.

Mais, trois semaines après, un soir, il lui dit :

— “Eh bien, je l’ai vue tantôt, Mme Arnoux !”

— “Où donc ?”

— “Au Palais, avec Balandard, avoué ; une femme brune, n’est-ce pas, de taille moyenne ?”

Frédéric fit un signe d’assentiment. Il attendait que Deslauriers parlât. Au moindre mot d’admiration, il se serait épanché largement, était tout prêt à le chérir ; l’autre se taisait toujours ; enfin, n’y tenant plus, il lui demanda d’un air indifférent ce qu’il pensait d’elle.

Deslauriers la trouvait “pas mal, sans avoir pourtant rien d’extraordinaire.”

— “Ah ! tu trouves”, dit Frédéric.

Arriva le mois d’août, époque de son deuxième examen. D’après l’opinion courante, quinze jours devaient suffire pour en préparer les matières. Frédéric, ne doutant pas de ses forces, avala d’emblée les quatre premiers livres du Code de procédure, les trois premiers du Code pénal, plusieurs morceaux d’instruction criminelle et une partie du Code civil, avec les annotations de M. Poncelet. La veille, Deslauriers lui fit faire une récapitulation qui se prolongea jusqu’au matin ; et, pour mettre à profit le dernier quart d’heure, il continua à l’interroger sur le trottoir, tout en marchant.

Comme plusieurs examens se passaient simultanément, il y avait beaucoup de monde dans la cour, entre autres Hussonnet et Cisy ; on ne manquait pas de venir à ces épreuves quand il s’agissait des camarades. Frédéric endossa la robe noire traditionnelle ; puis il entra suivi de la foule, avec trois autres étudiants, dans une grande pièce, éclairée par des fenêtres sans rideaux et garnie de banquettes, le long des murs. Au milieu, des chaises de cuir entouraient une table, décorée d’un tapis vert. Elle séparait les candidats de MM. les examinateurs en robe rouge, tous portant des chausses d’hermine sur l’épaule, avec des toques à galons d’or sur le chef.

Frédéric se trouvait l’avant-dernier dans la série, position mauvaise. A la première question sur la différence entre une convention et un contrat, il définit l’une pour l’autre ; et le professeur, un brave homme, lui dit : — “Ne vous troublez pas, monsieur, remettez-vous !” puis, ayant fait deux demandes faciles, suivies de réponses obscures, il passa enfin au quatrième. Frédéric fut démoralisé par ce piètre commencement. Deslauriers, en face, dans le public, lui faisait signe que tout n'était pas encore perdu ; et à la deuxième interrogation sur le droit criminel, il se montra passable. Mais, après la troisième, relative au testament mystique, l'examineur étant resté impassible tout le temps, son angoisse redoubla ; car Hussonnet joignait les mains comme pour applaudir, tandis que Deslauriers prodiguait les haussements d'épaules. Enfin, le moment arriva où il fallut répondre sur la Procédure ! Il s'agissait de la tierce opposition. Le professeur, choqué d'avoir entendu des théories contraires aux siennes, lui demanda d'un ton brutal :

— “Et vous, monsieur, est-ce votre avis ? Comment conciliez-vous le principe de l'article 1351 du Code civil avec cette voie d'attaque extraordinaire !”

Frédéric se sentait un grand mal de tête, pour avoir passé la nuit sans dormir. Un rayon de soleil, entrant par l'intervalle d'une jalousie, le frappait au visage. Debout derrière la chaise, il se dandinait et tirait sa moustache.

— “J' attends toujours votre réponse !” reprit l'homme à la toque d'or.

Et, comme le geste de Frédéric l'agaçait sans doute :

— “Ce n'est pas dans votre barbe que vous la trouverez !”

Ce sarcasme causa un rire dans l'auditoire ; le professeur, flatté, s'amadoua. Il lui fit deux questions encore sur l'ajournement et sur l'affaire sommaire, puis baissa la tête en signe d'approbation ; l'acte public était fini. Frédéric rentra dans le vestibule.

Pendant que l'huissier le dépouillait de sa robe, pour la repasser à un autre immédiatement, ses amis l'entourèrent, en achevant de l'ahurir avec leurs opinions contradictoires sur le résultat de l'examen. On le proclama bientôt d'une voix sonore, à l'entrée de la salle : “Le troisième était... ajourné !”

— “Emballé !” dit Hussonnet, “allons-nous-en !” Devant la loge du concierge, ils rencontrèrent Martinon, rouge, ému, avec un sourire dans les yeux et l'auréole du triomphe sur le front. Il venait de subir sans encombre son dernier examen. Restait seulement la thèse. Avant quinze jours, il serait licencié. Sa famille connaissait un ministre, “une belle carrière” s'ouvrait devant lui.

— “Celui-là t'enfonce tout de même”, dit Deslauriers.

Rien n'est humiliant comme de voir les sots réussir dans les entreprises où l'on échoue. Frédéric, vexé, répondit qu'il s'en moquait. Ses prétentions étaient plus hautes ; et, comme Hussonnet faisait mine de s'en aller, il le prit à l'écart pour lui dire :

— “ Pas un mot de tout cela, chez eux, bien entendu ! Le secret était facile, puisque Arnoux, le lendemain, partait en voyage pour l'Allemagne.

Le soir, en rentrant, le Clerc trouva son ami singulièrement changé : il pirouettait, sifflait ; et, l'autre s'étonnant de cette humeur, Frédéric déclara qu'il n'irait pas chez sa mère ; il emploierait ses vacances à travailler.

A la nouvelle du départ d'Arnoux, une joie l'avait saisi. Il pouvait se présenter là-bas, tout à son aise, sans crainte d'être interrompu dans ses visites. La conviction d'une sécurité absolue lui donnerait du courage. Enfin il ne serait pas éloigné, ne serait pas séparé d'elle ! Quelque chose de plus fort qu'une chaîne de fer l'attachait à Paris, une voix intérieure lui criait de rester.

Des obstacles s'y opposaient. Il les franchit en écrivant à sa mère ; il confessait d'abord son échec, occasionné par des changements faits dans le programme, — un hasard, une injustice ; — d'ailleurs, tous les grands avocats (il citait leurs noms) avaient été refusés à leurs examens. Mais il comptait se présenter de nouveau au mois de novembre. Or, n'ayant pas de temps à perdre, il n'irait point à la maison cette année ; et il demandait, outre l'argent d'un trimestre, deux cent cinquante francs, pour des répétitions de droit, fort utiles ; — le tout enguirlandé de regrets, condoléances, chatteries et protestations d'amour filial.

Mme Moreau, qui l'attendait le lendemain, fut chagrinée doublement. Elle cacha la mésaventure de son fils, et lui répondit “de venir tout de même”. Frédéric ne céda pas. Une brouille s'ensuivit. A la fin de la semaine, néanmoins, il reçut l'argent du trimestre avec la somme destinée aux répétitions, et qui servit à payer un pantalon gris perle, un chapeau de feutre blanc et une badine à pomme d'or.

Quand tout cela fut en sa possession :

— “C'est peut-être une idée de coiffeur que j'ai eue ?” songea-t-il. Et une grande hésitation le prit.

Pour savoir s'il irait chez Mme Arnoux, il jeta par trois fois, dans l'air, des pièces de monnaie. Toutes les fois, le présage fut heureux. Donc, la fatalité l'ordonnait. Il se fit conduire en fiacre rue de Choiseul.

Il monta vivement l'escalier, tira le cordon de la sonnette ; elle ne sonna pas ; il se sentait près de défaillir.

Puis il ébranla, d'un coup furieux, le lourd gland de soie rouge. Un carillon retentit, s'apaisa par degrés ; et l'on n'entendait plus rien. Frédéric eut peur.

Il colla son oreille contre la porte ; pas un souffle ! Il mit son oeil au trou de la serrure, et il n'apercevait dans l'antichambre que deux pointes de roseau, sur la muraille, parmi les fleurs du papier. Enfin, il tournait les talons quand il se ravisa. Cette fois, il donna un petit coup, léger. La porte s'ouvrit ; et, sur le seuil, les cheveux ébouriffés, la face cramoisie et l'air maussade, Arnoux lui-même parut.

— “Tiens ! Qui diable vous amène ? Entrez !”

Il l'introduisit, non dans le boudoir ou dans sa chambre, mais dans la salle à manger, où l'on voyait sur la table une bouteille de vin de Champagne avec deux verres ; et, d'un ton brusque :

— “Vous avez quelque chose à me demander, cher ami ?”

— “Non ! rien ! rien !” balbutia le jeune homme, cherchant un prétexte à sa visite.

Enfin, il dit qu'il était venu savoir de ses nouvelles, car il le croyait en Allemagne, sur le rapport d'Hussonnet.

— “Nullement !” reprit Arnoux. “Quelle linotte que ce garçon-là, pour entendre tout de travers !”

Afin de dissimuler son trouble, Frédéric marchait de droite et de gauche, dans la salle. En heurtant le pied d'une chaise, il fit tomber une ombrelle posée dessus ; le manche d'ivoire se brisa.

— “Mon Dieu !” s'écria-t-il, “comme je suis chagrin d'avoir brisé l'ombrelle de Mme Arnoux.”

A ce mot, le marchand releva la tête, et eut un singulier sourire. Frédéric, prenant l'occasion qui s'offrait de parler d'elle, ajouta timidement :

— “Est-ce que je ne pourrai pas la voir ?”

Elle était dans son pays, près de sa mère malade.

Il n'osa faire de questions sur la durée de cette absence. Il demanda seulement quel était le pays de Mme Arnoux.

— “Chartres ! Cela vous étonne ?”

— “Moi ? non ! pourquoi ? Pas le moins du monde !”

Ils ne trouvèrent, ensuite, absolument rien à se dire. Arnoux, qui s’était fait une cigarette, tournait autour de la table, en soufflant. Frédéric, debout contre le poêle, contemplait les murs, l’étagère, le parquet ; et des images charmantes défilaient dans sa mémoire, devant ses yeux plutôt. Enfin il se retira.

Un morceau de journal, roulé en boule, traînait par terre, dans l’antichambre ; Arnoux le prit ; et, se haussant sur la pointe des pieds, il l’enfonça dans la sonnette, pour continuer, dit-il, sa sieste interrompue. Puis, en lui donnant une poignée de main :

— “Avertissez le concierge, s’il vous plaît, que je n’y suis pas !”

Et il referma la porte sur son dos, violemment.

Frédéric descendit l’escalier marche à marche. L’insuccès de cette première tentative le décourageait sur le hasard des autres. Alors commencèrent trois mois d’ennui. Comme il n’avait aucun travail, son désœuvrement renforçait sa tristesse.

Il passait des heures à regarder, du haut de son balcon, la rivière qui coulait entre les quais grisâtres, noircis, de place en place, par la bavure des égouts, avec un ponton de blanchisseuses amarré contre le bord, où des gamins quelquefois s’amusaient, dans la vase, à faire baigner un caniche. Ses yeux délaissant à gauche le pont de pierre de Notre-Dame et trois ponts suspendus, se dirigeaient toujours vers le quai aux Ormes, sur un massif de vieux arbres, pareils aux tilleuls du port de Montereau. La tour Saint-Jacques, l’hôtel de ville, Saint-Gervais, Saint-Louis, Saint-Paul se levaient en face, parmi les toits confondus, — et le génie de la colonne de Juillet resplendissait à l’orient comme une large étoile d’or, tandis qu’à l’autre extrémité le dôme des Tuileries arrondissait, sur le ciel, sa lourde masse bleue. C’était par derrière, de ce côté-là, que devait être la maison de Mme Arnoux.

Il rentrait dans sa chambre ; puis, couché sur son divan, s’abandonnait à une méditation désordonnée plans d’ouvrage, projets de conduite, élancements vers l’avenir. Enfin, pour se débarrasser de lui-même, il sortait.

Il remontait, au hasard, le quartier latin, si tumultueux d’habitude, mais désert à cette époque, car les étudiants étaient partis dans leurs familles. Les grands murs des collèges, comme allongés par le silence, avaient un aspect plus morne encore ; on entendait toutes sortes de bruits paisibles, des battements d'ailes dans des cages, le ronflement d'un tour, le marteau d'un savetier ; et les marchands d'habits, au milieu des rues, interrogeaient de l'oeil chaque fenêtre, inutilement. Au fond des cafés solitaires, la dame du comptoir bâillait entre ses carafons remplis ; les journaux demeuraient en ordre sur la table des cabinets de lecture ; dans l'atelier des repasseuses, des linges frissonnaient sous les bouffées du vent tiède. De temps à autre, il s'arrêtait à l'étalage d'un bouquiniste ; un omnibus, qui descendait en frôlant le trottoir, le faisait se retourner ; et, parvenu devant le Luxembourg, il n'allait pas plus loin.

Quelquefois, l'espoir d'une distraction l'attirait vers les boulevards. Après de sombres ruelles exhalant des fraîcheurs humides, il arrivait sur de grandes places désertes, éblouissantes de lumière, et où les monuments dessinaient au bord du pavé des dentelures d'ombre noire. Mais les charrettes, les boutiques recommençaient, et la foule l'étourdissait, — le dimanche surtout, — quand, depuis la Bastille jusqu'à la Madeleine, c'était un immense flot ondulant sur l'asphalte, au milieu de la poussière, dans une rumeur continue ; il se sentait tout écoeuré par la bassesse des figures, la niaiserie des propos, la satisfaction imbécile transpirant sur les fronts en sueur ! Cependant, la conscience de mieux valoir que ces hommes atténuait la fatigue de les regarder.

Il allait tous les jours à l'Art industriel ; — et pour savoir quand reviendrait Mme Arnoux, il s'informait de sa mère très longuement. La réponse d'Arnoux ne variait pas ; “le mieux se continuait”, sa femme, avec la petite, serait de retour la semaine prochaine. Plus elle tardait à revenir, plus Frédéric témoignait d'inquiétude, — si bien qu'Arnoux, attendri par tant d'affection, l'emmena cinq ou six fois dîner au restaurant.

Frédéric, dans ces longs tête-à-tête, reconnut que le marchand de peinture n'était pas fort spirituel. Arnoux pouvait s'apercevoir de ce refroidissement ; et puis c'était l'occasion de lui rendre, un peu, ses politesses.

Voulant donc faire les choses très bien, il vendit à un brocanteur tous ses habits neufs, moyennant la somme de quatre-vingts francs ; et, l'ayant grossie de cent autres qui lui restaient, il vint chez Arnoux le prendre pour dîner. Regimbart s'y trouvait. Ils s'en allèrent aux Trois Frères Provençaux.

Le Citoyen commença par retirer sa redingote, et, sur de la déférence des deux autres, écrivit la carte. Mais il eut beau se transporter dans la cuisine pour parler lui-même au chef, descendre à la cave dont il connaissait tous les coins, et faire monter le maître de l'établissement, auquel il “donna un savon”, il ne fut content ni des mets, ni des vins, ni du service ! A chaque plat nouveau, à chaque bouteille différente, dès la première bouchée, la première gorgée, il laissait tomber sa fourchette, ou repoussait au loin son verre ; puis s'accoudant sur la nappe de toute la longueur de son bras, il s'écriait qu'on ne pouvait plus dîner à Paris ! Enfin, ne sachant qu'imaginer pour sa bouche, Regimbart se commanda des haricots à l'huile, “tout bonnement”, lesquels, bien qu'à moitié réussis, l'apaisèrent un peu. Puis il eut, avec le garçon, un dialogue, roulant sur les anciens garçons des Provençaux : “Qu'était devenu Antoine ? Et un nommé Eugène ? Et Théodore, le petit, qui servait toujours en bas ? Il y avait dans ce temps-là une chère autrement distinguée, et des têtes de Bourgogne comme on n'en reverra plus”

Ensuite, il fut question de la valeur des terrains dans la banlieue, une spéculation d'Arnoux, infaillible. En attendant, il perdait ses intérêts. Puisqu'il ne voulait vendre à aucun prix, Regimbart lui découvrirait quelqu'un ; et ces deux messieurs firent, avec un crayon, des calculs jusqu'à la fin du dessert.

On s'en alla prendre le café, passage du Saumon, dans un estaminet, à l'entresol. Frédéric assista, sur ses jambes, à d'interminables parties de billard, abreuvées d'innombrables chopes ; — et il resta là, jusqu'à minuit, sans savoir pourquoi, par lâcheté, par bêtise, dans l'espérance confuse d'un événement quelconque favorable à son amour.

Quand donc la reverrait-il ? Frédéric se désespérait. Mais, un soir, vers la fin de novembre, Arnoux lui dit :

— “Ma femme est revenue hier, vous savez !”

Le lendemain, à cinq heures, il entra chez elle. Il débuta par des félicitations, à propos de sa mère, dont la maladie avait été si grave.

— “Mais non ! Qui vous l’a dit ?”

— “Arnoux !”

Elle fit un “ah” léger, puis ajouta qu’elle avait eu d’abord, des craintes sérieuses, maintenant disparues.

Elle se tenait près du feu, dans la bergère de tapisserie. Il était sur le canapé, avec son chapeau entre ses genoux ; et l’entretien fut pénible, elle l’abandonnait à chaque minute il ne trouvait pas de joint pour y introduire ses sentiments. Mais, comme il se plaignait d’étudier la chicane, elle répliqua : — “Oui.... je conçois.... les affaires... !” en baissant la figure, absorbée tout à coup par des réflexions.

Il avait soif de les connaître, et même ne songeait pas à autre chose. Le crépuscule amassait de l’ombre autour d’eux.

Elle se leva, ayant une course à faire, puis reparut avec une capote de velours, et une mante noire, bordée de petit-gris. Il osa offrir de l’accompagner.

On n’y voyait plus ; le temps était froid, et un lourd brouillard, estompant la façade des maisons, puait dans l’air. Frédéric le humait avec délices ; car il sentait à travers la ouate du vêtement la forme de son bras ; et sa main, prise dans un gant chamois à deux boutons, sa petite main qu’il aurait voulu couvrir de baisers, s’appuyait sur sa manche. A cause du pavé glissant, ils oscillaient un peu ; il lui semblait qu’ils étaient tous les deux comme bercés par le vent, au milieu d’un nuage.

L’éclat des lumières, sur le boulevard, le remit dans la réalité. L’occasion était bonne, le temps pressait. Il se donna jusqu’à la rue de Richelieu pour déclarer son amour. Mais, presque aussitôt, devant un magasin de porcelaines, elle s’arrêta net, en lui disant :

— “Nous y sommes, je vous remercie ! A jeudi, n’est-ce pas, comme d’habitude ?”

Les dîners recommencèrent ; et plus il fréquentait Mme Arnoux, plus ses langueurs augmentaient.

La contemplation de cette femme l’énervait, comme l’usage d’un parfum trop fort. Cela descendit dans les profondeurs de son tempérament, et devenait presque une manière générale de sentir, un mode nouveau d’exister.

Les prostituées qu’il rencontrait aux feux du gaz, les cantatrices poussant leurs roulades, les écuyères sur leurs chevaux au galop, les bourgeoises à pied, les grisettes à leur fenêtre, toutes les femmes lui rappelaient celle-là, par des similitudes ou par des contrastes violents. Il regardait, le long des boutiques, les cachemires, les dentelles et les pendeloques de pierreries, en les imaginant drapés autour de ses reins, cousues à son corsage, faisant des feux dans sa chevelure noire. A l'éventaire des marchandes, les fleurs s'épanouissaient pour qu'elle les choisît en passant ; dans la montre des cordonniers, les petites pantoufles de satin à bordure de cygne semblaient attendre son pied ; toutes les rues conduisaient vers sa maison : les voitures ne stationnaient sur les places que pour y mener plus vite ; Paris se rapportait à sa personne, et la grande ville avec toutes ses voix, bruissait, comme un immense orchestre, autour d'elle.

Quand il allait au Jardin des Plantes, la vue d'un palmier l'entraînait vers des pays lointains. Ils voyageaient ensemble, au dos des dromadaires, sous le tendelet des éléphants, dans la cabine d'un yacht parmi des archipels bleus, ou côte à côte sur deux mulets à clochettes, qui trébuchent dans les herbes contre des colonnes brisées.

Quelquefois, il s'arrêtait au Louvre devant de vieux tableaux ; et son amour l'embrassant jusque dans les siècles disparus, il la substituait aux personnages des peintures. Coiffée d'un hennin, elle priait à deux genoux derrière un vitrage de plomb. Seigneuresse des Castilles ou des Flandres, elle se tenait assise, avec une fraise empesée et un corps de baleines à gros bouillons. Puis elle descendait quelque grand escalier de porphyre, au milieu des sénateurs, sous un dais de plumes d'autruche, dans une robe de brocart. D'autres fois, il la rêvait en pantalon de soie jaune, sur les coussins d'un harem ; — et tout ce qui était beau, le scintillement des étoiles, certains airs de musique, l'allure d'une phrase, un contour, l'amenaient à sa pensée d'une façon brusque et insensible.

Quant à essayer d'en faire sa maîtresse, il était sûr que toute tentative serait vaine.

Un soir, Dittmer, qui arrivait, la baisa sur le front ; Lovarias fit de même, en disant :

— “Vous permettez, n'est-ce pas, selon le privilège des amis ?”

Frédéric balbutia :

— “Il me semble que nous sommes tous des amis ?”

— “Pas tous des vieux !” reprit-elle.

C'était le repousser d'avance, indirectement.

Que faire, d'ailleurs ? Lui dire qu'il l'aimait ? Elle l'éconduirait sans doute : ou bien, S'indignant, le chasserait de sa maison ! Or, il préférerait toutes les douleurs à l'horrible chance de ne plus la voir.

Il enviait le talent des pianistes, les balafres des soldats. Il souhaitait une maladie dangereuse, espérant de cette façon l'intéresser.

Une chose l'étonnait, c'est qu'il n'était pas jaloux d'Arnoux ; et il ne pouvait se la figurer autrement que vêtue, — tant sa pudeur semblait naturelle, et reculait son sexe dans une ombre mystérieuse.

Cependant, il songeait au bonheur de vivre avec elle, de la tutoyer, de lui passer la main sur les bandeaux longuement, ou de se tenir par terre, à genoux, les deux bras autour de sa taille, à boire son âme dans ses yeux ! Il aurait fallu, pour cela, subvertir la destinée ; et, incapable d'action, maudissant Dieu et s'accusant d'être lâche, il tournait dans son désir, comme un prisonnier dans son cachot. Une angoisse permanente l'étouffait. Il restait pendant des heures immobile, ou bien, il éclatait en larmes ; et, un jour qu'il n'avait pas eu la force de se contenir, Deslauriers lui dit :

— “Mais, saprelotte ! qu'est-ce que tu as ?”

Frédéric souffrait des nerfs. Deslauriers n'en crut rien. Devant une pareille douleur, il avait senti se réveiller sa tendresse, et il le réconforta. Un homme comme lui se laisser abattre, quelle sottise ! Passe encore dans la jeunesse, mais plus tard, c'est perdre son temps.

— “Tu me gâtes mon Frédéric ! Je redemande l'ancien. Garçon, toujours du même ! Il me plaisait ! Voyons, fume une pipe, animal ! Secoue-toi un peu, tu me désolés !”

— “C'est vrai”, dit Frédéric, “je suis fou !”

Le Clerc reprit :

— “Ah ! vieux troubadour, je sais bien ce qui t'afflige Le petit cœur ? Avoue-le ! Bah ! une de perdue, quatre de trouvées ! On se console des femmes vertueuses avec les autres. Veux-tu que je t'en fasse connaître, des femmes ? Tu n'as qu'à venir à l'Alhambra.” (C'était un bal public ouvert récemment au haut des Champs-Élysées, et qui se ruina dès la seconde saison, par un luxe prématuré dans ce genre d'établissements.) “On s'y amuse à ce qu'il paraît. Allons-y ! Tu prendras tes amis si tu veux ; je te passe même Regimbart !”

Frédéric n'invita pas le Citoyen. Deslauriers se priva de Sénécals. Ils emmenèrent seulement Hussonnet et Cisy avec Dussardier ; et le même fiacre les descendit tous les cinq à la porte de l'Alhambra.

Deux galeries moresques s'étendaient à droite et à gauche, parallèlement. Le mur d'une maison, en face, occupait tout le fond, et le quatrième côté (celui du restaurant) figurait un cloître gothique à vitraux de couleurs. Une sorte de toiture chinoise abritait l'estrade où jouaient les musiciens ; le sol autour était couvert d'asphalte, et des lanternes vénitiennes accrochées à des poteaux formaient, de loin, sur les quadrilles, une couronne de feux multicolores. Un piédestal, çà et là, supportait une cuvette de pierre, d'où s'élevait un mince filet d'eau. On apercevait dans les feuillages des statues en plâtre, Hébés ou Cupidons tout gluants de peinture à l'huile ; et les allées nombreuses, garnies d'un sable très jaune soigneusement ratissé, faisaient paraître le jardin beaucoup plus vaste qu'il ne l'était.

Des étudiants promenaient leurs maîtresses ; des commis en nouveautés se pavanaient une canne entre les doigts ; des collégiens fumaient des régalias ; de vieux célibataires caressaient avec un peigne leur barbe teinte ; il y avait des Anglais, des Russes, des gens de l'Amérique du Sud, trois Orientaux en tarbouch. Des lorettes, des grisettes et des filles étaient venues là, espérant trouver un protecteur, un amoureux, une pièce d'or, ou simplement pour le plaisir de la danse ; et leurs robes à tunique vert d'eau, bleue, cerise, ou violette, passaient, s'agitaient entre les ébéniers et les lilas. Presque tous les hommes portaient des étoffes à carreaux, quelques-uns des pantalons blancs, malgré la fraîcheur du soir. On allumait les becs de gaz.

Hussonnet, par ses relations avec les journaux de modes et les petits théâtres, connaissait beaucoup de femmes ; il leur envoyait des baisers par le bout des doigts, et de temps à autre, quittant ses amis, allait causer avec elles.

Deslauriers fut jaloux de ces allures. Il aborda cyniquement une grande blonde, vêtue de nankin. Après l'avoir considéré d'un air maussade, elle dit : — “Non ! pas de confiance, mon bonhomme !” et tourna les talons.

Il recommença près d'une grosse brune, qui était folle sans doute, car elle bondit dès le premier mot, en le menaçant, s'il continuait, d'appeler les sergents de ville. Deslauriers s'efforça de rire ; puis, découvrant une petite femme assise à l'écart sous un réverbère, il lui proposa une contredanse.

Les musiciens, juchés sur l'estrade, dans des postures de singe, raclaient et soufflaient, impétueusement. Le chef d'orchestre, debout, battait la mesure d'une façon automatique. On était tassé, on s'amusait ; les brides dénouées des chapeaux effleuraient les cravates, les bottes s'enfonçaient sous les jupons ; tout cela sautait en cadence ; Deslauriers pressait contre lui la petite femme, et, gagné par le délire du cancan, se démenait au milieu des quadrilles comme une grande marionnette. Cisy et Dussardier continuaient leur promenade ; le jeune aristocrate lorgnait les filles, et, malgré les exhortations du commis, n'osait leur parler, s'imaginant qu'il y avait toujours chez ces femmes-là "un homme caché dans l'armoire avec un pistolet, et qui en sort pour vous faire souscrire des lettres de change" .

Ils revinrent près de Frédéric. Deslauriers ne dansait plus ; et tous se demandaient comment finir la soirée, quand Hussonnet s'écria :

— "Tiens ! la marquise d'Amaëgui !"

C'était une femme pâle, à nez retroussé, avec des mitaines jusqu'aux coudes et de grandes boucles noires qui pendaient le long de ses joues, comme deux oreilles de chien. Hussonnet lui dit :

— "Nous devrions organiser une petite fête chez toi, un raout oriental ? Tâche d'herboriser quelques-unes de tes amies pour ces chevaliers français ? Eh bien, qu'est-ce qui te gêne ? Attendrais-tu ton hidalgo ?"

L'Andalouse baissait la tête ; sachant les habitudes peu luxueuses de son ami, elle avait peur d'en être pour ses rafraîchissements. Enfin au mot d'argent lâché par elle, Cisy proposa cinq napoléons, toute sa bourse ; la chose fut décidée. Mais Frédéric n'était plus là.

Il avait cru reconnaître la voix d'Arnoux, avait aperçu un chapeau de femme, et il s'était enfoncé bien vite dans le bosquet à côté.

Mlle Vatnaz se trouvait seule avec Arnoux.

— "Excusez-moi ! je vous dérange ?"

— "Pas le moins du monde !" reprit le marchand.

Frédéric, aux derniers mots de leur conversation, comprit qu'il était accouru à l'Alhambra pour entretenir Mlle Vatnaz d'une affaire urgente ; et sans doute Arnoux n'était pas complètement rassuré, car il lui dit d'un air inquiet :

— "Vous êtes bien sûre ?"

— “Très sûre ! on vous aime ! Ah ! quel homme !”

Et elle lui faisait la moue, en avançant ses grosses lèvres, presque sanguinolentes à force d'être rouges. Mais elle avait d'admirables yeux fauves avec des points d'or dans les prunelles, tout pleins d'esprit, d'amour et de sensualité. Ils éclairaient, comme des lampes, le teint un peu jaune de sa figure maigre. Arnoux semblait jouir de ses rebuffades. Il se pencha de son côté en lui disant — “Vous êtes gentille, embrassez-moi !” Elle le prit par les deux oreilles, et le baisa sur le front.

A ce moment, les danses s'arrêtèrent ; et, à la place du chef d'orchestre, parut un beau jeune homme, trop gras et d'une blancheur de cire. Il avait de longs cheveux noirs disposés à la manière du Christ, un gilet de velours azur à grandes palmes d'or, l'air orgueilleux comme un paon, bête comme un dindon ; et quand il eut salué le public, il entama une chansonnette. C'était un villageois narrant lui-même son voyage dans la Capitale ; l'artiste parlait bas-normand, faisait l'homme soûl ; le refrain :

Ah ! j'ai t'y ri, j'ai t'y ri,

Dans ce gueusard de Paris

soulevait des trépignements d'enthousiasme. Delmas, “chanteur expressif”, était trop malin pour le laisser refroidir. On lui passa vivement une guitare, et il gémit une romance intitulée le Frère de l'Albanaise.

Les paroles rappelèrent à Frédéric celles que chantait l'homme en haillons, entre les tambours du bateau. Ses yeux s'attachaient involontairement sur le bas de la robe étalée devant lui. Après chaque couplet, il y avait une longue pause, — et le souffle du vent dans les arbres ressemblait au bruit des ondes.

Mlle Vatnaz, en écartant d'une main les branches d'un troène qui lui masquait la vue de l'estrade, contemplait le chanteur, fixement, les narines ouvertes, les cils rapprochés, et comme perdue dans une joie sérieuse.

— “Très bien !” dit Arnoux. “Je comprends pourquoi vous êtes ce soir à l'Alhambra ! Delmas vous plaît, ma chère.”

Elle ne voulut rien avouer.

— “Ah ! quelle pudeur !”

Et, montrant Frédéric :

— “Est-ce à cause de lui ? Vous auriez tort. Pas de garçon plus discret !”

Les autres, qui cherchaient leur ami, entrèrent dans la salle de verdure. Hussonnet le présenta. Arnoux fit une distribution de cigares et régala de sorbets la compagnie.

Mlle Vatnaz avait rougi en apercevant Dussardier. Elle se leva bientôt, et, lui tendant la main :

— “Vous ne me remettez pas, monsieur Auguste ?”

— “Comment la connaissez-vous ?” demanda Frédéric.

— “Nous avons été dans la même maison !” reprit-il.

Cisy le tirait par la manche, ils sortirent ; et, à peine disparu, Mlle Vatnaz commença l'éloge de son caractère. Elle ajouta même qu'il avait le génie du cœur.

Puis on causa de Delmas, qui pourrait, comme mime, avoir des succès au théâtre ; et il s'ensuivit une discussion, où l'on mêla Shakespeare, la Censure, le Style, le Peuple, les recettes de la Porte-Saint-Martin, Alexandre Dumas, Victor Hugo et Dumersan. Arnoux avait connu plusieurs actrices célèbres ; les jeunes gens se penchaient pour l'écouter. Mais ses paroles étaient couvertes par le tapage de la musique ; et, sitôt le quadrille ou la polka terminés, tous s'abattaient sur les tables, appelaient le garçon, riaient ; les bouteilles de bière et de limonade gazeuse détonaient dans les feuillages, des femmes criaient comme des poules ; quelquefois, deux messieurs voulaient se battre ; un voleur fut arrêté.

Au galop, les danseurs envahirent les allées. Haletant, souriant, et la face rouge, ils défilaient dans un tourbillon qui soulevait les robes avec les basques des habits ; les trombones rugissaient plus fort ; le rythme s'accélérait ; derrière le cloître moyen âge, on entendit des crépitations, des pétards éclatèrent ; des soleils se mirent à tourner ; la lueur des feux de Bengale, couleur d'émeraude, éclaira pendant une minute tout le jardin ; — et, à la dernière fusée, la multitude exhala un grand soupir.

Elle s'écoula lentement. Un nuage de poudre à canon flottait dans l'air. Frédéric et Deslauriers marchaient au milieu de la foule pas à pas, quand un spectacle les arrêta : Martinon se faisait rendre de la monnaie au dépôt des parapluies ; et il accompagnait une femme d'une cinquantaine d'années, laide, magnifiquement vêtue, et d'un rang social problématique.

— “Ce gaillard-là”, dit Deslauriers, “est moins simple qu’on ne suppose. Mais où est donc Cisy ?”

Dussardier leur montra l’estaminet, où ils aperçurent le fils des preux, devant un bol de punch, en compagnie d’un chapeau rose.

Hussonnet, qui s’était absenté depuis cinq minutes, reparut au même moment.

Une jeune fille s’appuyait sur son bras, en l’appelant tout haut “mon petit chat” .

— “Mais non !” lui disait-il. “Non ! pas en public ! Appelle-moi Vicomte, plutôt ! Ça vous donne un genre cavalier, Louis XIII et bottes molles, qui me plaît ! Oui, mes bons, une ancienne ! N’est-ce pas qu’elle est gentille ?”

Il lui prenait le menton.

— “Salue ces messieurs ce sont tous des fils de pairs de France ! je les fréquente pour qu’ils me nomment ambassadeur !”

— “Comme vous êtes fou !” soupira Mlle Vatnaz.

Elle pria Dussardier de la reconduire jusqu’à sa porte.

Arnoux les regarda s’éloigner, puis, se tournant vers Frédéric :

— “Vous plairait-elle, la Vatnaz ? Au reste, vous n’êtes pas franc là-dessus ? Je crois que vous cachez vos amours ?”

Frédéric, devenu blême, jura qu’il ne cachait rien.

— “C’est qu’on ne vous connaît pas de maîtresse”, reprit Arnoux.

Frédéric eut envie de citer un nom, au hasard. Mais l’histoire pouvait lui être racontée. Il répondit qu’effectivement, il n’avait pas de maîtresse.

Le marchand l’en blâma.

— “Ce soir, l’occasion était bonne ! Pourquoi n’avez-vous pas fait comme les autres, qui s’en vont tous avec une femme ?”

— “Eh bien, et vous ?” dit Frédéric, impatienté d’une telle persistance.

— “Ah ! moi ! mon petit c’est différent ! Je m’en retourne auprès de la mienne !”

Il appela un cabriolet, et disparut.

Les deux amis s’en allèrent à pied. Un vent d’est soufflait. Ils ne parlaient ni l’un ni l’autre. Deslauriers regrettait de n’avoir pas brillé devant le directeur d’un journal, et Frédéric s’enfonçait dans sa tristesse. Enfin, il dit que le bastringue lui avait paru stupide.

— “A qui la faute ? Si tu ne nous avais pas lâchés pour ton Arnoux !”

— “Bah ! tout ce que j’aurais pu faire eût été complètement inutile !”

Mais le Clerc avait des théories. Il suffisait pour obtenir les choses, de les désirer fortement.

— “Cependant, toi-même, tout à l’heure...”

— “Je m’en moquais bien !” fit Deslauriers, arrêtant net l’allusion. “Est-ce que je vais m’empêtrer de femmes !”

Et il déclama contre leurs mièvreries, leurs sottises bref, elles lui déplaisaient.

“Ne pose donc pas !” dit Frédéric.

Deslauriers se tut. Puis, tout à coup :

— “Veux-tu parier cent francs que je fais la première qui passe ?”

— “Oui ! accepté !”

La première qui passa était une mendiante hideuse ; et ils désespéraient du hasard, lorsqu’au milieu de la rue de Rivoli, ils aperçurent une grande fille, portant à la main un petit carton.

Deslauriers l’accosta sous les arcades. Elle inclina brusquement du côté des Tuileries, et elle prit bientôt par la Place du Carrousel ; elle jetait des regards de droite et de gauche. Elle courut après un fiacre ; Deslauriers la rattrapa. Il marchait près d’elle, en lui parlant avec des gestes expressifs. Enfin elle accepta son bras, et ils continuèrent le long des quais. Puis, à la hauteur du Châtelet, pendant vingt minutes au moins, ils se promenèrent sur le trottoir, comme deux marins faisant leur quart. Mais, tout à coup, ils traversèrent le pont au Change, le marché aux Fleurs, le quai Napoléon. Frédéric entra derrière eux. Deslauriers lui fit comprendre qu’il les gênerait, et n’avait qu’à suivre son exemple.

— “Combien as-tu encore ?”

— “Deux pièces de cent sous.”

— “C’est assez ! bonsoir.”

Frédéric fut saisi par l’étonnement que l’on éprouve à voir une farce réussir “Il se moque de moi”, pensa-t-il. Si je remontais ? “Deslauriers croirait, peut-être, qu’il lui envoyait cet amour ?” Comme si je n’en avais pas un, et cent fois plus rare, plus noble, plus fort ! “ Une espèce de colère le poussait. Il arriva devant la porte de Mme Arnoux.

Aucune des fenêtres extérieures ne dépendait de son logement. Cependant, il restait les yeux collés sur la façade, — comme s'il avait cru, par cette contemplation, pouvoir fendre les murs. Maintenant, sans doute, elle reposait, tranquille comme une fleur endormie, avec ses beaux cheveux noirs parmi les dentelles de l'oreiller, les lèvres entrecloses, la tête sur un bras.

Celle d'Arnoux lui apparut. Il s'éloigna, pour fuir cette vision.

Le conseil de Deslauriers vint à sa mémoire ; il en eut horreur. Alors, il vagabonda dans les rues.

Quand un piéton s'avavançait, il tâchait de distinguer son visage. De temps à autre, un rayon de lumière lui passait entre les jambes, décrivait au ras du pavé un immense quart de cercle ; et un homme surgissait, dans l'ombre, avec sa hotte et sa lanterne. Le vent, en de certains endroits, secouait le tuyau de tôle d'une cheminée ; des sons lointains s'élevaient, se mêlant au bourdonnement de sa tête, et il croyait entendre, dans les airs, la vague ritournelle des contredanses. Le mouvement de sa marche entretenait cette ivresse ; il se trouva sur le pont de la Concorde.

Alors, il se ressouvint de ce soir de l'autre hiver, — où, sortant de chez elle, pour la première fois, il lui avait fallu s'arrêter, tant son cœur battait vite sous l'étreinte de ses espérances. Toutes étaient mortes, maintenant !

Des nues sombres couraient sur la face de la lune. Il la contempla, en rêvant à la grandeur des espaces, à la misère de la vie, au néant de tout. Le jour parut ; ses dents claquaient ; et, à moitié endormi, mouillé par le brouillard et tout plein de larmes, il se demanda pourquoi n'en pas finir ? Rien qu'un mouvement à faire ! Le poids de son front l'entraînait, il voyait son cadavre flottant sur l'eau ; Frédéric se pencha. Le parapet était un peu large, et ce fut par lassitude qu'il n'essaya pas de le franchir.

Une épouvante le saisit. Il regagna les boulevards et s'affaissa sur un banc. Des agents de police le réveillèrent, convaincus qu'il "avait fait la noce" .

Il se remit à marcher. Mais comme il se sentait grand faim, et que tous les restaurants étaient fermés, il alla souper dans un cabaret des Halles. Après quoi, jugeant qu'il était encore trop tôt, il flâna aux alentours de l'hôtel de ville, jusqu'à huit heures et un quart.

Deslauriers avait depuis longtemps congédié sa donzelle ; et il écrivait sur la table, au milieu de la chambre. Vers quatre heures, M. de Cisy entra.

Grâce à Dussardier, la veille au soir, il s'était abouché avec une dame ; et même il l'avait reconduite en voiture, avec son mari, jusqu'au seuil de sa maison, où elle lui avait donné rendez-vous. Il en sortait. On ne connaissait pas ce nom-là !

— “Que voulez-vous que j'y fasse ?” dit Frédéric.

Alors le gentilhomme battit la campagne ; il parla de Mlle Vatnaz, de l'Andalouse, et de toutes les autres. Enfin, avec beaucoup de périphrases, il exposa le but de sa visite : se fiant à la discrétion de son ami, il venait pour qu'il l'assistât dans une démarche, après laquelle il se regarderait définitivement comme un homme ; et Frédéric ne le refusa pas. Il conta l'histoire à Deslauriers, sans dire la vérité sur ce qui le concernait personnellement.

Le Clerc trouva qu' “il allait maintenant très bien.” Cette déférence à ses conseils augmenta sa bonne humeur.

C'était par elle qu'il avait séduit, dès le premier jour, Mlle Clémence Daviou, brodeuse en or pour équipements militaires, la plus douce personne qui fût, et svelte comme un roseau, avec de grands yeux bleus, continuellement ébahis. Le Clerc abusait de sa candeur, jusqu'à lui faire croire qu'il était décoré, il ornait sa redingote d'un ruban rouge, dans leurs tête-à-tête, mais s'en privait en public, pour ne point humilier son patron, disait-il. Du reste, il la tenait à distance, se laissait caresser comme un pacha, et l'appelait “fille du peuple” par manière de rire. Elle lui apportait chaque fois de petits bouquets de violettes. Frédéric n'aurait pas voulu d'un tel amour.

Cependant, lorsqu'ils sortaient, bras dessus bras dessous, pour se rendre dans un cabinet chez Pinson ou chez Barillot, il éprouvait une singulière tristesse. Frédéric ne savait pas combien, depuis un an, chaque jeudi, il avait fait souffrir Deslauriers, quand il se brossait les ongles, avant d'aller dîner rue de Choiseul !

Un soir que, du haut de son balcon, il venait de les regarder partir, il vit de loin Hussonnet sur le pont d'Arcole. Le bohème se mit à l'appeler par des signaux, et, Frédéric ayant descendu ses cinq étages :

— “Voici la chose : C'est samedi prochain, 24, la fête de Mme

Arnoux.”

— “Comment, puisqu’elle s’appelle Marie ?”

— “Angèle aussi, n’importe ! On festoiera dans leur maison de campagne, à Saint-Cloud ; je suis chargé de vous en prévenir. Vous trouverez un véhicule à trois heures, au Journal ! Ainsi convenu Pardon de vous avoir dérangé. Mais j’ai tant de courses.”

Frédéric n’avait pas tourné les talons que son portier lui remit une lettre :

“Monsieur et Madame Dambreuse prient Monsieur F. Moreau de leur faire l’honneur de venir dîner chez eux samedi 24 courant. — R. S. V. P.”

— “Trop tard”, pensa-t-il.

Néanmoins, il montra la lettre à Deslauriers, lequel s’écria :

— “Ah ! enfin ! Mais tu n’as pas l’air content.”

— “Pourquoi ?”

Frédéric, ayant hésité quelque peu, dit qu’il avait le même jour une autre invitation.

— “Fais-moi le plaisir d’envoyer bouler la rue de Choiseul. Pas de bêtises ! Je vais répondre pour toi, si ça te gêne.”

Et le Clerc écrivit une acceptation, à la troisième personne.

N’ayant jamais vu le monde qu’à travers la fièvre de ses convoitises, il se l’imaginait comme une création artificielle, fonctionnant en vertu de lois mathématiques. Un dîner en ville, la rencontre d’un homme en place, le sourire d’une jolie femme pouvaient, par une série d’actions se déduisant les unes des autres, avoir de gigantesques résultats. Certains salons parisiens étaient comme ces machines qui prennent la matière à l’état brut et la rendent centuplée de valeur. Il croyait aux courtisanes conseillant les diplomates, aux riches mariages obtenus par les intrigues, au génie des galériens, aux docilités du hasard sous la main des forts. Enfin il estimait la fréquentation des Dambreuse tellement utile, et il parla si bien, que Frédéric ne savait plus à quoi se résoudre.

Il n’en devait pas moins, puisque c’était la fête de Mme Arnoux, lui offrir un cadeau ; il songea, naturellement, à une ombrelle, afin de réparer sa maladresse.

Or, il découvrit une marquise en soie gorge-pigeon, à petit manche d'ivoire ciselé, et qui arrivait de la Chine. Mais cela coûtait cent soixante-quinze francs et il n'avait pas un sou, vivant même à crédit sur le trimestre prochain. Cependant, il la voulait, il y tenait, et, malgré sa répugnance, il eut recours à Deslauriers.

Deslauriers lui répondit qu'il n'avait pas d'argent.

— “J'en ai besoin”, dit Frédéric, “grand besoin !”

Et, l'autre ayant répété la même excuse, il s'emporta.

— “Tu pourrais bien, quelquefois...”

— “Quoi donc ?”

— “Rien !”

Le Clerc avait compris. Il leva sur sa réserve la somme en question, et, quand il l'eut versée pièce à pièce : — “Je ne te réclame pas de quittance, puisque je vis à tes crochets.”

Frédéric lui sauta au cou, avec mille protestations affectueuses. Deslauriers resta froid. Puis, le lendemain, apercevant l'ombrelle sur le piano :

— “Ah ! c'était pour cela !”

— “Je l'enverrai peut-être”, dit lâchement Frédéric.

Le hasard le servit, car il reçut, dans la soirée, un billet bordé de noir, et où Mme Dambreuse, lui annonçant la perte d'un oncle, s'excusait de remettre à plus tard le plaisir de faire sa connaissance.

Il arriva dès deux heures au bureau du Journal. Au lieu de l'attendre pour le mener dans sa voiture, Arnoux était parti la veille, ne résistant plus à son besoin de grand air.

Chaque année, aux premières feuilles, durant plusieurs jours de suite, il décampait le matin, faisait de longues courses à travers champs, buvait du lait dans les fermes, batifolait avec les villageoises, s'informait des récoltes, et rapportait des pieds de salade dans son mouchoir. Enfin, réalisant un vieux rêve, il s'était acheté une maison de campagne.

Pendant que Frédéric parlait au commis, Mlle Vatnaz survint, et fut désappointée de ne pas voir Arnoux. Il resterait là-bas encore deux jours, peut-être. Le commis lui conseilla “d'y aller” ; elle ne pouvait y aller ; d'écrire une lettre, elle avait peur que la lettre ne fût perdue.

Frédéric s'offrit à la porter lui-même. Elle en fit une rapidement, et le conjura de la remettre sans témoins.

Quarante minutes après, il débarquait à Saint-Cloud.

La maison, cent pas plus loin que le pont, se trouvait à mi-hauteur de la colline. Les murs du jardin étaient cachés par deux rangs de tilleuls, et une large pelouse descendait jusqu'au bord de la rivière. La porte de la grille étant ouverte, Frédéric entra.

Arnoux, étendu sur l'herbe, jouait avec une portée de petits chats. Cette distraction paraissait l'absorber infiniment. La lettre de Mlle Vatnaz le tira de sa torpeur.

— “Diable, diable ! c'est ennuyeux ! elle a raison ; il faut que je parte.”

Puis, ayant fourré la missive dans sa poche, il prit plaisir à montrer son domaine. Il montra tout, l'écurie, le hangar, la cuisine. Le salon était à droite, et, du côté de Paris, donnait sur une varangue en treillage, chargée d'une clématite. Mais, au-dessus de leur tête, une roulade éclata ; Mme Arnoux, se croyant seule, s'amusait à chanter. Elle faisait des gammes, des trilles, des arpèges. Il y avait de longues notes qui semblaient se tenir suspendues ; d'autres tombaient précipitées, comme les gouttelettes d'une cascade ; et sa voix, passant par la jalousie, coupait le grand silence, et montait vers le ciel bleu.

Elle cessa tout à coup, quand M. et Mme Oudry, deux voisins, se présentèrent.

Puis elle parut elle-même au haut du perron ; et, comme elle descendait les marches, il aperçut son pied. Elle avait de petites chaussures découvertes, en peau mordorée, avec trois pattes transversales, ce qui dessinait sur ses bas un grillage d'or.

Les invités arrivèrent. Sauf Me Lefauchaux, avocat, c'étaient les convives du jeudi. Chacun avait apporté quelque cadeau : Dittmer une écharpe syrienne, Rosenwald un album de romances, Burieu une aquarelle, Sombaz sa propre caricature, et Pellerin un fusain, représentant une espèce de danse macabre, hideuse fantaisie d'une exécution médiocre. Hussonnet s'était dispensé de tout présent.

Frédéric attendit après les autres, pour offrir le sien. Elle l'en remercia beaucoup. Alors, il dit :

— “Mais... c'est presque une dette ! J'ai été si fâché.”

— “De quoi donc ?” reprit-elle. “Je ne comprends pas !”

— “A table !” fit Arnoux, en le saisissant par le bras ; puis, dans l'oreille : “Vous n'êtes guère malin, vous !”

Rien n'était plaisant comme la salle à manger, peinte d'une couleur vert d'eau. A l'un des bouts, une nymphe de pierre trempait son orteil dans un bassin en forme de coquille. Par les fenêtres ouvertes, on apercevait tout le jardin avec la longue pelouse que flanquait un vieux pin d'Ecosse, aux trois quarts dépouillé ; des massifs de fleurs la bombaient inégalement ; et, au-delà du fleuve, se développaient, en large demi-cercle, le bois de Boulogne, Neuilly, Sèvres, Meudon. Devant la grille, en face, un canot à la voile prenait des bordées.

On causa d'abord de cette vue que l'on avait, puis du paysage en général ; et les discussions commençaient quand Arnoux donna l'ordre à son domestique d'atteler l'américaine vers les neuf heures et demie. Une lettre de son caissier le rappelait.

— "Veux-tu que je m'en retourne avec toi ?", dit Mme Arnoux.

— "Mais certainement !" et, en lui faisant un beau salut : "Vous savez bien, Madame, qu'on ne peut vivre sans vous !"

Tous la complimentèrent d'avoir un si bon mari.

— "Ah ! c'est que je ne suis pas seule !" répliqua-t-elle doucement, en montrant sa petite fille.

Puis, la conversation ayant repris sur la peinture, on parla d'un Ruysdaël, dont Arnoux espérait des sommes considérables, et Pellerin lui demanda s'il était vrai que le fameux Saül Mathias, de Londres, fût venu, le mois passé, lui en offrir vingt-trois mille francs.

— "Rien de plus vrai !" et, se tournant vers Frédéric "C'est même le monsieur que je promenais l'autre jour à l'Alhambra, bien malgré moi, je vous assure, car ces Anglais ne sont pas drôles"

Frédéric, soupçonnant dans la lettre de Mlle Vatnaz quelque histoire de femme, avait admiré l'aisance du sieur Arnoux à trouver un moyen honnête de déguerpir ; mais son nouveau mensonge, absolument inutile, lui fit écarquiller les yeux.

Le marchand ajouta, d'un air simple :

— "Comment l'appellez-vous donc, ce grand jeune homme, votre ami ?"

— "Deslauriers", dit vivement Frédéric.

Et, pour réparer les torts qu'ils se sentait à son endroit, il le vanta comme une intelligence supérieure.

— "Ah ! vraiment ? Mais il n'a pas l'air si brave garçon que l'autre, le commis de roulage."

Frédéric maudit Dussardier. Elle allait croire qu'il frayait avec les gens du commun.

Ensuite, il fut question des embellissements de la Capitale, des quartiers nouveaux, et le bonhomme Oudry vint à citer, parmi les grands spéculateurs, M. Dambreuse.

Frédéric, saisissant l'occasion de se faire valoir, dit qu'il le connaissait. Mais Pellerin se lança dans une catilinaire contre les épiciers ; vendeurs de chandelles ou d'argent, il n'y voyait pas de différence. Puis, Rosenwald et Burieu devisèrent porcelaines ; Arnoux causait jardinage avec Mme Oudry ; Sombaz, loustic de la vieille école, s'amusait à blaguer son époux ; il l'appelait Odry, comme l'acteur, déclara qu'il devait descendre d'Oudry, le peintre des chiens, car la bosse des animaux était visible sur son front. Il voulut même lui tâter le crâne, l'autre s'en défendait à cause de sa perruque ; et le dessert finit avec des éclats de rire.

Quand on eut pris le café, sous les tilleuls, en fumant, et fait plusieurs tours dans le jardin, on alla se promener le long de la rivière.

La compagnie s'arrêta devant un pêcheur, qui nettoyait des anguilles, dans une boutique à poisson. Mlle Marthe voulut les voir. Il vida sa boîte sur l'herbe ; et la petite fille se jetait à genoux pour les rattraper, riait de plaisir, criait d'effroi. Toutes furent perdues. Arnoux les paya.

Il eut, ensuite, l'idée de faire une promenade en canot. Un côté de l'horizon commençait à pâlir. tandis que, de l'autre, une large couleur orange s'étalait dans le ciel et était plus empourprée au faîte des collines, devenues complètement noires. Mme Arnoux se tenait assise sur une grosse pierre, ayant cette lueur d'incendie derrière elle. Les autres personnes flânaient, çà et là ; Hussonnet, au bas de la berge, faisait des ricochets sur l'eau.

Arnoux revint, suivi par une vieille chaloupe, où malgré les représentations les plus sages il empila ses convives. Elle sombrait ; il fallut débarquer.

Déjà des bougies brûlaient dans le salon, tout tendu de perse, avec des girandoles en cristal contre les murs. La mère Oudry s'endormait doucement dans un fauteuil, et les autres écoutaient M. Lefauchaux, dissertant sur les gloires du barreau. Mme Arnoux était seule près de la croisée, Frédéric l'aborda.

Ils causèrent de ce que l'on disait. Elle admirait les orateurs ; lui, il préférerait la gloire des écrivains. Mais on devait sentir, reprit-elle, une plus forte jouissance à remuer les foules directement, soi-même, à voir que l'on fait passer dans leur âme tous les sentiments de la sienne. Ces triomphes ne tentaient guère Frédéric, qui n'avait point d'ambition.

— “Ah ! pourquoi ?” dit-elle. “Il faut en avoir un peu !”

Ils étaient l'un près de l'autre, debout, dans l'embrasure de la croisée. La nuit, devant eux, s'étendait comme un immense voile sombre, piqué d'argent. C'était la première fois qu'ils ne parlaient pas de choses insignifiantes. Il vint même à savoir ses antipathies et ses goûts : certains parfums lui faisaient mal, les livres d'histoire l'intéressaient, elle croyait aux songes.

Il entama le chapitre des aventures sentimentales. Elle plaignait les désastres de la passion, mais était révoltée par les turpitudes hypocrites ; et cette droiture d'esprit se rapportait si bien à la beauté régulière de son visage, qu'elle semblait en dépendre.

Elle souriait quelquefois, arrêtant sur lui ses yeux, une minute. Alors, il sentait ses regards pénétrer son âme, comme ces grands rayons de soleil qui descendent jusqu'au fond de l'eau. Il l'aimait sans arrière-pensée, sans espoir de retour, absolument ; et, dans ces muets transports, pareils à des élans de reconnaissance, il aurait voulu couvrir son front d'une pluie de baisers. Cependant, un souffle intérieur l'enlevait comme hors de lui ; c'était une envie de se sacrifier, un besoin de dévouement immédiat, et d'autant plus fort qu'il ne pouvait l'assouvir.

Il ne partit pas avec les autres, Hussonnet non plus. Ils devaient s'en retourner dans la voiture ; et l'américaine attendait au bas du perron, quand Arnoux descendit dans le jardin, pour cueillir des roses. Puis, le bouquet étant lié avec un fil, comme les tiges dépassaient inégalement, il fouilla dans sa poche, pleine de papiers, en prit un au hasard, les enveloppa, consolida son œuvre avec une forte épingle et il l'offrit à sa femme, avec une certaine émotion.

— “Tiens, ma chérie, excuse-moi de t'avoir oubliée !” Mais elle poussa un petit cri ; l'épingle, sottement mise, l'avait blessée, et elle remonta dans sa chambre. On l'attendit près d'un quart d'heure. Enfin elle reparut, enleva Marthe, se jeta dans la voiture.

— “Et ton bouquet ?” dit Arnoux.

— “Non ! non ! ce n'est pas la peine !”

Frédéric courait pour l'aller prendre ; elle lui cria :

— “Je n'en veux pas !”

Mais il l'apporta bientôt, disant qu'il venait de le remettre dans l'enveloppe, car il avait trouvé les fleurs à terre. Elle les enfonça dans le tablier de cuir, contre le siège, et l'on partit.

Frédéric, assis près d'elle, remarqua qu'elle tremblait horriblement. Puis, quand on eut passé le pont, comme Arnoux tournait à gauche :

— “Mais non ! tu te trompes ! par là, à droite !”

Elle semblait irritée ; tout la gênait. Enfin, Marthe ayant fermé les yeux, elle tira le bouquet et le lança par la portière, puis saisit au bras Frédéric, en lui faisant signe, avec l'autre main, de n'en jamais parler.

Ensuite, elle appliqua son mouchoir contre ses lèvres, et ne bougea plus.

Les deux autres, sur le siège, causaient imprimerie, abonnés. Arnoux, qui conduisait sans attention, se perdit au milieu du bois de Boulogne. Alors, on s'enfonça dans de petits chemins. Le cheval marchait au pas ; les branches des arbres frôlaient la capote. Frédéric n'apercevait de Mme Arnoux que ses deux yeux, dans l'ombre ; Marthe s'était allongée sur elle, et il lui soutenait la tête.

— “Elle vous fatigue !” dit sa mère.

Il répondit :

— “Non ! oh non !”

De lents tourbillons de poussière se levaient ; on traversait Auteuil ; toutes les maisons étaient closes ; un réverbère, çà et là, éclairait l'angle d'un mur, puis on rentrait dans les ténèbres ; une fois, il s'aperçut qu'elle pleurait.

Etait-ce un remords ? un désir ? quoi donc ? Ce chagrin, qu'il ne savait pas, l'intéressait comme une chose personnelle ; maintenant, il y avait entre eux un lien nouveau, une espèce de complicité ; et il lui dit, de la voix la plus caressante qu'il put :

— “Vous souffrez ?”

— “Oui, un peu”, reprit-elle.

La voiture roulait, et les chèvrefeuilles et les seringas débordaient les clôtures des jardins, envoyaient dans la nuit des bouffées d'odeurs amollissantes. Les plis nombreux de sa robe couvraient ses pieds. Il lui semblait communiquer avec toute sa personne par ce corps d'enfant étendu entre eux. Il se pencha vers la petite fille, et, écartant ses jolis cheveux bruns, la baisa au front, doucement.

— “Vous êtes bon !” dit Mme Arnoux.

— “Pourquoi ?”

— “Parce que vous aimez les enfants.”

— “Pas tous !”

Il n’ajouta rien, mais il étendit la main gauche de son côté et la laissa toute grande ouverte, — s’imaginant qu’elle allait faire comme lui, peut-être, et qu’il rencontrerait la sienne. Puis il eut honte, et la retira.

On arriva bientôt sur le pavé. La voiture allait plus vite, les becs de gaz se multiplièrent, c’était Paris. Hussonnet, devant le Garde-Meuble, sauta du siège. Frédéric attendit pour descendre que l’on fût arrivé dans la cour ; puis il s’embusqua au coin de la rue de Choiseul, et aperçut Arnoux qui remontait lentement vers les boulevards.

Dès le lendemain, il se mit à travailler de toutes ses forces.

Il se voyait dans une cour d’assises, par un soir d’hiver, à la fin des plaidoiries, quand les jurés sont pâles et que la foule haletante fait craquer les cloisons du prétoire, parlant depuis quatre heures déjà, résumant toutes ses preuves, en découvrant de nouvelles, et sentant à chaque phrase, à chaque mot, à chaque geste le couperet de la guillotine, suspendu derrière lui, se relever ; puis, à la tribune de la Chambre, orateur qui porte sur ses lèvres le salut de tout un peuple, noyant ses adversaires sous ses prosopopées, les écrasant d’une riposte, avec des foudres et des intonations musicales dans la voix, ironique, pathétique, emporté, sublime ; elle serait là, quelque part, au milieu des autres, cachant sous son voile ses pleurs d’enthousiasme ; ils se retrouveraient ensuite ; — et les découragements, les calomnies et les injures ne l’atteindraient pas, si elle disait : — “Ah ! cela est beau !” en lui passant sur le front ses mains légères.

Ces images fulguraient, comme des phares, à l’horizon de sa vie. Son esprit, excité, devint plus leste et plus fort. Jusqu’au mois d’août, il s’enferma, et fut reçu à son dernier examen.

Deslauriers, qui avait eu tant de mal à lui seriner encore une fois le deuxième à la fin de décembre et le troisième en février, s’étonnait de son ardeur. Alors, les vieux espoirs revinrent. Dans dix ans, il fallait que Frédéric fût député ; dans quinze, ministre ; pourquoi pas ? Avec son patrimoine qu’il allait toucher bientôt, il pouvait, d’abord, fonder un journal ; ce serait le début ; ensuite, on verrait. Quant à lui, il ambitionnait toujours une chaire à l'Ecole de droit ; et il soutint sa thèse pour le doctorat d'une façon si remarquable, qu'elle lui valut les compliments des professeurs.

Frédéric passa la sienne trois jours après. Avant de partir en vacances, il eut l'idée d'un pique-nique, pour clore les réunions du samedi.

Il s'y montra gai. Mme Arnoux était maintenant près de sa mère, à Chartres. Mais il la retrouverait bientôt, et finirait par être son amant.

Deslauriers, admis le jour même à la parlote d'Orsay avait fait un discours fort applaudi. Quoiqu'il fût sobre, il se grisa, et dit au dessert à Dussardier :

— “Tu es honnête, toi ! Quand je serai riche, je t'instituerai mon régisseur.”

Tous étaient heureux ; Cisy ne finirait pas son droit ; Martinon allait continuer son stage en province, où il serait nommé substitut ; Pellerin se disposait à un grand tableau figurant le Génie de la Révolution ; Hussonnet, la semaine prochaine, devait lire au directeur des Délassements le plan d'une pièce, et ne doutait pas du succès :

— “Car la charpente du drame, on me l'accorde ! Les passions, j'ai assez roulé ma bosse pour m'y connaître quant aux traits d'esprit, c'est mon métier !”

Il fit un saut, retomba sur les deux mains, et marcha quelque temps autour de la table, les jambes en l'air.

Cette gaminerie ne dérida pas Sénecal. Il venait d'être chassé de sa pension, pour avoir battu un fils d'aristocrate. Sa misère augmentant, il s'en prenait à l'ordre social, maudissait les riches ; et il s'épancha dans le sein de Regimbart, lequel était de plus en plus désillusionné, attristé, dégoûté. Le Citoyen se tournait, maintenant, vers les questions budgétaires, et accusait la Camarilla de perdre des millions en Algérie.

Comme il ne pouvait dormir sans avoir stationné à l'estaminet Alexandre, il disparut dès onze heures. Les autres se retirèrent plus tard ; et Frédéric, en faisant ses adieux à Hussonnet, apprit que Mme Arnoux avait dû revenir la veille.

Il alla donc aux Messageries changer sa place pour le lendemain, et, vers six heures du soir, se présenta chez elle. Son retour, lui dit le concierge, était différé d'une semaine. Frédéric dîna seul, puis flâna sur les boulevards.

Des nuages roses, en forme d'écharpe, s'allongeaient au-delà des toits ; on commençait à relever les tentes des boutiques ; des tombereaux d'arrosage versaient une pluie sur la poussière, et une fraîcheur inattendue se mêlait aux émanations des cafés, laissant voir par leurs portes ouvertes, entre des argenteries et des dorures, des fleurs en gerbes qui se miraient dans les hautes glaces. La foule marchait lentement. Il y avait des groupes d'hommes causant au milieu du trottoir ; et des femmes passaient, avec une mollesse dans les yeux et ce teint de camélia que donne aux chairs féminines la lassitude des grandes chaleurs. Quelque chose d'énorme s'épanchait, enveloppait les maisons. Jamais Paris ne lui avait semblé si beau. Il n'apercevait, dans l'avenir, qu'une interminable série d'années toutes pleines d'amour.

Il s'arrêta devant le théâtre de la Porte-Saint-Martin à regarder l'affiche ; et, par désœuvrement, prit un billet.

On jouait une vieille féerie. Les spectateurs étaient rares ; et, dans les lucarnes du paradis, le jour se découpait en petits carrés bleus, tandis que les quinquets de la rampe formaient une seule ligne de lumières jaunes. La scène représentait un marché d'esclaves à Pékin, avec clochettes, tam-tams, sultanes, bonnets pointus et calembours. Puis, la toile baissée, il erra dans le foyer, solitairement, et admira sur le boulevard, au bas du perron, un grand landau vert, attelé de deux chevaux blancs, tenus par un cocher en culotte courte.

Il regagnait sa place, quand, au balcon, dans la première loge d'avant-scène, entrèrent une dame et un monsieur. Le mari avait un visage pâle, bordé d'un filet de barbe grise, la rosette d'officier, et cet aspect glacial qu'on attribue aux diplomates.

Sa femme, de vingt ans plus jeune pour le moins, ni grande ni petite, ni laide ni jolie, portait ses cheveux blonds tire-bouchonnés à l'anglaise, une robe à corsage plat, et un large éventail de dentelle noire. Pour que des gens d'un pareil monde fussent venus au spectacle dans cette saison, il fallait supposer un hasard, ou l'ennui de passer leur soirée en tête-à-tête. La dame mordillait son éventail, et le monsieur bâillait. Frédéric ne pouvait se rappeler où il avait vu cette figure.

A l'entracte suivant, comme il traversait un couloir il les rencontra tous les deux ; sur le vague salut qu'il fit, M. Dambreuse, le reconnaissant, l'aborda et s'excusa, tout de suite, de négligences impardonnables. C'était une allusion aux cartes de visite nombreuses, envoyées d'après les conseils du Clerc. Toutefois il confondait les époques, croyant que Frédéric était à sa seconde année de droit. Puis il l'envia de partir pour la campagne. Il aurait eu besoin de se reposer, mais les affaires le retenaient à Paris.

Mme Dambreuse, appuyée sur son bras, inclinait la tête, légèrement ; et l'aménité spirituelle de son visage contrastait avec son expression chagrine de tout à l'heure.

— “On y trouve pourtant de belles distractions !” dit-elle, aux derniers mots de son mari. “Comme ce spectacle est bête ! n'est-ce pas, monsieur ?” Et tous trois restèrent debout, à causer théâtres et pièces nouvelles.

Frédéric, habitué aux grimaces des bourgeoises provinciales, n'avait vu chez aucune femme une pareille aisance de manières, cette simplicité, qui est un raffinement, et où les naïfs aperçoivent l'expression d'une sympathie instantanée.

On comptait sur lui, dès son retour ; M. Dambreuse le chargea de ses souvenirs pour le père Roque.

Frédéric ne manqua pas, en rentrant, de conter cet accueil à Deslauriers.

— “Fameux !” reprit le Clerc, “et ne te laisse pas entortiller par ta maman ! Reviens tout de suite !”

Le lendemain de son arrivée, après leur déjeuner, Mme Moreau emmena son fils dans le jardin.

Elle se dit heureuse de lui voir un état, car ils n'étaient pas aussi riches que l'on croyait ; la terre rapportait peu ; les fermiers payaient mal ; elle avait même été contrainte de vendre sa voiture. Enfin, elle lui exposa leur situation.

Dans les premiers embarras de son veuvage, un homme astucieux, M. Roque, lui avait fait des prêts d'argent, renouvelés, prolongés malgré elle. Il était venu les réclamer tout à coup ; et elle avait passé par ses conditions, en lui cédant à un prix dérisoire la ferme de Presles. Dix ans plus tard, son capital disparaissait dans la faillite d'un banquier, à Melun. Par horreur des hypothèques et pour conserver des apparences utiles à l'avenir de son fils, comme le père Roque se présentait de nouveau, elle l'avait écouté, encore une fois. Mais elle était quitte, maintenant. Bref, il leur restait environ dix mille francs de rente, dont deux mille trois cents à lui, tout son patrimoine !

— “Ce n'est pas possible !” s'écria Frédéric.

Elle eut un mouvement de tête signifiant que cela était très possible.

Mais son oncle lui laisserait quelque chose ? Rien n'était moins sûr !

Et ils firent un tour de jardin, sans parler. Enfin elle l'attira contre son cœur, et, d'une voix que les larmes étouffaient :

— “Ah ! mon pauvre garçon ! Il m'a fallu abandonner bien des rêves !”

Il s'assit sur le banc, à l'ombre du grand acacia.

Ce qu'elle lui conseillait, c'était de se mettre clerc chez M. Prouharam, avoué, lequel lui céderait son étude ; s'il la faisait bien valoir, il pourrait la revendre, et trouver un bon parti.

Frédéric n'entendait plus. Il regardait machinalement, par-dessus la haie, dans l'autre jardin, en face.

Une petite fille d'environ douze ans, et qui avait les cheveux rouges, se trouvait là, toute seule. Elle s'était fait des boucles d'oreilles avec des baies de sorbier ; son corset de toile grise laissait à découvert ses épaules, un peu dorées par le soleil ; des taches de confitures maculaient son jupon blanc ; — et il y avait comme une grâce de jeune bête sauvage dans toute sa personne, à la fois nerveuse et fluette. La présence d'un inconnu l'étonnait, sans doute, car elle s'était brusquement arrêtée, avec son arrosoir à la main, en dardant sur lui ses prunelles, d'un vert-bleu limpide.

— “C'est la fille de M. Roque”, dit Mme Moreau. “Il vient d'épouser sa servante et de légitimer son enfant.”

CHAPITRE 6

Ruiné, dépouillé, perdu !

Il était resté sur le banc, comme étourdi par une commotion. Il maudissait le sort, il aurait voulu battre quelqu'un ; et, pour renforcer son désespoir, il sentait peser sur lui une sorte d'outrage, un déshonneur ; — car Frédéric s'était imaginé que sa fortune paternelle monterait un jour à quinze mille livres de rente, et il l'avait fait savoir, d'une façon indirecte, aux Arnoux. Il allait donc passer pour un hâbleur, un drôle, un obscur polisson, qui s'était introduit chez eux dans l'espérance d'un profit quelconque ! Et elle, Mme Arnoux, comment la revoir, maintenant ?

Cela, d'ailleurs, était complètement impossible, n'ayant que trois mille francs de rente ! Il ne pouvait loger toujours au quatrième, avoir pour domestique le portier, et se présenter avec de pauvres gants noirs bleuis du bout, un chapeau gras, la même redingote pendant un an. Non, non ! jamais ! Cependant, l'existence était intolérable sans elle. Beaucoup vivaient bien qui n'avaient pas de fortune, Deslauriers entre autres ; — et il se trouva lâche d'attacher une pareille importance à des choses médiocres. La misère, peut-être, centuplerait ses facultés. Il s'exalta, en pensant aux grands hommes qui travaillent dans les mansardes. Une âme comme celle de Mme Arnoux devait s'émouvoir à ce spectacle, et elle s'attendrait. Ainsi, cette catastrophe était un bonheur après tout ; comme ces tremblements de terre qui découvrent des trésors, elle lui avait révélé les secrètes opulences de sa nature. Mais il n'existait au monde qu'un seul endroit pour les faire valoir : Paris ! car, dans ses idées, l'art, la science et l'amour (ces trois faces de Dieu, comme eût dit Pellerin) dépendaient exclusivement de la Capitale.

Il déclara le soir, à sa mère, qu'il y retournerait. Mme Moreau fut surprise et indignée. C'était une folie, une absurdité. Il ferait mieux de suivre ses conseils, c'est-à-dire de rester près d'elle, dans une étude. Frédéric haussa les épaules :

— “Allons donc !” se trouvant insulté par cette proposition.

Alors, la bonne dame employa une autre méthode. D'une voix tendre et avec de petits sanglots, elle se mit à lui parler de sa solitude, de sa vieillesse, des sacrifices qu'elle avait faits. Maintenant qu'elle était plus malheureuse, il l'abandonnait. Puis, faisant allusion à sa fin prochaine :

— “Un peu de patience, mon Dieu ! bientôt tu seras libre !”

Ces lamentations se répétèrent vingt fois par jour, durant trois mois ; et, en même temps, les délicatesses du foyer le corrompaient ; il jouissait d'avoir un lit plus mou, des serviettes sans déchirures ; si bien que, lassé, énervé, vaincu enfin par la terrible force de la douceur, Frédéric se laissa conduire chez maître Prouharam.

Il n'y montra ni science ni aptitude. On l'avait considéré jusqu'alors comme un jeune homme de grands moyens, qui devait être la gloire du département. Ce fut une déception publique.

D'abord il s'était dit “Il faut avertir Mme Arnoux”, et, pendant une semaine, il avait médité des lettres dithyrambiques, et de courts billets, en style lapidaire et sublime. La crainte d'avouer sa situation le retenait. Puis il songea qu'il valait mieux écrire au mari. Arnoux connaissait la vie et saurait le comprendre. Enfin, après quinze jours d'hésitation :

“Bah !

je ne dois plus les revoir ; qu'ils m'oublient ! Au moins, je n'aurai pas déchu dans son souvenir ! Elle me croira mort, et me regrettera... peut-être.”

Comme les résolutions excessives lui coûtaient peu, il s'était juré ne jamais revenir à Paris, et même de ne point s'informer de Mme Arnoux.

Cependant, il regrettait jusqu'à la senteur du gaz et au tapage des omnibus. Il rêvait à toutes les paroles qu'on lui avait dites, au timbre de sa voix, à la lumière de ses yeux, — et, se considérant comme un homme mort, il ne faisait plus rien, absolument.

Il se levait très tard, et regardait par sa fenêtre les attelages de rouliers qui passaient. Les six premiers mois, surtout, furent abominables.

En de certains jours, pourtant, une indignation le prenait contre lui-même. Alors, il sortait. Il s'en allait dans les prairies, à moitié couvertes durant l'hiver par les débordements de la Seine. Des lignes de peupliers les divisent. Çà et là, un petit pont s'élève. Il vagabondait jusqu'au soir, roulant les feuilles jaunes sous ses pas, aspirant la brume, sautant les fossés ; à mesure que ses artères battaient plus fort, des désirs d'action furieuse l'emportaient ; il voulait se faire trappeur en Amérique, servir un pacha en Orient, s'embarquer comme matelot ; et il exhalait sa mélancolie dans de longues lettres à Deslauriers.

Celui-là se démenait pour percer, La conduite lâche de son ami et ses éternelles jérémiades lui semblaient stupides. Bientôt, leur correspondance devint presque nulle. Frédéric avait donné tous ses meubles à Deslauriers, qui gardait son logement. Sa mère lui en parlait de temps à autre ; un jour enfin, il déclara son cadeau, et elle le grondait, quand il reçut une lettre.

— “Qu'est-ce donc ?” dit-elle, “tu trembles ?”

— “Je n'ai rien !” répliqua Frédéric.

Deslauriers lui apprenait qu'il avait recueilli Sénécal ; et depuis quinze jours, ils vivaient ensemble. Donc, Sénécal s'étalait, maintenant, au milieu des choses qui provenaient de chez Arnoux ! Il pouvait les vendre, faire des remarques dessus, des plaisanteries. Frédéric se sentit blessé, jusqu'au fond de l'âme. Il monta dans sa chambre. Il avait envie de mourir.

Sa mère l'appela. C'était pour le consulter, à propos d'une plantation dans le jardin.

Ce jardin, en manière de parc anglais, était coupé à son milieu par une clôture de bâtons, et la moitié appartenait au père Roque, qui en possédait un autre, pour les légumes, sur le bord de la rivière. Les deux voisins, brouillés, s'abstenaient d'y paraître aux mêmes heures. Mais, depuis que Frédéric était revenu, le bonhomme s'y promenait plus souvent et n'épargnait pas les politesses au fils de Mme Moreau. Il le plaignait d'habiter une petite ville. Un jour, il raconta que M. Dambreuse avait demandé de ses nouvelles. Une autre fois, il s'étendit sur la coutume de Champagne, où le ventre anoblissait.

— “Dans ce temps-là, vous auriez été un seigneur, puisque votre mère s'appelait de Fouvens. Et on a beau dire, allez ! c'est quelque chose, un nom ! Après tout”, ajouta-t-il, en le regardant d'un air malin, “cela dépend du garde des sceaux.”

Cette prétention d'aristocratie jurait singulièrement avec sa personne. Comme il était petit, sa grande redingote marron exagérait la longueur de son buste. Quand il ôtait sa casquette, on apercevait un visage presque féminin avec un nez extrêmement pointu ; ses cheveux de couleur jaune ressemblaient à une perruque ; il saluait le monde très bas, en frisant les murs.

Jusqu'à cinquante ans, il s'était contenté des services de Catherine, une Lorraine du même âge que lui, et fortement marquée de petite vérole. Mais, vers 1834, il ramena de Paris une belle blonde, à figure moutonnaire, à "port de reine". On la vit bientôt se pavaner avec de grandes boucles d'oreilles, et tout fut expliqué, par la naissance d'une fille, déclarée sous les noms d'Elisabeth-Olympe-Louise Roque.

Catherine, dans sa jalousie, s'attendait à exécrer cette enfant. Au contraire, elle l'aima. Elle l'entoura de soins, d'attentions et de caresses, pour supplanter sa mère et la rendre odieuse, entreprise facile, car Mme Eléonore négligeait complètement la petite, préférant bavarder chez les fournisseurs. Dès le lendemain de son mariage, elle alla faire une visite à la sous-préfecture, ne tutoya plus les servantes, et crut devoir, par bon ton, se montrer sévère pour son enfant. Elle assistait à ses leçons ; le professeur, un vieux bureaucrate de la mairie, ne savait pas s'y prendre. L'élève s'insurgeait, recevait des gifles, et allait pleurer sur les genoux de Catherine, qui lui donnait invariablement raison. Alors, les deux femmes se querellaient ; M. Roque les faisait taire. Il s'était marié par tendresse pour sa fille, et ne voulait pas qu'on la tourmentât.

Souvent elle portait une robe blanche en lambeaux avec un pantalon garni de dentelles ; et, aux grandes fêtes, sortait vêtue comme une princesse, afin de mortifier un peu les bourgeois, qui empêchaient leurs marmots de la fréquenter, vu sa naissance illégitime.

Elle vivait seule, dans son jardin, se balançant à l'escarpolette, courait après les papillons, puis tout à coup s'arrêtait à contempler les cétoines s'abattant sur les rosiers. C'étaient ces habitudes, sans doute, qui donnaient à sa figure une expression à la fois de hardiesse et de rêverie. Elle avait la taille de Marthe, d'ailleurs, si bien que Frédéric lui dit, dès leur seconde entrevue :

— "Voulez-vous me permettre de vous embrasser, mademoiselle ?"

La petite personne leva la tête, et répondit :

— "Je veux bien !"

Mais la haie de bâtons les séparait l'un de l'autre.

— "Il faut monter dessus", dit Frédéric.

— “Non, enlève-moi !”

Il se pencha par-dessus la haie et la saisit au bout de ses bras, en la baisant sur les deux joues ; puis il la remit chez elle, par le même procédé, qui se renouvela les fois suivantes.

Sans plus de réserve qu’une enfant de quatre ans, sitôt qu’elle entendait venir son ami, elle s’élançait à sa rencontre, ou bien, se cachant derrière un arbre, elle poussait un jappement de chien, pour l’effrayer.

Un jour que Mme Moreau était sortie, il la fit monter dans sa chambre. Elle ouvrit tous les flacons d’odeur et se pommada les cheveux abondamment ; puis, sans la moindre gêne, elle se coucha sur le lit où elle restait tout de son long, éveillée.

— “Je m’imagine que je suis ta femme”, disait-elle.

Le lendemain, il l’aperçut tout en larmes. Elle avoua “qu’elle pleurerait ses péchés”, et, comme il cherchait à les connaître, elle répondit en baissant les yeux — “Ne m’interroge pas davantage !”

La première communion approchait ; on l’avait conduite le matin à confesse.

Le sacrement ne la rendit guère plus sage. Elle entraît parfois dans de véritables colères ; on avait recours à M. Frédéric pour la calmer.

Souvent il l’emmenait avec lui dans ses promenades.

Tandis qu’il rêvassait en marchant, elle cueillait des coquelicots au bord des blés, et, quand elle le voyait plus triste qu’à l’ordinaire, elle tâchait de le consoler par de gentilles paroles. Son cœur, privé d’amour, se rejeta sur cette amitié d’enfant ; il lui dessinait des bonshommes, lui contait des histoires et il se mit à lui faire des lectures.

Il commença par les Annales romantiques, un recueil de vers et de prose, alors célèbre. Puis, oubliant son âge, tant son intelligence le charmait, il lut successivement Atala, Cinq-Mars, les Feuilles d’automne. Mais, une nuit (le soir même, elle avait entendu Macbeth, dans la simple traduction de Letourneur), elle se réveilla en criant : “La tache ! la tache !”, ses dents claquaient, elle tremblait, et, fixant des yeux épouvantés sur sa main droite, elle la frottait en disant : “Toujours une tache !” Enfin arriva le médecin, qui prescrivit d’éviter les émotions.

Les bourgeois ne virent là-dedans qu’un pronostic défavorable pour ses mœurs. On disait que “le fils Moreau” voulait en faire plus tard une actrice.

Bientôt il fut question d’un autre événement, à savoir l’arrivée de l’oncle Barthélemy. Mme Moreau lui donna sa chambre à coucher, et poussa la condescendance jusqu’à servir du gras les jours maigres.

Le vieillard fut médiocrement aimable. C’étaient de perpétuelles comparaisons entre le Havre et Nogent, dont il trouvait l’air lourd, le pain mauvais, les rues mal pavées, la nourriture médiocre et les habitants des paresseux. — “Quel pauvre commerce chez vous !” Il blâma les extravagances de défunt Son frère, tandis que, lui, il avait amassé vingt-sept mille livres de rente ! Enfin, il partit au bout de la semaine, et sur le marchepied de la voiture, lâcha ces mots peu rassurants :

— “Je suis toujours bien aise de vous savoir dans une bonne position.”

— “Tu n’auras rien !” dit Mme Moreau en rentrant dans la salle.

Il n’était venu que sur ses instances ; et, huit jours durant, elle avait sollicité de sa part une ouverture, trop clairement peut-être. Elle se repentait d’avoir agi, et restait dans son fauteuil, la tête basse, les lèvres serrées. Frédéric, en face d’elle, l’observait ; et ils se taisaient tous les deux, comme il y avait cinq ans, au retour de Montereau. Cette coïncidence, s’offrant même à sa pensée, lui rappela Mme Arnoux.

A ce moment, des coups de fouet retentirent sous la fenêtre, en même temps qu’une voix l’appelait.

C’était le père Roque, seul dans sa tapisserie. Il allait passer toute la journée à la Fortelle, chez M. Dambreuse, et proposa cordialement à Frédéric de l’y conduire.

— “Vous n’avez pas besoin d’invitation avec moi soyez sans crainte !”

Frédéric eut envie d’accepter. Mais comment expliquerait-il son séjour définitif à Nogent ? Il n’avait pas un costume d’été convenable ; enfin que dirait sa mère ? Il refusa.

Dès lors, le voisin se montra moins amical. Louise grandissait ; Mme Eléonore tomba malade dangereusement ; et la liaison se dénoua au grand plaisir de Mme Moreau, qui redoutait pour l’établissement de son fils la fréquentation de pareilles gens.

Elle rêvait de lui acheter le greffe du tribunal ; Frédéric ne repoussait pas trop cette idée. Maintenant, il l'accompagnait à la messe, il faisait le soir sa partie d'impériale, il s'accoutumait à la province, s'y enfonçait ; — et même son amour avait pris comme une douceur funèbre, un charme assoupissant. A force d'avoir versé sa douleur dans ses lettres, de l'avoir mêlée à ses lectures, promenée dans la campagne et partout épandue, il l'avait presque tarie, si bien que Mme Arnoux était pour lui comme une morte dont il s'étonnait de ne pas connaître le tombeau, tant cette affection était devenue tranquille et résignée.

Un jour, le 12 décembre 1845, vers neuf heures du matin, la cuisinière monta une lettre dans sa chambre. L'adresse, en gros caractères, était d'une écriture inconnue ; et Frédéric, sommeillant, ne se pressa pas de la décacheter. Enfin il lut :

" Justice de paix du Havre. IIIe arrondissement.

" Monsieur,

"M. Moreau, votre oncle, étant mort ab intestat..."

Il héritait !

Comme si un incendie eût éclaté derrière le mur, il sauta hors de son lit, pieds nus, en chemise : il se passa la main sur le visage, doutant de ses yeux, croyant qu'il rêvait encore, et, pour se raffermir dans la réalité, il ouvrit la fenêtre toute grande.

Il était tombé de la neige ; les toits étaient blancs et même il reconnut dans la cour un baquet à lessive, qui l'avait fait trébucher la veille au soir.

Il relut la lettre trois fois de suite ; rien de plus vrai ? toute la fortune de l'oncle ! Vingt-sept mille livres de rente ! — et une joie frénétique le bouleversa, à l'idée de revoir Mme Arnoux. Avec la netteté d'une hallucination, il s'aperçut auprès d'elle, chez elle, lui apportant quelque cadeau dans du papier de soie, tandis qu'à la porte stationnerait son tilbury, non, un coupé plutôt un coupé noir, avec un domestique en livrée brune il entendait piaffer son cheval et le bruit de la gourmette se confondant avec le murmure de leurs baisers. Cela se renouvellerait tous les jours, indéfiniment. Il les recevrait chez lui, dans sa maison ; la salle à manger serait en cuir rouge, le boudoir en soie jaune, des divans partout et quelles étagères quels vases de Chine ! quels tapis ! Ces images arrivaient si tumultueusement, qu'il sentait la tête lui tourner. Alors, il se rappela sa mère ; et il descendit, tenant toujours la lettre à sa main.

Mme Moreau tâcha de contenir son émotion et eut une défaillance. Frédéric la prit dans ses bras et la baisa au front.

— “Bonne mère, tu peux racheter ta voiture maintenant ; ris donc, ne pleure plus, sois heureuse”

Dix minutes après, la nouvelle circulait jusqu’aux faubourgs. Alors, Me Benoist, M. Gambin, M. Chambion, tous les amis, accoururent. Frédéric s’échappa une minute pour écrire à Deslauriers. D’autres visites survinrent. L’après-midi se passa en félicitations. On en oubliait la femme Roque, qui était cependant “très bas” .

Le soir, quand ils furent seuls, tous les deux, Mme Moreau dit à son fils qu’elle lui conseillait de s’établir à Troyes, avocat. Etant plus connu dans son pays que dans un autre, il pourrait plus facilement y trouver des partis avantageux.

— “Ah ! c’est trop fort !” s’écria Frédéric.

A peine avait-il son bonheur entre les mains qu’on voulait le lui prendre. Il signifia sa résolution formelle d’habiter Paris.

— “Pourquoi y faire ?”

— “Rien !”

Mme Moreau, surprise de ses façons, lui demanda ce qu’il voulait devenir.

— “Ministre !” répliqua Frédéric.

Et il affirma qu’il ne plaisantait nullement, qu’il prétendait se lancer dans la diplomatie, que ses études et ses instincts l’y poussaient. Il entrerait d’abord au Conseil d’Etat, avec la protection de M. Dambreuse.

— “Tu le connais donc ?”

— “Mais oui ! par M. Roque !”

— “Cela est singulier”, dit Mme Moreau.

Il avait réveillé dans son cœur ses vieux rêves d’ambition. Elle s’y abandonna intérieurement, et ne reparla plus des autres.

S’il eût écouté son impatience, Frédéric fût parti à l’instant même. Le lendemain, toutes les places dans les diligences étaient retenues ; il se rongea jusqu’au surlendemain, à sept heures du soir.

Ils s’asseyaient pour dîner, quand tintèrent à l’église trois longs coups de cloche ; et la domestique, entrant, annonça que Mme Eléonore venait de mourir.

Cette mort, après tout, n'était un malheur pour personne, pas même pour son enfant. La jeune fille ne s'en trouverait que mieux, plus tard.

Comme les deux maisons se touchaient, on entendait un grand va-et-vient, un bruit de paroles ; et l'idée de ce cadavre près d'eux jetait quelque chose de funèbre sur leur séparation. Mme Moreau, deux ou trois fois, s'essuya les yeux. Frédéric avait le cœur serré.

Le repas fini, Catherine l'arrêta entre deux portes. Mademoiselle voulait, absolument, le voir. Elle l'attendait dans le jardin. Il sortit, enjamba la haie, et, tout en se cognant aux arbres quelque peu, se dirigea vers la maison de M. Roque. Des lumières brillaient à une fenêtre au second étage ; puis une forme apparut dans les ténèbres, et une voix chuchota :

— “C'est moi.”

Elle lui sembla plus grande qu'à l'ordinaire, à cause de sa robe noire, sans doute. Ne sachant par quelle phrase l'aborder, il se contenta de lui prendre les mains, en soupirant :

— “Ah ! ma pauvre Louise !”

Elle ne répondit pas. Elle le regarda profondément, pendant longtemps. Frédéric avait peur de manquer la voiture ; il croyait entendre un roulement tout au loin, et, pour en finir :

— “Catherine m'a prévenu que tu avais quelque chose...”

— “Oui, c'est vrai ! je voulais vous dire...”

Ce vous l'étonna ; et, comme elle se taisait encore :

— “Eh bien, quoi ?”

— “Je ne sais plus. J'ai oublié ! Est-ce vrai que vous partez ?”

— “Oui, tout à l'heure.”

Elle répéta :

— “Ah ! tout à l'heure ?... tout à fait ?... nous ne nous reverrons plus ?”

Des sanglots l'étouffaient.

— “Adieu ! adieu ! embrasse-moi donc !”

Et elle le serra dans ses bras avec emportement.

DEUXIEME PARTIE

CHAPITRE 1

Quand il fut à sa place, dans le coupé, au fond, et que la diligence s'ébranla, emportée par les cinq chevaux détalant à la fois, il sentit une ivresse le submerger. Comme un architecte qui fait le plan d'un palais, il arrangea, d'avance, sa vie. Il l'emplit de délicatesses et de splendeurs ; elle montait jusqu'au ciel ; une prodigalité de choses y apparaissait ; et cette contemplation était si profonde, que les objets extérieurs avaient disparu.

Au bas de la côte de Sourdun, il s'aperçut de l'endroit où l'on était. On n'avait fait que cinq kilomètres, tout au plus ! Il fut indigné. Il abattit le vasistas pour voir la route. Il demanda plusieurs fois au conducteur dans combien de temps, au juste, on arriverait. Il se calma cependant, et il restait dans son coin, les yeux ouverts.

La lanterne, suspendue au siège du postillon, éclairait les croupes des limoniers. Il n'apercevait au-delà que les crinières des autres chevaux qui ondulaient comme des vagues blanches ; leurs haleines formaient un brouillard de chaque côté de l'attelage ; les chaînes de fer sonnaient, les glaces tremblaient dans leur châssis ; et la lourde voiture, d'un train égal, roulait sur le pavé. Ça et là, on distinguait le mur d'une grange, ou bien une auberge, toute seule. Parfois en passant dans les villages, le four d'un boulanger projetait des lueurs d'incendie, et la silhouette monstrueuse des chevaux courait sur l'autre maison en face. Aux relais, quand on avait dételé, il se faisait un grand silence, pendant une minute. Quelqu'un piétinait en haut, sous la bâche, tandis qu'au seuil d'une porte, une femme, debout, abritait sa chandelle avec sa main. Puis, le conducteur sautant sur le marchepied, la diligence repartait.

A Mormans, on entendit sonner une heure et un quart. — “C'est donc aujourd'hui”, pensa-t-il, “aujourd'hui même, tantôt !”

Mais, Peu à Peu ses espérances et ses souvenirs, Nogent, la rue de Choiseul, Mme Arnoux, sa mère, tout se confondait.

Un bruit sourd de planches le réveilla, on traversait le pont de Charenton, c'était Paris. Alors, ses deux compagnons, Otant l'un sa casquette, l'autre son foulard, se couvrirent de leur chapeau et causèrent. Le premier, un gros homme rouge, en redingote de velours, était un négociant ; le second venait dans la Capitale pour consulter un médecin ; — et, craignant de l'avoir incommodé pendant la nuit, Frédéric lui fit spontanément des excuses, tant il avait l'âme attendrie par le bonheur.

Le quai de la gare se trouvant inondé, sans doute, on continua tout droit, et la campagne recommença. Au loin de hautes cheminées d'usines fumaient. Puis on tourna dans Ivry. On monta une rue ; tout à coup il aperçut le dôme du Panthéon.

La plaine, bouleversée, semblait de vagues ruines. L'enceinte des fortifications y faisait un renflement horizontal ; et, sur les trottoirs en terre qui bordaient la route, de petits arbres sans branches étaient défendus par des lattes hérissées de clous. Des établissements de produits chimiques alternaient avec des chantiers de marchands de bois. De hautes portes, comme il y en a dans les fermes, laissaient voir, par leurs battants entrouverts, l'intérieur d'ignobles cours pleines d'immondices, avec des flaques d'eau sale au milieu. De longs cabarets, couleur sang de bœuf, portaient à leur premier étage, entre les fenêtres, deux queues de billard en sautoir dans une couronne de fleurs peintes ; çà et là, une bicoque de plâtre à moitié construite était abandonnée. Puis, la double ligne de maisons ne discontinua plus ; et, sur la nudité de leurs façades, se détachait, de loin en loin, un gigantesque cigare de fer-blanc, pour indiquer un débit de tabac. Des enseignes de sage-femme représentaient une matrone en bonnet, dodelinant un poupon dans une courtépointe garnie de dentelles. Des affiches couvraient l'angle des murs, et, aux trois quarts déchirées tremblaient au vent comme des guenilles. Des ouvriers en blouse passaient, et des haquets de brasseurs, des fourgons de blanchisseuses, des carioles de bouchers ; une pluie fine tombait, il faisait froid, le ciel était pâle, mais deux yeux qui valaient pour lui le soleil resplendissaient derrière la brume.

On s'arrêta longtemps à la barrière, car des coquetiers, des rouliers et un troupeau de moutons y faisaient de l'encombrement. Le factionnaire, la capote rabattue, allait et venait devant sa guérite pour se réchauffer. Le commis de l'octroi grimpa sur l'impériale, et une fanfare de cornet à piston éclata. On descendit le boulevard au grand trot, les palonniers battants, les traits flottants. La mèche du long fouet claquait dans l'air humide. Le conducteur lançait son cri sonore : "Allume ! allume ! ohé !" et les balayeurs se rangeaient, les piétons sautaient en arrière, la boue jaillissait contre les vasistas, on croisait des tombereaux, des cabriolets, des omnibus. Enfin la grille du Jardin des plantes se déploya.

La Seine, jaunâtre, touchait presque au tablier des ponts. Une fraîcheur s'en exhalait. Frédéric l'aspira de toutes ses forces, savourant ce bon air de Paris qui semble contenir des effluves amoureuses et des émanations intellectuelles ; il eut un attendrissement en apercevant le premier fiacre. Et il aimait jusqu'au seuil des marchands de vin garni de paille, jusqu'aux décrotteurs avec leurs boîtes, jusqu'aux garçons épiciers secouant leur brûloir à café. Des femmes trottaient sous des parapluies ; il se penchait pour distinguer leur figure ; un hasard pouvait avoir fait sortir Mme Arnoux.

Les boutiques défilaient, la foule augmentait, le bruit devenait plus fort. Après le quai Saint-Bernard, le quai de la Tournelle et le quai Montebello, on prit le quai Napoléon ; il voulut voir ses fenêtres, elles étaient loin. Puis on repassa la Seine sur le Pont-Neuf, on descendit jusqu'au Louvre ; et, par les rues Saint-Honoré, Croix des-Petits-Champs et du Bouloi, on atteignit la rue Coq-Héron, et l'on entra dans la cour de l'hôtel.

Pour faire durer son plaisir, Frédéric s'habilla le plus lentement possible, et même il se rendit à pied au boulevard Montmartre ; il souriait à l'idée de revoir, tout à l'heure, sur la plaque de marbre le nom chéri ; il leva les yeux. Plus de vitrines, plus de tableaux, rien !

Il courut à la rue de Choiseul. M. et Mme Arnoux n'y habitaient pas, et une voisine gardait la loge du portier ; Frédéric l'attendit ; enfin, il parut, ce n'était plus le même. Il ne savait point leur adresse.

Frédéric entra dans un café, et, tout en déjeunant, consulta l'Almanach du Commerce. Il y avait trois cents Arnoux, mais pas de Jacques Arnoux ! Où donc logeaient-ils ? Pellerin devait le savoir.

Il se transporta tout en haut du faubourg Poissonnière, à son atelier. La porte n'ayant ni sonnette ni marteau, il donna de grands coups de poing, et il appela, cria. Le vide seul lui répondit.

Il songea ensuite à Hussonnet. Mais où découvrir un pareil homme ? Une fois, Il l'avait accompagné jusqu'à la maison de sa maîtresse, rue de Fleurus. Parvenu dans la rue de Fleurus, Frédéric s'aperçut qu'il ignorait le nom de la demoiselle.

Il eut recours à la Préfecture de police. Il erra d'escalier en escalier, de bureau en bureau. Celui des renseignements se fermait. On lui dit de repasser le lendemain.

Puis il entra chez tous les marchands de tableaux qu'il put découvrir, pour savoir si l'on ne connaissait point Arnoux. M. Arnoux ne faisait plus le commerce.

Enfin, découragé, harassé, malade, il s'en revint à son hôtel et se coucha. Au moment où il s'allongeait entre ses draps, une idée le fit bondir de joie :

— “Regimbart ! quel imbécile je suis de n'y avoir pas songé !”

Le lendemain, dès sept heures, il arriva rue Notre-Dame-des-Victoires devant la boutique d'un rogommiste, où Regimbart avait coutume de prendre le vin blanc. Elle n'était pas encore ouverte ; il fit un tour de promenade aux environs, et, au bout d'une demi-heure, s'y présenta de nouveau. Regimbart en sortait. Frédéric s'élança dans la rue. Il crut même apercevoir au loin son chapeau ; un corbillard et des voitures de deuil s'interposèrent. L'embarras passé, la vision avait disparu.

Heureusement, il se rappela que le Citoyen déjeunait tous les jours à onze heures précises chez un petit restaurateur de la place Gaillon. Il s'agissait de patienter ; et, après une interminable flânerie de la Bourse à la Madeleine, et de la Madeleine au Gymnase, Frédéric, à onze heures précises, entra dans le restaurant de la place Gaillon, sûr d'y trouver son Regimbart.

— “Connais pas !” dit le gargotier d'un ton rogue.

Frédéric insistait ; il reprit :

— “Je ne le connais plus, monsieur !” avec un haussement de sourcils majestueux et des oscillations de la tête, qui décelaient un mystère.

Mais, dans leur dernière entrevue, le Citoyen avait parlé de l'estaminet Alexandre. Frédéric avala une et, sautant dans un cabriolet, s'enquit près du cocher s'il n'y avait point quelque part, sur les hauteurs de Sainte-Geneviève, un certain café Alexandre. Le cocher le conduisit rue des Francs-Bourgeois-Saint-Michel dans un établissement de ce nom-là, et à sa question : — “M. Regimbart, s'il vous plaît ?” le cafetier lui répondit, avec un sourire extra-gracieux :

— “Nous ne l’avons pas encore vu, monsieur”, tandis qu’il jetait à son épouse assise dans le comptoir, un regard d’intelligence.

Et aussitôt se tournant vers l’horloge :

— “Mais nous l’aurons, j’espère, d’ici à dix minutes, un quart d’heure tout au plus. — Célestin, vite les feuilles ! — Qu’est-ce que monsieur désire prendre ?”

Quoique n’ayant besoin de rien prendre, Frédéric avala un verre de rhum, puis un verre de kirsch, puis un verre de curaçao, puis différents grogs, tant froids que chauds. Il lut tout le Siècle du jour, et le relut ; il examina, jusque dans les grains du papier, la caricature du Charivari ; à la fin, il savait par cœur les annonces. De temps à autre, des bottes résonnaient sur le trottoir, c’était lui ! et la forme de quelqu’un se profilait sur les carreaux ; mais cela passait toujours !

Afin de se désennuyer, Frédéric changeait de place ; il alla se mettre dans le fond, puis à droite, ensuite à gauche ; et il restait au milieu de la banquette, les deux bras étendus. Mais un chat, foulant délicatement le velours du dossier, lui faisait des peurs en bondissant tout à coup, pour lécher les taches de sirop sur le plateau ; et l’enfant de la maison, un intolérable mioche de quatre ans, jouait avec une crécelle sur les marches du comptoir. Sa maman, petite femme pâlotte, à dents gâtées souriait d’un air stupide. Que pouvait donc faire Regimbart ? Frédéric l’attendait, perdu dans une détresse illimitée.

La pluie sonnait comme grêle, sur la capote du cabriolet. Par l’écartement du rideau de mousseline, il apercevait dans la rue le pauvre cheval, plus immobile qu’un cheval de bois. Le ruisseau, devenu énorme, coulait entre deux rayons des roues, et le cocher s’abritant de la couverture sommeillait ; mais, craignant que son bourgeois ne s’esquivât, de temps à autre il entrouvrait la porte, tout ruisselant comme un fleuve ; — et si les regards pouvaient user les choses, Frédéric aurait dissous l’horloge à force d’attacher dessus les yeux. Elle marchait, cependant. Le sieur Alexandre se promenait — de long en large, en répétant : “il va venir, allez ! il va venir !” et, pour le distraire, lui tenait des discours, parlait politique. Il poussa même la complaisance jusqu’à lui proposer une partie de dominos.

Enfin, à quatre heures et demie, Frédéric, qui était là depuis midi, se leva d’un bond, déclarant qu’il n’attendait plus.

— “Je n’y comprends rien moi-même”, répondit le cafetier d’un air candide, “c’est la première fois que manque M. Ledoux !”

— “Comment, M. Ledoux ?”

— “Mais oui, monsieur !”

— “J’ai dit Regimbart” s’écria Frédéric exaspéré.

— “Ah ! mille excuses vous faites erreur ! — N’est-ce pas, madame Alexandre, monsieur a dit : M. Ledoux ?”

Et, interpellant le garçon :

— “Vous l’avez entendu. vous-même, comme Moi’ ?” Pour se venger de son maître, sans doute. le garçon se contenta de sourire.

Frédéric se fit ramener vers les boulevards, indigné du temps perdu. furieux contre le Citoyen, implorant sa présence comme celle d’un dieu, et bien résolu à l’extraire du fond des caves les plus lointaines. Sa voiture l’agaçait, il la renvoya ; ses idées se brouillaient ; puis tous les noms des cafés qu’il avait entendu prononcer par cet imbécile jaillirent de sa mémoire, à la fois, comme les mille pièces d’un feu d’artifice : café Gascard, café Grimbert, café Halbout. estaminet Bordelais, Havanaïs, Havrais, Bœuf à la mode. brasserie Allemande, Mère Morel ; et il se transporta dans tous successivement. Mais, dans l’un. Regimbart venait de sortir ; dans un autre, il viendrait peut-être ; dans un troisième, on ne l’avait pas vu depuis six mois ; ailleurs, il avait commandé, hier. un gigot pour samedi. Enfin, chez Vautier, limonadier, Frédéric, ouvrant la porte, se heurta contre le garçon.

— “Connaissez-vous M. Regimbart ?”

— “Comment, monsieur, si je le connais ? C’est moi qui ai l’honneur de le servir. Il est en haut ; il achève de dîner !”

Et, la serviette sous le bras, le maître de l’établissement, lui-même, l’aborda :

— “Vous demandez M. Regimbart, monsieur ? il était ici à l’instant.”

Frédéric poussa un juron, mais le limonadier affirma qu’il le trouverait chez Bouttevilain, infailliblement.

— “Je vous en donne ma parole d’honneur ! il est parti un peu plus tôt que de coutume, car il a un rendez-vous d’affaires avec des messieurs. Mais vous le trouverez, je vous le répète, chez Bouttevilain, rue Saint-Martin, deuxième perron, à gauche, au fond de la cour, entresol, porte à droite !”

Enfin, il l’aperçut à travers la fumée des pipes, seul, au fond de l'arrière-buvette après le billard, une chope devant lui, le menton baissé et dans une attitude méditative.

— “Ah ! il y a longtemps que je vous cherchais, vous !”

Sans s'émouvoir, Regimbart lui tendit deux doigts seulement, et comme s'il l'avait vu la veille, il débita plusieurs phrases insignifiantes sur l'ouverture de la session.

Frédéric l'interrompit, en lui disant, de l'air le plus naturel qu'il put :

— “Arnoux va bien ?”

La réponse fut longue à venir, Regimbart se gargarisait avec son liquide.

— “Oui, pas mal !”

— “Où demeure-t-il donc, maintenant ?”

— “Mais... rue Paradis-Poissonnière”, répondit le Citoyen étonné.

— “Quel numéro ?”

— “Trente-sept, parbleu, vous êtes drôle !”

Frédéric se leva :

— “Comment, vous partez ?”

— “Oui, oui, j'ai une course, une affaire que j'oubliais ! Adieu !”

Frédéric alla de l'estaminet chez Arnoux, comme soulevé par un vent tiède et avec l'aisance extraordinaire que l'on éprouve dans les songes.

Il se trouva bientôt à un second étage, devant une porte dont la sonnette retentissait ; une servante parut ; une seconde porte s'ouvrit, Mme Arnoux était assise près du feu. Arnoux fit un bond et l'embrasse. Elle avait sur ses genoux un petit garçon de trois ans, à peu près ; sa fille, grande comme elle maintenant, se tenait debout, de l'autre côté de la cheminée.

— “Permettez-moi de vous présenter ce monsieur-là”, dit Arnoux, en prenant son fils par les aisselles.

Et il s'amusa quelques minutes à le faire sauter en l'air, très haut, pour le recevoir au bout de ses bras.

— “Tu vas le tuer ! ah ! mon Dieu ! finis donc !” s'écriait Mme Arnoux.

Mais Arnoux, jurant qu'il n'y avait pas de danger, continuait, et même zézéait des caresses en patois marseillais, son langage natal. — “Ah ! brave pichou, mon poulit rossignolet ! !” Puis il demanda à Frédéric pourquoi il avait été si longtemps sans leur écrire, ce qu'il avait pu faire là-bas, ce qui le ramenait.

— “Moi, à présent, cher ami, je suis marchand de faïences. Mais causons de vous !”

Frédéric alléguait un long procès, la santé de sa mère il insista beaucoup là-dessus, afin de se rendre intéressant. Bref, il se fixait à Paris, définitivement cette fois ; et il ne dit rien de l'héritage, — dans la peur de nuire à son passé.

Les rideaux, comme les meubles, étaient en damas de laine marron ; deux oreillers se touchaient contre le traversin ; une bouillotte chauffait dans les charbons ; et l'abat-jour de la lampe, posé au bord de la commode, assombrissait l'appartement. Mme Arnoux avait une robe de chambre en mérinos gros bleu. Le regard tourné vers les cendres et une main sur l'épaule du petit garçon, elle défaisait, de l'autre, le lacet de la brassière ; le mioche en chemise pleurait tout en se grattant la tête, comme M. Alexandre fils.

Frédéric s'était attendu à des spasmes de joie mais les passions s'étiolaient quand on les dépayse, et, ne retrouvant plus Mme Arnoux dans le milieu où il l'avait connue, elle lui semblait avoir perdu quelque chose, porter confusément comme une dégradation, enfin n'être pas la même. Le calme de son cœur le stupéfiait. Il s'informa des anciens amis, de Pellerin, entre autres.

— “Je ne le vois pas souvent”, dit Arnoux.

Elle ajouta :

— “Nous ne recevons plus, comme autrefois !” Était-ce pour l'avertir qu'on ne lui ferait aucune invitation ? Mais Arnoux, poursuivant ses cordialités, lui reprocha de n'être pas venu dîner avec eux, à l'improviste ; et il expliqua pourquoi il avait changé d'industrie.

— “Que voulez-vous faire dans une époque de décadence comme la nôtre ? La grande peinture est passée de mode ! D'ailleurs, on peut mettre de l'art partout. Vous savez, moi, j'aime le Beau ! il faudra un de ces jours que je vous mène à ma fabrique.”

Et il voulut lui montrer, immédiatement, quelques-uns de ses produits dans son magasin à l'entresol.

Les plats, les soupières, les assiettes et les cuvettes encombraient le plancher. Contre les murs étaient dressés de larges carreaux de pavage pour salles de bain et cabinets de toilette, avec sujets mythologiques dans le style de la Renaissance, tandis qu'au milieu une double étagère, montant jusqu'au plafond, supportait des vases à contenir la glace, des pots à fleurs, des candélabres, de petites jardinières et de grandes statuettes polychromes figurant un nègre ou une bergère pompadour. Les démonstrations d'Arnoux ennuyaient Frédéric, qui avait froid et faim.

Il courut au café Anglais, y soupa splendidement, et, tout en mangeant, il se disait :

— “J'étais bien bon là-bas avec mes douleurs ! A peine si elle m'a reconnu ! quelle bourgeoise !”

Et, dans un brusque épanouissement de santé, il se fit des résolutions d'égoïsme. Il se sentait le cœur dur comme la table où ses coudes posaient. Donc, il pouvait, maintenant, se jeter au milieu du monde, sans peur. L'idée des Dambreuse lui vint ; il les utiliserait ; puis il se rappela Deslauriers. “Ah ! ma foi, tant pis !” Cependant, il lui envoya, par un commissionnaire, un billet lui donnant rendez-vous le lendemain au Palais-Royal, afin de déjeuner ensemble.

La fortune n'était pas si douce pour celui-là.

Il s'était présenté au concours d'agrégation avec une thèse sur le droit de tester, où il soutenait qu'on devait le restreindre autant que possible ; — et, son adversaire l'excitant à lui faire dire des sottises, il en avait dit beaucoup, sans que les examinateurs bronchassent. Puis le hasard avait voulu qu'il tirât au sort, pour sujet de leçon, la Prescription. Alors, Deslauriers s'était livré à des théories déplorables ; les vieilles contestations devaient se produire comme les nouvelles ; pourquoi le propriétaire serait-il privé de son bien parce qu'il n'en peut fournir les titres qu'après trente et un an révolus ? C'était donner la sécurité de l'honnête homme à l'héritier du voleur enrichi. Toutes les injustices étaient consacrées par une extension de ce droit, qui était la tyrannie, l'abus de la force ! Il s'était même écrié :

— “Abolissons-le ; et les Francs ne pèseront plus sur les Gaulois, les Anglais sur les Irlandais, les Yankees sur les Peaux-Rouges, les Turcs sur les Arabes, les blancs sur les nègres, la Pologne...”

Le président l'avait interrompu :

— “Bien ! bien ! monsieur ! nous n'avons que faire de vos opinions politiques, vous vous représenterez plus tard !”

Deslauriers n'avait pas voulu se représenter. Mais ce malheureux titre XX du III<sup>e</sup> livre du Code civil était devenu pour lui une montagne d'achoppement. Il élaborait un grand ouvrage sur la Prescription, considérée comme base du droit civil et du droit naturel des peuples ; et il était perdu dans Dunod, Rogérius, Balbus, Merlin, Vazeille, Savigny, Tropiong, et autres lectures considérables. Afin de s'y livrer plus à l'aise, il s'était démis de sa place de maître-clerc. Il vivait en donnant des répétitions, en fabriquant des thèses ; et, aux séances de la Parlote, il effrayait par sa virulence le parti conservateur, tous les jeunes doctrinaires issus de M. Guizot, — si bien qu'il avait, dans un certain monde, une espèce de célébrité, quelque peu mêlée de défiance pour sa personne.

Il arriva au rendez-vous, portant un gros paletot doublé de flanelle rouge, comme celui de Sénécals autrefois.

Le respect humain, à cause du public qui passait, les empêcha de s'entreindre longuement, et ils allèrent jusque chez Véfour, bras dessus bras dessous, en ricanant de plaisir, avec une larme au fond des yeux. Puis, dès qu'ils furent seuls, Deslauriers s'écria :

— “Ah ! saprelotte, nous allons nous la repasser douce, maintenant !”

Frédéric n'aima point cette manière de s'associer, tout de suite, à sa fortune. Son ami témoignait trop de joie pour eux deux, et pas assez pour lui seul.

Ensuite, Deslauriers conta son échec, et peu à peu ses travaux, son existence, parlant de lui-même stoïquement et des autres avec aigreur. Tout lui déplaisait. Pas un homme en place qui ne fût un crétin ou une canaille. Pour un verre mal rincé, il s'emporta contre le garçon, et, sur le reproche anodin de Frédéric :

— “Comme si j'allais me gêner pour de pareils cocos, qui vous gagnent jusqu'à des six et huit mille francs par an, qui sont électeurs, éligibles peut-être ! Ah non,, non !”

Puis, d'un air enjoué :

— “Mais j'oublie que je parle à un capitaliste, à un Mondor, car tu es un Mondor, maintenant !”

Et, revenant sur l'héritage, il exprima cette idée : que les successions collatérales (chose injuste en soi, bien qu'il se réjouît de celle-là) seraient abolies, un de ces jours, à la prochaine révolution.

— “Tu crois ?” dit Frédéric.

— “Compte dessus” répondit-il. “Ça ne peut pas durer on souffre trop Quand je vois dans la misère des gens comme Sénécal...”

— “Toujours le Sénécal !” pensa Frédéric.

— “Quoi de neuf, du reste ? Es-tu encore amoureux de M<sup>me</sup> Arnoux ! C’est passé, hein ?”

Frédéric, ne sachant que répondre, ferma les yeux en baissant la tête.

À propos d’Arnoux, Deslauriers lui apprit que son journal appartenait maintenant à Hussonnet, lequel l’avait transformé. Cela s’appelait “L’Art, institut littéraire, société par actions de cent francs chacune ; capital social : quarante mille francs”, avec la faculté pour chaque actionnaire de pousser là sa copie ; car “la société a pour but de publier les œuvres des débutants, d’épargner au talent, au génie peut-être. les crises douloureuses qui abreuvent, etc..., tu vois la blague” Il y avait cependant quelque chose à faire, c’était de hausser le ton de ladite feuille, puis tout à coup, gardant les mêmes rédacteurs et promettant la suite du feuilleton, de servir aux abonnés un journal politique les avances ne seraient pas énormes.

— “Qu’en penses-tu, voyons veux-tu t’y mettre ?”

Frédéric ne repoussa pas la proposition. Mais il fallait attendre le règlement de ses affaires.

— “Alors, si tu as besoin de quelque chose...”

— “Merci, mon petit !” dit Deslauriers.

Ensuite, ils fumèrent des puros, accoudés sur la planche de velours, au bord de la fenêtre. Le soleil brillait, l’air était doux, des troupes d’oiseaux voletant s’abattaient dans le jardin ; les statues de bronze et de marbre, lavées par la pluie, miroitaient ; des bonnes en tablier causaient assises sur des chaises ; et l’on entendait les rires des enfants, avec le murmure continu que faisait la gerbe du jet d’eau.

Frédéric s’était senti troublé par l’amertume de Deslauriers ; mais, sous l’influence du vin qui circulait dans ses veines, à moitié endormi, engourdi, et recevant la lumière en plein visage, il n’éprouvait plus qu’un immense bien-être, voluptueusement stupide, — comme une plante saturée de chaleur et d’humidité. Deslauriers, les paupières entre-closes, regardait au loin, vaguement. Sa poitrine se gonflait, et il se mit à dire :

— “Ah ! c’était plus beau, quand Camille Desmoulins, debout là-bas sur une table, poussait le peuple à la Bastille ! On vivait dans ce temps-là, on pouvait s'affirmer, prouver sa force ! De simples avocats commandaient à des généraux, des va-nu-pieds battaient les rois, tandis qu'à présent..."

Il se tut, puis tout à coup :

— "Bah ! l'avenir est gros"

Et, tambourinant la charge sur les vitres, il déclama ces vers de Barthélémy :

Elle reparaitra, la terrible Assemblée

Dont, après quarante ans, votre tête est troublée,

Colosse qui sans peur marche d'un pas puissant.

"Je ne sais plus le reste ! Mais il est tard, si nous partions ?"

Et il continua, dans la rue, à exposer ses théories.

Frédéric, sans l'écouter, observait à la devanture des marchands les étoffes et les meubles convenables pour son installation ; et ce fut peut-être la pensée de Mme Arnoux qui le fit s'arrêter à l'étalage d'un brocanteur, devant trois assiettes de faïence. Elles étaient décorées d'arabesques jaunes, à reflets métalliques, et valaient cent écus la pièce. Il les fit mettre de côté.

— "Moi, à ta place", dit Deslauriers, "je m'achèterais plutôt de l'argenterie", décelant, par cet amour du cossu, l'homme de mince origine.

Dès qu'il fut seul, Frédéric se rendit chez le célèbre Pomadère, où il se commanda trois pantalons, deux habits, une pelisse de fourrure et cinq gilets ; puis chez un bottier, chez un chemisier, et chez un chapelier, ordonnant partout qu'on se hâtât le plus possible.

Trois jours après, le soir, à son retour du Havre, il trouva chez lui sa garde-robe complète ; et, impatient de s'en servir, il résolut de faire à l'instant même une visite aux Dambreuse. Mais il était trop tôt, huit heures à peine.

— "Si j'allais chez les autres ?", se dit-il.

Arnoux, seul, devant sa glace, était en train de se raser. Il lui proposa de le conduire dans un endroit où il s'amuserait, et, au nom de M. Dambreuse :

— "Ah ! ça se trouve bien ! Vous verrez là de ses amis venez donc ! ce sera drôle !"

Frédéric s'excusait, Mme Arnoux reconnut sa voix et lui souhaita le bonjour à travers la cloison, car sa fille était indisposée, elle-même souffrante ; et l'on entendait le bruit d'une cuiller contre un verre, et tout ce frémissement de choses délicatement remuées qui se fait dans la chambre d'un malade. Puis Arnoux disparut pour dire adieu à sa femme. Il entassait les raisons :

— “Tu sais bien que c'est sérieux. Il faut que j'y aille, j'y ai besoin, on m'attend.”

— “Va, va, mon ami. Amuse-toi !”

Arnoux héla un fiacre.

— “Palais-Royal ! galerie Montpensier.”

Et, se laissant tomber sur les coussins :

— “Ah ! comme je suis las, mon cher ! j'en crèverai. Du reste, je peux bien vous le dire, à vous.”

Il se pencha vers son oreille, mystérieusement :

— “Je cherche à retrouver le rouge de cuivre des Chinois.”

Et il expliqua ce qu'étaient la couverte et le petit feu.

Arrivé chez Chevet, on lui remit une grande corbeille, qu'il fit porter sur le fiacre. Puis il choisit pour “sa pauvre femme” du raisin, des ananas, différentes curiosités de bouche et recommanda qu'elles fussent envoyées de bonne heure, le lendemain.

Ils allèrent ensuite chez un costumier ; c'était d'un bal qu'il s'agissait. Arnoux prit une culotte de velours bleu, une veste pareille, une perruque rouge ; Frédéric un domino ; et ils descendirent rue de Laval, devant une maison illuminée au second étage par des lanternes de couleur.

Dès le bas de l'escalier, on entendait le bruit des violons.

— “Où diable me menez-vous ?” dit Frédéric.

— “Chez une bonne fille ! n'ayez pas peur !”

Un groom leur ouvrit la porte, et ils entrèrent dans l'antichambre, où des paletots, des manteaux et des châles étaient jetés en pile sur des chaises. Une jeune femme, en costume de dragon Louis XV, la traversait en ce moment-là. C'était Mlle Rose-Annette Bron, la maîtresse du lieu.

— “Eh bien ?” dit Arnoux.

— “C'est fait !” répondit-elle.

— “Ah ! merci, mon ange !”

Et il voulut l'embrasser.

— “Prends donc garde, imbécile ! tu vas gâter mon maquillage !”

Arnoux présenta Frédéric.

— “Tapez là dedans, monsieur, soyez le bienvenu !” Elle écarta une portière derrière elle, et se mit à crier emphatiquement :

— “Le sieur Arnoux, marmiton, et un prince de ses amis !”

Frédéric fut d’abord ébloui par les lumières ; il n’aperçut que de la soie, du velours, des épaules nues, une masse de couleurs qui se balançait aux sons d’un orchestre caché par des verdure, entre des murailles tendues de soie jaune, avec des portraits au pastel, çà et là, et des torchères de cristal en style Louis XVI. De hautes lampes, dont les globes dépolis ressemblaient à des boules de neige, dominaient des corbeilles de fleurs, posées sur des consoles, dans les coins ; — et, en face, après une seconde pièce plus petite, on distinguait, dans une troisième, un lit à colonnes torses, ayant une glace de Venise à son chevet.

Les danses s’arrêtèrent, et il y eut des applaudissements, un vacarme de joie, à la vue d’Arnoux s’avançant avec son panier sur la tête ; les victuailles faisaient bosse au milieu. — “Gare au lustre !” Frédéric leva les yeux : c’était le lustre en vieux saxe qui ornait la boutique de l’Art industriel ; le souvenir des anciens jours passa dans sa mémoire ; mais un fantassin de la Ligne en petite tenue, avec cet air nigaud que la tradition donne aux conscrits, se planta devant lui, en écartant les deux bras pour marquer l’étonnement ; et il reconnut, malgré les effroyables moustaches noires extra-pointues qui le défiguraient, son ancien ami Hussonnet. Dans un charabia moitié alsacien, moitié nègre, le bohème l’accablait de félicitations, l’appelant son colonel. Frédéric, décontenancé par toutes ces personnes ne savait que répondre. Un archet ayant frappé sur un pupitre, danseurs et danseuses se mirent en place.

Ils étaient une soixantaine environ, les femmes pour la plupart en villageoises ou en marquises, et les hommes, presque tous d’âge mûr, en costumes de routier, de débardeur ou de matelot.

Frédéric, s’étant rangé contre le mur, regarda le quadrille devant lui.

Un vieux beau, vêtu, comme un doge vénitien, d’une longue simarre de soie pourpre, dansait avec Mme Rosanette, qui portait un habit vert, une culotte de tricot et des bottes molles à éperons d’or. Le couple en face se composait d’un Arnaute chargé de yatagans et d’une

Suisse aux yeux bleus, blanche comme du lait, potelée comme une caille, en manches de chemise et corset rouge. Pour faire valoir sa chevelure qui lui descendait jusqu'aux jarrets, une grande blonde, marcheuse à l'Opéra, s'était mise en femme sauvage ; et, par-dessus son maillot de couleur brune, n'avait qu'un pagne de cuir, des bracelets de verroterie, et un diadème de clinquant, d'où s'élevait une haute gerbe en plumes de paon. Devant elle, un Pritchard, affublé d'un habit noir grotesquement large, battait la mesure avec son coude sur sa tabatière. Un petit berger Watteau, azur et argent comme un clair de lune, choquait sa houlette contre le thyrses d'une Bacchante, couronnée de raisins, une peau de léopard sur le flanc gauche et des cothurnes à rubans d'or. De l'autre côté une Polonaise, en spencer de velours nacarat, balançait son jupon de gaze sur ses bas de soie gris perle, pris dans des bottines roses cerclées de fourrure blanche. Elle souriait à un quadragénaire ventru, déguisé en enfant de chœur, et qui gambadait très haut, levant d'une main son surplis et retenant de l'autre sa calotte rouge. Mais la reine, l'étoile, c'était mademoiselle Loulou, célèbre danseuse des bals publics. Comme elle se trouvait riche maintenant, elle portait une large collerette de dentelle sur sa veste de velours noir uni ; et son large pantalon de soie ponceau, collant sur la croupe et serré à la taille par une écharpe de cachemire, avait, tout le long de la couture, des petits camélias blancs naturels. Sa mine pâle, un peu bouffie et à nez retroussé, semblait plus insolente encore par l'ébouffure de sa perruque où tenait un chapeau d'homme, en feutre gris, plié d'un coup de poing sur l'oreille droite ; et, dans les bonds qu'elle faisait, ses escarpins à boucles de diamants atteignaient presque au nez de son voisin, un grand Baron moyen âge tout empêtré dans une armure de fer. Il y avait aussi un Ange, un glaive d'or à la main, deux ailes de cygne dans le dos, et qui, allant, venant, perdant à toute minute son cavalier, un Louis XIV, ne comprenait rien aux figures et embarrassait la contredanse.

Frédéric, en regardant ces personnes, éprouvait un sentiment d'abandon, un malaise. Il songeait encore à Mme Arnoux et il lui semblait participer à quelque chose d'hostile se tramant contre elle.

Quand le quadrille fut achevé, Mme Rosanette l'aborda. Elle haletait un peu, et son hausse-col, poli comme un miroir, se soulevait doucement sous son menton.

— “Et vous, monsieur”, dit-elle, “vous ne dansez pas ?”

Frédéric s’excusa, il ne savait pas danser.

— “Vraiment ! mais avec moi ? bien sûr ?”

Et, posée sur une seule hanche, l’autre genou un peu rentré, en caressant de la main gauche le pommeau de nacre de son épée, elle le considéra pendant une minute, d’un air moitié suppliant, moitié gouaillieur. Enfin elle dit “Bonsoir !”, fit une pirouette, et disparut.

Frédéric, mécontent de lui-même, et ne sachant que faire, se mit à errer dans le bal.

Il entra dans le boudoir, capitonné de soie bleu pâle avec des bouquets de fleurs des champs, tandis qu’au plafond, dans un cercle de bois doré, des Amours, émergeant d’un ciel d’azur, batifolaient sur des nuages en forme d’édredon. Ces élégances, qui seraient aujourd’hui des misères pour les pareilles de Rosanette, l’éblouirent ; et il admira tout : les volubilis artificiels ornant le contour de la glace, les rideaux de la cheminée, le divan turc, et, dans un renforcement de la muraille, une manière de tente tapissée de soie rose, avec de la mousseline blanche par-dessus. Des meubles noirs à marqueterie de cuivre garnissaient la chambre à coucher, où se dressait, sur une estrade couverte d’une peau de cygne, le grand lit à baldaquin et à plumes d’autruche. Des épingles à tête de pierreries fichées dans des pelotes, des bagues traînant sur des plateaux, des médaillons à cercle d’or et des coffrets d’argent se distinguaient dans l’ombre, sous la lueur qu’épanchait une urne de Bohême, suspendue à trois chaînettes. Par une petite porte entrebâillée, on apercevait une serre chaude occupant toute la largeur d’une terrasse, et que terminait une volière à l’autre bout.

C’était bien là un milieu fait pour lui plaire. Dans une brusque révolte de sa jeunesse, il se jura d’en jouir, s’enhardit ; puis, revenu à l’entrée du salon, où il y avait plus de monde maintenant (tout s’agitait dans une sorte de pulvérulence lumineuse), il resta debout à contempler les quadrilles, clignant les yeux pour mieux voir, — et humant les molles senteurs de femmes, qui circulaient comme un immense baiser épandu.

Mais il y avait près de lui, de l’autre côté de la porte, Pellerin ; — Pellerin en grande toilette, le bras gauche dans la poitrine et tenant de la droite, avec son chapeau, un gant blanc, déchiré.

— “Tiens, il y a longtemps qu’on ne vous a vu ! où diable étiez-vous donc ? parti en voyage, en Italie ? Poncif, hein, l’Italie ? pas si raide qu’on dit ? N’importe ! apportez-moi vos esquisses, un de ces jours ?”

Et, sans attendre sa réponse, l’artiste se mit à parler de lui-même.

Il avait fait beaucoup de progrès, ayant reconnu définitivement la bêtise de la Ligne. On ne devait pas tant s’enquérir de la Beauté et de l’Unité, dans une œuvre, que du caractère et de la diversité des choses.

— “Car tout existe dans la nature, donc tout est légitime, tout est plastique. Il s’agit seulement d’attraper la note, voilà. J’ai découvert le secret !” Et lui donnant un coup de coude, il répéta plusieurs fois : — “J’ai découvert le secret, vous voyez ! Ainsi regardez-moi cette petite femme à coiffure de sphinx qui danse avec un postillon russe, c’est net, sec, arrêté, tout en méplats et en tons crus : de l’indigo sous les yeux, une plaque de cinabre à la joue, du bistre sur les tempes ; pif ! paf ! — Et il jetait, avec le pouce, comme des coups de pinceau dans l’air. — ” Tandis que la grosse, là-bas “, continua-t-il en montrant une Poissarde, en robe cerise avec une croix d’or au cou et un fichu de linon noué dans le dos, — ” rien que des rondeurs ; les narines s’épatent comme les ailes de son bonnet, les coins de la bouche se relèvent, le menton s’abaisse, tout est gras, fondu, copieux, tranquille et soleillant, un vrai Rubens ! Elles sont parfaites cependant ! Où est le type alors ? “Il s’échauffait.” Qu’est-ce qu’une belle femme ? Qu’est-ce que le beau ? Ah ! le beau ! me direz-vous... ” Frédéric l’interrompt pour savoir ce qu’était un pierrot à profil de bouc, en train de bénir tous les danseurs au milieu d’une pastourelle.

— “Rien du tout ! un veuf, père de trois garçons. Il les laisse sans culottes, passe sa vie au club, et couche avec la bonne.”

— “Et celui-là, costumé en bailli, qui parle dans l’embrasure de la fenêtre à une marquise-Pompadour ?” — “La marquise, c’est Mme Vandaël, l’ancienne actrice du Gymnase, la maîtresse du Doge, le comte de Palazot. Voilà vingt ans qu’ils sont ensemble ; on ne sait pourquoi. Avait-elle de beaux yeux, autrefois, cette femme-là ! Quant au citoyen près d’elle, on le nomme le capitaine d’Herbigny, un vieux de la vieille, qui n’a pour toute fortune que sa croix d’honneur et sa pension, sert d’oncle aux grisettes dans les solennités, arrange les duels et dîne en ville.”

— “Une canaille ?” dit Frédéric.

— “Non ! un honnête homme !”

— “Ah !”

L’artiste lui en nomma d’autres encore, quand, apercevant un monsieur qui portait comme les médecins de Molière une grande robe de serge noire, mais bien ouverte de haut en bas, afin de montrer toutes ses breloques :

— “Ceci vous représente le docteur Des Rogis, enragé de n’être pas célèbre, a écrit un livre de pornographie médicale, cire volontiers les bottes dans le grand monde, est discret ; ces dames l’adorent. Lui et son épouse (cette maigre châtelaine en robe grise) se trimbalent ensemble dans tous les endroits publics, et autres. Malgré la gêne du ménage, on a un jour, — thés artistiques où il se dit des vers. — Attention !”

En effet, le Docteur les aborda ; et bientôt ils formèrent tous les trois, à l’entrée du salon, un groupe de causeurs, où vint s’adjoindre Hussonnet, puis l’amant de la Femme-Sauvage, un jeune poète, exhibant, sous un court mantel à la François, la plus piètre des anatomies, et enfin un garçon d’esprit, déguisé en Turc de barrière. Mais sa veste à galons jaunes avait si bien voyagé sur le dos des dentistes ambulants, son large pantalon à plis était d’un rouge si déteint, son turban roulé comme une anguille à la tartare d’un aspect si pauvre, tout son costume enfin tellement déplorable et réussi, que les femmes ne dissimulaient pas leur dégoût. Le docteur l’en consola par de grands éloges sur la Débardeuse sa maîtresse. Ce Turc était fils d’un banquier.

Entre deux quadrilles, Rosanette se dirigea vers la cheminée, où était installé, dans un fauteuil, un petit vieillard replet, en habit marron, à boutons d’or. Malgré ses joues flétries qui tombaient sur sa haute cravate blanche, ses cheveux encore blonds, et frisés naturellement comme les poils d’un caniche, lui donnaient quelque chose de folâtre.

Elle l’écouta, penchée vers son visage. Ensuite, elle lui accommoda une verre de sirop ; et rien n’était mignon comme ses mains sous leurs manches de dentelles qui dépassaient les parements de l’habit vert. Quand le bonhomme eut bu, il les baisa.

— “Mais c’est M. Oudry, le voisin d’Arnoux !”

— “Il l’a perdu !” dit en riant Pellerin.

— “Comment ?”

Un postillon de Longjumeau la saisit par la taille, une valse commençait. Alors, toutes les femmes, assises autour du salon sur des banquettes, se levèrent à la file, prestement ; et leurs jupes, leurs écharpes, leurs coiffures se mirent à tourner.

Elles tournaient si près de lui, que Frédéric distinguait les gouttelettes de leur front ; — et ce mouvement giratoire de plus en plus vif et régulier, vertigineux, communiquant à sa pensée une sorte d'ivresse, y faisait surgir d'autres images, tandis que toutes passaient dans le même éblouissement, et chacune avec une excitation particulière selon le genre de sa beauté. La Polonaise, qui s'abandonnait d'une façon langoureuse, lui inspirait l'envie de la tenir contre son cœur, en filant tous les deux dans un traîneau sur une plaine couverte de neige. Des horizons de volupté tranquille, au bord d'un lac, dans un chalet, se déroulaient sous les pas de la Suissesse, qui valsait le torse droit et les paupières baissées. Puis, tout à coup, la Bacchante, penchant en arrière sa tête brune, le faisait rêver à des caresses dévoratrices, dans des bois de lauriers-roses, par un temps d'orage, au bruit confus des tambourins. La Poissarde, que la mesure trop rapide essoufflait, poussait des rires ; et il aurait voulu, buvant avec elle aux Porcherons, chiffonner à pleines mains son fichu, comme au bon vieux temps. Mais la Débardeuse, dont les orteils légers effleuraient à peine le parquet, semblait receler dans la souplesse de ses membres et le sérieux de son visage tous les raffinements de l'amour moderne, qui a la justesse d'une science et la mobilité d'un oiseau. Rosanette tournait, le poing sur la hanche ; sa perruque à marteau, sautillant sur son collet, envoyait de la poudre d'iris autour d'elle ; et, à chaque tour, du bout de ses éperons d'or, elle manquait d'attraper Frédéric.

Au dernier accord de la valse, Mlle Vatnaz parut. Elle avait un mouchoir algérien sur la tête, beaucoup de piastres sur le front, de l'antimoine au bord des yeux, avec une espèce de paletot en cachemire noir tombant sur un jupon clair, lamé d'argent, et elle tenait un tambour de basque à la main.

Derrière son dos marchait un grand garçon, dans le costume classique du Dante, et qui était (elle ne s'en cachait plus, maintenant) l'ancien chanteur de l'Alhambra, — lequel, s'appelant Auguste

Delamare, s'était fait appeler primitivement Anténor Dellamarre, puis Delmas, puis Belmar, et enfin Delmar, modifiant ainsi et perfectionnant son nom, d'après sa gloire croissante ; car il avait quitté le bastringue pour le théâtre, et venait même de débiter bruyamment à l'Ambigu, dans Gaspardo le Pêcheur.

Hussonnet, en l'apercevant, se renfrogna. Depuis qu'on avait refusé sa pièce, il exérait les comédiens. On n'imaginait pas la vanité de ces Messieurs, de celui-là, surtout ! “ — Quel poseur, voyez donc ! ”

Après un léger salut à Rosanette, Delmar s'était adossé à la cheminée ; et il restait immobile, une main sur le cœur, le pied gauche en avant, les yeux au ciel, avec sa couronne de lauriers dorés par-dessus son capuchon, tout en s'efforçant de mettre dans son regard beaucoup de poésie, pour fasciner les dames. On faisait, de loin, un grand cercle autour de lui.

Mais la Vatnaz, quand elle eut embrassé longuement Rosanette, s'en vint prier Hussonnet de revoir, sous le point de vue du style, un ouvrage d'éducation qu'elle voulait publier : la Guirlande des jeunes Personnes, recueil de littérature et de morale. L'homme de lettres promit son concours. Alors, elle lui demanda s'il ne pourrait pas, dans une des feuilles où il avait accès, faire mousser quelque peu son ami, et même lui confier plus tard un rôle. Hussonnet en oublia de prendre un verre de punch.

C'était Arnoux qui l'avait fabriqué ; et, suivi par le groom du Comte portant un plateau vide, il l'offrait aux personnes avec satisfaction.

Quand il vint à passer devant M. Oudry, Rosanette l'arrêta.

— “Eh bien, et cette affaire ?”

Il rougit quelque peu ; enfin, s'adressant au bon homme :

— “Notre amie m'a dit que vous auriez l'obligeance...”

— “Comment donc, mon voisin ! tout à vous.”

Et le nom de M. Dambreuse fut prononcé ; comme ils s'entretenaient à demi-voix, Frédéric les entendait confusément ; il se porta vers l'autre coin de la cheminée, où Rosanette et Delmar causaient ensemble.

Le cabotin avait une mine vulgaire, faite comme les décors de théâtre pour être contemplée à distance, des mains épaisses, de grands pieds, une mâchoire lourde ; et il dénigrait les acteurs les plus illustres, traitait de haut les poètes, disait : “mon organe, mon physique, mes moyens”, en émaillant son discours de mots peu intelligibles pour lui-même, et qu’il affectionnait, tels que “morbidezza, analogue et homogénéité” .

Rosanette l’écoutait avec de petits mouvements de tête approbatifs. On voyait l’admiration s’épanouir sous le fard de ses joues, et quelque chose d’humide passait comme un voile sur ses yeux clairs, d’une indéfinissable couleur. Comment un pareil homme pouvait-il la charmer ? Frédéric s’excitait intérieurement à le mépriser encore plus, pour bannir, peut-être, l’espèce d’envie qu’il lui portait.

Mlle Vatnaz était maintenant avec Arnoux ; et, tout en riant très haut, de temps à autre, elle jetait un coup d’oeil sur son amie, que M. Oudry ne perdait pas de vue.

Puis Arnoux et la Vatnaz disparurent ; le bonhomme vint parler bas à Rosanette.

— “Eh bien, oui, c’est convenu ! Laissez-moi tranquille.”

Et elle pria Frédéric d’aller voir dans la cuisine si M. Arnoux n’y était pas.

Un bataillon de verres à moitié pleins couvrait le plancher ; et les casseroles, les marmites, la turbatière, la poêle à frire sautaient. Arnoux commandait aux domestiques en les tutoyant, battait la rémolade, goûtait les sauces, rigolait avec la bonne.

— “Bien”, dit-il, “avertissez-la ! Je fais servir.”

On ne dansait plus, les femmes venaient de se rasseoir, les hommes se promenaient. Au milieu du salon, un des rideaux tendus sur une fenêtre se bombait au vent ; et la Sphinx, malgré les observations de tout le monde, exposait au courant d’air ses bras en sueur. Où donc était Rosanette ? Frédéric la chercha plus loin, jusque dans le boudoir et dans la chambre. Quelques- uns, pour être seuls, ou deux à deux, s’y étaient réfugiés. L’ombre et les chuchotements se mêlaient. Il y avait de petits rires sous des mouchoirs, et l’on entrevoyait au bord des corsages des frémissements d’éventails, lents et doux comme des battements d’aile d’oiseau blessé.

En entrant dans la serre, il vit, sous les larges feuilles d’un caladium, près le jet d’eau, Delmar, couché à plat ventre sur le canapé de toile ; Rosanette, assise près de lui, avait la main passée dans ses cheveux ; et ils se regardaient. Au même moment, Arnoux entra par l'autre côté, celui de la volière. Delmar se leva d'un bond, puis il sortit à pas tranquilles sans se retourner ; et même, s'arrêta près de la porte, pour cueillir une fleur d'hibiscus dont il garnit sa boutonnière. Rosanette pencha le visage ; Frédéric, qui la voyait de profil, s'aperçut qu'elle pleurait.

— “Tiens ! qu'as-tu donc ?” dit Arnoux.

Elle haussa les épaules sans répondre.

— “Est-ce à cause de lui ?” reprit-il.

Elle étendit les bras autour de son cou, et, le baisant au front, lentement :

— “Tu sais bien que je t'aimerai toujours, mon gros. N'y pensons plus ! Allons souper !”

Un lustre de cuivre à quarante bougies éclairait la salle, dont les murailles disparaissaient sous de vieilles faïences accrochées ; et cette lumière crue, tombant d'aplomb, rendait plus blanc encore, parmi les hors-d'œuvre et les fruits, un gigantesque turbot occupant le milieu de la nappe, bordée par des assiettes pleines de potage à la bisque. Avec un froufrou d'étoffes, les femmes, tassant leurs jupes, leurs manches et leurs écharpes, s'assirent les unes près des autres ; les hommes, debout, s'établirent dans les angles. Pellerin et M. Oudry furent placés près de Rosanette ; Arnoux était en face. Palazot et son amie venaient de partir.

— “Bon voyage !” dit-elle, “attaquons !”

Et l'Enfant de chœur, homme facétieux, en faisant un grand signe de croix, commença le Benedicite.

Les dames furent scandalisées, et principalement la Poissarde, mère d'une fille dont elle voulait faire une femme honnête. Arnoux, non plus, “n'aimait pas ça”, trouvant qu'on devait respecter la religion.

Une horloge allemande, munie d'un coq, carillonnant deux heures, provoqua sur le coucou force plaisanteries. Toutes sortes de propos s'ensuivirent : calembours, anecdotes, vantardises, gageures, mensonges tenus pour vrais, assertions improbables, un tumulte de paroles qui bientôt s'éparpilla en conversations particulières. Les vins circulaient, les plats se succédaient, le docteur découpait. On se lançait de loin une orange, un bouchon ; on quittait sa place pour causer avec quelqu'un. Souvent Rosanette se tournait vers Delmar, immobile derrière elle ; Pellerin bavardait, M. Oudry souriait. Mlle Vatnaz mangea presque à elle seule le buisson d'écrevisses, et les carapaces sonnaient sous ses longues dents. L'Ange, posée sur le tabouret du piano (seul endroit où ses ailes lui permirent de s'asseoir), mastiquait placidement, sans discontinuer.

— “Quel fourchette !” répétait l'Enfant de chœur ébahi, “quelle fourchette !”

Et la Sphinx buvait de l'eau-de-vie, criait à plein gosier, se démenait comme un démon. Tout à coup ses joues s'enflèrent, et, ne résistant plus au sang qui l'étouffait, elle porta sa serviette contre ses lèvres, puis la jeta sous la table.

Frédéric l'avait vue.

— “Ce n'est rien !”

Et, à ses instances pour partir et se soigner, elle répondit lentement :

— “Bah ! à quoi bon ? autant ça qu'autre chose ! la vie n'est pas si drôle !”

Alors, il frissonna, pris d'une tristesse glaciale, comme s'il avait aperçu des mondes entiers de misère et de désespoir, un réchaud de charbon près d'un lit de sangle, et les cadavres de la Morgue en tablier de cuir, avec le robinet d'eau froide qui coule sur leurs cheveux.

Cependant, Hussonnet, accroupi aux pieds de la Femme-Sauvage, braillait d'une voix enrouée, pour imiter l'acteur Grassot :

— “Ne sois pas cruelle, ô Celuta cette petite fête de famille est charmante ! Enivrez-moi de voluptés, mes amours ! Folichonnons ! folichonnons !”

Et il se mit à baiser les femmes sur l'épaule. Elles tressaillaient, piquées par ses moustaches ; puis il imagina de casser contre sa tête une assiette, en la heurtant d'un petit coup. D'autres l'imitèrent — , les morceaux de faïence volaient comme des ardoises par un grand vent, et la Débardeuse s'écria :

— “Ne vous gênez pas ! ça ne coûte rien ! Le bourgeois qui en fabrique nous en cadote !”

Tous les yeux se portèrent sur Arnoux. Il répliqua :

— “Ah ! sur facture, permettez !” tenant, sans doute, à passer pour n'être pas, ou n'être plus l'amant de Rosanette.

Mais deux voix furieuses s'élevèrent :

— “Imbécile !”

— “Polisson !”

— “A vos ordres !”

— “Aux vôtres !”

C’était le Chevalier moyen âge et le Postillon russe qui se disputaient ; celui-ci ayant soutenu que des armures dispensaient d’être brave, l’autre avait pris cela pour une injure. Il voulait se battre, tous s’interposaient, et le Capitaine, au milieu du tumulte, tâchait de se faire entendre.

— “Messieurs, écoutez-moi ! un mot ! J’ai de l’expérience, messieurs !”

Rosanette, ayant frappé avec son couteau sur un verre, finit par obtenir du silence ; et, s’adressant au Chevalier qui gardait son casque, puis au Postillon coiffé d’un bonnet à longs poils :

— “Retirez d’abord votre casserole ! ça m’échauffe ! — et vous, là-bas, votre tête de loup. — Voulez-vous bien m’obéir, saprelotte Regardez donc mes épaulettes Je suis votre maréchale”

Il s’exécutèrent, et tous applaudirent en criant — “Vive la Maréchale ! vive la Maréchale !” Alors, elle prit sur le poêle une bouteille de vin de Champagne, et elle le versa de haut, dans les coupes qu’on lui tendait. Comme la table était trop large, les convives, les femmes surtout, se portèrent de son côté, en se dressant sur la pointe des pieds, sur les barreaux des chaises, ce qui forma pendant une minute un groupe pyramidal de coiffures, d’épaules nues, de bras tendus, de corps penchés ; — et de longs jets de vin rayonnaient dans tout cela, car le Pierrot et Arnoux, aux deux angles de la salle, lâchant chacun une bouteille, éclaboussaient les visages. Les petits oiseaux de la volière, dont on avait laissé la porte ouverte, envahirent la salle, tout effarouchés, voletant autour du lustre, se cognant contre les carreaux, contre les meubles ; et quelques-uns, posés sur les têtes, faisaient au milieu des chevelures comme de larges fleurs.

Les musiciens étaient partis. On tira le piano de l’antichambre dans le salon. La Vatnaz s’y mit, et, accompagnée de l’Enfant de chœur qui battait du tambour de basque, elle entama une contredanse avec furie, tapant les touches comme un cheval qui piaffe, et se dandinant de la taille, pour mieux marquer la mesure. La Maréchale entraîna Frédéric, Hussonnet faisait la roue, la Débardeuse se disloquait comme un clown, le Pierrot avait des façons d’orang-outang, la Sauvagesse, les bras écartés, imitait l’oscillation d’une chaloupe. Enfin tous, n’en pouvant plus, s'arrêtèrent ; et on ouvrit une fenêtre.

Le grand jour entra, avec la fraîcheur du matin. Il y eut une exclamation d'étonnement, puis un silence. Les flammes jaunes vacillaient, en faisant de temps à autre éclater leurs bobèches ; des rubans, des fleurs et des perles jonchaient le parquet ; des taches de punch et de sirop poissaient les consoles ; les tentures étaient salies, les costumes fripés, poudreux ; les nattes pendaient sur les épaules ; et le maquillage, coulant avec la sueur, découvrait des faces blêmes, dont les paupières rouges clignotaient.

La Maréchale, fraîche comme au sortir d'un bain, avait les joues roses, les yeux brillants. Elle jeta au loin sa perruque ; et ses cheveux tombèrent autour d'elle comme une toison, ne laissant voir de tout son vêtement que sa culotte, ce qui produisit un effet à la fois comique et gentil.

La Sphinx, dont les dents claquaient de fièvre, eut besoin d'un châle.

Rosanette courut dans sa chambre pour le chercher, et, comme l'autre la suivait, elle lui ferma la porte au nez, vivement.

Le Turc observa, tout haut, qu'on n'avait pas vu sortir M. Oudry. Aucun ne releva cette malice, tant on était fatigué.

Puis, en attendant les voitures, on s'embobelina dans les capelines et les manteaux. Sept heures sonnèrent. L'Ange était toujours dans la salle, attablée devant une compote de beurre et de sardines ; et la Poissarde, près d'elle, fumait des cigarettes, tout en lui donnant des conseils sur l'existence.

Enfin, les fiacres étant survenus, les invités s'en allèrent. Hussonnet, employé dans une correspondance pour la province, devait lire avant son déjeuner cinquante-trois journaux la Sauvagesse avait une répétition à son théâtre, Pellerin un modèle, l'Enfant de chœur trois rendez-vous. Mais l'Ange, envahie par les premiers symptômes d'une indigestion, ne put se lever. Le Baron moyen âge la porta jusqu'au fiacre.

— “Prends garde à ses ailes !” cria par la fenêtre la Débardeuse.

On était sur le palier quand Mlle Vatnaz dit à Rosanette :

— “Adieu, chère ! C'était très bien, ta soirée.”

Puis se penchant à son oreille :

— “Garde-le !”

— “Jusqu’à des temps meilleurs”, reprit la Maréchale en tournant le dos, lentement.

Arnoux et Frédéric s’en revinrent ensemble, comme ils étaient venus. Le marchand de faïence avait un air tellement sombre, que son compagnon le crut indisposé.

— “Moi ? pas du tout !”

il se mordait la moustache, fronçait les sourcils, et Frédéric lui demanda si ce n’était pas ses affaires qui le tourmentaient.

— “Nullement !”

Puis tout à coup :

— “Vous le connaissiez, n’est-ce pas, le père Oudry ?”

Et, avec une expression de rancune :

— “Il est riche, le vieux gredin !”

Ensuite, Arnoux parla d’une cuisson importante que l’on devait finir aujourd’hui, à sa fabrique. Il voulait la voir. Le train partait dans une heure. “Il faut cependant que j’aille embrasser ma femme.”

— “Ah ! sa femme !” pensa Frédéric.

Puis il se coucha, avec une douleur intolérable à l’occiput ; et il but une carafe d’eau, pour calmer sa soif.

Une autre soif lui était venue, celle des femmes, du luxe et de tout ce que comporte l’existence parisienne. Il se sentait quelque peu étourdi, comme un homme qui descend d’un vaisseau ; et, dans l’hallucination du premier sommeil, il voyait passer et repasser continuellement les épaules de la Poissarde, les reins de la Débardeuse, les mollets de la Polonaise, la chevelure de la Sauvagesse. Puis deux grands yeux noirs, qui n’étaient pas dans le bal, parurent ; et légers comme des papillons, ardents comme des torches, ils allaient, venaient, vibraient, montaient dans la corniche, descendaient jusqu’à sa bouche. Frédéric s’acharnait à reconnaître ces yeux sans y parvenir. Mais déjà le rêve l’avait pris ; il lui semblait qu’il était attelé près d’Arnoux, au timon d’un fiacre, et que la Maréchale, à califourchon sur lui, l’éventrait avec ses éperons d’or.

CHAPITRE 2

Frédéric trouva, au coin de la rue Rumford, un petit hôtel et il s'acheta, tout à la fois le coupé, le cheval, les meubles et deux jardinières prises chez Arnoux, pour mettre aux deux coins de la porte dans son salon. Derrière cet appartement, étaient une chambre et un cabinet. L'idée lui vint d'y loger Deslauriers. Mais, comment la recevrait-il, elle, sa maîtresse future ? La présence d'un ami serait une gêne. Il abattit le refend pour agrandir le salon, et fit du cabinet un fumoir.

Il acheta les poètes qu'il aimait, des Voyages, des Atlas, des Dictionnaires, car il avait des plans de travail sans nombre ; il pressait les ouvriers, courait les magasins, et, dans son impatience de jouir, emportait tout sans marchander.

D'après les notes des fournisseurs, Frédéric s'aperçut qu'il aurait à déboursier prochainement une quarantaine de mille francs, non compris les droits de succession, lesquels dépasseraient trente-sept mille ; comme sa fortune était en biens territoriaux, il écrivit au notaire du Havre d'en vendre une partie, pour se libérer de ses dettes et avoir quelque argent à sa disposition. Puis, voulant connaître enfin cette chose vague, miroitante et indéfinissable qu'on appelle le monde, il demanda par un billet aux Dambreuse s'ils pouvaient le recevoir. Madame répondit qu'elle espérait sa visite pour le lendemain.

C'était jour de réception. Des voitures stationnaient dans la cour. Deux valets se précipitèrent sous la marquise, et un troisième, au haut de l'escalier, se mit à marcher devant lui.

Il traversa une antichambre, une seconde pièce, puis un grand salon à hautes fenêtres, et dont la cheminée monumentale supportait une pendule en forme de sphère, avec deux vases de porcelaine monstrueux où se hérissaient, comme deux buissons d'or, deux faisceaux de bobèches. Des tableaux dans la manière de l'Espagnolet étaient appendus au mur ; les lourdes portières en tapisserie tombaient majestueusement ; et les fauteuils, les consoles, les tables, tout le mobilier, qui était de style Empire, avait quelque chose d'imposant et de diplomatique. Frédéric souriait de plaisir, malgré lui.

Enfin il arriva dans un appartement ovale, lambrissé de bois de rose, bourré de meubles mignons et qu'éclairait une seule glace donnant sur un jardin. Mme Dambreuse était auprès du feu, une douzaine de personnes formant cercle autour d'elle. Avec un mot aimable, elle lui fit signe de s'asseoir, mais sans paraître surprise de ne l'avoir pas vu depuis longtemps.

On vantait, quand il entra, l'éloquence de l'abbé Cœur. Puis on déplora l'immoralité des domestiques, à propos d'un vol commis par un valet de chambre ; et les cancans se déroulèrent. La vieille dame de Sommers avait un rhume, Mlle de Turvisot se mariait, les Montcharron ne reviendraient pas avant la fin de janvier, les Bretancourt non plus, maintenant on restait tard à la campagne ; et la misère des propos se trouvait comme renforcée par le luxe des choses ambiantes ; mais ce qu'on disait était moins stupide que la manière de causer, sans but, sans suite et sans animation. Il y avait là, cependant, des hommes versés dans la vie, un ancien ministre, le curé d'une grande paroisse, deux ou trois hauts fonctionnaires du gouvernement ; ils s'en tenaient aux lieux communs les plus rebattus. Quelques-uns ressemblaient à des douairières fatiguées, d'autres avaient des tournures de maquignon ; et des vieillards accompagnaient leurs femmes, dont ils auraient pu se faire passer pour les grands-pères.

Mme Dambreuse les recevait tous avec grâce. Dès qu'on parlait d'un malade, elle fronçait les sourcils douloureusement, et prenait un air joyeux s'il était question de bals ou de soirées. Elle serait bientôt contrainte de s'en priver, car elle allait faire sortir de pension une nièce de son mari, une orpheline. On exalta son dévouement ; c'était se conduire en véritable mère de famille.

Frédéric l'observait. La peau mate de son visage paraissait tendue, et d'une fraîcheur sans éclat, comme celle d'un fruit conservé. Mais ses cheveux, tire-bouchonnés à l'anglaise, étaient plus fins que de la soie, ses yeux d'un azur brillant, tous ses gestes délicats. Assise au fond, sur la causeuse, elle caressait les floches rouges d'un écran japonaise, pour faire valoir ses mains, sans doute, de longues mains étroites, un peu maigres, avec des doigts retroussés par le bout. Elle portait une robe de moire grise, à corsage montant, comme une puritaine.

Frédéric lui demanda si elle ne viendrait pas cette année à la

Fortelle. Mme Dambreuse n'en savait rien. Il concevait cela, du reste : Nogent devait l'ennuyer. Les visites augmentaient. C'était un bruissement continu de robes sur les tapis ; les dames posées au bord des chaises, poussaient de petits ricanements, articulaient deux ou trois mots, et, au bout de cinq minutes, partaient avec leurs jeunes filles. Bientôt, la conversation fut impossible à suivre, et Frédéric se retirait quand Mme Dambreuse lui dit — “Tous les mercredis, n'est-ce pas, monsieur Moreau ?” rachetant par cette seule phrase ce qu'elle avait montré d'indifférence.

Il était content. Néanmoins, il huma dans la rue une large bouffée d'air ; et, par besoin d'un milieu moins artificiel, Frédéric se ressouvint qu'il devait une visite à la Maréchale.

La porte de l'antichambre était ouverte. Deux bichons havanais accoururent. Une voix cria :

— “Delphine ! Delphine ! — Est-ce vous, Félix ?”

Il se tenait sans avancer ; les deux petits chiens jappaient toujours. Enfin Rosanette parut, enveloppée dans une sorte de peignoir en mousseline blanche garnie de dentelles, pieds nus dans des babouches.

— “Ah ! pardon, monsieur ! Je vous prenais pour le coiffeur. Une minute ! je reviens !”

Et il resta seul dans la salle à manger.

Les persiennes en étaient closes. Frédéric la parcourait des yeux, en se rappelant le tapage de l'autre nuit, lorsqu'il remarqua au milieu, sur la table, un chapeau d'homme, un vieux feutre bossué, gras, immonde. A qui donc ce chapeau ? Montrant impudemment sa coiffe dé cousue, il semblait dire : “Je m'en moque après tout Je suis le maître !”

La Maréchale survint. Elle le prit, ouvrit la serre, l'y jeta, referma la porte (d'autres portes, en même temps, s'ouvraient et se refermaient), et, ayant fait passer Frédéric par la cuisine, elle l'introduisit dans son cabinet de toilette.

On voyait, tout de suite, que c'était l'endroit de la maison le plus hanté, et comme son vrai centre moral. Une perse à grands feuillages tapissait les murs, les fauteuils et un vaste divan élastique ; sur une table de marbre blanc s'espaçaient deux larges cuvettes en faïence bleue ; des planches de cristal formant étagère au-dessus étaient encombrées par des fioles, des brosses, des peignes, des bâtons de cosmétique, des boîtes à poudre ; le feu se mirait dans une haute psyché ; un drap pendait en dehors d'une baignoire, et des senteurs de pâte d'amandes et de benjoin s'exhalaient.

— “Vous excuserez le désordre ! Ce soir, je dîne en ville.”

Et, comme elle tournait sur ses talons, elle faillit écraser un des petits chiens. Frédéric les déclara charmants. Elle les souleva tous les deux, et haussant jusqu'à lui leur museau noir :

— “Voyons, faites une risette, baissez le monsieur.” Un homme, habillé d'une sale redingote à collet de fourrure, entra brusquement.

— “Félix, mon brave”, dit-elle, “vous aurez votre affaire dimanche prochain, sans faute.”

L'homme se mit à la coiffer. Il lui apprenait des nouvelles de ses amies : Mme de Rochegune, Mme de Saint-Florentin, Mme Lombard, toutes étant nobles comme à l'hôtel Dambreuse. Puis il causa théâtres ; on donnait le soir à l'Ambigu une représentation extraordinaire.

— “Irez-vous ?”

— “Ma foi, non ! Je reste chez moi.”

Delphine parut. Elle la gronda pour être sortie sans sa permission. L'autre jura qu'elle “rentrait du marché”.

— “Eh bien, apportez-moi votre livre ! — Vous permettez, n'est-ce pas ?”

Et, lisant à demi-voix le cahier, Rosanette faisait des observations sur chaque article. L'addition était fausse.

— “Rendez-moi quatre sous !”

Delphine les rendit, et, quand elle l'eut congédiée

— “Ah ! Sainte Vierge ! est-on assez malheureux avec ces gens-là !”

Frédéric fut choqué de cette récrimination. Elle lui rappelait trop les autres, et établissait entre les deux maisons une sorte d'égalité fâcheuse.

Delphine, étant revenue, s'approcha de la Maréchale pour chuchoter un mot à son oreille.

— “Eh non ! je n'en veux pas !”

Delphine se présenta de nouveau.

— “Madame, elle insiste.”

— “Ah ! quel embêtement ! Flanque-la dehors !”

Au même instant, une vieille dame habillée de noir poussa la porte. Frédéric n'entendit rien, ne vit rien ; Rosanette s'était précipitée dans la chambre, à sa rencontre.

Quand elle reparut, elle avait les pommettes rouges et elle s'assit dans un des fauteuils, sans parler. Une larme tomba sur sa joue ; puis se tournant vers le jeune homme, doucement :

— “Quel est votre petit nom ?”

— “Frédéric.”

— “Ah ! Federico ! Ça ne vous gêne pas que je vous appelle comme ça ?”

Et elle le regardait d'une façon câline, presque amoureuse. Tout à coup, elle poussa un cri de joie à la vue de Mlle Vatnaz.

La femme artiste n'avait pas de temps à perdre, devant, à six heures juste, présider sa table d'hôte ; et elle haletait, n'en pouvant plus. D'abord, elle retira de son cabas une chaîne de montre avec un papier, puis différents objets, des acquisitions.

— “Tu sauras qu'il y a, rue Joubert, des gants de Suède à trente-six sous magnifiques ! Ton teinturier demande encore huit jours. Pour la guipure, j'ai dit qu'on repasserait. Bugneaux a reçu l'acompte. Voilà tout, il me semble ? C'est cent quatre-vingt-cinq francs que tu me dois !”

Rosanette alla prendre dans un tiroir dix napoléons. Aucune des deux n'avait de monnaie, Frédéric en offrit.

— “Je vous les rendrai”, dit la Vatnaz, en fourrant les quinze francs dans son sac. “Mais vous êtes un vilain. Je ne vous aime plus, vous ne m'avez pas fait danser une seule fois, l'autre jour ! — Ah ! ma chère, j'ai découvert, quai Voltaire, à une boutique, un cadre d'oiseaux-mouches empaillés qui sont des amours. A ta place, je me les donnerais. Tiens ! Comment trouves-tu ?”

Et elle exhiba un vieux coupon de soie rose qu'elle avait acheté au Temple pour faire un pourpoint moyen âge à Delmar.

— “Il est venu aujourd'hui, n'est-ce pas ?”

— “Non !”

— “C'est singulier”

Et, une minute après :

— “Où vas-tu ce soir ?”

— “Chez Alphonsine”, dit Rosanette ; ce qui était la troisième version sur la manière dont elle devait passer la soirée.

Mlle Vatnaz reprit :

— “Et le vieux de la Montagne, quoi de neuf ?”

Mais, d’un brusque clin d’oeil, la Maréchale lui commanda de se taire ; et elle reconduisit Frédéric jusque dans l’antichambre, pour savoir s’il verrait bientôt Arnoux.

— “Priez-le donc de venir ; pas devant son épouse, bien entendu !”

Au haut des marches, un parapluie était posé contre le mur, près d’une paire de socques.

— “Les caoutchoucs de la Vatnaz”, dit Rosanette. “Quel pied, hein ? Elle est forte, ma petite amie !”

Et d’un ton mélodramatique, en faisant rouler la dernière lettre du mot :

— “Ne pas s’y fierrr !”

Frédéric, enhardi par cette espèce de confiance, voulut la baiser sur le col. Elle dit froidement :

— “Oh ! faites ! Ça ne coûte rien !”

Il était léger en sortant de là, ne doutant pas que la Maréchale ne devînt bientôt sa maîtresse. Ce désir en éveilla un autre ; et, malgré l’espèce de rancune qu’il lui gardait, il eut envie de voir Mme Arnoux.

D’ailleurs, il devait y aller pour la commission de Rosanette.

— “Mais, à présent”, songea-t-il (six heures sonnaient), “Arnoux est chez lui, sans doute.”

Il ajourna sa visite au lendemain.

Elle se tenait dans la même attitude que le premier jour, et cousait une chemise d’enfant. Le petit garçon, à ses pieds, jouait avec une ménagerie de bois ; Marthe, un peu plus loin, écrivait.

Il commença par la complimenter de ses enfants. Elle répondit sans aucune exagération de bêtise maternelle.

La chambre avait un aspect tranquille. Un beau soleil passait par les carreaux, les angles des meubles reluisaient, et, comme Mme Arnoux était assise auprès de la fenêtre, un grand rayon, frappant les accroche-cœurs de sa nuque, pénétrait d’un fluide d’or sa peau ambrée. Alors, il dit :

— “Voilà une jeune personne qui est devenue bien grande depuis trois ans ! — Vous rappelez-vous, Mademoiselle, quand vous dormiez sur mes genoux, dans la voiture ?” Marthe ne se rappelait pas. “Un soir, en revenant de Saint-Cloud ?”

Mme Arnoux eut un regard singulièrement triste. Était-ce pour lui défendre toute allusion à leur souvenir commun ?

Ses beaux yeux noirs, dont la sclérotique brillait, se mouvaient doucement sous leurs paupières un peu lourdes, et il y avait dans la profondeur de ses prunelles une bonté infinie. Il fut ressaisi par un amour plus fort que jamais, immense : c'était une contemplation qui l'engourdisait, il la secoua pourtant. Comment se faire valoir ? par quels moyens ? Et, ayant bien cherché, Frédéric ne trouva rien de mieux que l'argent. Il se mit à parier du temps, lequel était moins froid qu'au Havre.

— “Vous y avez été ?”

— “Oui, pour une affaire... de famille... un héritage.” — “Ah ! j'en suis bien contente”, reprit-elle avec un air de plaisir tellement vrai, qu'il en fut touché comme d'un grand service.

Puis elle lui demanda ce qu'il voulait faire, un homme devant s'employer à quelque chose. Il se rappela son mensonge et dit qu'il espérait parvenir au conseil d'Etat, grâce à M. Dambreuse, le député.

— “Vous le connaissez peut-être ?”

— “De nom, seulement.”

Puis, d'une voix basse :

— “Il vous a mené au bal, l'autre jour, n'est-ce pas ?” Frédéric se taisait.

— “C'est ce que je voulais savoir, merci.”

Ensuite, elle lui fit deux ou trois questions discrètes sur sa famille et sa province. C'était bien aimable, d'être resté là-bas si longtemps, sans les oublier.

— “Mais... le pouvais-je ?” reprit-il. “En doutiez-vous ?”

Mme Arnoux se leva.

— “Je crois que vous nous portez une bonne et solide affection. — Adieu... au revoir !”

Et elle tendit sa main d'une manière franche et virile. N'était-ce pas un engagement, une promesse ? Frédéric se sentait tout joyeux de vivre ; il se retenait pour ne pas chanter, il avait besoin de se répandre, de faire des générosités et des aumônes. Il regarda autour de lui s'il n'y avait personne à secourir. Aucun misérable ne passait ; et sa velléité de dévouement s'évanouit, car il n'était pas homme à en chercher au loin les occasions.

Puis il se ressouvint de ses amis. Le premier auquel il songea fut Hussonnet, le second Pellerin. La position infime de Dussardier commandait naturellement des égards ; quant à Cisy, il se réjouissait de lui faire voir un peu sa fortune. Il écrivit donc à tous les quatre de venir pendre la crémaillère le dimanche suivant, à onze heures juste, et il chargea Deslauriers d'amener Sénécal.

Le répétiteur avait été congédié de son troisième pensionnat pour n'avoir point voulu de distribution de prix, usage qu'il regardait comme funeste à l'égalité. Il était maintenant chez un constructeur de machines, et n'habitait plus avec Deslauriers depuis six mois.

Leur séparation n'avait eu rien de pénible. Sénécal, dans les derniers temps, recevait des hommes en blouse, tous patriotes, tous travailleurs, tous braves gens, mais dont la compagnie semblait fastidieuse à l'avocat. D'ailleurs, certaines idées de son ami, excellentes comme armes de guerre, lui déplaisaient. Il s'en taisait par ambition, tenant à le ménager pour le conduire, car il attendait avec impatience un grand bouleversement où il comptait bien faire son trou, avoir sa place.

Les convictions de Sénécal étaient plus désintéressées. Chaque soir, quand sa besogne était finie, il regagnait sa mansarde, et il cherchait dans les livres de quoi justifier ses rêves. Il avait annoté le Contrat social. Il se bourrait de la Revue Indépendante. Il connaissait Mably, Morelly, Fourier, Saint-Simon, Comte, Cabet, Louis Blanc, la lourde charretée des écrivains socialistes, ceux qui réclament pour l'humanité le niveau des casernes, ceux qui voudraient la divertir dans un lupanar ou la plier sur un comptoir ; et, du mélange de tout cela, il s'était fait un idéal de démocratie vertueuse, ayant le double aspect d'une métairie et d'une filature, une sorte de Lacédémone américaine où l'individu n'existerait que pour servir la Société, plus omnipotente, absolue, infaillible et divine que les Grands Lamas et les Nabuchodonosors. Il n'avait pas un doute sur l'éventualité prochaine de cette conception, et tout ce qu'il jugeait lui être hostile, Sénécal s'acharnait dessus, avec des raisonnements de géomètre et une bonne foi d'inquisiteur. Les titres nobiliaires, les croix, les panaches, les livrées surtout, et même les réputations trop sonores le scandalisaient, — ses études comme ses souffrances avivant chaque jour sa haine essentielle de toute distinction ou supériorité quelconque.

— “Qu'est-ce que je dois à ce monsieur pour lui faire des politesses ? S'il voulait de moi, il pouvait venir" Deslauriers l'entraîna.

Ils trouvèrent leur ami dans sa chambre à coucher. Stores et doubles rideaux, glace de Venise, rien n'y manquait ; Frédéric, en veste de velours, était renversé dans une bergère, où il fumait des cigarettes de tabac turc.

Sénécal se rembrunit, comme les cagots amenés dans les réunions de plaisir. Deslauriers embrassa tout d'un seul coup d'oeil ; puis, le saluant très bas :

— "Monseigneur ! je vous présente mes respects"

Dussardier lui sauta au cou.

— "Vous êtes donc riche, maintenant ? Ah ! tant mieux, nom d'un chien, tant mieux !"

Cisy parut, avec un crêpe à son chapeau. Depuis la mort de sa grand-mère, il jouissait d'une fortune considérable, et tenait moins à s'amuser qu'à se distinguer des autres, à n'être pas comme tout le monde, enfin à "avoir du cachet" . C'était son mot.

Il était midi cependant, et tous bâillaient ; Frédéric attendait quelqu'un. Au nom d'Arnoux, Pellerin fit la grimace. Il le considérait comme un renégat depuis qu'il avait abandonné les arts.

— "Si l'on se passait de lui ? qu'en dites-vous ?"

Tous approuvèrent.

Un domestique en longues guêtres ouvrit la porte, et l'on aperçut la salle à manger avec sa haute plinthe en chêne relevé d'or et ses deux dressoirs chargés de vaisselle. Les bouteilles de vin chauffaient sur le poêle les lames des couteaux neufs miroitaient près des huîtres il y avait dans le ton laiteux des verres-mousseline comme une douceur engageante, et la table disparaissait sous du gibier, des fruits, des choses extraordinaires. Ces attentions furent perdues pour Sénécal.

Il commença par demander du pain de ménage (le plus ferme possible), et, à ce propos, paria des meurtres de Buzançais et de la crise des subsistances.

Rien de tout cela ne serait survenu si on protégeait mieux l'agriculture, si tout n'était pas livré à la concurrence, à l'anarchie, à la déplorable maxime du "laissez faire, laissez passer" ! Voilà comment se constituait la féodalité de l'argent, pire que l'autre ! Mais qu'on y prenne garde ! le peuple, à la fin, se lassera, et pourrait faire payer ses souffrances aux détenteurs du capital, soit par de sanglantes proscriptions, ou par le pillage de leurs hôtels.

Frédéric entrevit dans un éclair, un flot d'hommes aux bras nus envahissant le grand salon de Mme Dambreuse, cassant les glaces à coups de pique.

Sénécals continuait : l'ouvrier, vu l'insuffisance des salaires, était plus malheureux que l'ilote, le nègre et le paria, s'il a des enfants surtout.

— “Doit-il s'en débarrasser par l'asphyxie, comme le lui conseille je ne sais plus quel docteur anglais, issu de Malthus”

Et se tournant vers Cisy :

— “En serons-nous réduits aux conseils de l'infâme Malthus ?”

Cisy, qui ignorait l'infamie et même l'existence de Malthus, répondit qu'on secourait pourtant beaucoup de misères, et que les classes élevées...

— “Ah ! les classes élevées !” dit, en ricanant, le socialiste. “D'abord, il n'y a pas de classes élevées ; on n'est élevé que par le cœur ! Nous ne voulons pas d'aumônes, entendez-vous ! mais l'égalité, la juste répartition des produits.”

Ce qu'il demandait, c'est que l'ouvrier pût devenir capitaliste, comme le soldat colonel. Les jurandes, au moins, en limitant le nombre des apprentis, empêchaient l'encombrement des travailleurs, et le sentiment de la fraternité se trouvait entretenu par les fêtes, les bannières.

Hussonnet comme poète, regrettait les bannières Pellerin aussi, prédilection qui lui était venue au café Dagneaux, en écoutant causer des phalanstériens. Il déclara Fourier un grand homme.

— “Allons donc !” dit Deslauriers. “Une vieille bête ! qui voit dans les bouleversements d'empires des effets de la vengeance divine. C'est comme le sieur Saint-Simon et son église, avec sa haine de la Révolution française : un tas de farceurs qui voudraient nous refaire le catholicisme !”

M. de Cisy, pour s'éclairer, sans doute, ou donner de lui une bonne opinion, se mit à dire doucement :

— “Ces deux savants ne sont donc pas de l'avis de Voltaire ?”

— “Celui-là, je vous l'abandonne !” reprit Sénécals.

— “Comment ? moi, je croyais...”

— “Eh non ! il n'aimait pas le peuple”

Puis la conversation descendit aux événements contemporains : les mariages espagnols, les dilapidations de Rochefort, le nouveau chapitre de Saint-Denis, ce qui amènerait un redoublement d'impôts. Selon Sénécals, on en payait assez, cependant !

— “Et pourquoi, mon Dieu ? pour élever des palais aux singes du Muséum, faire parader sur nos places de brillants états-majors, ou soutenir, parmi les valets du Château, une étiquette gothique !”

— “, J’ai lu dans la Mode”, dit Cisy, “qu’à la Saint-Ferdinand, au bal des Tuileries, tout le monde était déguisé en chicards.”

— “Si ce n’est pas pitoyable !” fit le socialiste, en haussant de dégoût les épaules.

— “Et le musée de Versailles !” s’écria Pellerin. “Parlons-en ! Ces imbéciles-là ont raccourci un Delacroix et rallongé un Gros ! Au Louvre, on a si bien restauré, gratté et tripoté toutes les toiles, que, dans dix ans, peut-être pas une ne restera. Quant aux erreurs du catalogue, un Allemand a écrit dessus tout un livre. Les étrangers, ma parole, se fichent de nous !”

— “Oui, nous sommes la risée de l’Europe”, dit Sénécals.

— “C’est parce que l’Art est inféodé à la Couronne.”

— “Tant que vous n’aurez pas le suffrage universel...”

— “Permettez !” car l’artiste, refusé depuis vingt ans à tous les Salons, était furieux contre le Pouvoir. “Eh qu’on nous laisse tranquilles. Moi, je ne demande rien seulement les Chambres devraient statuer sur les intérêts de l’Art. Il faudrait établir une chaire d’esthétique, et dont le professeur, un homme à la fois praticien et philosophe, parviendrait, j’espère, à grouper la multitude. — Vous feriez bien, Hussonnet, de toucher un mot de ça dans votre journal ?”

— “Est-ce que les journaux sont libres ? est-ce que nous le sommes ?” dit Deslauriers avec emportement. “Quand on pense qu’il peut y avoir jusqu’à vingt-huit formalités pour établir un batelet sur une rivière, ça me donne envie d’aller vivre chez les anthropophages ! Le Gouvernement nous dévore ! Tout est à lui, la philosophie, le droit, les arts, l’air du ciel ; et la France râle, énervée, sous la botte du gendarme et la soutane du calotin !”

Le futur Mirabeau épanchait ainsi sa bile, largement. Enfin, il prit son verre, se leva, et, le poing sur la hanche, l’oeil allumé :

— “Je bois à la destruction complète de l’ordre actuel, c’est-à-dire de tout ce qu'on nomme Privilège, Monopole, Direction, Hiérarchie, Autorité, Etat !" et, d'une voix plus haute : "que je voudrais briser comme ceci !" en lançant sur la table le beau verre à patte, qui se fracassa en mille morceaux.

Tous applaudirent, et Dussardier principalement.

Le spectacle des injustices lui faisait bondir le cœur. Il s'inquiétait de Barbès ; il était de ceux qui se jettent sous les voitures pour porter secours aux chevaux tombés. Son érudition se bornait à deux ouvrages, l'un intitulé Crimes des rois, l'autre Mystères du Vatican. Il avait écouté l'avocat bouche bée, avec délices. Enfin, n'y tenant plus :

— "Moi, ce que je reproche à Louis-Philippe, c'est d'abandonner les Polonais !"

— "Un moment !" dit Hussonnet. "D'abord, la Pologne n'existe pas ; c'est une invention de Lafayette ! Les Polonais, règle générale, sont tous du faubourg Saint-Marceau, les véritables s'étant noyés avec Poniatowski." Bref, "il ne donnait plus là-dedans", il était "revenu de tout ça !" C'était comme le serpent de mer, la révocation de l'édit de Nantes et "cette vieille blague de la Saint-Barthélemy !"

Sénécal, sans défendre les Polonais, releva les derniers mots de l'homme de lettres. On avait calomnié les papes, qui, après tout, défendaient le peuple, et il appelait la Ligue "l'aurore de la Démocratie, un grand mouvement égalitaire contre l'individualisme des protestants."

Frédéric était un peu surpris par ces idées. Elles ennuyaient Cisy probablement, car il mit la conversation sur les tableaux vivants du Gymnase, qui attiraient alors beaucoup de monde.

Sénécal s'en affligea. De tels spectacles corrompaient les filles du prolétaire ; puis on les voyait étaler un luxe insolent. Aussi approuvait-il les étudiants bavarois qui avaient outragé Lola Montés. A l'instar de Rousseau, il faisait plus de cas de la femme d'un charbonnier que de la maîtresse d'un roi.

— "Vous blaguez les truffes !" répliqua majestueusement Hussonnet. Et il prit la défense de ces dames, en faveur de Rosanette. Puis, comme il parlait de son bal et du costume d'Arnoux :

— "On prétend qu'il branle dans le manche ?" dit Pellerin.

Le marchand de tableaux venait d'avoir un procès pour ses terrains de Belleville, et il était actuellement dans une compagnie de kaolin bas-breton avec d'autres farceurs de son espèce.

Dussardier en savait davantage ; car son patron à lui, M. Moussinot, ayant été aux informations sur Arnoux près du banquier Oscar Lefebvre, celui-ci avait répondu qu'il le jugeait peu solide, connaissant quelques-uns de ses renouvellements.

Le dessert était fini ; on passa dans le salon, tendu, comme celui de la Maréchale, en damas jaune, et de style Louis XVI.

Pellerin blâma Frédéric de n'avoir pas choisi, plutôt, le style néo-grec ; Sénécals frota des allumettes contre les tentures, Deslauriers ne fit aucune observation. Il en fit dans la bibliothèque, qu'il appela une bibliothèque de petite fille. La plupart des littérateurs contemporains s'y trouvaient. Il fut impossible de parler de leurs ouvrages, car Hussonnet, immédiatement, contait des anecdotes sur leurs personnes, critiquait leurs figures, leurs mœurs, leur costume, exaltant les esprits de quinzisième ordre, dénigrant ceux du premier, et déplorant, bien entendu, la décadence moderne. Telle chansonnette de villageois contenait, à elle seule, plus de poésie que tous les lyriques du XIXe siècle ; Balzac était surfait, Byron démoli, Hugo n'entendait rien au théâtre, etc.

— "Pourquoi donc", dit Sénécals, "n'avez-vous pas les volumes de nos poètes-ouvriers ?"

Et M. de Cisy, qui s'occupait de littérature, s'étonna de ne pas voir sur la table de Frédéric "quelques-unes de ces physiologies nouvelles, physiologie du fumeur, du pêcheur à la ligne, de l'employé de barrière" .

Ils arrivèrent à l'agacer tellement, qu'il eut envie de les pousser dehors par les épaules. "Mais je deviens bête !" Et, prenant Dussardier à l'écart, il lui demanda s'il pouvait le servir en quelque chose.

Le brave garçon fut attendri. Avec sa place de caissier, il n'avait besoin de rien.

Ensuite, Frédéric emmena Deslauriers dans sa chambre, et, tirant de son secrétaire deux mille francs :

— "Tiens, mon brave, empoche ! C'est le reliquat de mes vieilles dettes."

— "Mais... et le Journal ?" dit l'avocat. "J'en ai parlé à Hussonnet, tu sais bien."

Et, Frédéric ayant répondu qu'il se trouvait "un peu gêné, maintenant", l'autre eut un mauvais sourire.

Après les liqueurs, on but de la bière ; après la bière, des grogs ; on refuma des pipes. Enfin, à cinq heures du soir, tous s'en allèrent ; et ils marchaient les uns près des autres, sans parler, quand Dussardier se mit à dire que Frédéric les avait reçus parfaitement. Tous en convinrent.

Hussonnet déclara son déjeuner un peu trop lourd. Sénécals critiqua la futilité de son intérieur. Cisy pensait de même. Cela manquait de "cachet", absolument.

— "Moi, je trouve", dit Pellerin, "qu'il aurait bien pu me commander un tableau."

Deslauriers se taisait, en tenant dans la poche de son pantalon ses billets de banque.

Frédéric était resté seul. Il pensait à ses amis, et sentait entre eux et lui comme un grand fossé plein d'ombre qui les séparait. Il leur avait tendu la main cependant, et ils n'avaient pas répondu à la franchise de son cœur.

Il se rappela les mots de Pellerin et de Dussardier sur Arnoux. C'était une invention, une calomnie sans doute ? Mais pourquoi ? Et il aperçut Mme Arnoux, ruinée, pleurant, vendant ses meubles. Cette idée le tourmenta toute la nuit ; le lendemain, il se présenta chez elle.

Ne sachant comment s'y prendre pour communiquer ce qu'il savait, il lui demanda en manière de conversation si Arnoux avait toujours ses terrains de Belleville.

— "Oui, toujours."

— "Il est maintenant dans une compagnie pour du kaolin de Bretagne, je crois ?"

— "C'est vrai."

— "Sa fabrique marche très bien, n'est-ce pas ?"

— "Mais... je le suppose."

Et, comme il hésitait :

— "Qu'avez-vous donc ? vous me faites peur !"

Il lui apprit l'histoire des renouvellements.

Elle baissa la tête, et dit :

— "Je m'en doutais"

En effet, Arnoux, pour faire une bonne spéculation, s'était refusé à vendre ses terrains, avait emprunté dessus largement, et, ne trouvant point d'acquéreurs, avait cru se rattraper par l'établissement d'une manufacture. Les frais avaient dépassé les devis. Elle n'en savait pas davantage ; il éludait toute question et affirmait continuellement que "ça allait très bien" .

Frédéric tâcha de la rassurer. C'étaient peut-être des embarras momentanés. Du reste, s'il apprenait quelque chose, il lui en ferait part.

— "Oh ! oui, n'est-ce pas ?" dit-elle, en joignant ses deux mains, avec un air de supplication charmant.

Il pouvait donc lui être utile. Le voilà qui entrait dans son existence, dans son cœur.

Arnoux parut.

— "Ah ! comme c'est gentil, de venir me prendre pour dîner !"

Frédéric en resta muet.

Arnoux paria de choses indifférentes, puis avertit sa femme qu'il rentrerait fort tard, ayant un rendez-vous avec M. Oudry.

— "Chez lui ?"

— "Mais certainement, chez lui."

Il avoua, tout en descendant l'escalier, que, la Maréchale se trouvant libre, ils allaient faire ensemble une partie fine au Moulin-Rouge ; et, comme il lui fallait toujours quelqu'un pour recevoir ses épanchements, il se fit conduire par Frédéric jusqu'à la porte.

Au lieu d'entrer, il se promena sur le trottoir, en observant les fenêtres du second étage. Tout à coup les rideaux s'écartèrent.

— "Ah ! bravo ! le père Oudry n'y est plus. Bonsoir !" C'était donc le père Oudry qui l'entretenait ? Frédéric ne savait que penser maintenant.

A partir de ce jour-là, Arnoux fut encore plus cordial qu'auparavant ; il l'invitait à dîner chez sa maîtresse, et bientôt Frédéric hanta tout à la fois les deux maisons.

Celle de Rosanette l'amusait. On venait là le soir, en sortant du club ou du spectacle ; on prenait une tasse de thé, on faisait une partie de loto ; le dimanche, on jouait des charades ; Rosanette, plus turbulente que les autres, se distinguait par des inventions drolatiques, comme de courir à quatre pattes ou de s'affubler d'un bonnet de coton. Pour regarder les passants par la croisée, elle avait un chapeau de cuir bouilli ; elle fumait des chibouques, elle chantait des tyroliennes. L'après-midi, par désœuvrement, elle découpait des fleurs dans un morceau de toile perse, les collait elle-même sur ses carreaux, barbouillait de fard ses deux petits chiens, faisait brûler des pastilles, ou se tirait la bonne aventure. Incapable de résister à une envie, elle s'engouait d'un bibelot qu'elle avait vu, n'en dormait pas, courait l'acheter, le troquait contre un autre, et gâchait les étoffes, perdait ses bijoux, gaspillait l'argent, aurait vendu sa chemise pour une loge d'avant-scène. Souvent, elle demandait à Frédéric l'explication d'un mot qu'elle avait lu, mais n'écoutait pas sa réponse, car elle sautait vite à une autre idée, en multipliant les questions. Après des spasmes de gaieté, c'étaient des colères enfantines ; ou bien elle rêvait, assise par terre, devant le feu, la tête basse et le genou dans ses deux mains, plus inerte qu'une couleuvre engourdie. Sans y prendre garde, elle s'habillait devant lui, tirait avec lenteur ses bas de soie, puis se lavait à grande eau le visage, en se renversant la taille comme une naïade qui frissonne — , et le rire de ses dents blanches, les étincelles de ses yeux, sa beauté, sa gaieté éblouissaient Frédéric, et lui fouettaient les nerfs.

Presque toujours, il trouvait Mme Arnoux montrant à lire à son bambin, ou derrière la chaise de Marthe qui faisait des gammes sur son piano ; quand elle travaillait à un ouvrage de couture, c'était pour lui un grand bonheur que de ramasser, quelquefois, ses ciseaux. Tous ses mouvements étaient d'une majesté tranquille ; ses petites mains semblaient faites pour épandre des aumônes, pour essuyer des pleurs ; et sa voix, un peu sourde naturellement, avait des intonations caressantes et comme des légèretés de brise.

Elle ne s'exaltait point pour la littérature, mais son esprit charmait par des mots simples et pénétrants. Elle aimait les voyages, le bruit du vent dans les bois, et à se promener tête nue sous la pluie. Frédéric écoutait ces choses délicieusement, croyant voir un abandon d'elle-même qui commençait.

La fréquentation de ces deux femmes faisait dans sa vie comme deux musiques : l'une folâtre, emportée, divertissante, l'autre grave et presque religieuse ; et, vibrant à la fois, elles augmentaient toujours, et peu à peu se mêlaient ; — car, si Mme Arnoux venait à l'effleurer du doigt seulement, l'image de l'autre, tout de suite, se présentait à son désir, parce qu'il avait, de ce côté-là, une chance moins lointaine ; — et, dans la compagnie de Rosanette, quand il lui arrivait d'avoir le cœur ému, il se rappelait immédiatement son grand amour.

Cette confusion était provoquée par des similitudes entre les deux logements. Un des bahuts que l'on voyait autrefois boulevard Montmartre ornait à présent la salle à manger de Rosanette, l'autre, le salon de Mme Arnoux. Dans les deux maisons, les services de table étaient pareils, et l'on retrouvait jusqu'à la même calotte de velours traînant sur les bergères ; puis une foule de petits cadeaux, des écrans, des boîtes, des éventails allaient et venaient de chez la maîtresse chez l'épouse, car, sans la moindre gêne, Arnoux, souvent, reprenait à l'une ce qu'il lui avait donné, pour l'offrir à l'autre.

La Maréchale riait avec Frédéric de ses mauvaises façons. Un dimanche, après dîner, elle l'emmena derrière la porte, et lui fit voir dans son paletot un sac de gâteaux, qu'il venait d'escamoter sur la table, afin d'en régaler, sans doute, sa petite famille. M. Arnoux se livrait à des espiègleries côtoyant la turpitude. C'était pour lui un devoir que de frauder l'octroi ; il n'allait jamais au spectacle en payant, avec un billet de secondes prétendait toujours se pousser aux premières, et racontait comme une farce excellente qu'il avait coutume, aux bains froids, de mettre dans le tronc du garçon un bouton de culotte pour une pièce de dix sous, ce qui n'empêchait point la Maréchale de l'aimer.

Un jour, cependant, elle dit, en parlant de lui — “Ah ! il m'embête, à la fin ! J'en ai assez ! Ma foi, tant pis, j'en trouverai un autre !”

Frédéric croyait “l'autre” déjà trouvé et qu'il s'appelait M. Oudry.

— “Eh bien”, dit Rosanette, “qu'est-ce que cela fait ?”

Puis, avec des larmes dans la voix :

— “Je lui demande bien peu de chose, pourtant, et il ne veut pas, l'animal ! Il ne veut pas ! Quant à ses promesses, oh ! c'est différent.”

Il lui avait même promis un quart de ses bénéfices dans les fameuses mines de kaolin ; aucun bénéfice ne se montrait, pas plus que le cachemire dont il la leurrait depuis six mois.

Frédéric pensa, immédiatement, à lui en faire cadeau. Arnoux pouvait prendre cela pour une leçon et se fâcher.

Il était bon cependant, sa femme elle-même le disait. Mais si fou ! Au lieu d'amener tous les jours du monde à dîner chez lui, à présent il traitait ses connaissances chez le restaurateur. Il achetait des choses complètement inutiles, telles que des chaînes d'or, des pendules, des articles de ménage. Mme Arnoux montra même à Frédéric, dans le couloir, une énorme provision de bouillottes, chauffeuses et samovars. Enfin, un jour, elle avoua ses inquiétudes : Arnoux lui avait fait signer un billet, souscrit à l'ordre de M. Dambreuse.

Cependant, Frédéric conservait ses projets littéraires, par une sorte de point d'honneur vis-à-vis de lui-même. Il voulut écrire une histoire de l'esthétique, résultat de ses conversations avec Pellerin, puis mettre en drames différentes époques de la Révolution française et composer une grande comédie, par l'influence indirecte de Deslauriers et d'Hussonnet. Au milieu de son travail, souvent le visage de l'une ou de l'autre passait devant lui ; il luttait contre l'envie de la voir, ne tardait pas à y céder ; et il était plus triste en revenant de chez Mme Arnoux.

Un matin qu'il ruminait sa mélancolie au coin de son feu, Deslauriers entra. Les discours incendiaires de Sénécals avaient inquiété son patron, et, une fois de plus, il se trouvait sans ressources.

— “Que veux-tu que j'y fasse ?” dit Frédéric.

— “Rien ! tu n'as pas d'argent, je le sais. Mais ça ne te gênerait guère de lui découvrir une place, soit par M. Dambreuse ou bien Arnoux ?”

Celui-ci devait avoir besoin d'ingénieurs dans son établissement. Frédéric eut une inspiration : Sénécals pourrait l'avertir des absences du mari, porter des lettres, l'aider dans mille occasions qui se présenteraient. D'homme à homme, on se rend toujours ces services-là. D'ailleurs, il trouverait moyen de l'employer sans qu'il s'en doutât. Le hasard lui offrait un auxiliaire, c'était de bon augure, il fallait le saisir ; et, affectant de l'indifférence, il répondit que la chose peut-être était faisable et qu'il s'en occuperait.

Il s'en occupa tout de suite. Arnoux se donnait beaucoup de peine dans sa fabrique. Il cherchait le rouge de cuivre des Chinois mais ses couleurs se volatilisaient par la cuisson. Afin d'éviter les gerçures de ses faïences, il mêlait de la chaux à son argile ; mais les pièces se brisaient pour la plupart, l'émail de ses peintures sur cru bouillonnait, ses grandes plaques gondolaient ; et, attribuant ces mécomptes au mauvais outillage de sa fabrique, il voulait se faire faire d'autres moulins à broyer, d'autres séchoirs. Frédéric se rappela quelques-unes de ces choses ; et il l'aborda en annonçant qu'il avait découvert un homme très fort, capable de trouver son fameux rouge. Arnoux en fit un bond, puis, l'ayant écouté, répondit qu'il n'avait besoin de personne.

Frédéric exalta les connaissances prodigieuses de Sénecal, tout à la fois ingénieur, chimiste et comptable, étant un mathématicien de première force.

Le faïencier consentit à le voir.

Tous deux se chamaillèrent sur les émoluments. Frédéric s'interposa et parvint, au bout de la semaine, à leur faire conclure un arrangement.

Mais, l'usine étant située à Creil, Sénecal ne pouvait en rien l'aider. Cette réflexion, très simple, abattit son courage comme une mésaventure.

Il songea que plus Arnoux serait détaché de sa femme, plus il aurait de chance auprès d'elle. Alors, il se mit à faire l'apologie de Rosanette, continuellement ; il lui représenta tous ses torts à son endroit, conta les vagues menaces de l'autre jour, et même parla du cachemire, sans taire qu'elle l'accusait d'avarice.

Arnoux, piqué du mot (et, d'ailleurs, concevant des inquiétudes), apporta le cachemire à Rosanette, mais la gronda de s'être plainte à Frédéric ; comme elle disait lui avoir cent fois rappelé sa promesse, il prétendit qu'il ne s'en était pas souvenu, ayant trop d'occupations.

Le lendemain, Frédéric se présenta chez elle. Bien qu'il fût deux heures, la Maréchale était encore couchée ; et, à son chevet, Delmar, installé devant un guéridon, finissait une tranche de foie gras. Elle cria de loin : "Je l'ai, je l'ai" ; puis, le prenant par les oreilles, elle l'embrassa au front, le remercia beaucoup, le tutoya, voulut même le faire asseoir sur son lit. Ses jolis yeux tendres pétillaient, sa bouche humide souriait, ses deux bras ronds sortaient de sa chemise qui n'avait pas de manches ; et, de temps à autre, il sentait, à travers la batiste, les fermes contours de son corps. Delmar, pendant ce temps-là, roulait ses prunelles.

— "Mais, véritablement, mon amie, ma chère amie !..."

Il en fut de même les fois suivantes. Dès que Frédéric entra, elle montait debout sur un coussin, pour qu'il l'embrassât mieux, l'appelait un mignon, un chéri, mettait une fleur à sa boutonnière, arrangeait sa cravate ; ces gentillesse redoublaient toujours lorsque Delmar se trouvait là.

Étaient-ce des avances ? Frédéric le crut. Quant à tromper un ami, Arnoux, à sa place, ne s'en gênerait guère ! et il avait bien le droit de n'être pas vertueux avec sa maîtresse, l'ayant toujours été avec sa femme ; car il croyait l'avoir été, ou plutôt il aurait voulu se le faire accroire, pour la justification de sa prodigieuse couardise. Il se trouvait stupide cependant, et résolut de s'y prendre avec la Maréchale carrément.

Donc une après-midi, comme elle se baissait devant sa commode, il s'approcha d'elle et eut un geste d'une éloquence si peu ambiguë, qu'elle se redressa tout empourprée. Il recommença de suite ; alors, elle fondit en larmes, disant qu'elle était bien malheureuse et que ce n'était pas une raison pour qu'on la méprisât.

Il réitéra ses tentatives. Elle prit un autre genre, qui fut de rire toujours. Il crut malin de riposter par le même ton, et en l'exagérant. Mais il se montrait trop gai pour qu'elle le crût sincère ; et leur camaraderie faisait obstacle à l'épanchement de toute émotion sérieuse. Enfin, un jour elle répondit qu'elle n'acceptait pas les restes d'une autre.

— “Quelle autre ?”

— “Eh oui ! va retrouver madame Arnoux !”

Car Frédéric en parlait souvent ; Arnoux, de son côté, avait la même manie ; elle s'impatientait, à la fin, d'entendre toujours vanter cette femme ; et son imputation était une espèce de vengeance.

Frédéric lui en garda rancune.

Elle commençait, du reste, à l'agacer fortement. Quelquefois, se posant comme expérimentée, elle disait du mal de l'amour avec un rire sceptique qui donnait des démangeaisons de la gifler. Un quart d'heure après, c'était la seule chose qu'il y eût au monde, et, croisant ses bras sur sa poitrine, comme pour serrer quelqu'un, elle murmurait : “Oh ! oui, c'est bon ! c'est si bon !” les paupières entre-closes et à demi pâmée d'ivresse. Il était impossible de la connaître, de savoir, par exemple, si elle aimait Arnoux, car elle se moquait de lui et en paraissait jalouse. De même pour la Vatnaz, qu'elle appelait une misérable, d'autres fois sa meilleure amie. Elle avait, enfin, sur toute sa personne et jusque dans le retroussement de son chignon, quelque chose d'inexprimable qui ressemblait à un défi ; — et il la désirait, pour le plaisir surtout de la vaincre et de la dominer.

Comment faire ? car souvent elle le renvoyait sans nulle cérémonie, apparaissant une minute entre deux portes pour chuchoter : “Je suis occupée ; à ce soir !” ou bien il la trouvait au milieu de douze personnes ; et quand ils étaient seuls, on aurait juré une gageure, tant les empêchements se succédaient. Il l’invitait à dîner, elle refusait toujours ; une fois, elle accepta, mais ne vint pas.

Une idée machiavélique surgit dans sa cervelle.

Connaissant par Dussardier les récriminations de Pellerin sur son compte, il imagina de lui commander le portrait de la Maréchale, un portrait grandeur nature, qui exigerait beaucoup de séances ; il n’en manquerait pas une seule ; l’inexactitude habituelle de l’artiste faciliterait les tête-à-tête. Il engagea donc Rosanette à se faire peindre, pour offrir son visage à son cher Arnoux. Elle accepta, car elle se voyait au milieu du Grand Salon, à la place d’honneur, avec une foule devant elle, et les journaux en parleraient, ce qui “la lancerait” tout à coup.

Quant à Pellerin, il saisit la proposition avidement. Ce portrait devait le poser en grand homme, être un chef-d’œuvre.

Il passa en revue dans sa mémoire tous les portraits de maître qu’il connaissait, et se décida finalement pour un Titien, lequel serait rehaussé d’ornements à la Véronèse.

Donc il exécuterait son projet sans ombres factices, dans une lumière franche éclairant les chairs d’un seul ton, et faisant étinceler les accessoires.

— “Si je lui mettais”, pensa-t-il, “une robe de soie rose, avec un burnous oriental ? oh non ! canaille le burnous ! ou plutôt si je l’habillais de velours bleu, sur un fond gris, très coloré ? On pourrait lui donner également une collerette de guipure blanche, avec un éventail noir et un rideau d’écarlate par derrière ?”

Et, cherchant ainsi, il élargissait chaque jour sa conception et s’en émerveillait.

Il eut un battement de cœur quand Rosanette, accompagnée de Frédéric, arriva chez lui pour la première séance. Il la plaça debout, sur une manière d’estrade, au milieu de l’appartement ; et, en se plaignant du jour et regrettant son ancien atelier, il la fit d'abord s'accouder contre un piédestal, puis asseoir dans un fauteuil, et tour à tour s'éloignant d'elle et s'en rapprochant pour corriger d'une chiquenaude les plis de sa robe, il la regardait les paupières entre-closes, et consultait d'un mot Frédéric.

— “Eh bien, non !” s'écria-t-il. “J'en reviens à mon idée ! Je vous flanque en Vénitienne !”

Elle aurait une robe de velours ponceau avec une ceinture d'orfèvrerie, et sa large manche doublée d'hermine laisserait voir son bras nu qui toucherait à la balustrade d'un escalier montant derrière elle. A sa gauche, une grande colonne irait jusqu'au haut de la toile rejoindre des architectures, décrivant un arc. On apercevait en dessous, vaguement, des massifs d'orangers presque noirs, où se découperait un ciel bleu, rayé de nuages blancs. Sur le balustre couvert d'un tapis, il y aurait, dans un plat d'argent, un bouquet de fleurs, un chapelet d'ambre, un poignard et un coffret de vieil ivoire un peu jaune dégorgeant des sequins d'or ; quelques-uns même, tombés par terre çà et là, formeraient une suite d'éclaboussures brillantes, de manière à conduire l'oeil vers la pointe de son pied, car elle serait posée sur l'avant-dernière marche, dans un mouvement naturel et en pleine lumière.

Il alla chercher une caisse à tableaux, qu'il mit sur l'estrade pour figurer la marche ; puis il disposa comme accessoires sur un tabouret en guise de balustrade, sa vareuse, un bouclier, une boîte de sardines, un paquet de plumes, un couteau, et, quand il eut jeté devant Rosanette une douzaine de gros sous, il lui fit prendre sa pose.

— “Imaginez-vous que ces choses-là sont des richesses, des présents splendides. La tête un peu à droite ! Parfait ! et ne bougez plus ! Cette attitude majestueuse va bien à votre genre de beauté ?”

Elle avait une robe écossaise avec un gros manchon et se retenait pour ne pas rire.

— “Quant à la coiffure, nous la mêlerons à un tortis de perles : cela fait toujours bon effet dans les cheveux rouges.”

La Maréchale se récria, disant qu'elle n'avait pas les cheveux rouges.

— “Laissez donc ! Le Rouge des peintres n'est pas celui des bourgeois !”

Il commença à esquisser la position des masses ; et il était si préoccupé des grands artistes de la Renaissance, qu'il en parlait. Pendant une heure, il rêva tout haut à ces existences magnifiques, pleines de génie, de gloire et de somptuosités avec des entrées triomphales dans les villes, et des galas à la lueur des flambeaux, entre des femmes à moitié nues, belles comme des déesses.

— “Vous étiez faite pour vivre dans ce temps-là. Une créature de votre calibre aurait mérité un monseigneur !” Rosanette trouvait ses compliments fort gentils. On fixa le jour de la séance prochaine ; Frédéric se chargeait d'apporter les accessoires.

Comme la chaleur du poêle l'avait étourdie quelque peu, ils s'en retournèrent à pied par la rue du Bac et arrivèrent sur le pont Royal.

Il faisait un beau temps, âpre et splendide. Le soleil s'abaissait ; quelques vitres de maison, dans la Cité, brillaient au loin comme des plaques d'or, tandis que, par derrière, à droite, les tours de Notre-Dame se profilaient en noir sur le ciel bleu, mollement baigné à l'horizon dans des vapeurs grises. Le vent souffla et Rosanette ayant déclaré qu'elle avait faim, ils entrèrent à la Pâtisserie anglaise.

Des jeunes femmes, avec leurs enfants, mangeaient debout contre le buffet de marbre, où se pressaient, sous des cloches de verre, les assiettes de petits gâteaux. Rosanette avala deux tartes à la crème. Le sucre en poudre faisait des moustaches au coin de sa bouche. De temps à autre, pour l'essuyer, elle tirait son mouchoir de son manchon ; et sa figure ressemblait, sous sa capote de soie verte, à une rose épanouie entre ses feuilles.

Ils se remirent en marche ; dans la rue de la Paix, elle s'arrêta, devant la boutique d'un orfèvre, à considérer un bracelet ; Frédéric voulut lui en faire cadeau.

— “Non”, dit-elle, “garde ton argent.”

Il fut blessé de cette parole.

— “Qu'a donc le mimi ? On est triste ?” Et, la conversation s'étant renouée, il en vint, comme d'habitude, à des protestations d'amour.

— “Tu sais bien que c'est impossible !”

— “Pourquoi ?”

— “Ah ! parce que...”

Ils allaient côte à côte, elle appuyée sur son bras, et les volants de sa robe lui battaient contre les jambes. Alors, il se rappela un crépuscule d'hiver, où, sur le même trottoir, Mme Arnoux marchait ainsi à son côté ; et ce souvenir l'absorba tellement, qu'il ne s'apercevait plus de Rosanette et n'y songeait pas.

Elle regardait, au hasard, devant elle, tout en se laissant un peu traîner, comme un enfant paresseux. C'était l'heure où l'on rentrait de la promenade, et des équipages défilaient au grand trot sur le pavé sec. Les flatteries de Pellerin lui revenant sans doute à la mémoire, elle poussa un soupir.

— “Ah ! il y en a qui sont heureuses ! Je suis faite pour un homme riche, décidément.”

Il répliqua d'un ton brutal :

— “Vous en avez un, cependant !” car M. Oudry passait pour trois fois millionnaire.

Elle ne demandait pas mieux que de s'en débarrasser.

— “Qui vous en empêche ?”

Et il exhala d'amères plaisanteries sur ce vieux bourgeois à perruque, lui montrant qu'une pareille liaison était indigne, et qu'elle devait la rompre !

— “Oui”, répondit la Maréchale, comme se parlant à elle-même. “C'est ce que je finirai par faire, sans doute !”

Frédéric fut charmé de ce désintéressement. Elle se ralentissait, il la crut fatiguée. Elle s'obstina à ne pas vouloir de voiture et elle le congédia devant sa porte, en lui envoyant un baiser du bout des doigts.

— “Ah ! quel dommage ! et songer que des imbéciles me trouvent riche !”

Il était sombre en arrivant chez lui.

Hussonnet et Deslauriers l'attendaient.

Le bohème, assis devant sa table, dessinait des têtes de Turcs, et l'avocat, en bottes crottées, sommeillait sur le divan.

“Ah ! enfin”, s'écria-t-il. “Mais quel air farouche ! Peux-tu m'écouter ?”

